Use it with SQUIBB ANGLE TOOTHBRUSH — bent like a dentist's mirror to reach more places.
They're companions in cleanliness.
SQUIBB Dental Cream
SQUIBB
A name you can trust

MARY HALLAM

(Continued from Page 47)

gratitude that he was asking for, but an assurance that things looked better and brighter for her. And she could not deny him this satisfaction, and did not wish to. She looked at his down-bent head and knew that she felt not only gratitude but affection, and that she was by no means unhappy or unhopeful. She said, gently launching the words from her lips with confidence in them, "So far, glad." And added, "Yes, I'm glad."

He seemed moved by her assurance, when it came, for he lay perfectly still as though he listened with all his being. "I believe you mean it," he said, and stirred and sat up. Then he took up his cup. "This is the first wine we've drunk together," he said. "Let's have a toast." He waited for her to take up her cup and then said, raising his, "Here's to you, Mary Hallam, and here's hoping you'll say the same in a year's time."

She drank and then let him fill her glass again. "It's my turn now," she said, but when she raised her cup she could think of nothing to say but, "Here's to you, Alan." It was the first time she had used his Christian name, and she knew that he was as much aware of it as she was herself.

The sun poured down on their heads and all about them was peace and absolute silence, without even a bird's note to break it. He'll remember this day, she thought, when he's an old man, and I'll remember it when I'm an old woman. And the thought of growing old, of her flesh and bones and blood gradually changing and aging, seemed a luxury beyond her power to assess.

"I never thought you'd come with me," he said, "till the last minute. I was afraid you'd change your mind. I've just been thinking; if we go on as we've been going we'll get home day after tomorrow."

At the word "home" her doubts returned. "Alan," she asked him, "how are you going to explain to them all about me?"

"I lay awake last night," he said, "puzzling that out. I decided it would save a lot of talk if we just said we were going to be married." He went on without looking at her, "We could say that we're going to marry in about six months. I don't like saying what isn't true, but we've got to say something. Six months will give you time to think things over, and it would keep people's mouths shut. Not that I care what they say. But I've got to think of you."

She got up quickly and stood for a moment looking down at him. Then, her hands in the pockets of her coat, she walked away a little distance. Had he made the suggestion simply for her sake? Or had he some other motive? Presently she returned, still puzzled, and said, hesitating, "You wouldn't hold me to it, would you?"

"So that's what's the matter, is it?" he asked, looking intently at her. "Now just be sensible. I didn't want anyone to think you were just a girl I'd picked up; that's all. One minute you try to drown yourself and the next you're worrying because someone who's trying to help you may be taking an unfair advantage of you. Let me tell you this: I'm not going to get maudlin about you, so don't expect it."

She cried angrily, "I don't want you to get maudlin about me. It's the last thing I'd want."

"Maybe it'll be the last thing you'll get," he said with a sudden smile. "Think that over. We ought to be moving." He looked at his wrist watch. "Come on, let's pack up."

She began to tidy away the remains of the lunch. His self-assurance both steadied and annoyed her. She liked it, yet felt she ought to resent it. Then she thought, Who are you to resent anything? You've put yourself in his hands. Be thankful you can trust him.

As she got on the pillion seat behind him she broke a silence that had lasted for some minutes. "All right, you can tell them what you've just said you'd tell them."

She heard, above the noise of the starting engine, his casual and indifferent "O.K."

They crossed on the Townshend Ferry, and it was rough and stormy. She was not seasick, however, and stayed out-of-doors in the wind, tasting the salt spray and wearing her raincoat like a cape over her tweed coat. Alan got into talk with a man driving a small car whom he seemed to know, and she hardly spoke to him during the crossing.

Since he had made his first difficult, terse statement about his own life at Callac le Petit, he had told her little about himself. Both withheld confidences, feeling that there would be a time for them, but that it was not yet. Indeed, she wondered if she could ever unlock for him her Pandora's box of troubles, and how they would sound to his ears if she did. More and more these troubles began to seem like trivia compared with his.

At any rate, thanks to him, her anxiety as to her immediate future had lost its edge. The responsibility for her well-being had now become his; he had assumed it of his own free will, and for his own purposes. What she most liked and admired about him was his ability to cope with situations. There was something curiously adult about him, and she knew she had been fortunate in her encounter. She only hoped she would not fail him.

From Dover to Devizes she was too tired to take pleasure in the ride, or in the country through which they passed. When they stopped at an inn for a cup of tea, he told her his plans. He proposed leaving her in the village, in Burley, while he went home and prepared his family for her arrival. He would get old Mrs. Boles to make up a bed for her, and he would return for her in about an hour.

"I'll have to tell my mother tonight," he said, "because it's a small house and she'd be sure to hear your voice. But I think it would be best if you didn't see her until tomorrow." Then a look on her face made him say, "Don't worry, it's going to be all right. Think of her as a child. That's what she is. She couldn't face what she had to face. She went right back to a time when she was happy, when she was a little girl of nine or ten. And yet the queer thing is, she knows George and I are her sons. Simple is what she is. There are worse things, I suppose."

A soft, thick dusk was falling when they reached Burley. The village lay on either side of a small, cressy stream bordered by willows. A narrow and very old stone bridge with a humped back connected the two halves. Close to the bridge on one side was a church, surrounded thickly by trees, and on the other side was the inn, the Wheat Sheaf, and the post office.

It was a warm, still evening threaded with voices and the barking of dogs, and people

(Continued on Page 84)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Mine, All Mine

By Ursella Wadleigh

Johnny wears a black eye all the time;
His clothes are full of lovely rips and tears.
He hates the sight of toothbrush, comb and water.
To keep his room his kingdom, he sets snares.
Just when I think I'm off my beam,
He turns on me with grin and shining eyes,
Hugs me hard and in my hand,
He puts a crawling thing—his newest prize.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

New! Blush-cleanse your face—for that Engaged-lovely look

See it give your skin:

an instant clean, refreshed look an instant softer, silkier feel

—a lovely blush of color

YOU'LL SEE RESULTS TONIGHT—with the new blush-cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream. It cream-cleanses and cream-rinses your face to a softer, lovelier look!

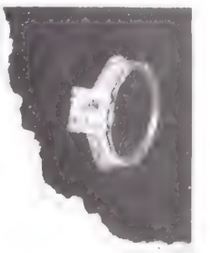
YOU BLUSH-CLEANSE—Run your face with warm water. Dip deep into soft, smooth Pond's Cold Cream. Swirl it on your receptive, moist warm skin in little creamy "engagement ring" circles up over your face and throat. Tissue off.

YOU BLUSH-RINSE—Cream again with more new, soft Pond's Cold Cream. Swirl about 5 more creamy circlets over your face. Tissue well. Finish with cold water. Blot dry.

EXTRA CLEANSING, GLOWING. [illegible] with your hands and face? Pond's cream-cleans [illegible] and cream-rinses [illegible] makeup—expels free grime with it! Leaves skin [illegible]

This complete Pond's [illegible] Every morning—for a bright-awake look—a once-over [illegible] with Pond's!

PRISCILLA THOMPSON—[illegible] complexion! Cream-smooth, adorable . . . blush-cleansed by Pond's



PRISCILLA'S RING—[illegible] brilliant with [illegible] diamonds [illegible] at [illegible]

She's Engaged!

She's Lovely! She uses Pond's!

PRISCILLA THOMPSON beautifully expresses today's new look of young elegance—with accent on her smooth gold hair, her smooth ivory complexion.

One of Chicago's fashionable young set, she is the daughter of Mrs. Thomas Bruce Thompson and the late Mr. Thompson—and is engaged to William Paul Henricks also of Chicago. He is an Ex-Navy Lieutenant Commander and served in the Pacific.

Priscilla is an enthusiast about blush-cleansing with Pond's. "I've never known anything to give my face such a lovely washed-up, soft feeling," she says.

Have the Pond's blush-cleansed look. Get your Pond's Cold Cream today! You'll find the luxurious, big 6-ounce jar is especially nice to use.

Among the [illegible] women of Society who use Pond's

[illegible] CHARLES CAVENDISH

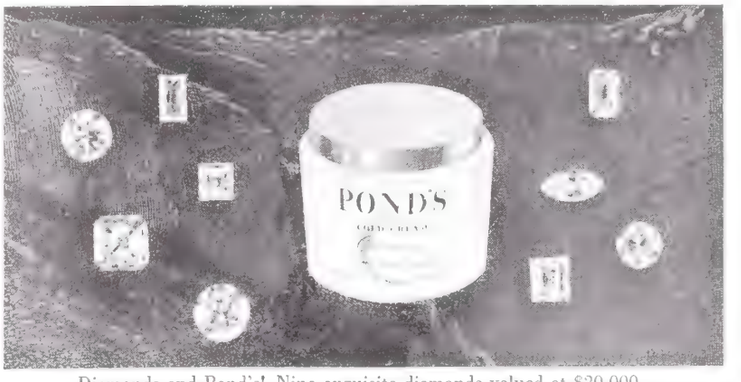
MRS. ANTHONY [illegible] MRS. FRANCIS D. [illegible]

[illegible] MARCHIONESS OF CARISBROOKE

MRS. ALLEN [illegible] THE HON. [illegible] MARY GRESHAM

[illegible] WILLIAM RHINELANDER [illegible]

THE PRINCESS [illegible] DI TORLONIA MRS. ERNEST DU PONT, JR.



Diamonds and Pond's! Nine exquisite diamonds valued at $20,000—destined for some of America's loveliest engaged girls

Before you invest in the last word in laundries...

Here's every invention to make washday easy...including a speedy Gas [illegible] — especially the new do-everything washing machine. But before you invest in one of these wonder washers, ask yourself this: "Do I have an [illegible] hot water supply? It must have to work properly!" Remember the average automatic washer needs about 40 gallons of 140° water in 30 minutes to turn out a fluffy, snow-white laundry. The new automatic Gas water-heaters are designed specifically to meet such needs. They replace the hot water supply almost as fast as it is drawn off. Cost amazingly little to run. Eliminate old-fashioned fuss and inconvenience. In fact, no matter how you wash your clothes, an automatic Gas water-heater is a necessity in every modern household. Order one in the right size for your family — today!

DISHWASHING [illegible]

GAS

for the last word in automatic water-heating

ALTOGETHER there are 140 household uses for hot water. Check over them all, and get a new automatic Gas water-heater like this. See the many new models on display at most Gas appliance dealers' right now!

AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

(Continued from Page 82)

were walking about the main street and sitting on their doorsteps or in their front gardens. Some of them looked up as the motorcycle noisily crossed the bridge and stopped in front of the Wheat Sheaf, and one or two called out greetings to Alan, who answered briefly. He took Mary into the inn and asked the proprietor, a short, stout man in riding breeches, to give her some supper.

"This is Mr. Luck," he said, "a good friend of mine. He'll look after you. I'll be back in an hour."

Mr. Luck, to her great relief, showed no curiosity about her. It was clear that he thought the village of greater interest and importance. They had had good weather, he said, for the harvest, and everybody had been busy helping to get it in. She presently sat down to a supper of cold beef, salad and plum tart brought to her in the dining room by Mr. Luck himself. He continued to talk about local affairs until Alan's return.

As they went out to get on the motorcycle, Alan said, "George is pretty excited. He thinks I'm telling him fairy tales. I've moved into his room –there are two beds in it—and you'll have to sleep in mine. Mrs. Boles sleeps in my mother's room."

"Oh," said Mary. "Then when she goes, shouldn't I ——"

"No," he said, as she got up behind him. "I'll rig up an electrical gadget so that if she wants anything in the night, her bell will ring in my room."

Only to strangers, she soon learned, did Alan and George speak of Mrs. Garstin as "mother." At home they referred to her simply as "her" or "she." Their lives were built around hers; she was the childish, incalculable deity of the house. Something of this Mary had already guessed. Holding to Alan's waist as they sped out of the village, she took a pride in his unusualness, and in the unusualness of his situation. It set him apart; he was not the ordinary young man she had at first taken him for. Her hands tightly pressing his belt, she thought, He's all I have now to hold to.

> It isn't tying himself to one woman that a man dreads when he thinks of marrying, it's separating himself from all the others.
> —HELEN ROWLAND.

They went up a hill, rising directly from the water meadows. An almost full moon possessed the sky and the night, and she felt she was in an improbable dream, invented between sleep and waking. The road then ran downhill among trees, where the lighted windows of farms showed cozily, and along a narrow lane between hedges, where they presently stopped at a small white gate. Looking with anxious eyes at what was to be her home, she saw a squarely built stone cottage, its windows lighted and no curtains drawn. In an upper room figures were moving, and for an instant she caught a glimpse of a woman with long, tied-back hair falling between her shoulders. Alan said:

"Mrs. Boles is putting her to bed."

THE front door opened and a tall boy came out to meet them. He came awkwardly, with shy uncertainty. In the light from the open door Mary saw a head of rough fair hair.

"Here's George," said Alan, holding the gate open.

Mary put out her hand. "How are you, George?" she said.

The boy made an unintelligible answer, dropped her hand quickly and said, turning to Alan, "Let me put the bike away."

As George disappeared around the corner of the house, Alan said, "He'll be all right when he gets used to you. He doesn't see enough people, poor kid."

He took her into the living room, a square cottage room with a round table in the center of it, on which an oil lamp with a white china shade shed its homely light. Mary, glancing around her, saw that the walls were papered with an old-fashioned paper and hung with a few prints. There was an open brick fireplace, and on the mantel above it stood a clock and a pair of spotted china dogs. On the opposite wall there were bookshelves filled with shabby books. There were two easy chairs, with sagging seats and faded covers, and an old-fashioned sofa. The carpet was old and patched, but clean, and the room smelled of wax polish and paraffin. On a small table in the window a few flowers were arranged stiffly in a white vase.

There were footsteps on the stairs and Mrs. Boles came in. She walked stiffly and held on to the back of a chair to cross the room.

"This is Miss Mary Hallam," Alan said.

MARY got up and shook hands with the old woman, who drew a small chair out from the table and sat down, her hands under her apron. Mary thought she had never seen anyone so bloodless, so like a decent, tidily dressed corpse, ready for its burial. Except for her white apron she was all in black, and her temples, nose, forehead seemed transparent. She smelled of the years, though she was clean as a scrubbed pine table. She looked at Mary with bright, impersonal old eyes, devoid of expression, used only for seeing objects that needed her attention.

"You'll be company for the boys, miss," she said. "It'll be nice for them to have a young lady in the house." She turned to Alan. "Well, I put her to bed; she was as good as gold and went like a lamb. 'Alan's home,' she kept saying, 'Alan's home, Mrs. Boles.' She's been no trouble at all lately. I've kept accounts of everything, and I hope you'll find everything right."

"Of course it's right, Mrs. Boles. I don't know what we'd have done without you."

"I'm not able to get about as I used to," said the old woman. "If it wasn't for the stairs I might stay on, but I can't manage the stairs, not with my legs. Doctor said, 'Mrs. Boles,' he said, 'it's time someone took care of you instead of you taking care of them,' he said, but I said, 'Who's going to take care of me, doctor? I've done for others since I was twelve, and I'll go on doing for others till the end,' I said."

And she will, thought Mary.

Alan presently went into the kitchen with Mrs. Boles to look over the accounts, and Mary and George were left alone. Mary asked who had helped them before Mrs. Boles came, and he said that an aunt had lived with them, his mother's younger sister, a widow, but that she had married again two years ago and had gone to Canada.

"Isn't it awfully lonely for you?" she asked.

He shook his head. "Not for me." His face took on an expression of exaggerated seriousness. "I always have plenty to think about."

There was a long silence and then he asked if Alan had told her they had a bathroom. She said he hadn't, and indeed the matter had been much in her mind. She had feared an outdoor privy, and the most primitive sort of washing arrangements.

"Alan built it three years ago," he said, and got up. "I'll show you if you like."

She followed him through the kitchen, where Alan and Mrs. Boles were sitting at the table. It was a pleasant little room, and contained a tall dresser, an oilstove, a small boiler, a sink and four kitchen chairs. Wherever she looked there was order and neatness. George threw open the door of a lean-to, and said, "Here it is," in a voice full of boyish pride. She saw a white enameled tub, a hand basin with running water, a cement floor and walls of pitch pine.

"Did Alan really do all this himself?" she asked, marveling.

"I helped him a bit, but I was only a kid of twelve then. And a chap in the village helped with the plumbing. Alan did all the rest. The bathtub cost ten pounds."

"It's beautiful," Mary said.

As they passed through the kitchen again, Alan glanced up at her and said in a brisk, impersonal way, "You're dead tired. George, take her upstairs and show her her room." He added, "Breakfast's at seven-thirty."

Mary admitted that she was more than ready for bed, said good night, and gladly

(Continued on Page 86)

I'LL SAY RINSO'S TRIPLE-ACTION SUDS GETS OUT STUBBORN DIRT—FAST!

says
Mrs. Edward D. Cone
of Bloomfield, N.J.

RINSO'S FORMULA GIVES YOU ALL THREE—

1. SOAPY-RICH BASE—makes suds that drive deep down—gets out stubborn dirt without hard rubbing or scrubbing.

2. SUDS-BOOSTER—even in hard water you get heaps of hard-working suds—and FAST!

3. GREASE-CHASER—goes after grease and grime—but it's easy on the hands—helps prevent yellowing of clothes, too!

Bring on your big washes—table linens, shirts, dresses, towels, even extra-dirty work clothes and play clothes. Rinso's soapy-rich suds drive deep down and get out that stubborn dirt fast—easy—safe!

Rinso's soapy-rich suds [illegible] Your whites come out [illegible] Rinso White. And your gay washables [illegible] stay bright as new after dozens and dozens of Rinso washings.

THE ONLY SOAP RECOMMENDED BY MAKERS OF 33 LEADING WASHERS

RINSO IS A PRODUCT OF LEVER BROTHERS COMPANY

ANYONE CAN GET A WASH THAT'S

RIN-SO WHITE

RIN-SO BRIGHT

Overweight may menace your health, especially if you are over 30, for it often goes hand in hand with high blood pressure, heart ailments, diabetes, and other diseases. However, if you are under 30, a small amount of overweight can be beneficial.

The chief cause of overweight is overeating. It rarely results from glandular disturbances or other causes.

If you are overweight, let your doctor diagnose the cause. Follow his advice for bringing your weight down to normal, or a little below.

Keep it there—and help assure a longer, happier life!

For further helpful information, send for Metropolitan's free booklet, 37-J, "Overweight and Underweight."

It contains lists of the calorie values of almost 300 foods, suggested low-calorie menus, illustrated reducing exercises, and a table of ideal weights.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N.Y.

TO VETERANS—IF YOU HAVE NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE—KEEP IT!

(Continued from Page 84)

followed George up the stairs. On the upper floor there were three bedrooms. They tiptoed past Mrs. Garstin's door, and George opened the door of a small room to the left of the stairs.

"Here's where you'll sleep," he said.

It was a small neat room with white casement curtains at the one window and a clean white bedspread on the iron single bed. Besides a table and a chair there were a chest of drawers full of Alan's clothes neatly arranged, a hanging mirror, and over the bed two shelves filled with books. Holding up the lamp, she scrutinized their titles. On the top shelf were two "Westerns," an old volume of Sherlock Holmes, a single volume of Shakespeare containing only the tragedies, a Bible, Pilgrim's Progress, and a book of Kipling's verse. On the lower shelf were Maugham's Of Human Bondage, three technical books on electrical engineering, and a book on gardening.

She waited till all the noises of the house had ceased except for a murmur of talk from the room where George and Alan were, before slipping down the stairs and into the bathroom. Surely, she thought, Alan couldn't run this house and pay Mrs. Boles out of what he earned. She had no idea what wages he received, but it seemed likely that Mrs. Garstin was not penniless. Probably, she thought, she had an annuity, if perhaps a small one. But Alan, she realized, had a talent for living, for managing his affairs. There was nothing at all of the helpless male about him. She guessed that he would regard her poor efforts at housekeeping with pitying contempt.

The thought of the morning and her first meeting with Mrs. Garstin kept her awake for some time, but at last she slept, uneasily, for the bed was hard and her fears produced one alarming dream after another. Suddenly, in the midst of her dreams, she heard a voice; it seemed to speak loudly and clearly within her very ear, inside her head. With a start she was wide awake, and the penetrating, pervasive tones continued to echo, like the reverberations of a gong. Never before had she had such an experience. "Be not afraid," the voice had said, and now, wide awake, she could hear the diminishing echo repeating itself, "Be not afraid . . . be not afraid," in dying waves of sound. She lay listening with her whole being in a state of excited expectancy. Where had it come from? Who or what had spoken?

> Wise men, instead of exploding general prejudices, employ their sagacity to discover the latest wisdom which prevails in them.
>
> —EDMUND BURKE.

WHEREVER it came from, it was the message of all messages that she needed. She knew that it was fear and fear alone that had driven her down the sands and into the sea, an accumulation of fears never admitted, never expressed. Looking back over her life, she saw that her every act had been dictated by fear: fear for her own future, fear of disappointment, fear of loneliness, fear of failure. She had snatched too hastily at Ferdinand Walsh because she was afraid. In the dark little room she turned a new scrutiny upon her hatred of Letty; and that, too, she now saw, had arisen from childish fear of her. Fear of her father, too much a stranger to her, had kept them apart. And fear of what she would find at the end of this journey had tormented her during every mile of it. She clearly saw how utterly illogical it was to fear for the fate of what she had tried her hardest to destroy. To live in a continual state of nervous apprehension over something she had already thrown away was, she saw, the supremest folly. Relax, she said to herself, and gradually she let every tense muscle and sinew go, drew in her breath gently and let time flow over her, softly and darkly, aware of a sense of peace and a quiet exaltation.

She woke to the twittering of birds, looked out on a small, somewhat neglected garden, saw that a soft rain was falling, and dressed quickly. She was downstairs before Alan or George, though Mrs. Boles had been up and about for half an hour, and the water wa boiling on the oilstove for tea. She helpe the old woman, who said that the damp mad her joints stiffer, and took note of all tha she said and did. Breakfast was not a com plicated affair. They had tea, porridge, bacon bread and butter, and jam. Mrs. Garsti stayed quietly in her bed, Mrs. Boles said till a tray was taken up to her. There wa no hot water in the morning; the boiler wa lighted and baths were taken three times week and at night. Alan had a kettle of ho water to shave with. In winter, Mrs. Bole said, the kitchen was warmed by an o heater, and there was another for Mr Garstin's room, while the boys kept th house supplied with wood for the sitting room fire. Alan, she said, was as good housekeeper as any woman, and better tha most.

"SURPRISING what he knows," she said "but he's carried a burden since he was lad, and that's made him wise before h time. He'll make a good husband."

As he ate his breakfast, Alan asked Mar if she had had a good night.

"Very good," she told him.

"The bed's hard."

"I got used to it."

"I'll clear the things out of the drawer tonight. And on my way home I'll stop a the post office to see if any of your parce have come."

"I hope they have," she said. "Anyway I'll do some washing today." She caught look of what she took for amusement in h eyes and added, "Perhaps Mrs. Boles wi help me. I've never done any washing ironing."

Mrs. Boles looked at her as if she coul not have heard her correctly, said, "Neve done ——" and then fe silent, as if the matte were beyond her compre hension.

After Alan left, Mar helped Mrs. Boles with th cleaning and tidying kitchen and sitting room and the old woman the went upstairs to Mrs. Ga stin's room with a tra and remained up there, while Mary sat the sitting room darning her three pairs stockings. She could hear the voices of th two women over her head, Mrs. Garstin's curiously light and childish treble. She fe that since last night she had turned a fres page of her life, that she had put the pa behind her. As her needle went in and ou she told herself that she had not a worry now, in the world. If her health continue to improve—and she was beginning to be lieve it might—she had little to wish fo She liked George. She liked, trusted an even admired Alan. She was not going to b afraid of Mrs. Garstin. She had work to do It was as simple as that.

The voices from above became suddenl louder, and there were steps on the stairs "And now you'll see the nice young lad Alan's brought back with him," she hear Mrs. Boles say, as if she were speaking to child. "She's going to look after the hous when I've gone, just like he told you. Com along, dear. There's nothing to be afraid of."

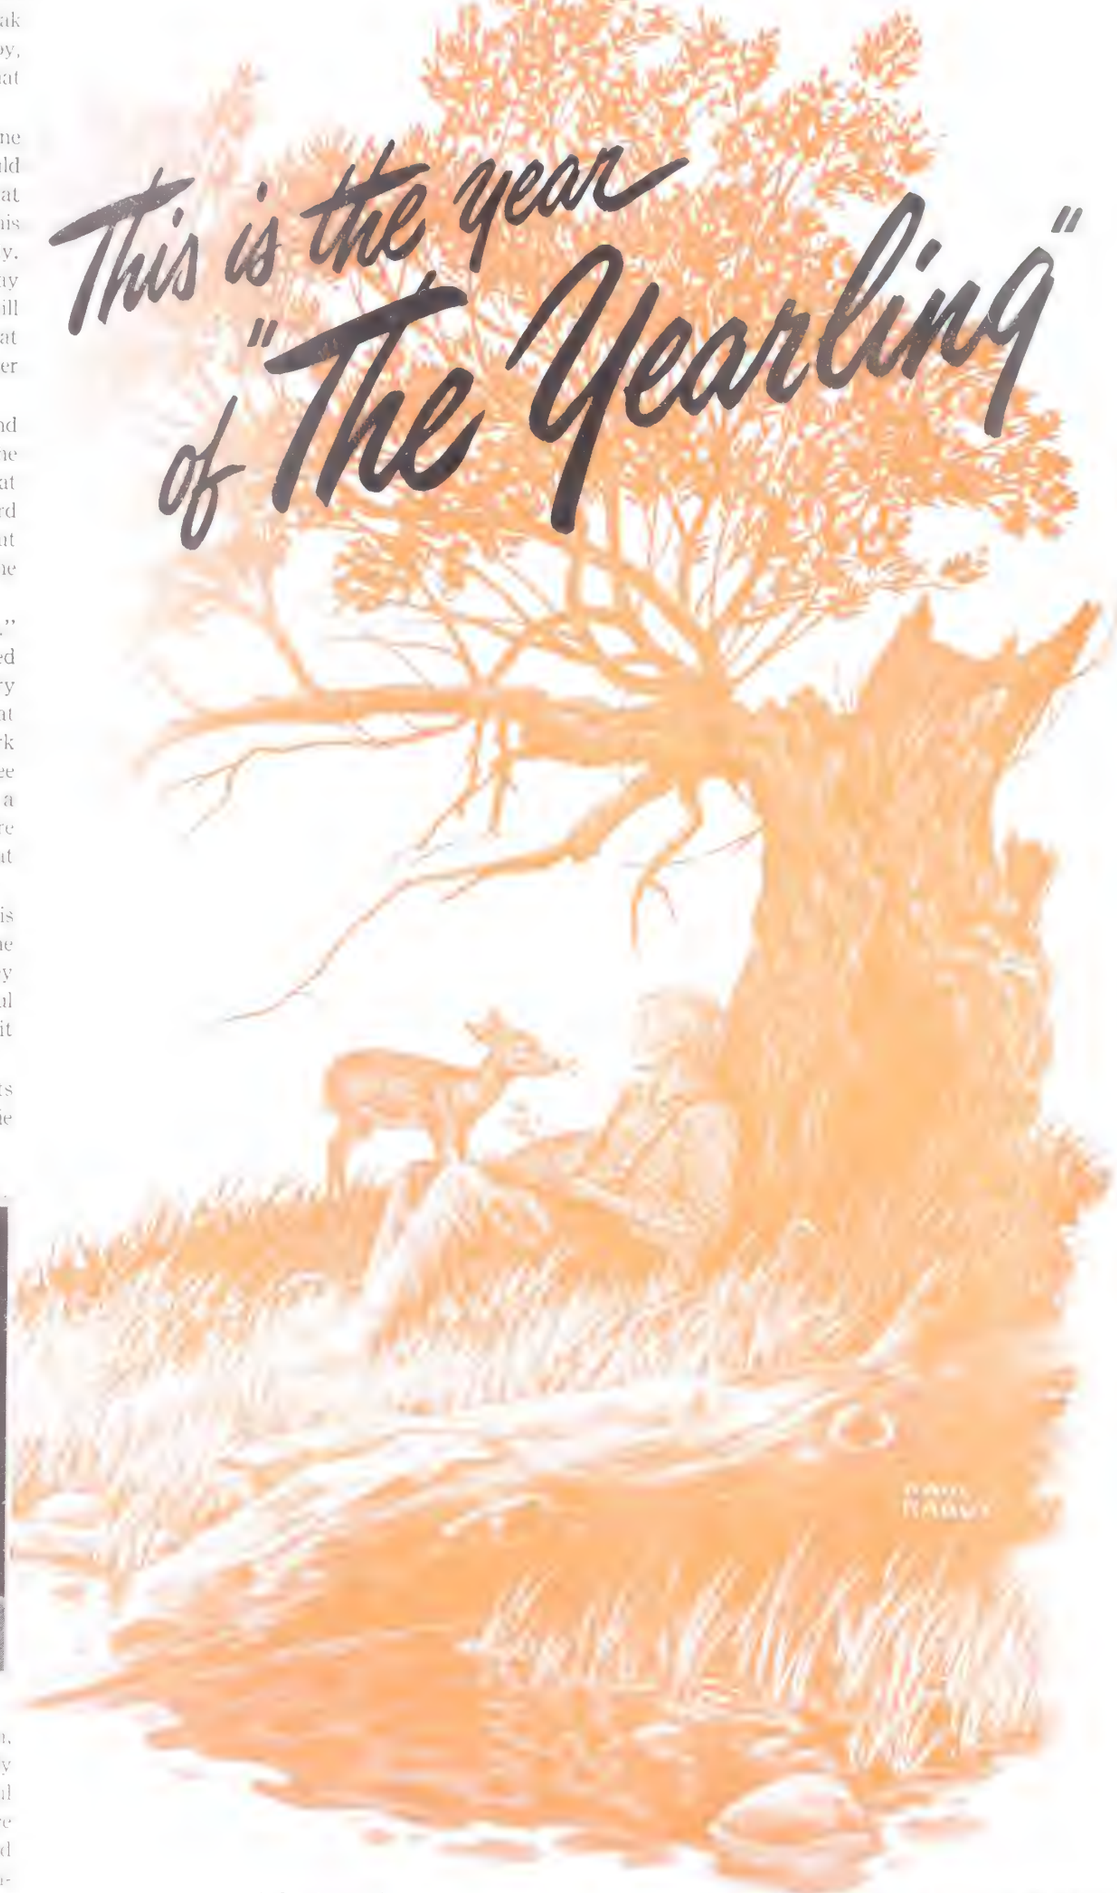
Quickly Mary put down her darning Mrs. Garstin was afraid. She was frightene at the thought of a stranger in the house Oh, the poor creature! Her own lingerin dreads vanished in an instant as Mrs. Bole came in, holding the arm of a thin woman with fair, whitening hair worn in a great bun large blue eyes which rolled too much i their sockets and features that must once have been irresistibly pretty. The lips parte a little, and the whole expression was that o a child on its best behavior, trying hard t remember to do and say correctly all that i had been told to do and say. It was a per sonality so appealing, so pathetic, so hesitan that Mary was half afraid to go forward fo fear of giving alarm. But she went, holdin out her hand, and Mrs. Boles, a little roughl but with kindly intent, pushed forward th right hand of her charge.

(Continued on Page 89)

NEWLIN WILDES

OFFERS HIS IMPRESSIONS TO LADIES' HOME JOURNAL READERS

This is the year of "The Yearling"



f you have a heart you'll love "The Yearling." You will truly love it because it is the story of a young family, a father, a mother and a boy, o live in a strange, a dangerous, a hard and a note part of this world. A part of this world ich you have never seen, probably, but which u should see. It is a story that will almost break ur heart, sometimes, because it is about a boy, ery young and growing boy, and the things that loved and that he had to do.

He loved animals, this boy, and he wanted one imal that he could call his own, that would low him through the woods and glades, and that could talk to and that would be his friend, his ry dear and close friend. His only friend, really. e got that friend, finally, and he got it in a way at will thrill you and terrify you and that will ld you breathless as you watch. He got that end in spite of a mother who wanted to love her n, but who did not dare.

And when he has his friend, this boy Jody, and s named his friend Flag, then you will see the ings happen that make a boy grow older, that ake a boy grow up and be a man. They are hard ings that happen to this boy, bitter things, but ey give him something else, something that he s needed and wanted all his life.

You will see a new star born in "The Yearling." aude Jarman, Jr. is his name, and be assured at he will do to your heart is something very nderful. You will see Gregory Peck in a role that great and human and warming, and full of stark nger and poise and courage. And you will see ne Wyman as Jody's mother, in a hard role, a y hard role, but one that will make you admire more than you ever have before, and one that l draw you to her in greatest sympathy.

There are others too, many others, and theirs is tory photographed in the full brilliance of the id color of that strange and hard world they e in. "The Yearling" is a great and wonderful perience. If you have a heart you will love it d be better for having seen it.

"The Yearling" is The Picture Of The Year. Its rs, Gregory Peck and Jane Wyman, are Marjorie nnan Rawlings's characters come to life.

The supporting cast headed by Claude Jarman, , includes Clem Bevans, Margaret Wycherly d Forrest Tucker. The screen play by Paul born is superb. Director-producer Clarence own and producer Sidney Franklin have created Technicolor film of which Metro-Goldwyn-ayer may be truly proud.

(Advertisement)

ILLUSTRATED BY PAUL RABUT

Good eating made easy!

That's the wonderful thing about Treet!

Treet-Corn-Potato Scallop

Here's the Treet meal-in-one-dish that has everything—it's easy-cooking, good-looking, good-tasting, good for you! Cube contents 1 tin of Treet, heat with ½ cup milk, 2 cups cream-style corn, ⅓ cup chopped green pepper, ⅓ cup chopped onion, 1½ tsps. salt, ⅛ tsp. pepper. Arrange this mixture with 5 cups hot sliced potatoes (cooked 10 min.) in layers in casserole. Sprinkle flour on each layer. Dot with Cloverbloom Butter, cover, bake 30 min. in 375° F. oven. Cut contents of another tin of Treet in 8 slices and arrange on top of casserole. Bake uncovered 15 min. Serves 8 —with lettuce wedges and 1000 Island dressing.

Treet — not one but two favorite meats!

There's more to Treet than you see or taste—tremendous food values are concentrated in this blend of tender pork shoulder and sugar-cured ham. Treet is rich in proteins and calories, minerals and vitamins—and none of this nutritious goodness is ever lost, for Treet is sealed in the tin before cooking. Remember, Treet is not one but two favorite meats—and you can serve Treet any way you serve ham!

For additional Treet and Canned Meats recipes, write Marie Gifford, Dept. 47, P. O. Box 2053, Chicago 9, Ill.

The best and nothing but the best is labeled

ARMOUR ★

Serve Treet every way you serve ham!

(Continued from P[illegible])

I am Mary Hallam," Mary said. "I e last night. How do you do?"
I'm better, thank you," said Mrs. Gar-, and Mrs. Boles put in, in an undertone: She always says she's better, poor lamb."
I've been doing some mending," Mary . "My stockings were full of holes."
. Garstin nodded and then looked in-ingly at Mrs. Boles.
Yes, dear," said the old woman, "I w. I've forgotten your sewing. I'll go nd get it."

ARY said she would go, and asked where as. On the window sill in Mrs. Garstin's n, the old woman said, and Mary ran airs. This was the largest bedroom, and filled with things that must have be-ged to Mrs. Garstin's early youth. There e Victorian engravings on the walls, and e china and bric-a-brac of the same period nged on hanging shelves. On a bedside e were framed photographs of Alan and rge, taken some years earlier. Flowers e stuck stiffly here and there into small ow-necked vases, probably by Mrs. es. She ran down with the sewing basket set it on the table, and at once Mrs. stin held out her hands for it.
Wait, dear," said Mrs. Boles. "I'll thread needle for you. Now just sit quiet and to the young lady, there's a good girl."
Irs. Garstin turned her head away, like a child, but a moment later, as Mary ed up her mending, she felt that the et and empty blue eyes were watching Mary looked up at her and smiled.
fter an hour's work, she glanced out the dow and saw that the rain had stopped. as growing lighter, clouds were breaking all the green foliage about the house ened with wet. She looked down at Mrs. stin's feet. She wore a blue cotton dress an old gray cardigan, a little tight from y washings. She was well shod for walk-even on wet roads, and Mary thought might take her along the lane a little way.
Would you like a walk?" she asked.
Irs. Garstin looked up with an air of prise. "Is it Sunday?" she asked.
No," Mary said. "It's Thursday, but dn't we go just the same?" Then she erstood. Mrs. Boles found walking so cult that it was probably left to Alan or rge to take her out when Sunday came. e'll go," Mary said firmly. "I'd like to You see, I only came last night, and I en't been out yet. Then we can finish our ing when we come back."
Irs. Garstin at once looked happy. She dled her bits of stuff into the basket and up. Mary took her arm and they went together, Mrs. Garstin smiling shyly and erly like a child being given a treat. A ll brick path led to the gate, on either side of which were tall lilac bushes. The lane, curving and narrow, continued for a hundred yards or so to the left and ended at a wide farm gate. On the other side of the gate were meadows, where cows were grazing. From this farm, Mrs. Boles had told her, they got milk, butter and eggs. The house could just be seen, screened by tall elms. They walked as far as the gate, slowly, Mrs. Garstin on Mary's arm. She was light and walked with a curiously springing step. Mary asked her if she liked walking and Mrs. Garstin said that she did, but that she was afraid of meeting strangers.

"I don't like people," she said. "They stare at me. They're wicked. I'm wicked, too, but I don't stare. I know it's rude."

"You're not wicked," Mary said. "Alan and George wouldn't love you if you were."

Her head nodded solemnly, childishly. "I am. I am very, very, very wicked. The most wicked person in the world. George and Alan love me because I'm their mother, but I'm very wicked." And she gave Mary a grave and portentous look.

The air was delicious with the scent of ferns and wet earth, and the sun now came out warm and bright, and every raindrop glistened. "How beautiful it is!" Mary said, hoping to turn her mind to other topics.

Over to the south there rose up in a clear and lovely line the chalk downs, with heavy clumps of trees on their sides and summits, looking dark and solid. The whole countryside undulated, rising softly here, falling softly there, and the yellow harvested fields made lovely patterns against the distant blues and greens of hill and meadow.

"I'd like to walk down the lane a little way," Mary said. "As far as the next farm gate if you're not tired."

MRS. GARSTIN smiled her assent, and walked beside her. "We're like two sisters," she said. "Two sisters who've met after a great many years. I wonder where we've been all this time. Don't you?"

"It would be interesting to know, wouldn't it?" said Mary, and then, thinking, I mustn't deal too much in fantasy, it may be bad for her, said, "Most of the time, of course, I've been in London."

"In London," echoed Mrs. Garstin, and added thoughtfully, "Perhaps at the Army and Navy Stores."

Her mention of this shop, with which people living in the country so frequently dealt, encouraged Mary. "Well, I've often been there," she said. "To buy things."

Mrs. Garstin considered this. "Was it guns or ropes you went for?" she asked.

"Neither," Mary answered. "Once I bought a camera, and once I bought a dog, a little collie puppy. I loved him more than anything in the world."

"More than your mother or your father?"

"More than anything I had to play with, I mean."

"Then," asked Mrs. Garstin, "why didn't you bring him with you?"

"He died a long time ago."

Her arm was clutched convulsively. "He . . . died!"

"Well," said Mary, fearful of having made a blunder, "he was very old. He's buried under a beech tree in the country and bluebells grow on his grave."

"He died! Oh," Mrs. Garstin whispered, "how dreadful!"

And Mary thought, I must never speak of death again.

Mrs. Garstin loosened her tight clutch of her arm, and paused in the rutted lane, which, except that it was open to the sky, looked as though it had been "Tell me something."

O Bygone Days . . .

1898—DELIGHTFUL MRS. "PAT" CAMPBELL was the London stage star. Equally well known was that popular yachtsman and tea merchant, Sir Thomas Lipton.

The former was renowned for the roles of Paula Tanqueray and Irene. The latter . . . for his incomparable blend of tea from his own Ceylon tea gardens. brisk-flavored Lipton's!

1947—JOAN CAULFIELD is one of the brightest stars of the day. She will soon appear in Paramount's "WELCOME STRANGER."

JOAN SAYS, "Sir Thomas Lipton made me a third-generation tea drinker. My grandmother started the family off on his fresh, spirited tea." The reason, Joan, you and your people like Lipton's is because it's brisk.

Brisk means richer flavor—the result of Lipton's scientific blending of as many as 18 different teas, each chosen for its special character.

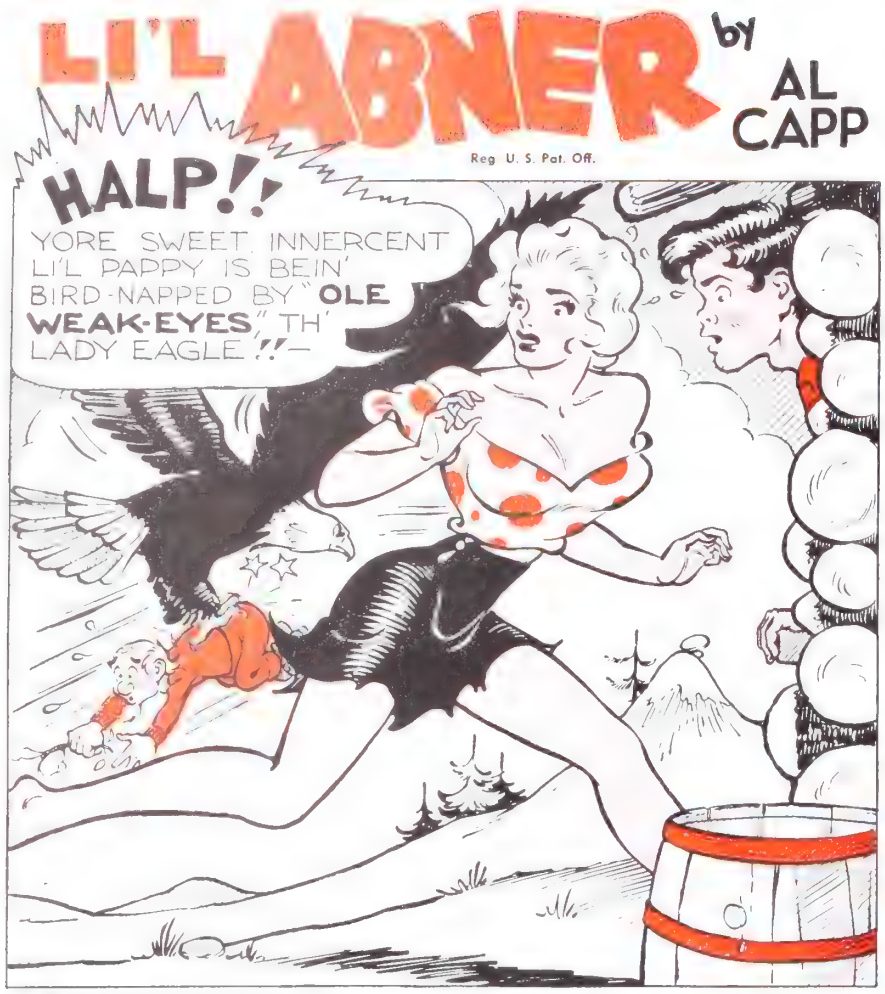
No wonder there's a delightful difference that makes Lipton Tea America's favorite brand. Try it.

LIPTON TEA

Brisk flavor

—never flat

Save money. Buy the larger packages.



LI'L ABNER by AL CAPP
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
HALP!!
YORE SWEET, INNERCENT LI'L PAPPY IS BEIN' BIRD-NAPPED BY "OLE WEAK-EYES," TH' LADY EAGLE!!—
HURRY MAMMY!
READY IN 5 MINUTES, SON! THIS FAST-COOKIN' "ENRICHED 5 MINUTE" CREAM OF WHEAT WILL GIVE YO' TH' "GIT-UP-AN'-GO" T' RES-KEW THET BALD-HAIDED LI'L RASCAL!!
CUSS YO', OLE WEAK-EYES!!
THASS NO AIG— THASS MAH HAID! AN' (SOB!) NO MATTER HOW LONG YO' SETS ON IT—IT WON'T HATCH!!—
HYAR AH COME, PAPPY!! —A-BUSTIN' WIF FOOD-ENERGY, BLOOD-BUILDIN' IRON, CALCIUM, AN' PHOSPHORUS— T'SAY NOTHIN' O' VITAMIN B1!!!
SON—YO' HAS RESKEWED TH' WRONG BALD-HAIDED LI'L RASCAL!!
AH THOUGHT TWARN'T PAPPY!! IT AIN'T GOT THET CREAM OF WHEAT FEELIN'!!
Capp
GET THAT CREAM OF WHEAT FEELING!
CREAM OF WHEAT
CREAM OF WHEAT

carved out of the thick dark foliage by an apple corer. "I'll tell you something," she whispered, "if you'll promise never to tell anyone else. We all die. You and I and everybody."

Mary nodded. "Yes," she said, "I suppose we do. But never mind, we're alive now. And so are Alan and George and Mrs. Boles, and the birds and the cows, all alive together."

"So we are," said Mrs. Garstin, and nodded, and resumed her springing walk, smiling once more.

Alive, thought Mary. I, alive? Can anyone who has thrown away life ever really live it again? But I am, I am living it. And she lifted up her face to the sky, where the clouds were packing away, and the sun was bursting hotly out and retreating again and bringing warm odors out of the lane and the dripping hedges. I am, I am living it.

They walked as far as the farm gate where a sign said, "Day-old chicks for sale, cut flowers, honey, apples." She knew it was useless to ask who lived there, and they turned toward home, Mrs. Garstin stepping now and again carelessly into puddles, so that on their return Mary had to find dry shoes for her and did not know whether to scold her or not.

Mrs. Boles had no such scruples, and shook a crooked forefinger at her, saying, "You're a naughty, naughty girl! How many times have I told you to keep your feet dry?"

They put her sewing into her hands and Mary went into the kitchen to talk to Mrs. Boles, from whom she had much to learn. The farm at the end of the lane belonged to a farmer named Hobday, she said. Down below at the lower farm were Mr. Bailey and his sons, Arthur and Dick, his daughter, Mrs. Dykes, and her husband. The Dykeses were the right sort, and sometimes Will Dykes and Alan went out together after rabbits or a partridge.

The best way to show that a stick is crooked is not to argue about it, or spend your time denouncing it, but to lay a straight stick alongside it.

"But you wouldn't say any of them was really friendly with the Garstins. Seems as if the folks here was suspiciouslike of anyone as doesn't farm their own land," she said.

For lunch there were cold sausage rolls which Mrs. Boles had made the day before, and a milk pudding. For the supper there were pork chops and mushrooms, and before she left, Mrs. Boles said, she'd "rattle up" a treacle pudding, as she'd got a bit of suet, and put it on to boil. It was George's favorite.

"Now," said Mrs. Boles, "what else can I tell you?"

A thousand and one things, thought Mary, but there wouldn't be time for them, and she'd have to learn them from Alan and George. She found a battered old cookery book on the kitchen shelf and made up her mind to study it. She'd seen that oil, coal and wood were kept in the shed where Alan kept his motorcycle. She'd learned how to manage the oilstove and how to fill it. The boiler was George's affair; he cleaned it and lighted it, and all she'd need to do would be to give it a shakedown and put coke on it now and again. Mrs. Boles had cleaned the house from top to bottom. If Mary wanted a bit of help sometimes, she said, Mrs. Dykes might come over and lend a hand, but she had two little ones under seven and her own house to look after.

THE old woman left after tea, and when she had gone a vivid awareness of the strangeness and loneliness of her situation overwhelmed Mary as she stood at the gate. She knew she would count the hours every day until Alan and George came home. Would she be able to endure the loneliness? she asked herself, and thought yes, if Alan stayed. And already Mrs. Garstin had cast a sort of spell on her. Her condition had a curious fascination of its own; indeed, her personal charm had by no means been destroyed. For the first time in her life Mary felt herself to be necessary, or in a position to make herself necessary, to other people, and she found stimulation in this knowledge.

Alan's motorcycle came exploding along the lane at half past six, and after putting it in the shed he came into the kitchen where Mary was delicately handling the pork chops and wondering how long it would be before she could touch raw meat without repugnance. Looking quickly at his face, she saw only the unconcerned look she now knew so well, the level regard and the hint of sullenness about the mouth. If he was glad to see her there, if he had looked forward to his home-coming today, he gave no sign of it.

"PORK chops," he said. "Mrs. Boles was always buying them. I don't like pork much, do you?"

"No," she said, "but it's all there is. She said I was to fry them."

"Well, see that they're cooked enough. Any potatoes?"

"She didn't say anything about potatoes. There are mushrooms."

He went to a cupboard, took out some potatoes and scrubbed them. "Don't peel them, just salt them and put them on to boil. I'll go in and see her now, and then I'll come and help you. George won't be home till late. He works at the rector's every day, you know, and then studies with him at night." When he returned to the kitchen again he said, "I've heard her version of things. Now let's hear yours."

She asked eagerly, "What did she say?"

"She's forgotten everything I told her last night. She calls you her sister, but I think she just means that you're someone she likes."

"Alan, I never dreamed she'd be so—so charming. She must have had a charming mind."

For a moment he said nothing, but watched the pan in which the chops were frying. "I'll tell you about her tonight," he said. "As George is out, it's a good opportunity. What are you going to do with those mushrooms?" he asked.

"I was going to fry them. I've washed them."

"You haven't peeled them."

"I didn't know I had to." She sighed. "I've got an awful lot to learn."

"That's all right. So have I. Here, give them to me, I'll do it."

He peeled them and dropped them into the frying pan, after pouring off most of the fat.

"Do you always come home as early as this?" she wanted to know.

"Earlier, as a rule. Tonight I stopped at the post office to see if any of your parcels had come, but they hadn't. If you ask my advice, which you haven't, I'd say write to your father now and tell him you're in England and all right. If you don't want him to know where you are, I can get a chap at the factory who's going to London to post your letter there. Your father's bound to be worried at the thought of your being in France when war comes."

"Is it coming? Are you sure?"

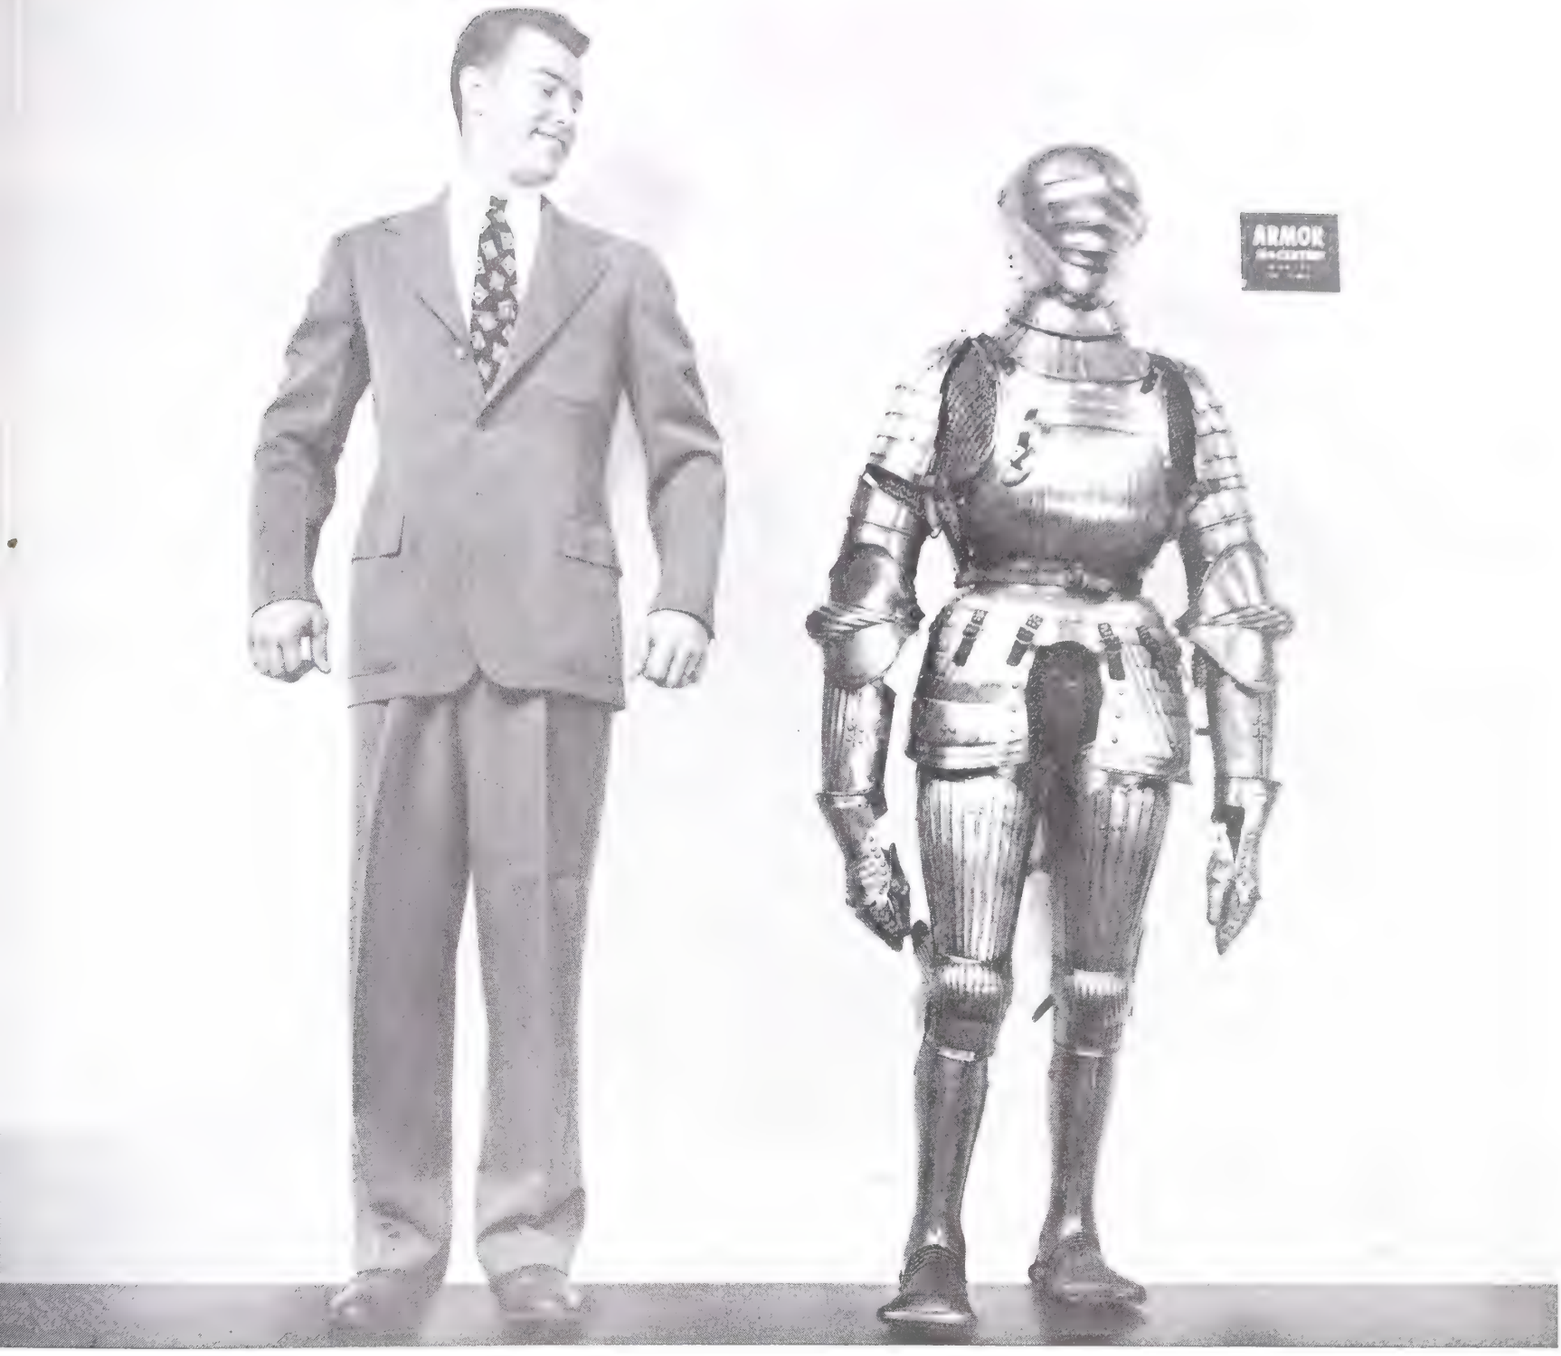
"As sure as I'm alive," he said, and put his hand in his pocket. "Here's the evening paper. Read it while you're waiting for the chops to cook. I'll go and set the table."

Yes, she thought, it certainly looked like it, unless a miracle happened. She put the paper down and thought, If he goes, I couldn't stay here. I couldn't possibly stay here without him.

At supper, Mrs. Garstin sat between them. She ate like a nicely brought up child, taking great care to place her knife and fork side by side when she had finished. Now and again it seemed as if she were trying to follow their talk, but found it too great an effort.

After supper, Alan helped Mary with the dishes. Mrs. Garstin sat in the kitchen while they worked, winding a ball of wool onto a stick and then winding it back again. Alan did the washing up, piling up the warm and dripping plates so fast that Mary got behind with the drying. Mrs. Garstin was not allowed to help. She dropped things, Mrs and the average American man next to a ight of old, and you'll discover a surpris- g fact. By modern standards, our iron- id ancestors were pretty undersized!

(Continued on Page 94)



The shell of our former selves!

The human race has grown appreciably ice medieval times. But the real news is w rapidly it has grown recently. For stance, the soldier of the second World ar – according to Selective Service figures topped his 1917 counterpart by almost full inch!

This gain is largely due to the things we ve learned about food. It is a very tangible sult of research in vitamins, minerals, proteins – the myriad complex food substances which help build sound bones and tall, straight bodies.

Because so many of these vital substances are found in nature's most nearly perfect food – milk – National Dairy scientists are able to make a unique contribution to the sum of nutritional knowledge.

Behind them is a great organization – and many specialized talents – teamed up to turn National Dairy research into more and better foods for your table. And these, in turn, help advance the health of America. Just watch the next generation!

Dedicated to the wider use and better understanding of dairy products as human food . . . as a base for the development of new products and materials . . . as a source of health and enduring progress on the farms and in the towns and cities of America.

NATIONAL DAIRY
PRODUCTS CORPORATION
AND AFFILIATED COMPANIES

NEW GENERAL ELECTRIC REFRIGERATORS

FOOD STORAGE IN THE SAME

Greatest advance meeting

THE THING that women have wanted and asked for—first and foremost—in new refrigerators is MORE FOOD-STORAGE CAPACITY.

Now, General Electric answers that demand—with the greatest advance in refrigerators in 20 years! . . . The greatest advance since General Electric pioneered the "sealed-in-steel" refrigerating unit.

It's the new General Electric Space Maker Refrigerator—the refrigerator that gives you a third more food-storage capacity with no increase in kitchen floor space.

Compare a General Electric Space Maker with your present refrigerator

Suppose you now have a 6-cubic-foot refrigerator that just fits in your kitchen.

The new General Electric will fit in the same floor space, yet give you 8 cubic feet of food-storage capacity! In other words, you can have two extra cubic feet of space for storing food, without needing any more kitchen space for your refrigerator.

That's an example of how these wonderful new refrigerators give you one third more room inside the refrigerator—more room for frozen foods, more room for bottles, for meats, vegetables, for everything you keep in your refrigerator. And this has been achieved with no reduction in thickness of insulation!

How is this possible?

This truly great advance in household refrigerators has been made possible by improved design and engineering of General Electric's famous "sealed-in-steel" refrigerating unit. The mechanism has been made highly compact, so it takes up less room in the base of the refrigerator.

More efficient and economical than ever!

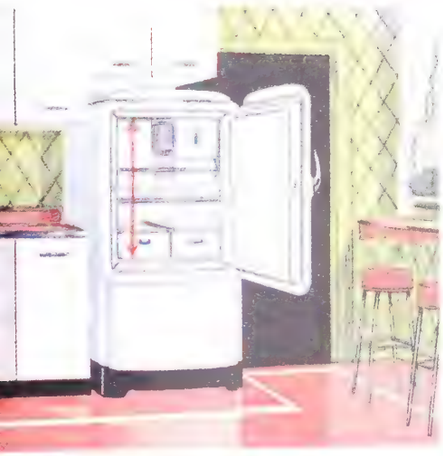
These same engineering improvements have made the General Electric refrigerating unit more efficient and economical than ever before!

The "sealed-in-steel" mechanism in today's General Electric Refrigerator has about one third more refrigerating capacity . . . freezes ice 35% faster . . . uses less electricity . . . than the latest units made before the war!

Look inside this great new General Electric (Model ND-8). Big Super-Freezer holds 20 standard packages of frozen foods, plus 4 ice trays (80 ice cubes). Bottle space big enough for 12 square one-quart milk bottles; enough headroom for really tall bottles! Notice the ample, conveniently arranged shelves . . . the big fruit, meat, and vegetable drawers for keeping these foods market-fresh! Did you ever see such a refrigerator? Don't you want one?

VE ONE THIRD MORE
TCHEN SPACE!

ome refrigerators in 20 years. . . .
ands of women everywhere!



he pictures tell the story!

the left is a standard 6-cubic-foot refrigerator in kitchen. Note the size of the freezer and the food-orage space. Note, too, that a bigger refrigerator uldn't fit in this kitchen.

On the right is the new General Electric 8-cubic-foot Space Maker model in the same kitchen. Notice the difference in the sizes of the freezer (for frozen-food storage), and how much more room there is for general food storage.

Yet this refrigerator fits in exactly the same kitchen space as the usual 6-cubic-foot model!

Model illustrated is the NB—8-cubic-foot

Model illustrated is the NC—8-cubic-foot

Model illustrated is the NC—6-cubic-foot

Greater-than-ever dependability!

sts and inspectors point that these new, more com-rigerating units should give even longer and more de-e performance than the great "sealed-in-steel" units ve set an unmatched record for reliable operation!

that's a vital advantage! For constant, trouble-free ation—day in, day out—year in, year out—primarily ou're buying when you buy a refrigerator. More than a General Electric Refrigerators have been in service rs or longer.

t fail to see the wonderful new "Space Maker" models retailer's. They're the answer to your prayers for more orage space without buying a bigger refrigerator!

General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Connecticut

GE REFRIGERATORS

Over a million in service
ten years or longer

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Grandma couldn't see the neighbors
Through the dirty pane.

Thanks to WINDEX, now her gossip's
Getting good again!

Mary's kitten haunts the mirror,
Boxing her reflection.

WINDEX gets the mirror bright
In time for Mom's inspection!

Santa Claus gave Pete a car,
The shiniest you've seen!

And Pete's got WINDEX, like his Dad,
To keep the windshield clean!

Spray it on and wipe it off—
WINDEX is a dream . . .
A lightning way to give your glass
A really brilliant gleam!

Get Brighter Windows Quicker With—

WINDEX

TRADE MARK [illegible] by The Drackett Company

WINDEX is a must for house cleaning! No streaking, no film, when you insist on this dustless, noninflammable, oil-free cleaner. Don't trust cheap substitutes!

Costs less than a penny per window — even thriftier in the big 20-ounce size.

(Continued from Page 90)

Boles had said, and the fall and crash frightened and distressed her.

At nine, Mary went upstairs with her to help her get to bed. In the candlelit room she undressed shyly, drawing her nightdress over her head before taking off her underclothes.

"I'm sleeping all alone tonight," she told Mary with satisfaction. "I don't like sharing my room with people. They snore. You wouldn't believe how they snored, those people who were here. Mrs. Boles and Mrs. Boles and Mrs. Boles. They were here too long. They meant to be kind, but they outstayed their welcome."

Mary put a dressing gown about her shoulders and she sat in front of her dressing table, unloosed her hair, which hung below her waist, and waited for Mary to brush it. As she drew the brush down with rhythmical, soothing strokes, Mary thought, She has lovely hair. It must have been wonderful when she was a girl.

When Mrs. Garstin was in bed and the candles blown out and the matches taken away for safety, as Mrs. Boles had instructed, Mary went downstairs.

Alan got up and went to a corner cupboard which he opened and from which he took a bottle of stout and two mugs. He filled one and was about to fill the other when Mary said:

"I don't think I like stout."

"It's good for you," he said. "I want to see you put some fat on those bones."

"Am I so very thin?"

"Too thin. And you'll be working hard here."

"So far," she said, "I'm feeling very well."

"Well, thank the Lord for that. You'll need to be. Look, I'm going to tell you the whole story, from the beginning. It'll take some time."

She nodded, and said, "I've been looking forward to this ever since you first told me."

"In a way I have, too, and in a way I haven't. This is how it was. My father was a doctor named Giles Garstin. He was one of those lucky people who really love their profession. I'm another. He was so keen on it that he never wanted a holiday."

"I was like that too," Mary said.

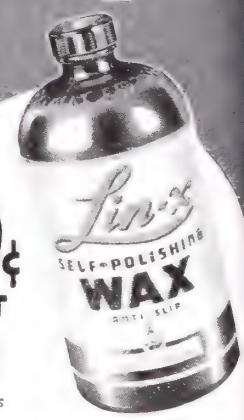
He nodded and went on. "Several years after he left medical school, he got a chance to buy a practice in a small town about forty miles from York, and decided to take it. He had been there about two years when he met my mother. That was in January, nineteen fourteen. She had been acting in a repertory company, and one day found herself in York playing the part of Celia in As You Like It. My father had heard about this company and decided he'd spend a night or two in York and go to the play. He went, and he saw my mother and he went clean daft about her. There's no other word for it. He got an introduction somehow, and from that time on there was only one woman in the world for him. When he knew what he wanted he wasted no time about it. She didn't want to give up the stage, and I don't blame her, but she fell in love with him, and that was that. I don't believe two people ever loved each other more than those two. They married, and he took her to Moreland Castle, which was the name of the village where he lived.

"My father was a good-looking chap. He was clever, besides, and he hadn't lived in Moreland Castle for two years without making some women friends. One of them, a widow of about his age with a bit of money, was set on marrying him. When he came back with my mother, this woman was sort of stunned. She couldn't forgive him for marrying someone younger than she was, and beautiful, and an actress. That last was the worst of all. She worked up a campaign of hate against my mother, a sort of war of whispers. My mother soon knew about it, but she was too happy to take it seriously, and when I came along she was too busy. I was born at the end of that same year.

"I've said they loved each other, and they were happy, really happy, as long as they were together, but in the summer of nine-

Don't let yourself slip!

UL



59¢ PINT

Also in economical quart and gallon sizes

LIN-X

SELF-POLISHING

WAX

is ANTI-SLIP!

Made by the Makers of Kem-Tone the Miracle Wall Finish

More than half of home accidents are caused by falls. Good reason why you should use LIN-X, the Anti-Slip Wax. It bears the seal of the Underwriters' Laboratories, Inc., as an anti-slip floor treatment. It beautifies and protects your linoleum and wood floors—a wonderful wax that's anti-slip!

PRODUCTS OF
SHERWIN-WILLIAMS RESEARCH

Bringing the Marvels of Science to Your Home

Ladies, accept this challenge

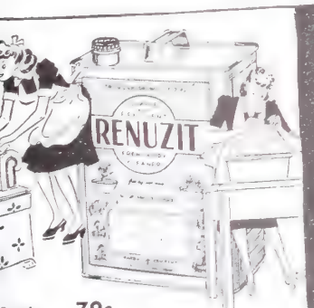
Dry Clean all your wearables

EXPERT RESULTS or Double Your Money Back!

Never, never before such a challenge! Think of it, ladies, you, yourselves are the judges—you dry clean clothing—drapes—slip covers—everything that's dry cleanable—the results must please you thoroughly, or you get Double Your Money Back! Nothing could be fairer—and no homemaker should overlook this opportunity to discover the easy, safe, economical "Dip and Rinse" way that has made Renuzit America's largest selling French Dry Cleaner!

DOUBLE MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE

Buy the 2-gallon, 1-gallon or quart size—use it according to directions—if not completely satisfied return the unused portion to Renuzit Home Products Company, Phila. 3, Pa., and receive double the purchase price.



1 gal. 79c
2 gal. . $1.55 Slightly Higher West of Rocky Mts.

Everything Comes Clean With

RENUZIT

FRENCH DRY CLEANER

Dresses	Sweaters	Rugs
Blouses	Skirts	Curtains
Slacks	Fabric Gloves	Drapes
Neckties	Slip Covers	Upholstery

For Hard to Remove Spots!

NEW! RENUZIT SPOT AND STAIN REMOVER

Fruit, Chocolate, Almost all other oil or g[illegible]

teen fifteen my father went to France, to a field hospital, and he was there till the end of the war, just coming home occasionally, on leave. It must have been terribly lonely for her. The widow had done her work well, and my mother saw very few people and those few weren't very congenial.

"Everything was all right when my father came back again, and for some time things went along smoothly enough. Then she had a child, a girl, and it was born dead, and she minded that terribly. Also she was lonely. During consulting hours my father never had a minute to himself, and the rest of the time he was out on his rounds. The only time they had together was a couple of hours in the evening or an occasional Sunday.

"Now this other chap comes into the story. He and his wife had lately come there to live in a house just down the road a little way. He was agent for a big estate near by, and my mother liked talking to him. He was one of those people you only halfway trust, but he was good company and he was married to a woman who was older than he was and no companion to him at all. My mother tried to make a friend of her, but the widow saw to it that the friendship didn't get very far. Our house was on the way to the estate, and this chap took to dropping in. He'd throw his horse's bridle over the gatepost and come in for a chat. My father saw no harm in it, but presently he found out that people were talking and told her that perhaps she'd better not let him come there so often. She passed the word on, but this chap kept on making excuses for coming, sometimes when my father was there but sometimes when he wasn't. Pretty soon she saw she'd have to have it out with him, and she did. She said, very plainly, that he wasn't to come to the house again unless he brought his wife with him.

> They say that God is everywhere, and yet we always think of Him as somewhat of a recluse.
>
> —EMILY DICKINSON.

"There was a sort of devil in this chap. He'd have gone on quite happily and peaceably if there'd been no opposition, but when he found that he wasn't to see her any more, he lost his head. He hung around and tried to meet her when she took me out for walks, and he began to make a nuisance of himself. He began to drink, too, and he told his wife that he was in love with my mother and didn't care if the whole world knew it. That set the village buzzing. What with one thing and another, my father decided that perhaps it was time to look out for another practice somewhere else.

"Well, one night this chap saw my father leave the house in his car to go to someone who'd been taken seriously ill. It was about eleven o'clock at night, and as soon as the car had gone he came and knocked on our door. I was in bed, upstairs, and it woke me up. My mother told him to go away, but he said he'd got to talk to her, and that if she didn't let him in he'd stand there banging on the door all night. Finally she opened the door, thinking that if she talked to him quietly he'd go home. But he'd had a lot to drink, and he was in no mood to go. My mother got frightened and ordered him out. I heard her. I got out of bed and started to come downstairs. I felt I wanted to be there to protect her. They'd told me she was going to have a baby, though I don't think she showed it much. I was at the head of the stairs when he saw me. He rushed up swearing at me, pushed me into my bedroom and locked the door. That made my mother wild, and she went for him. They struggled, and he had his arms around her and that long hair of hers had tumbled down when my father, who'd forgotten something, opened the door. God knows what he thought. Anyhow, he saw red, and he didn't stop to ask any questions. There was a stick in the hall that some patient had given him, for a joke, to take out on his rounds at night. It had a weight in it. He snatched it up and

WARNING!—MOTH DAMAGE ON THE WAY!

Protect the woolens in your life with

MOTH-DED

the marvelous NEW moth killer

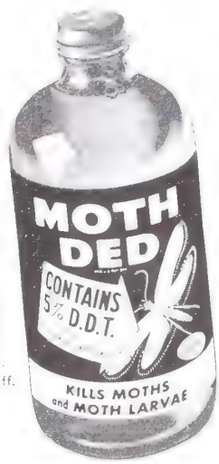
CONTAINS 5% D.D.T.

One thorough spraying lasts for months.

Safe! Sure! Economical!

Every drop effective...

—contains no water!



T.M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Only 39¢ PINT

For Apparel • Rugs • Upholstered Furniture • All Woolens

Spray closet walls and floors, storage chests and drawers.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

HINTS FOR STORING WOOLENS:

Before storing your woolens for the summer, brush them carefully in the open air, spray all cracks and crevices in your closets and chests with Moth-Ded. Then spray the garments or blankets and put them away.

Boyle-Midway Inc., American Home Products Corporation

what's the trick...

that makes her click?

How does a popular gal get that way? She's smart—'specially about her clothes. She knows just how to keep 'em fresh and appealing right down to the last stitch.

Get her story from the inside—see what makes her click.

Bandbox Freshness beginning with undies that are beautifully cared for. They're gently washed with Ivory Flakes, to help guard against frayed straps and faded colors. No soap is gentler for clothes or colors.

"Follow-me" Figure. She gives good care. Ivory Flakes care to her new nylon girdle. That's the way to help it stay young and elastic. See how much longer your girdles keep their stretch and fit with frequent washings in Ivory Flakes—the fast flake form of baby's pure Ivory.

"Date-Catching Clothes." Her light-hearted print of Cohama washable fabric looks pretty as a posy . . . 'cause Ivory Flakes help keep it that way. It's one soap that fashion designers and fabric experts recommend to pamper the style and color of your pet washables. So be smart—shun strong soaps, rough handling. Head for twice the wear with Ivory Flakes care.

"Look-Again" Legs. She's not worrying over needless runs in those 61-gauge chiffons. She's too smart to risk the wrong kind of soap. Her stockings get gently sudsed every night in rich Ivory Flakes. Strain tests prove that can slow down stocking runs as much as 50%.

If it's lovely to wear . . .

It's worth Ivory Flakes care!

gave the chap one single blow on the head with it. He went down like a log. My father was very strong, and he'd hit harder than he'd realized. When he saw what he'd done, he rang up the police. He told them what had happened. My mother just sat with a white face, unable to speak. They couldn't get a word out of her, neither my father nor the police. Then she fainted, and in the middle of it all George began to make his appearance, two months before his time."

He stopped and Mary put her hands over her face. "Oh, the poor things!" she cried. "The poor things!"

"It couldn't have been much worse," he said. "The trial came on at the next assizes and my father got ten years. Ten years! That was ruin for him, and ruin for him was ruin for her. It broke her up completely. They had to take George away from her. Later they took me away, though I fought like a wildcat to stay. They put her into a home. I don't know what would have happened to us if it hadn't been for her sister. She had no kids of her own and, though she was married, her marriage had turned out badly. So she bought this cottage, and brought us here to live.

"Three times a year, until he died, I was taken to see my father. My mother never saw him again. Her mind just emptied itself of the whole thing. Then my aunt and I decided that she'd better come and live with us, as she was getting no better, and spent her days in the home crying, or in a melancholy sort of daze. After she came here she was much happier, and her health's been better too. Doctor Williams comes every two weeks to have a look at her. He says we're doing the best for her that could be done.

"Well, to end the story, as soon as I left school I went to some engineering works outside Reading. I knew I wanted to be an electrical engineer from the time I was nine. I used to get home about once a fortnight, on Saturdays. Then this place near Devizes opened up, and I came home and got a job there, working on electrical gadgets for airplanes. It's all a bit hush-hush. I get good pay, four-fifty a year. Next year it'll be better, they tell me. But if there's a war, I'll go if I can. She has a little annuity, forty pounds a year. The cottage belongs to us, there's no rent to pay, and there'd be my allowance as well."

"What about me?" she asked.

"Could you stick it?"

"I don't know."

"Could you if I stayed?"

"Yes."

He got up and went to the window and stood looking out. The lusterless moon, seen from the lighted room, looked like a poor coin traveling the sky. He turned back to her.

"When I first saw you," he said, "I thought, 'Someone like her would be good for her.' You're different. It's a lot to ask, but if sometimes you could read some poetry to her; if maybe we could get a small piano and you could play —— I used to try reading Shakespeare aloud to her, but I'm no good at it. He's too big for me, and when I come to something I like I get a lump in my throat. George can't; anyway, his voice is breaking."

"I'd like to try. Could we get a piano?"

"I'll get one. It could go against that wall."

"There's something so sweet about her," Mary said. "And sometimes today I felt she was laughing at me. Only I must remember not to speak about death."

He took up a candle and lighted it for her. "I'll wait up for George. And I'll get breakfast tomorrow. You look tired."

"No," she said. "I want to get breakfast." Standing there, she idly curved her hand around the lighted candle flame. The seams and scars showed vividly. "Look," she said, interested. "I've never seen it like that before."

"When'll it be your turn to talk?"

She glanced at him in surprise, and then understood. "I'd almost forgotten I had a story to tell."

More and more, as the days passed, Mary felt that what had happened at Callac le Petit had cut her life in two. It was as though she were living on one side of a great gulf, and all her past lay on the farther side. This strange life had, she found, a far from displeasing flavor. There was poetry in its simplicity and in its homely rhythms. There was poetry in Mrs. Garstin's return to childhood and in her wild blue eyes; in Alan's and George's devotion to her.

At night Mary went to bed tired out; but she woke rested and ready for the day's work. Alan found her a secondhand bicycle and, when she could get Mrs. Dykes, a plain, kindly, silent young woman, to sit with Mrs. Garstin for an hour or two, she went off on brief, exploratory journeys. In the evening, when Mrs. Garstin had been put to bed, the three of them turned on the radio very softly and sat close to it, listening to the news. Often, nowadays, Alan came back late from the factory; work was being speeded up and he had to put in a good many hours of overtime. She dared no longer ask him if he had made up his mind to enlist, in the event of war. It now meant too much to her; she clung stubbornly and silently to hope.

NEXT MONTH

His whole life had stopped for a moment at the sight of two blue eyes, the touch of a hand. "This girl," he realized, "is what I think is beauty."

From then on for the two of them, Penny and David, a whole new world began. As ageless and as young as their two hearts creating it. The springtime world of first love. Whoever has found her own world well lost will recapture an old magic in a new novel—

Friends and Lovers

By Helen MacInnes

The first of five parts

IN THE APRIL JOURNAL

On Sunday, September third, Mary gave Mrs. Garstin her sewing and slipped out into the garden, following Alan and George who had taken the radio under the quince tree on the other side of the house. The sunny morning, the soft air full of the scent of grass, the sound of bees in the late clover, were the accompaniment to the announcement of war.

Mary, as she listened, found herself trying to picture her father, Letty, Lucille and Ivor all gathered somewhere about their radio listening. Where would they be? She imagined Letty saying, "Ivor will be all right at Eton; Lucille, you'll have to go to your grandmother, I can't be bothered with you in London if I'm going to drive an ambulance." And then possibly she would say, turning in triumph to Nelson, "Darling, how right I was to have the basement reinforced. I told you it would be worth all the money we spent." That group seemed to belong to her, or she to it, far less than this little group here under the quince tree.

When the announcement came they looked at one another in the green shade while the branches stirred and rustled above their heads. Then Alan said, "We mustn't let her know."

"Would it make any impression on her if she did know?" Mary asked. "Wouldn't she soon forget?"

"We can't run the risk," Alan said. "It might be a shock. It might be enough to send her right over the borderline."

They put away the radio and George went back to the sitting room where his mother was. Mary and Alan walked together to the front gate, out into the lane

t see how you can go on every wearing that harness of belts, d external pads." So speaks the woman who has herself been ed to the Tampax method of sanitary protection. Naturally ts to share her discovery of this ed method which has so many o recommend it.

s nobody ever told the girl. Her came of a conservative family.
ldom tried new things. But now
d has brought a change. Hereafter ways use Tampax—invented by a sold at every drug store or notion and so compact that a purse ly carry a whole month's supply.

l thank you for telling. Just as of women have thanked someor this same Tampax, made of rgical cotton compressed in aps for quick, dainty insertion.
s or pins, no odor, no revealing or ridges under the clothing.
ven bother to remove it in tub or Easy disposal. Comes in 3 sizes:
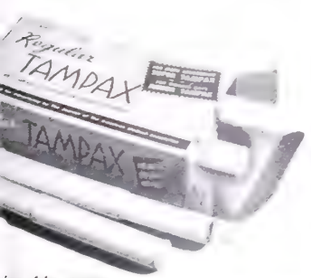
, Super, Junior. Tampax Incor-
, Palmer, Mass.



for Advertising
rnal of the American

INCORPORATED lass end me in plain wrapper
I enclose 10¢ (stamps or silver) to cover cost
g. Size is checked below.
LAR ( ) SUPER

and down toward the village. Now that there was no further doubt that it was war, Mary could no longer refrain from speaking about Alan's plans.

She tried, in her own mind, various ways of opening the subject, and at last said, "I've been wondering how you'll explain your absence to her, if you go. She'll miss you terribly. She always knows, without being told, when it's time for you to come home."

"We could tell her I'd gone north to another factory, I suppose. I've been thinking a lot about her—and about you. You'll have George here. The lad's growing up; he'll be company for you. It'll be lonely, I know. But if you could stick it for even six months—well, you know how grateful I'd be."

"Why six months?" she asked, startled. "How would things be different at the end of six months?" She had forgotten they had always had six months in mind. The time now seemed to her arbitrary, brutally short.

"I don't say they would be, but with a bit of luck I might find some middle-aged woman, a widow maybe, who'd look on this as her home. I keep putting advertisements in the local paper from time to time."

"Oh," she said. Then, after a pause, "I thought I was doing better. I hoped you were satisfied with me."

A little roughly he said, "The trouble is, I don't think I ought to let you stay, even if you'd be willing. Your health's better; what's to keep you from taking a proper sort of job somewhere, where you'd be with the sort of people you're used to?"

She answered, choosing her words, "Yes, it's true that my health's been better, but perhaps that's because I'm living the sort of life I ought to be living; the sort of life that's best for me."

"Well," he said, "remember I don't know much about you. I still don't know why you tried to drown yourself."

"There's never any time," she told him. "In the evenings, George is there, and on Sundays we're with her, or busy about the house. It isn't that I've wanted to avoid telling you."

"Are you sure about that?"

She didn't reply at once. Then, trying to seize the elusive truth about herself, she answered, "Perhaps I've been ashamed to tell you. It's all real enough in my mind, and my reasons seemed good at the time, but they don't seem so good now."

"I'll take you on the motor bike to the top of Farwell Down this afternoon," he said. "No one will interrupt us there and you can get it off your chest."

"All right," she agreed. "I ought to go back now, I have things to do in the house."

He saw that her lips were quivering; her face looked as if it had been sharply hit. "What's the matter?" he asked.

"You seem as anxious now to get rid of me as you were to get me here."

"That's nonsense. I don't want you to go. I was thinking of you."

"Oh," she cried desperately, "what do I matter? Why aren't we talking about the war instead of about me? Perhaps they're bombing London now. Why talk about me?" She began to walk away from him, but he caught her wrist and she had to stand still, her face averted.

"Wait. The most important thing for you and me at this moment is to get our personal affairs straightened out."

She made no answer.

He went on. "About what I told them when we got back. If it would make things any easier for you, we could get married. Now or later. Whenever you like."

She looked at him then, as if she longed to see into his heart. But he was not opening that for her yet. All she saw was a young man in an old sweater she had been meaning to mend; a young man in a faded shirt with a frayed collar, and trousers that were patched and torn; with a blunt-featured, intelligent, healthy face and rough fair hair; honest, level eyes and a sullen mouth; sullen when it was not smiling, and it was not smiling now.

Who is she?

this woman whose young skin glows with clean freshness?
Whose years are hidden behind a clear, smooth complexion? You... if you have discovered how DuBarry Cleansing Cream agrees with your skin...softens as it seeks out imperceptible dirt and grime. Prove it to yourself. Do as thousands have done at the famous Success School*. Use DuBarry Cleansing Cream to keep your skin flawlessly clean. Tone it with DuBarry Skin Freshener for an alive quality that makes men whisper, "Who Is She?"

The DuBarry Success School at the Richard Hudnut Fifth Avenue*

Find the DuBarry dealer in your neighborhood and ask for your copy of this easy-to-follow plan to greater loveliness.

DuBarry Beauty Preparations by Richard Hudnut New York • Paris

How to make a meal a Masterpiece!

To be tempting, appetizing, and nutritious—those are the three "musts" for a meal that can truly be called a masterpiece.

But flavors and vitamins in raw foods have a way of escaping. Serious nutritional losses often occur in storage and during transit from distant fields to your kitchen. Even in the home, these precious values are so often "cooked away."

But when food is packed in cans, those values are sealed in. That's why food authorities* agree, you can trust foods in cans.

*See September-October, 1940 issue of "Food Research"

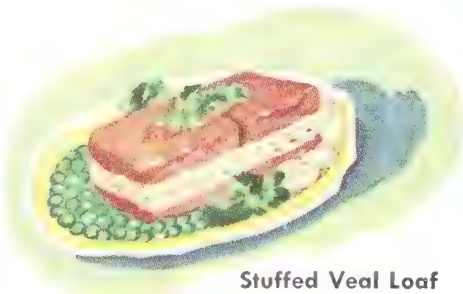
Gourmet's Delight . . . tomato soup, crackers, veal loaf, peas, onions, sliced pineapple, pumpkin and almonds for pie, coffee . . . and they all come to you in cans.

Always in Season

With their freshness, flavor and vitamins sealed in, the canned fruits and vegetables at your grocer's tell you that in canned foods nothing is "out of season." These delicious foods, so nutritious and convenient to serve—so reasonable in price—are available all year round in almost unlimited variety.

Garden of Eatin'

What a cozy feeling it is to know that on your pantry shelves there is a wide variety of delicious foods packed in cans. You know, each individual can is really a miniature "pressure cooker" that captures flavors and food values—and holds them for you! Processed canned foods don't require refrigeration until opened.



Stuffed Veal Loaf

Place a savory rice stuffing between slices of canned veal loaf, and bake in oven until well browned. Delicious and different! No wonder women are proud to serve foods packed in cans. With lightning speed today's modern canning methods pop foods into cans and cook them while they're farm-fresh—full of fine flavors and precious nutrients.

FOODS YOU BUY IN CANS ARE

SAFE from dirt, germs, odors.

SAFE from air, light, moisture.

SAFE even after a can is opened—because, in the canning process, both the can and its contents are sterilized. Simply cover the top and place in the refrigerator.

BECAUSE

No other container protects like the Can

CAN MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, INC., NEW YORK

(Continued from Page 97)

d it make things easier for us?"
d, frightened, and trying not to ght."

then, why not?"
ight," he said. "Why not? I'm you are."
w her life as balanced delicately, isly upon this moment; her pre-nce-thrown-away, all-she-had life.
an almost drunken recklessness in an anguish to settle, to decide of the thing, "I'm willing. When-like."
asp tightened upon her wrist, and ropped it and together they walked he cottage. The sun was in their elm branches printed, fleetingly, ckled shadows on their cheeks and . Portentously they walked; geno come seemed to walk with them.
them will be a musician, thought eady a mother in her thoughts.
isn't a house any girl would jump id, bent on fair dealing. "But I'll Once I've made up my mind to get and I have, I'll make a fairly good isband. We'll make a go of it."
would you stay here?" she pressed uld you stay and not join up?"
g in step with her, he said, "No
g. I don't know. You'll have to take I've got a funny sort of brain, it can get the hang of this new elec-ff, and I can teach other people.
ey won't let me go. I don't know.
find yourself married to a soldier, ap that stays behind to work at a Whatever hap-won't be worse
d to me than to a er chaps. That's tell you."
e caught Alan's smiled and she ilently, with an art, O God, let him not go to the war.
it be over soon. O God, help us all.

tayed on the top of Farwell Down n went down. She had told her ng on her coat, on the turf, with de her, smoking and asking an occaestion. Lapwings had cried and bove their heads, flying this way on their supple, bending, frantic rks had climbed the sky and sung ed to earth; clouds had threatened dispersed, and now those that were rranged themselves in the west, to flames by the sunset.
Mary cried hopelessly, at the end
'how can one person ever tell anthing? How can I make you see world looked like to me then?"

ee," he said, "why you felt as you n see why you'd come to the end of
er. Just one thing added to anlind you," he said, and she had ed the touch of Yorkshire in his tter, "I'm not excusing what you ink you were pretty silly, but you ng, and there was your bad health.
don't come out of it too badly. If I I'd just forget it. It's all past and
. You don't have to live with Letty
. And that chap, Walsh. He never o marry you; you're not his sort.
nore his sort. He liked giving you asure. That's human. People enjoy they get tired of it. Letty didn't get ange out of him, I'll be bound. He love with her; you'd no need to feel
They were just a couple of animals,
the way animals -and humans—
e. That's the way I look at it. As for s Cotter, you've got her all wrong, friend too. The thing doesn't hang There's some mistake somewhere, ink you treated them both pretty Still, I may be wrong. You exo much. And that life you were livthat house you lived in, they weren't to you. I'm not a conceited sort of t I think I can make you happier u were there." He kissed her tenderly, without passion. "You're such a kid in a lot of ways," he said, releasing her.

"Oh," she whispered, [illegible] I Then teach me to grow up."

"All in good time. Are you going to try to be happy with me?"

"I shall be happy with you."

"It might turn out pretty well," he said, picking up her coat. "It just might."

THE first winter passed in an unreal and precarious calm. Mary thought that she was like a toy ship in a glass bottle which, though tossed by the waves, remains intact and undisturbed in its safe little vacuum. She could not leave the house, except for an occasional hour or so. The little family had always been isolated; now that the war had come, and the already busy farmers and villagers had taken on new duties, they became still more isolated.

Mary spent over two months this way before she knew, beyond any doubt, that she was in love with Alan. It happened on a night when the roads were icy and the ruts in the lane had a cutting edge that hurt the feet that stumbled against them. Half past six came, and Alan had not returned. Then seven, half past, then eight. She gave George and Mrs. Garstin their suppers, kept her own and Alan's hot, and put Mrs. Garstin to bed. She went to the front door, looked out and listened. George came out and stood beside her.

"I'm worried," she said. "He didn't expect to stay late. It's freezing hard too."

"He'll be all right," George said.

"What makes you say that?" she asked, curious. "Is it faith, or do you just not believe that anything could happen to him?"

"Both," said George, and added, "It's faith, I think, mostly."

"I wish I had it."

All about them was silence, bare branches and a sky of stars angrily bright. Suppose something has happened to him, she thought, and a great emptiness opened before her feet, a blankness and emptiness that appalled her. Her whole being strained to draw out of the night and the silence the distant sound of the motorcycle. In a panic she prayed, forming the words for her inner ear, O God, let him come, let him come soon! Let him be all right!

"You'll get cold," George said, and tried to draw her in, but she said, "No, let me stay. I want to listen."

At last she was driven indoors by the icy air, and knelt by the fire, warming her hands and shivering. How would they know, if something had happened? Who would tell them?

"He's always careful when the roads are bad," George said. "Why don't you eat something? It's worse when you're hungry."

"I can't eat," she said, "when I'm worried."

"What would you do if he went to the war?"

"Heaven knows."

She put on a coat and once more stood on the little porch, listening. Still no sound. After a while she went in again, and suddenly a crescendo of uneven bursts, as the motorcycle bumped over the hard ruts, shattered the night's stillness. She flew to the door, ran out, crying, "Oh, Alan, why are you so late?" as he wheeled the motorcycle into the shed. He said nothing, seemed just as usual, closed the door of the shed and then turned to her.

"What are you so excited about? I had trouble with the headlight, that's all."

She put her arms about him, almost crying with relief. "Oh, I'm so glad you're here!" she exclaimed.

"What's all the fuss about?" But he spoke tenderly. "You're getting fond of me, I believe."

"Fond!" she cried out, but keeping her voice low. "Alan, I'd die if anything happened to you."

"Not you," he said, keeping an arm about her, holding her to his side.

"I would, I would!"

> Character, like embroidery, is made stitch by stitch.
> —MARY LYON.

MOLASSES BROWNIES

take no sugar . . . no shortening!

ANOTHER MAGIC RECIPE! ANOTHER EAGLE BRAND SUCCESS!

Magic Recipe for Molasses Brownies

- 1⅓ cups (15-oz. can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
- Dash of salt
- ¼ cup molasses
- 2 cups graham cracker crumbs
- 1 cup chopped nut meats
- ½ teaspoon vanilla

Mix Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk, salt, molasses, graham cracker crumbs, nut meats, and vanilla. Blend thoroughly. Spread mixture in 8 x 12-inch pan greased and lined with waxed paper. Garnish as desired. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 15 minutes or until set. Turn from pan and remove paper at once. Cool, cut into squares. Makes about 24 brownies.

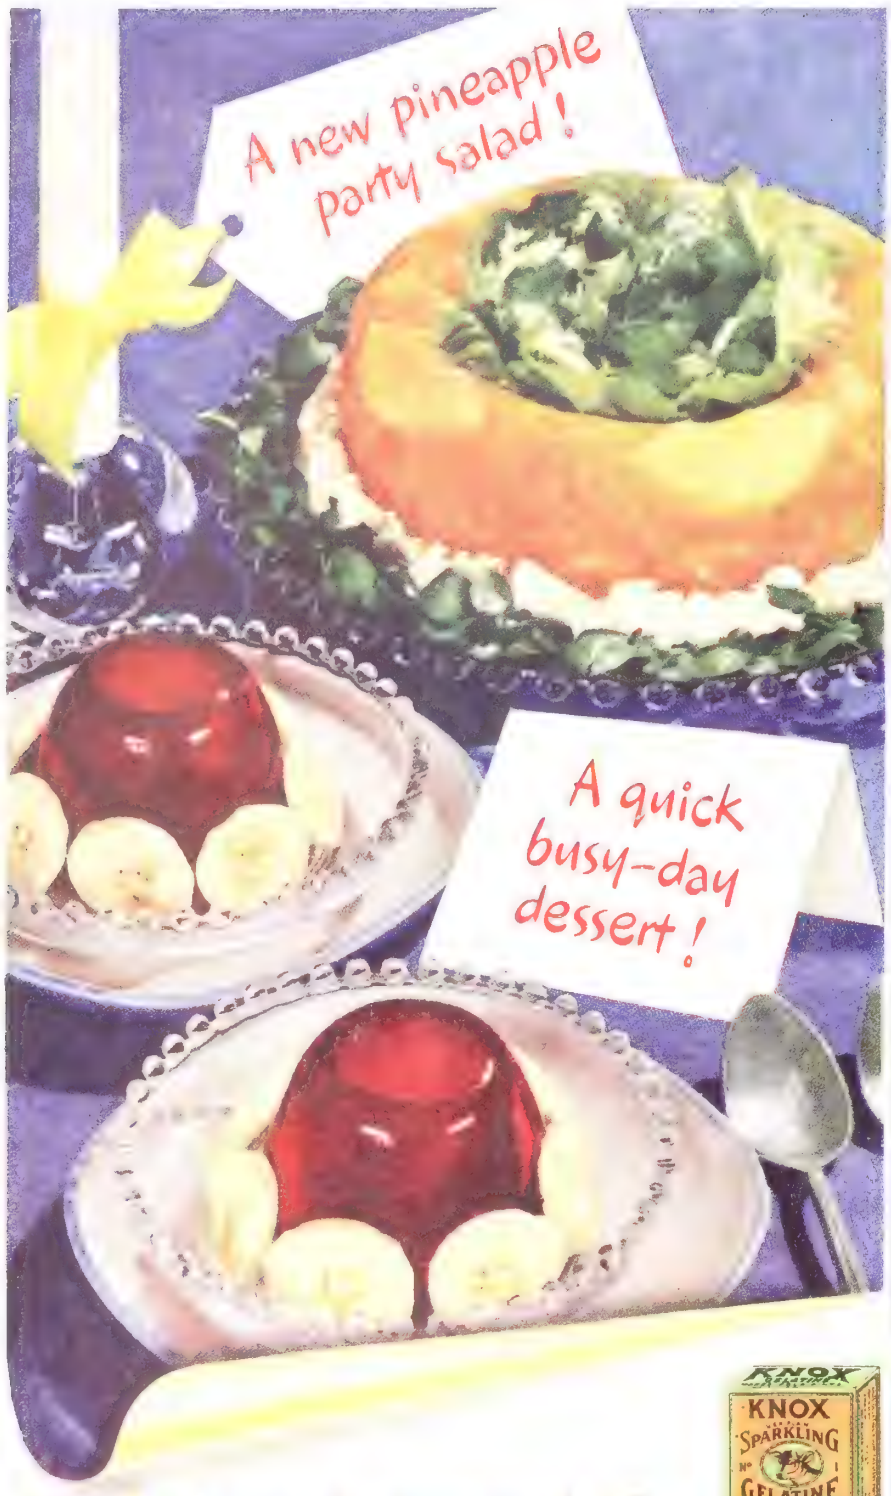
NEW! LUSCIOUS!

SO EASY TO MAKE!

Every Magic Recipe is planned and tested to give you perfect results . . . with a minimum of fuss and trouble! Every recipe is built around Eagle Brand, the original Sweetened Condensed Milk, made to meet Borden's high-quality standards. It's a creamy-rich blend of the purest whole milk, and sugar.

For recipes for dozens of delicious candies, cookies, puddings, ice creams, send post card for FREE Book of Eagle Brand Magic Recipes to Borden's, 350 Madison Ave., Dept. LH-37, New York 17, N.Y.

© The Borden Company



Both made easy with Knox

SUCH a pretty, fancy-dress salad—and yet so easy for company meals! That's because it's made with Knox Gelatine and can be made the day before. Knox is also grand for quick, busy-day desserts. In fact, fancy dishes or plain—they're easy and better with pure, unflavored Knox Gelatine! For more fine Knox recipes free, write today to the address below!

KNOX GELATINE

GOLDEN PINEAPPLE SALAD
(Serves 6; uses 1¼ pkg.)

1 envelope Knox Gelatine
¼ cup cold water
¼ cup sugar
½ teaspoon salt
1 cup hot pineapple juice
½ cup orange juice
¼ cup lemon juice
1 cup raw carrot, coarsely grated
1 cup oranges and 1½ cups canned pineapple, both cut in small pieces

Soften gelatine in cold water. Add sugar, salt and hot pineapple juice; stir until dissolved. Add orange juice and lemon juice. Cool. When it begins to thicken, add other ingredients. Pour into mold that has been rinsed in cold water. Chill until firm. Serve on greens with mayonnaise. Garnish with cream cheese.

GRAPE JELLY DELIGHT
(Serves 6; uses ¼ pkg.)

1 envelope Knox Gelatine
½ cup cold water
3 tablespoons sugar
⅛ teaspoon salt
3 tablespoons grape jelly
1¼ cups hot water
3 tablespoons lemon juice

Soften gelatine in cold water. Add sugar, salt, grape jelly, and hot water, and stir until dissolved. Add lemon juice and strain. Pour into individual molds that have been rinsed in cold water and chill until firm. Serve garnished with banana slices, and whipped cream if desired. How easy it is to make real-fruit-flavored gelatine desserts with Knox and jellies! Jams and marmalade may be used, too. Try it soon!

P.S. FREE—write to Mrs. Charles B. Knox, Box 23, Johnstown, N. Y., for her illustrated recipe book.

On the porch he kissed her. "You're as cold as a frog. You mustn't worry like this."

"Alan," she whispered, clinging to him, "marry me soon."

"Once I'm your husband you'll stop worrying about me, is that it?"

"I'll have a better right to worry. Alan, I mean it; marry me. I'm sick of not being married to you." She shook him. "I'm sick of it, I tell you."

"I'm pretty sick of it myself."

"Well, why don't we? Soon, quickly; what are we waiting for?"

"I've been waiting for just this," he said.

"Well, tonight I knew."

"Right, I'll put the matter in hand." He opened the door and went in, and took off his leather coat.

She put the supper on the table, beside the lamp. I'm happy, she thought, I'm happy! Now it's all right with my world. It's all I want, to have him here. Now I know.

George waited till they'd had their supper and then went up to bed. Alan helped her wash up, then they went back to the sitting room. He sat on the sofa and patted the place beside him.

"Come here." Suddenly shy, she sat down and he took her, to her delight, into his arms. Then he released her to say, "It's a funny sort of business, you know. George moves out of our room and you move in."

"The sooner the better," she told him, and pushed back her hair and smiled, warmly happy.

"What about this time next month?"

"Yes," she said, with a pang at the thought of thirty days to be got through.

"O.K. In the church; just you and me and George and Doctor Williams and maybe a chap from the factory I'm friendly with, as a second witness."

"Yes. That's just as I'd like it."

"I'll stop and see the rector tomorrow on my way home, so if I'm late don't get all worked up about it. All the same, I'm glad I was late tonight."

"So am I, now."

"You're going to get very fond of me, you know," he said.

She laughed. She said she knew it and asked, "What about you?"

"You needn't worry about that side of it." Then he said suddenly, "Look, I may have to go away sometime in the new year."

She became rigid with dread. "You mean ——"

"No, not what you think. They want me to go with some other chaps to the South Coast. It's part of a defense plan. I've got to train people to use this new electrical stuff I've told you about. Keep it under your hat. Can you stick it alone here?"

"Yes. If I must, of course I can. But if I have to eat my heart out for you, it'll have to be as Mrs. Alan Garstin."

"You'll be that all right before I go."

"They might send you away earlier than you think."

"If they do, I'll get a special license. Otherwise we'll stick to this day next month. It's my birthday."

"Oh, Alan!" she exclaimed. "Of course it is. So I shan't have to remind you when our wedding anniversary comes round, shall I? Letty was always reminding my father."

"Are you going to write to him?"

"Can't I wait till I'm married?"

"I don't like it," he said, "but please yourself."

"I don't belong in their world any more."

"Look," he said, "I haven't got a world for you. There's only her and George and me. Don't cut yourself off from too much. You might be sorry."

"If you come home every night, there'd be nothing more I'd want."

"You're a silly, infatuated girl."

She laughed happily. "I know I am."

They were married before the end of December and went to Bath for a five-day honeymoon. Mary felt a sentimental regret that they were going by car and not on Alan's motorcycle, but Alan did not share it.

"As soon as I can afford it," he said, "I'll get a secondhand car and teach you to drive. That may not be till after the war."

"To take her out?" Mary asked.

He looked dubious. "It depends on how she gets on. She's a lot better, though."

Mary thought so, too, but had feared to say so, for it sounded as if she were praising herself.

If dogs could talk, perhaps we should find it as hard to get on with them as we do with people.
—KAREL CAPEK: Intimate Things (Putnam's).

She had written to her father, but decided to withhold both her new name and her address. She had feared that her father might descend upon them, and try to prevent the marriage. She had a nervous dread of some kind of interference. She wanted the marriage to be wholly hers and Alan's, and shrank from comment or the mere thought of comment.

Alan was not sent to the South Coast until April. The Finnish-Russian war, magnetic mines, the submarine peril, the muted war on the Continent, the sporadic air raids, these were a distant, never-to-be-alluded-to background to their personal, shut-in, but vivid life.

When the parting came, it seemed to her that something that was a living entity was being torn apart. The growing together, the grafting had been going on as if begun by the most expert of gardeners. There was nothing, she thought, to hinder it. They were now heartily in love, and within those close four walls, within the tiny, confined circle of their lives, the growth of love was rapid. They had only the world of each other's personalities to explore.

Absorbed though Alan was in his work, excitedly absorbed, when he left the factory he left it completely and returned to a young wife whose ready and eager caress was his one joy and recreation. The two single beds were pushed together, the two mattresses exchanged for one large one; Mary bought new curtains, new covers, installed a hanging cupboard, and contrived with a new-found skill to make the small room a home. Her happiness was so real a thing that her whole look, her whole personality affirmed it.

The hard work no longer tired her, and Mrs. Dykes helped her with the cleaning twice a week. At night, after Mrs. Garstin had been put to bed, she read aloud to Alan. If George liked what they were reading, he sometimes listened, but he more often went to bed with a book of his own choice. It had been arranged by the rector that he was to go to a theological seminary the following autumn. What Mary would do then, alone in the house, if Alan were still away, was a problem they dared not face. Without Mrs. Garstin there would have been no problem; Mary would have followed him. But it never entered their heads to send her away.

Alan had not been gone two weeks before Mary wrote to him to say that they might expect a baby in November. She was so enchanted by the prospect that the added difficulties seemed not to have presented themselves to her. Alan was more aware of them, but said, "Don't worry, we'll manage. If George is away we can put somebody in his room. If he's home, he'll have to sleep in the sitting room. What we want is a younger Mrs. Boles. You'd better begin looking for one. Ask everybody you see."

She asked, but without result. But so many miracles had happened that she did not greatly concern herself. Meanwhile the passing of winter and the wonder and delight of knowing herself to be pregnant kept her more than tolerably happy. Alan would come home for a few days' leave in May, and meanwhile she would have held back the spring for him if she could, for to experience it without him was a sweet sorrow. But this was not as other springs had been. She was free now of the dream, free of all the anguish and the longing. For once, spring was no cruel anachronism. Now she could move in step with it.

(Continued on Page 102)

Finest way to ring the bell with a New Easter Brunch

Finest

RECIPE FOR CITRUS DELIGHT

Grape juice Lime slices
Stokely's Finest Citrusip

Combine equal parts grape juice and water; pour in freezing tray of refrigerator. Freeze into cubes. Pour chilled Citrusip into glasses; add grape juice cubes and lime slices. Then sip the first cool swallows, and enjoy this magical mingling . . . sunshiny, sparkling orange juice blended with the stimulating tang of grapefruit juice. Yes, Citrusip is a combination that can't fail to say "come hither" to hunger. For each inviting fruit is gathered at its juice-brimming best . . . then delivered posthaste to the nearby cannery where it is promptly pressed and packed. So every drop of lively, fresh flavor is locked into nothing but the finest juices . . . Stokely's Finest. Serve them soon.

Finest

RECIPE FOR CORN-HAM CASSEROLE

Slice ham ½" thick	2 cans Stokely's Finest Whole Grain Corn
Whole cloves	2 tablesp. minced parsley
⅓ cup brown sugar	2 tablesp. minced onion
1 teasp. dry mustard	Few grains salt, pepper
½ cup cider

Stud fat edge of ham with cloves. Place in baking dish; add cider. Combine sugar, mustard; sprinkle over ham. Cover. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 25-30 min. per lb. Drain off liquid. Combine ½ cup liquid with drained corn; add other ingredients. Bake with ham 30 min. Garnish with plump, luscious apricots . . . Stokely's Finest, of course. Serves 8. There's a world of good eating in this hearty, party casserole, for the finest corn is chock-full of dewy-fresh tastiness. And it's cooked by a secret recipe to preserve vitamins and minerals . . . in nothing but the finest . . . Stokely's Finest.

Stokely's Finest

ALWAYS DELICIOUS

Products of Stokely Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis and Stokely Van Camp of Canada, Ltd.

Package of Smiles!

Removes surface stains from the teeth–even tobacco stains!

Dr. West's Miracle Tooth Paste

This brand-new dentifrice discovery combines special polishing and cleansing ingredients with remarkable powers. It's safe, pleasant-tasting, effective. Get your package of smiles today!

50¢

(Continued from Page 100)

The house in Hyde Park Square had kept its dignity and its intactness throughout the long years of war. Nothing had gone from it, nothing but cracks from near-by blasts and the soot and soil of London days and nights had been added to it. Both belowstairs and on the top floor were to be found every known contrivance for dealing with incendiary bombs, and in one corner of the basement Letty kept a great tin box full of first-aid appliances.

For two years Nelson had been an air-raid warden, at the end of which time he resigned in favor of a younger and less tired man. For nearly a year Letty had driven an ambulance with zest and courage, but her driving in the blackout was erratic, and provided an added risk. It was suggested that her organizing ability and skill in directing others were being wasted, and she presently became head of a large depot for unpacking and distributing clothes from America and Canada to bombed-out families.

The flying-bomb period worried Nelson more than the bombing of '40 and '41, and he tried to persuade Letty to leave London, but she wouldn't hear of it. Her nerves were quite unaffected and she never missed a day at the depot. When she got back she would want cocktails, and at least three or four times a week people dropped in. The people who came were mostly men. A frequent visitor was Ferdinand Walsh, whom Letty had "picked up again," in her own words, and who combined his work at the bar with an exalted position with the Ministry of Food. Then there were a few of Nelson's friends, Greer Hopkinson among them, and a bevy of American officers whom Letty particularly welcomed because she said they made her feel gay.

FREQUENTLY they dined out at restaurants, and not once, when the flying bombs snored hideously over London and crashed, did she show the slightest nervousness. Imperturbability was the fashion, and Letty was a woman of fashion. She seemed to ignore, or not to be able to imagine, the shattered flesh, and when the crashes were close she would laugh and say, "That was a near one!" and there was fierce excitement in her eyes.

Only when Mary's letters came did she lose her cool serenity. It made her far angrier than it made Nelson that Mary still gave no address. He would hand the letters to her to read, and after a glance at them she would tear them up viciously and toss them into the wastepaper basket.

When the news of her marriage came she said, "I don't think we need trouble our heads about her any more. She's married someone she's ashamed of, and it's no more than I expected. Nothing would induce me to speak to her again."

He was silent, and she asked, "Would you speak to her again, Nelson?"

"I don't know," he said heavily, sadly. "What I find it hardest to understand is her running away in the first place. If I knew what made her do that ——"

"Disappointment over Ferdinand Walsh," said Letty, who always repeated this formula, "and some sort of shock in Paris, Maud thought. That old man she went about with, you remember. Now she's married some complete bounder and she's ashamed to let us find it out."

"There must have been more to it than that," he said, frowning, and did not see Letty's quick glance of fury.

When letters came giving them news of the two little boys, Letty was coldly sarcastic. "Well, she was determined to deprive you of any pleasure you might get out of being a grandfather," she said one day. "I don't know why she even bothers to write."

"I ought to have done what I first wanted to do," he said. "I ought to have taken steps to find her in the beginning and bring her back. The French police could have traced her easily enough."

"After that threat in her letter to Maud, I don't see how you could. However," she added, "don't let's talk about her. The very sound of her name irritates me."

"I don't understand it," he said. "I'll never understand it. Are you sure, are you absolutely sure, Letty, that there wasn't a quarrel or some disagreement between you?"

SHE raised her cold gray eyes and looked at him. "Nelson, I warn you, if you ask me that question again there'll be trouble. I have told you not once but twenty times that there was no quarrel, no disagreement of any sort. If you're going to try to blame me for the vagaries of a stupid, neurotic girl ——"

"Letty, Letty," he said, frowning. "Is it necessary to speak of her like that?"

"Why not? It happens to be true." And she gave him so cold a look that if he had not been pouring out a last cup of coffee it would have told him much. She moved toward the door and said, over her shoulder, "Try and come back early. There are some people coming in for cocktails."

As Nelson was putting on his coat, the telephone rang and he went to it. To his amazement he heard Maud's voice. She sounded precisely as usual. The robust, good-humored, warm voice lightened his gloom.

"Well, Mrs Pierce," he said jocularly, using for the first time her new name, "you could knock me over with something even lighter than a feather. What are you doing over here?"

She had come over in connection with UNRRA, she said. She'd been offered a temporary job at UNRRA headquarters in London and had jumped at it. "Lowell's so well just now," she said, "that I felt I could safely leave him for a few months. Any news from Mary?"

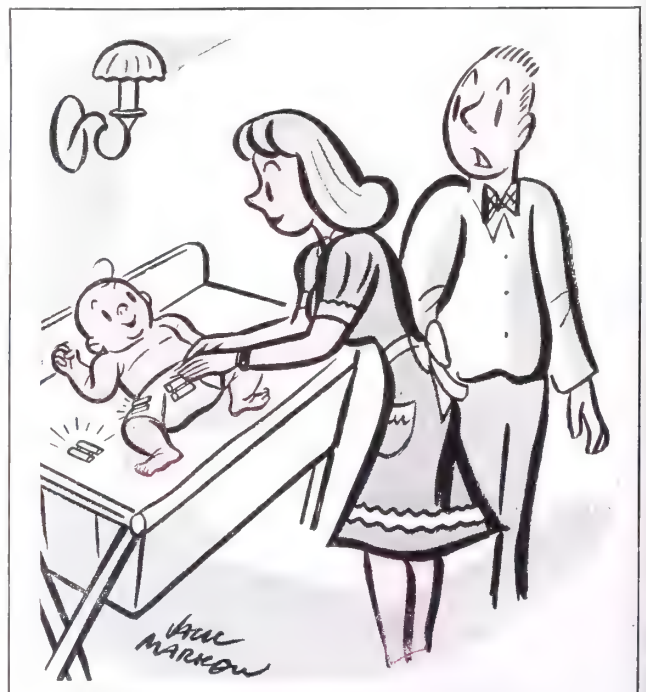
"A letter this morning, full of talk about the children, but giving no address, as usual."

"Dear, dear! I was hoping to see her. I'm staying at the Downshire, as usual."

"Come in this evening," he suggested. "There are a number of people coming. Then we'll take you out to dinner somewhere."

"Grand," she said. "I'll be there. How's Letty?"

(Continued on Page 104)



"What if I'm suddenly recalled to active duty?"

Curtains up!

ON "BATHROOM BEAUTY"

STARRING Vinylite TRADE-MARK PLASTICS

Made for the role it plays... that's VINYLITE Brand Plastic, the sheer, shimmering material science formulated for use in superior shower and window curtains.

From the outside looking in—or the inside looking out—curtains of these remarkable materials are vibrant with a beauty that is long-run. They're moisture-proof—resistant to mildew—and they hang in graceful, crackproof folds that would do justice to a Hollywood set!

Like all top-flight stars, VINYLITE Plastics are extremely versatile. Witness their stirring performances in: fashion-right stain-free aprons... belts and suspenders that seem to breathe with their wearers... rugged children's shoe soles that last till they're outgrown... floor coverings that shed stains in a twinkling.

Yes, the curtain's up on a dramatic new era in home furnishings... an era made more colorful by VINYLITE Plastics.

VINYLITE is a trade-mark you'll want to use often ... it's pronounced "VINE-NA-LITE."

You know it's right if it's

Vinylite PLASTICS

BAKELITE CORPORATION

Unit of Union Carbide and Carbon Corporation UCC

30 East 42nd Street, New York 17, N. Y.

Everything's under control

the COST of your laundry

the QUALITY of the work

the TIME it takes

. . . to get it done

Laundering takes less time when done with a Norge "Ro-ta-tor" washer, because of the superior washing action in a tub of greater capacity. Clothes last longer, too . . . the plastic "Ro-ta-tor" is so smooth there's virtually no wash-wear! And the net result of these two Norge-given advantages is that the over-all cost of your laundry is gratifyingly small! See this great washer demonstrated—Norge dealers are conveniently listed in the classified section of telephone directories.

A BORG-WARNER INDUSTRY

Norge ... trade mark of Norge Division, Borg-Warner Corporation, Detroit 26, Michigan. In Canada: Addison Industries, Limited, Toronto, Ont.

SEE NORGE BEFORE YOU BUY

Electric Ranges | Gas Ranges | Refrigeration | Home Heaters | Washers | Home and Farm Freezers

(Continued from Page 102)

"Very well. Very busy. I don't think you'll see any change in her. I'll give you her telephone number if you'd like to ring her up."

"No," said Maud. "Don't tell her I'm coming. I'll just turn up and give her the surprise of her life."

"Right," he said. "See you later."

Colonel Everard was the first of Letty's visitors that day. He was admitted by Shaw just after Letty had got home and while she was tidying herself upstairs. He was a tall, slender man of forty-six with a sallow, distinguished face, and an absolute composure of manner that had immediately pleased Letty. He had been in Europe for a year and a half and had already seen much service and been wounded, and when he was in London the house in Hyde Park Square became a kind of home to him. He had been divorced shortly before coming over, and in the beginning it was a place where he could relax, tell his quiet, humorous stories, carry on a gentle flirtation with a pretty woman and forget the war. Letty never discussed the war, never asked questions, was vividly interested in personalities and any gossip which might come her way, and, or so she made it seem, in the person to whom she was speaking. He had been amused, too, by her trick of belittling herself in a way that only added to her charm.

"Of course I'm the dullest of your English women friends, Rex, and I know it. I only chatter about you and me. Anyway, you know I don't love you for the occasional lipstick or bottle of perfume or tin of tongue, don't you? And I give you good prewar whisky—or Nelson does."

But later, his visits there assumed a new meaning for him. He found he could not stay away. Nelson seemed a shadowy figure; he was rarely there, and Letty rarely spoke of him. It was easy to ignore Nelson, to minimize his importance, even, at times, to forget him.

Three of the rudest people in the world: a young fellow making fun of an old man, a strong person jeering at an invalid, a wise man mocking a fool. —IRISH PROVERB.

As Letty ran downstairs and into the library she was delighted to find that as yet no one else had come to spoil a much desired tête-à-tête.

"How lovely!" she cried, going to the colonel with both hands outstretched. "I've got you to myself. I'm glad to see you've poured yourself a drink."

"I don't feel precisely a stranger in this house," he said, "so don't expect me to act like one. How do you manage to look the way you do after a whole day at the depot?"

"It's no secret. Soap and water. No, don't pour me out a whisky and soda. I think I'll have a gin and lime. What a blessing is drink! You needn't scowl at me. You know very well I've never drunk more than three cocktails at a sitting in my life and never will. No, dear Rex, there are vices nearer to my heart."

His handsome, darkly lashed eyes looked at her with tender admiration. "Have you really got two grown-up children? I'll believe it when I see them."

"Well, I was married at eighteen. At nineteen I had Lucille. I'm not yet forty."

"I don't suppose," he said, "you've ever been more attractive in your life. Letty, do you love him?"

"Who? Nelson? My dear, I'm a very good wife."

He laughed a little, a laugh that often accompanied the things he said. "Just my luck to come over here and meet someone like you. You know very well that I have every intention of marrying again. Why put obstacles in my path by providing yourself with a husband and family?"

"But you must marry again, Rex. You must. And soon."

"I had it in my mind," he said, smiling, "to marry someone who'd put my interests first, and so win my love and gratitude that I'd spend my life putting hers first."

"Are you really that sort of man, Rex?"

"Believe it or not, I'm that sort of man. I'm even the sort of man you once said you hated. I'm sentimental."

"Well then, I must have been thinking of something quite different," Letty said. "For, heaven knows, I don't hate you."

"Letty, Letty," he said. "Why don't you order me out of the house? It's the first time in my life I ever coveted another man's wife, and I'm finding it confoundedly painful."

Swiftly, as he was speaking, and in the little tense silence that followed, Letty was reviewing her life. Things in England were not going to be agreeable after the war. Nelson had been talking of selling the house, of taking a flat. Ever since he had lost that election in 1939, she had been wondering what life held in store for her. It was not enough to be married to a manufacturer of typewriters. Nelson couldn't even understand why, at times, she was bored nearly to frenzy, why, though of course she would never put it into words, she was grateful for the excitement and danger of the war.

She had never met a man whose attraction for her was as strong as that of Rex Everard. When he looked at her she was frightened lest other people saw in his eyes what she saw. He was ready, enchantingly ready, to give himself away.

Now she was going to end one phase of her life and begin another, and she knew that she was. She had done her best, she could do no more. "Rex," she said softly, putting into her voice the music that was never anywhere in her but in her voice, "Rex, be careful, my dear. Don't, don't make things too hard. When you say things like that, a whole new world opens out before me, and it's a world I mustn't even glance at."

He looked as though he were seeing her for the first or the last time. Her lashes, he saw with a new pleasure, were fairer than her hair; they were golden. And the gray of her eyes, he noted, was a color. Could she be nearly forty? The smooth, unwrinkled brow, innocent and lovely, the proud, fierce little nose, these things had magic in them. And he told himself, in agony, that she had a conscience, that she would fight a battle against this new and growing fondness, and win it, and he would be lost, and it would be the end of his dream.

He took her hand and laid it against his cheek. "If I could see you once, just once, walking into my front door, walking right through the house with that funny little walk of yours ——"

"You like my walk?" she murmured. "I always got scolded for it. My mother called it a 'follow-me' walk. She always said it would get me into trouble."

"I hope it has," he said gently, and she saw his eyes blur with tears, "and I hope this is it."

With nothing more said, they swayed together. Her arms went up, about his neck. For a few minutes they silently, with deadly, wordless passion, told each other how little the rest of the world mattered to them. When he let her go she saw that he looked heartbroken, anguished.

"Ah, Letty!" he cried. "Letty, I can't let you go."

"No," she said, her eyes holding his. "No, you can't. You're right."

"Do you by any chance mean that?"

"Darling, I mean exactly that. You can't let me go, I can't let you go. That's final. Leave the rest to me." The doorbell rang, and she seized her handbag and attended to her face. Then, as Shaw's deliberate tread sounded along the uncarpeted hall, she put her arms under his, around him, looked up into his eyes, and said, "One more kiss. Quickly."

"I've got to talk to you," he pleaded. "Can't we have an evening out together? Doesn't Nelson ever spend an evening out?"

"I'll arrange that too. Leave it to me."

"Do I have to stay here and talk to people and drink more of Nelson's whisky? Can't I go?"

If you have a septic tank disposal system, you don't have to worry about using Sani-Flush to clean your toilet bowl. It's absolutely safe. Scientific tests prove it. Sani-Flush cleans and disinfects chemically, removes stain and germ-laden film. Saves messy work. Write for free report by sanitary engineers. Learn the truth about its safety.

Effective in hard and soft water. Sold everywhere in two handy sizes. The Hygienic Products Company, Dept. 248, Canton 2, Ohio.

ani-Flush
UICK
EASY
SANITARY

ANISH THAT BUCKET

SAVE your SOAP

USE
RITZ WINDOW CLOTHS

for sparkling windows in your home and car. Eliminates use of expensive chamois. Saves time and "elbow grease". On the market for over 20 years.

In handsome white and gold gift box. 45¢ each at better Housefurnishing and Linen Departments and Shops, Hardware Stores, Groceries, or write:

JOHN RITZENTHALER
Franklin Street New York 13, N. Y.
EST. 1892

SAVOGRAN
EMOVER & BLEACHER
Renews Floors!
AND STORES WRITE FOR CIRCULAR K
SAVOGRAN CO., BOSTON 10, MASS.

NOW YOU CAN BUY
MORGAN
Masterpiece Furniture

"Yes," she said. "Go."

There were footsteps once more crossing the hall. It turned out to be two young American officers, one of them accompanied by a pretty English girl whom he'd met at a Red Cross dance. The room now began to fill up quickly. Letty, looking round, thought there could surely be no more to come when, once more, she heard the bell. A moment later the door opened and Maud walked in.

Letty uttered cries of amazement and delight. "I can't believe my eyes. Maud, you old wretch, why didn't you let me know? What a trick to play on me!"

It was more than a surprise to Letty, it was something of a shock, although a highly agreeable one, all things considered. (For there was no one who could be more useful, to whom Nelson would more readily turn for comfort.) Maud looked well and except that her hair was nearly white, no different. Letty thought she had put on a little weight, but perhaps that was the uniform. She introduced Maud to Ferdinand Walsh, who had arrived, and sat them down together. Maud's intuition, plus a fragment that remained in her memory, told her that this tall, interesting-looking barrister was the one Mary had somehow, according to Letty, "bungled things" with.

Drawing a bow at a venture, she said, "You knew Mary, didn't you? Mary Hallam."

"Indeed yes," said Ferdinand, bending on her his powerful look, great eyebrows and forthright nose. "Sad that she still keeps her whereabouts a secret."

"She hasn't, to me," said Maud. "She's written to tell me where she is, but I'm only to tell the family at my discretion, and if I feel they should be told. You're a lawyer, advise me. What shall I do?"

"Exactly what she suggests—use your discretion," he said.

"Well," said Maud, "I won't do anything till I've seen her father, and talked to him."

"I'm very much interested," said Walsh. "Tell me about her. Do you gather that she's happy?"

"Completely."

"Then why the mystery?"

"That," said Maud, "she also explained to me, but I can say nothing about it. I can only tell you that it's nothing she need be ashamed of. On the contrary."

"I'm happy to hear it," he said. Then, it seemed, he tired of the subject of Mary, and asked, "Will you be here long? I gather you've come on a mission. It's impossible, nowadays, to avoid war clichés."

"It's hardly that," Maud said. "I may be here about six months. I promised my husband I wouldn't be away longer."

THEY talked a little more, then Letty crossed the room to them. "Are you talking about Mary?" she asked. "Since you've been here, Maud, I've thought of a new possibility. Perhaps she's been murdered, and her murderer has learned to copy her handwriting and sends us those letters just to keep us quiet."

"How preposterous you are, Letty!" said Maud. "But you always were. I was just telling Mr. Walsh, what I was presently going to tell you, that she's told me where she is. But I'm not to divulge her address except for some very good reason."

To Letty, this was a slap in the face. If Mary had wished to insult her, she could have found no better way. She'll never have a chance to insult me again, she thought. But she only smiled and said, "Really, Maud? How like her to choose such a devious way of telling us! Ferdinand, you mustn't monopolize Mrs. Pierce. Come over here, Maud, I want some of your compatriots to meet you."

The evening tried Letty almost beyond her endurance. The subjects talked about were Mary and the war, but chiefly Mary. As Letty got into bed she thought, At last I shall be rid of the girl, and forever. It's Mary, and Nelson's suspicions about my behavior to her, that have come between him and me. I'll tell Nelson that if he mentions Mary once more

(Continued on Page 107)

Ladies
Now You Can WASH and BLUE
at the same time!

MAKE CLOTHES
DAZZLING WHITE!

THINK OF IT! BLU-WHITE COMBINES SPECIAL BLUING WITH PURE, MILD SOAP FLAKES!

- If you want dazzling white, sparkling bright washes, get amazing Blu-White. For this new, revolutionary product does what soap alone cannot do. It washes and blues at the same time!
- Blu-White gives you mountains of cleansing white suds, beautiful blue water underneath. There's no extra bluing rinse, no bluing streaks. And Blu-White never over-blues.
- Blu-White alone does a complete family washing job, or you can use it with your regular soap. And it's all you need for washing lingerie and stockings! You'll love it!

Get BLU-WHITE Today

- Try it next washday, next time you wash out lingerie. It's safe for everything you wash — even washable colors . . . and so gentle to your hands. Today, discover why 9 out of 10 users prefer Blu-White Flakes to anything else!

"Look on the bright side!"

Half-and-half floor demonstration quickly shows you why more women use Johnson's Glo-Coat than any other floor polish!

Shining with new beauty—its colors and pattern sharp and fresh—the bright side of this linoleum floor quickly shows you what to expect when you use Johnson's Self Polishing Glo-Coat. What's more, you can expect the gloss to last—because this hard-wearing wax polish keeps its beautiful shine a long, long time!

Here's another thing. It's actually easier to keep linoleum or varnished wood floors looking beautiful with Glo-Coat . . . than it is to keep them merely clean with soa and water. Constant scrubbing does kee floors clean . . . but you're everlastingly it. And too much soap and water haste aging and cracking.

So by all means use Johnson's Glo-Coa There's no rubbing or buffing—it real shines as it dries! Dirt and spilled thin wipe up easily, and the tough wax-protecti keeps your floors beautiful and young-loo ing years longer. Try it . . . and see!

FIVE FAMOUS JOHNSON POLISHES

Self Polishing Glo-Coat

Paste Wax, Liquid Wax, Cream Wax, Carnu for cars

New! DRAX* Johnson's new product DRAX gives invisible wax protection to clothes and fabrics. DRAX-treated garments resist dirt, keep fresh longer, are easier to wash and iron. Look for the DRAX tag on garments you buy. Ask your laundry and dry cleaner for DRAX service. Coming soon! DRAX for household use. Write for information. S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc., Racine, Wisconsin.

Save money by buying the larger sizes

*Trademark Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

© S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc., Racine, Wis., 1

(Continued from Page 105)

lk out of his house. And he will mention nd I will walk out. Only I must find here to go. Then I'll admit misconduct, k him to divorce me. Oh, Rex, it needn't e than a year. I don't even feel very for Nelson. He's so good, and such a son had said, so pleadingly, "Maud, e you to be here when she comes," Maud had arranged with Mary to ar- hen her own work would be over for the She made her way to Hyde Park e, thinking, Here I am, still involved he Parrish-Hallam family. Only it's now.

had been shocked and startled by the affair. It had not occurred to her as a ility, or, at any rate, as in the least ble, that Letty would leave Nelson. he had left the house in Hyde Park e forever. The great house now reared ny floors above the head of a stricken, ered man whose blank, fixed look filled s heart with pity.

y's going had, indeed, had something effect of a bomb, leaving the house in hly, ruined silence. Maud, hurrying summoned by O'Shaughnessy's fright- voice on the tele- felt rather like a squad, though the was there before Mr. Hallam, the said, had had a though fortunately one.

rely," he said, "Mrs. n can be persuaded e back."

d could barely re- smile as she told at, once Mrs. Hal- d made up her mind, uld be extremely un- o change it. After Nelson such com- she could, she went, urgent request, to ty.

y seemed glad to see d was her usual self, perhaps a little ex- nd her air of pretty e had not left her. , she said, had only to blame.

please don't let him think for a mo- Maud, that I'll weaken and go back. ver happens, I won't do that."

emed almost indecent, in the face of rdness, to tell her that Nelson had troke, though a slight one. But Maud her.

y's face stiffened. "I'm sorry," she I hope he'll soon be better, but don't this to send me running back to him. all got to die, though I hope Nelson e for many years. I stuck to him all h the war. Don't forget that."

vorst thing that could happen to now, Maud thought, would be to be any doubt as to Letty's intentions. erefore made it as plain as she could om now on he would have to contrive without his wife.

remorse was harder for her to witness is grief. "I've been suspicious of her. orried her about Mary, I've been of Walsh and of other men. I've been petty! Oh, Maud, I blame myself. I myself more than I blame her!"

evening he was downstairs in his sitting in an armchair, a rug over his His face had lost some of its mobility; ression was now centered in his eyes. agic creature, Maud thought, I wish tell you that I always liked you better liked Letty, but you don't want to hear .

then the front doorbell rang. Nelson at her inquiringly. "Mary?"

ll I go and let her in?" Maud asked, shook his head.

aw will go. I'd like you to stay here e."

They could hear Mary's voice greeting Shaw, and his, in reply; then children's voices, and there was a pause in the hall while coats were taken off. Then Mary came into the room, holding a child by either hand.

"Here we are!" she cried. "Father! Are you better? Oh, Maud, how glad I am to see you."

She went to him and kissed him, then turned to kiss Maud. Her father, watching her, thought he would scarcely have known her. The pallid, delicate girl had put on weight, roundness, ripeness. She had color, animation. She had the alert, half-humorous look of a woman who has much to do with children and is amused more than she is harassed by them. That she envied no one, hated no one, feared no one, was in her calm eyes. Nelson had longed to see once more the daughter who had been lost to him for six years. It was the unhappy, frustrated girl he had hoped to welcome home with forgiveness. Now, anxiously, he saw that she had passed far beyond need of him.

"Well, father," she said, smiling, "here they are, your two grandsons. David is five. George is three. They've never been to London before. Don't you think they're pretty good? It's been a long day for them. David, go to your grandfather and tell him about the train we came in. Tell him what it was like."

Nelson held out an arm, and the little boy went slowly toward him, and when it encircled him he stood very quietly and a little shyly, looking earnestly at his grandfather.

"Tell your grandfather what pulled the train," Mary prompted.

The child looked into Nelson's face and said, "A engine; a great big engine."

"A great big engine, was it? And did you go fast?"

David nodded. "And a lady gave George an orange."

"Well, he was in luck," said Nelson, keeping his arm about him. Nothing of Letty here, he was thinking. Nothing. Mary and her mother and myself, and his father. No taint of Letty. And as he heard the word "taint" in his own mind, he was dismayed, and flinched from it. "Where is your husband?" he asked Mary.

"Well," said Mary, and colored, "we didn't know whether you'd feel well enough to see him today or not. As a matter of fact, he's walking round the square, waiting for a signal. If you'd like to see him, I'll call him in."

"Of course I want to see him," Nelson said. "I expected him. Shaw has your old room ready, with two beds in it, and there are two beds for the children in the room next door. Call your husband in, by all means."

"Oh, thank you!" Mary cried. She put George down, and said, "Come, darling, we'll go and find daddy."

"How well she looks!" exclaimed Maud when she had gone out of the room. "And how she's changed! How amazingly she's changed!"

David was looking a little apprehensively from Maud to his grandfather. It was clear that he longed to run after his mother, but he controlled himself and stood quietly by Nelson's chair. He was tall for his age, less sturdy than George, but they both had their father's thick, straight fair hair and blue eyes. David had his mother's sensitive mouth and chin. Yes, David said, he was learning to read. He could do sums. He would go to school next year.

"They must take after their father," Nelson said to Maud. "They don't look much like the Hallam family." But there was no regret in his voice.

(Continued on Page 109)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Hills

By Mary Maxtone

Hills are earth's music
And the eye,
Filled with their span's
Immensity,
Sends to the heart
Chords more profound
Than ever ear
Distilled from sound;
Their grave crescendos
Sweep the sky
And bless the land
With symphony.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

GOOD COOKING IS EASY

THICK REVERE COPPER BOTTOM

The Revere method of "waterless" cooking saves time and money, preserves vitamins and food values, and brings new goodness to your favorite dishes. The secret is in the thick copper bottom which spreads the heat so quickly and evenly and makes Revere copper-clad stainless steel ware practically indestructible. After you have prepared food this way just once you'll never be satisfied again with old-fashioned methods. You'll find that these beautiful, gleaming utensils brighten your kitchen, lighten your work and are as easy to clean as glass or china. But make sure you get the real Revere copper-clad stainless steel ware. Look for the Revere trade-mark on the thick copper bottom. Listen to Exploring the Unknown on the Mutual Network every Sunday evening, 9 to 9:30 P.M., EST.

COPPERCLAD 1801 REVERE WARE STAINLESS STEEL

REVERE COPPER AND BRASS INCORPORATED

Rome Manufacturing Company Division, Rome, New York

Eleven decorator colors, one magnificent texture . . . this Bigelow Cassandra has the unique Lokweave construction.

Right at your feet

RIGHT at your feet . . . soft, thick, beautiful . . . a new Bigelow rug. Never has Bigelow made more beautiful rugs. Even husbands get enthusiastic over them. There are sculptured effects, subtle two-tones, shaggy textures, twist yarns and bright florals. All are made in wonderful decorator colors and many in the B. H. F. (Basic Home Furnishings) colors.

Close-ups of only three new Bigelow rugs are shown here. The floral: one of the 27 Beauvais patterns. The gray: Serenade, a new idea in the old favorite, Wilton. The red: Cassandra, a Lokweave carpet. One big fact doesn't show up in the pictures, but it will show up on your floor. All Bigelow rugs and carpets are made of Lively Wool, a special blend of finest wools, chosen for resiliency, luster and strength.

No wondering about beauty, no worrying about quality when you buy a rug marked by the blue and gold label. Your favorite store can show you now, or very soon, Bigelow rugs and carpets in patterns to delight you, textures to excite you, at prices to please.

FREE 8 pg. color booklet, "Middle House." Contains floor plan and 5 interior color photographs. Write Bigelow, Dept. L37, 140 Madison Ave., New York 16, N.Y.

Copr., 1947, Bigelow-Sanford Carpet Co., Inc.

BIGELOW WEAVERS

Fine rugs and carpets since 1825

(Continued from Page 107)

Mary was quickly back again, this time th a strongly built man with blunt, unndsome features and thick fair hair; wear- somewhat ill-fitting clothes and display- neither shyness nor eagerness. He went aight to Nelson and shook hands with him. "I'm sorry you've been ill, sir. I hope u're better. Mary was very worried. We me as soon as we could, but there were ings that had to be arranged at home be- e we could leave."

"Of course," said Nelson, and Mary saw th pity how his eyes stared, how fixed and familiar was his look. "I'm glad indeed to e you here," he said formally.

"And this is Maud," Mary said, a hand Alan's arm.

"I guessed that. I've heard a lot about u. How are you?"

Maud said she was very well and extremely ppy to see them all at last. "I've always d a very warm place in my heart for Mary," e said, "and so has my husband"—she used e word with the slight self-consciousness of woman who marries late in life—"in spite of e naughty trick she played on us in Paris."

"She behaved very badly," said Alan, nd she knows it, and so do I. But then, if e'd behaved better we'd never have met, d David and George wouldn't be here."

nd he and Mary looked each other, and exanged a smile.

"I'm very much hamed, father," said ary, as Alan and Maud ked together. She drew chair close to his. You've been so forbearing, and so kind. I n't deserve it. Will you forgive me?"

Conscience gets a lot of credit that belongs to cold feet.

EARS rushed to his eyes. "There's no estion of forgiveness. I was a poor sort of ther to you."

"Oh, no. You gave me everything you uld. You couldn't give me happiness. How uld you? I had to find that for myself. ut I was a thankless girl."

"Never mind. That's all past." He sighed d looked over at Alan, who caught his e. "Tell me what you're doing now."

"Well, sir," said Alan, "you know I'm an gineer, specializing in radar. I've been tting up stations wherever they were eded. Now I'm home on a bit of leave. ary has had to carry on alone, and I don't ow how she's done it. She s been a heroine. ut now we hope that's over. I'm going to experimental station in the Midlands on, and the family will come with me, ary and the children and my mother."

"Is your mother better?" asked Maud. "She's about as well as she ever will be."

Maud was looking at Mary's hands. They ere rough and lined. The crippled right nd had done its full share of work. They ere the hands, Maud thought, of a workingan's wife, but this did not seem to her a agedy; this seemed to her a small price to y for happiness and those two boys. Whatever the price to Mary, it was plain that she d paid it gladly.

Maud said, "What I'm longing to hear, ary, is what you did and where you went after you left Paris. What happened to you, and how did you two meet?"

At this point, David created a diversion. He looked at Mary with an eager, expectant look, as of one who hopes to have a long-deferred wish fulfilled, and said, "Where is it? You promised that I could see it you promised."

"You know you mustn't interrupt when grownups are talking," she chided him, "but I know how much you want to see it. Father," she said, "your grandson has inherited my passion for music. He's only seen an upright. Do you think I might take him into the drawing room?"

Nelson looked at the clock. "It's nearly their suppertime, isn't it?" he said. He was feeling very tired. "I told Shaw they'd want their supper as soon as they came."

"Could I please see the piano now?" David asked politely.

"The room is all in dust sheets," Nelson said, "but go in if you like, of course."

"We can soon open it up," Maud said, and got up. "Come along, it will only take a minute."

To her surprise, Nelson put aside his rug and raised himself slowly from his chair. "I'll come with you," he said, and Mary took his arm as they went to the drawing room.

Maud switched on a lamp while Alan and Mary folded back the dust sheet from the great Bechstein. Mary was thinking of the miserable hours she had spent in that room. But the little boy was staring at the piano. He had forgotten them all in his delighted amazement. He went forward in a kind of silent ecstasy, tiptoeing softly to the piano bench. His whole small being hungered for the sound of a pressed key. He hitched himself up on the bench and gave a little wriggle to seat himself more firmly. Then, gently, he struck middle C. After a rapturous moment he turned to look at his mother with a face that was a mere vehicle for the expression of utter joy. Then he forgot everything but the delight of listening, and struck the same key again, a little louder. He let the sound die away, then lifted both hands and, holding them suspended over the keys, struck a chord, a chord he had practiced a hundred times on the old hired upright piano at home. Then, with the same careful deliberation, another, and another. The magnificence of those small chords, echoing in the great room, the joyous pain of complete fulfillment, overcame him. He slipped abruptly off the bench, ran to his father and burst into tears.

"Now, now, lad," said Alan, lifting him up, "what's all this? Crying for joy, are you? Well, you're not the first that's done that."

George's small voice made itself heard. "David's crying," he announced.

The door opened and Shaw came in, surprised to find them there, and said, in his usual mournful way, that the children's supper was now ready in the dining room.

THE END

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE POWER OF A WOMAN

(Continued from Page 11)

sty and incapable of exact definition. They gin to build their skyscrapers from the cond story up, and the building hangs in e air without any visible foundations. omen, being housekeepers, like to start with ellar and investigate that thoroughly before ey proceed. They'll say, "I don't like that llar—I don't like those steps." Or else, That's a well-built cellar. You can trust " They are unable to explain why they el that way. They just do. So it has been lled "intuition." It isn't intuition; it's perlative common sense and direct think- g, all the big, unmeaning words eliminated. en form committees; women go right to the point. They become confused only when, because of their training, they listen too much to men. I'd like to see more women in politics, in business and everything else. They are rational, practical, and usually do what they say they are going to do.

I am a man who made a fortunate marriage. Practically every mistake I have made, including the business ones, I made against the better judgment of my wife.

Meanwhile, such is the present state of the male mind, only a few psychologists, personal-relationship engineers and doctors will agree with me, or even understand what I've been saying.

THE END

GLOSHEEN

THE HEART OF YOUR COLOR SCHEME

Let *Bonded Glosheen be your decorator! Begin with any Glosheen color-planned print—for example, Fascination shown above. Let it sing at your windows . . . echo its colors on your couch. Steal its heart-melting yellow to tone your walls . . . match the leaf tone in plain for your chairs. And then for accent, accessories in its richest flower shade. Here's complete color harmony, guaranteed by the Waverly* Bond to keep its sparkling colors fresh through sun and shine, through repeated washings and cleanings.

Waverly GUARANTEE BOND

GLOSHEEN ONE OF Schumacher's WAVERLY Bonded FABRICS

COLOR TRICKS GALORE WITH FABRICS

WAVERLY Bonded FABRICS, Dept. W-24
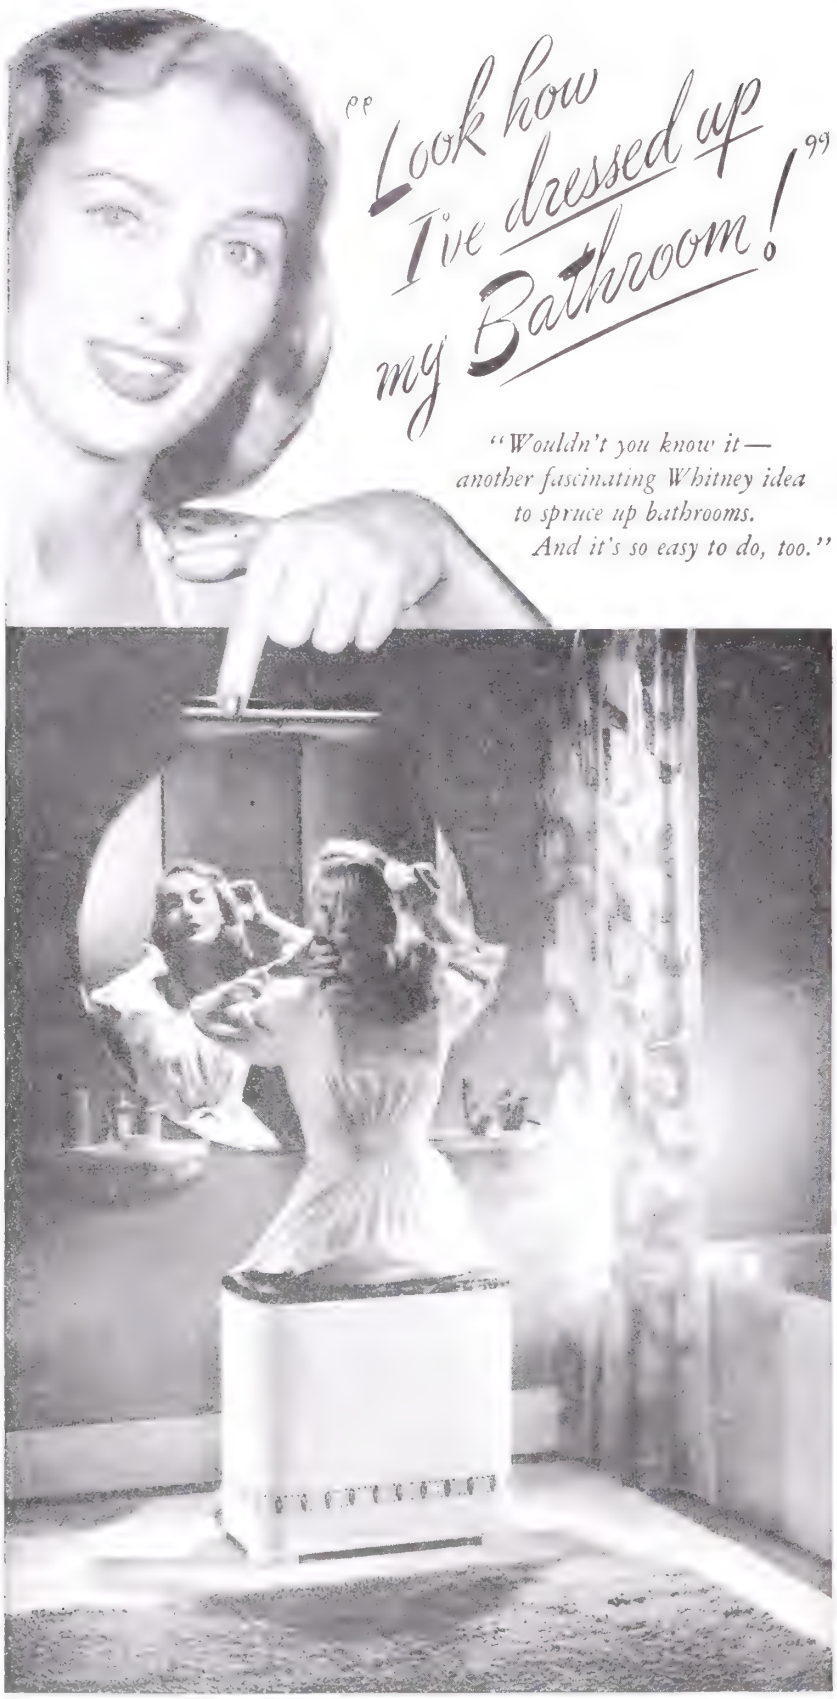
F. Schumacher & Co., 60 W. 40th St., New York 18, N.Y.

Please send me your decorating booklet—"Color Tricks Galore with Fabrics." I enclose 10¢ to cover cost of mailing.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____



"Look how I've dressed up my Bathroom!"
"Wouldn't you know it—another fascinating Whitney idea to spruce up bathrooms.
And it's so easy to do, too."

How to make this Beauty Parlor Bathroom!

Just hang a mirror on your wall, dressing table height. Line up a couple of shelves to either side to hold all your creams and other cosmetics. Select a lovely Whitney bench-type Hamper as a bench to sit on. And there you have it. A gay utility dressing table...

a new look to your bathroom. Whitney Hampers come in a variety of colors to match your bathroom color scheme. And best of all, when you buy a Whitney you buy beauty that will last and last. Look for a Whitney Hamper at your favorite store next time you go shopping.

If it's a Whitney... its beauty will last!

Whitney HAMPERS
JUVENILE FURNITURE · CRIBS
BABY CARRIAGES

F. A. WHITNEY CARRIAGE CO. Since 1858 Leominster, Mass.

CALL ME "THE HEART"

(Continued from Page 41)

Then she went to dramatic school, where she was notably successful with all the most unsympathetic parts she could persuade them to give her: Goneril in King Lear, Hedda Gabler, Craig's Wife. She worked hard to become a capable actress; and a Hollywood talent scout signed her up for being so beautiful.

She did not like Hollywood much, and was amusing herself with her personal marionette theater and the play-acting of her childhood until the moment when she could clout some director over the head and get a part like the one Bette Davis had in The Corn is Green. Or Paxinou in For Whom the Bell Tolls.

In the meantime, at a quarter to seven, she was roaring along Wilshire Boulevard, wondering which of the amazing inaccuracies of her studio bio book the publicity department might have pounced on to make an issue out of tonight. Hastily she recalled the first page of that bio book: "Mother—trapeze artist; Father—Brazilian rancher; First job—international spy; Favorite book—Diseases of the Musical Profession." If any of these irrelevant snatches of misinformation were thrown up to her tonight, she would just have to take her chances, depending on her resources of ingenuity, which were considerable.

She arrived, a little breathless, at the head of the steps in the Ambassador lobby. Now which of these men might be Hank What's-his-name? If she could get them all to sing, it would help. She'd know that voice in a thousand.

"You're Martha Sherman, aren't you?" said that voice right in her ear.

She jumped and turned to face a stocky, sandy-haired man whose blue eyes surveyed her blandly through rimless spectacles.

"Better than I thought," he said, meaning her. "I'm Hank Welcher," meaning him. "We're just about ready to begin," he told her.

"Do I look all right?"

He looked her over carefully—the clinging black velvet dress with its rhinestone slide fastener, the shining hair, brushed high on her head, the slippers with the glass heels. "Supercolossal," Hank said. "Couldn't we just zip that thing a little lower?"

The only other person Martha knew among the twenty-odd guests in the private dining room was Jonathan Crisp. He had directed her first and only picture with a kind of businesslike care she had found very attractive. Once he had made the entire cast wait while the star planned and cooked a complete meal. He said he wanted her to renew her acquaintance with food on the hoof before she started making dramatic gestures at a kitchen range. He had had no complaints about the way Martha walked through the part of the star's pretty, innocuous sister. And he had never once said she was beautiful.

MARTHA liked him and she was glad he was seated next to her. "What's it all about?" she whispered to him hastily. But his attention was already being claimed by a girl on the other side.

There was a good deal of high-caliber jabbering going on all around her, but it was no different from the kind of high-caliber jabbering she heard all over the studio: who was working in what picture, who had been to Palm Springs with whom, who was writing what and for whom. Professional talk. If she had known it would be like this, she would have worn a black wig and talked with a Portuguese accent about her Brazilian rancher father.

She wished they would haul out their flashlights and get to work on her so she could go home. She wouldn't mind if they asked her to pose with the man at the head of the table. He had a face and jowls exactly like a hippopotamus. He rose to his feet like a hippopotamus, too, and began to speak.

"LADIES and gentlemen," he said, "we are here tonight for a very special reason. Not just to enjoy a splendid dinner, though we have certainly done that!" Satisfied laughter and scattered applause. "But we are here tonight for another reason. We are here to inaugurate a new and greater rebirth of Romance in America. Romance, that some may have thought was rapidly disappearing from our too streamlined American scene, lives again in the person of our honored guest tonight—the girl who has been chosen to personify the Renascence of Romance . . . the Heart . . . America's Heart . . . of 1947 . . . that beautiful starlet of TNT Pictures, Miss Martha Sherman!"

They all raised their glasses. Some of them looked around rather vaguely to be sure which was she, but Hank Welcher solved that by rushing over to Martha and pumping her hand up and down.

Then the flashes began to go off. She did, after all, pose with Mr. Hippopotamus. She posed with a lot of other people she had never seen before in her life. She posed alone, with her wrap and without it. Lights were set up around her. Cameras clicked.

After what seemed ages, she was standing outside in the good, clean air with Hank and Jonathan Crisp. She felt as if she had just come out of one of those Crazy Houses at an amusement park.

"Well," she said a little belligerently, "what do I do now?"

"Go home and get a good night's sleep," said Hank. "Next week, we start shooting Allegro—a Modern Love Story, starring Miss Martha Sherman and directed by Mr. Jonathan Crisp."

"Did you know about this, Mr. Crisp?"

"Yes," said Jonathan. He said it a little shamefacedly, Martha thought.

"It's going to be the biggest thing that ever happened to you, Miss Sherman," Welcher told her. "Thanks for your cooperation. G'by now."

"What's going to be the biggest and so forth?" Martha said to Hank's departing back. "What's he talking about, Mr. Crisp?"

Jonathan Crisp shrugged. "How about a drink?" he said.

"Thanks, I don't. But I could use a good deal of explanation."

They went to a little place called the Swanee where people sat in respectful silence while Art Tatum played the piano.

Between Tatum, he told her. It was her build-up. She was going to be starred in Allegro—a Modern Love Story. He was going to direct. It was going to cost a million dollars or so, and naturally the star had to have name value.

"But why me?"

"I think they think you're very beautiful," he said apologetically.

"What's that got to do with it?"

"Look, Martha." They were Martha and Jonathan by now. "I know what you mean. But don't worry about it. Just play along."

"Is that what you do?"

He smiled a little, and it came to her sharply how delicate and sensitive his mouth was, how incongruous in that big head with the bushy hair touched with gray at the sides.

(Continued on Page 112)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The Foolish Heart

By Elizabeth Coatsworth

The heart is not a merchant,
It values not by weight,
But like an unlearned simpleton
Confuses small and great.

A word, a star hung in the west,
Some motion of a hand
May mean more to a watchful heart
Than empires understand.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Plan your home for family comfort

With the right Heating Equipment . . .

matter how cold it is outdoors, your home can always cozy and comfortable if you select American-Standard ating Equipment. Whether you prefer radiator heating, warm air heating winter air conditioning, American-Standard offers you the finest. And for type of fuel—coal, oil or gas. Yet it costs no more. Above—Empire ler, Budget Water Heater and Hanover Laundry Tray.

AMERICAN-Standard
HEATING · PLUMBING

Look for this Mark of Merit

2. With the right Plumbing Fixtures . . .

You want convenience, good looks, and healthful cleanliness in your bathroom. (In your kitchen and laundry, too.) And you'll get them—plus years of dependable service—if you buy American-Standard Plumbing Fixtures. They are beautifully styled, colorful, smart. They bear the American-Standard Mark of Merit—your guide to quality. Above—Neo-Angle Bath, Companion Lavatory, Master One-Piece Closet.

NEW HOME BOOK shows American-Standard Heating Equipment and Plumbing Fixtures. These products—sold through Wholesale Distributors to your Heating and Plumbing Contractor—are available on easy time payments for remodeling. Write for your copy today. American Radiator & Standard Sanitary Corp., Dept. L73, Pittsburgh 30, Pa.

AMERICAN-Standard
HEATING PLUMBING
Serving the Nations' Health and Comfort

TING AND PLUMBING products for every use...including Boilers, Warm Air Furnaces, Winter Air Conditioners, Water Heaters, for all fuels...Radiators, Convectors, Enclosures...Gas and Oil Burners.. Heating Accessories...Bathtubs, Water Closets, Lavatories, Kitchen Sinks, Laundry Trays, Brass Trim...and specialized products for Hospitals, Hotels, Schools, Ships and Railroads.

Graciousness

A BEAUTIFUL PIANO WITH A MAGNIFICENT TONE

LESTER Betsy Ross Spinet

The Betsy Ross Spinet will bring true graciousness into your home . . . be the keynote for the musical activities of your entire family.

Compact in size . . . thrillingly beautiful in fine, rich woods . . . this famous piano will add distinction to any room.

Rich, clear tone is inherent in every Betsy Ross Spinet . . . and the easy, responsive action makes playing a joy.

Moderate in cost . . . made ONLY by the Lester Piano Manufacturing Company . . . makers of the renowned Lester Grand Pianos.

ONE name quality price

SOLD BY AMERICA'S FOREMOST PIANO DEALERS

Foreign Sales Office:
H. A. ASTLETT & Co. • 27 William St., New York 5, N. Y.

LESTER PIANO MANUFACTURING CO., LESTER 13, PENNSYLVANIA

Send me your 24-page illustrated book showing piano arrangement in the home. (Enclose 10c for postage)

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ STATE_____

MAIL THIS COUPON FOR ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET Z

(Continued from Page 110)

"Yes," he said. "That's what I've been doing now for ten years."

She thought about that for a moment. Ten years seemed a long time. "Didn't they ever try to make you do something you didn't want to do?"

"Sure. But I'm the kind of guy who never can think of the right answer till next morning when I'm shaving."

"How's the story on this—this Allegro?" she asked warily.

"It's got a twist. Instead of boy meets girl, they manage to avoid having them meet really until the end of the picture."

"No!"

He put his hands along the sides of her arms where they lay discouragedly across the table. "Martha," he said very seriously, "take my advice. I've been around here a long time. Don't kick up a fuss. Get yourself some money in the bank. You'll need it to have your kind of life."

"What do you know about my kind of life?"

"I've watched you work. You like to act. You've got imagination." He stopped and looked embarrassed. "Besides," he went on, "I know about Lucifer and Francesca."

"You what?"

"You see, Imogene's sister works for me. She thinks you're a little cracked."

"I might as well live in Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania!"

"Yes, I know. That's Hollywood. But promise me you'll take the build-up as you find it. I think you can make a very good thing of it. What's one picture more or less?"

TATUM was beginning to play again. There was a fine, sharp precision about his playing, a sureness that excited you and made things seem very active and clear and possible.

"Well, I don't know why you should bother," she said quietly in the middle of Begin the Beguine, "but I'd be the last person to suggest that Martha Sherman couldn't do with a little advice. If you'll promise I won't have to do any cooking, I'll crawl sweetly through Allegro with you."

"You won't have to do any cooking."

Next morning, the headlines had it. "MARTHA SHERMAN—THE HEART," they read.

"Last night, at a dinner at the Los Angeles Ambassador," the story went, "Martha Sherman, star of TNT Pictures, was voted America's Heart of 1947.

"L. Harold Klee, heading the group of California businessmen who made the award, stated that the American male wants his women more romantic and that Miss Sherman best typified their new ideal of American womanhood."

The shots were okay and the information no more outlandish than some of the other things Martha occasionally read about herself in the paper, so she chucked it in the wastebasket and went back to Lucifer and Francesca.

"Are you a starlet, varlet?" said Lucifer in one of Martha's voices.

And Francesca answered in another, "To beat or not to beat, that is the question of the Heart."

It took about a week for the thing to get under way. In that week they took a hundred pictures of her, some in specially designed dresses with Heart necklines which were pretty low; and some with Heart hems which were pretty short in front.

Seventeen college fraternities invited her to college proms. One boy brought his saxophone to serenade her at two in the morning; the photographers got there in the middle of the first chorus of Dinah. Ten band leaders dedicated broadcasts or theme songs to her. Two of the band leaders flew out to Hollywood to have their pictures taken with her. The Hollywood sight-seeing busses added her house to their schedule and Imogene said they stopped twice a day while the sightseers gaped at the torn place in the awning and the banana tree in the patio.

Mr. Hippopotamus' wife sued for divorce and got it, on the strength of the dinner photographs. She called Martha up and was bitter and unpleasant about it.

MOTHER, I'M DELIGHTED WITH THE WAY CLOROX REMOVES STAINS FROM PATSY'S DRESSES!
AND YOU CAN DEPEND ON CLOROX TO MAK WHITE LINENS SNOWY-WHITE SANITARY!
CLOROX
CLOROX

CLOROX ALSO LESSENS RUBBING—CONSERVING FABRICS. IT'S FREE FROM CAUSTIC...EXTRA-GENTLE.

MOTHERS welcome the way Clorox makes everyday household tasks easier! For Clorox removes stubborn stains . . . such as fruit beverage, grass, blood, many ink, dye and medicine stains—even scorch, mildew—from white and color-fast cottons and linens. Clorox bleaches white cottons and linens snowy-white (brightens fast colors), makes laundry sanitary. Clorox lessens rubbing conserving fabrics. In household cleaning Clorox disinfects, deodorizes, makes home a more healthful place. Directions on label.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE BLEACH AND HOUSEHOLD DISINFECTANT

CLOROX

FREE FROM CAUSTIC

Years of unsurpassed quality and performance have made Clorox the choice of millions . . . it's always uniform . . . it's always dependable

Luminall, in lovely new colors, brightens your home at low cost. At your dealer's.

LUMINALL PAINTS, CHICAGO 9.

New! Practical and appealing. Makes any towel or napkin a perfect bib! Handy for daily use at home . . . ideal when dining out or traveling. Clips are washable, sanitary plastic in pink or blue; tape is adjustable in size. Packaged one pair to a clear-plastic gift box. Now available at leading department stores and specialty shops.

FEDERAL TOOL CORP., (DEPT. J) CHICAGO 12

KVP PIE TAPE

When You Buy -
ORGANDIE CURTAINS
Look for this Label
SAYLERIZED
PERMANENT FINISH
Starchless!

SAYLERIZED ✻ curtain organdies keep crisply beautiful in damp weather — fresh and new looking after countless washings. This process minimizes lint and fuzz—imparts soil resistance that means less laundering, less wear, longer life. No starch required. Also Saylerized cotton wash goods and handkerchief fabrics.

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

KEEP YOUR BATHROOM
fresh and sweet
VANISH
Banishes Toilet ODORS
CLEANS TOILET BOWLS WITHOUT SCRUBBING
BANISHES TOILET ODORS
JUDSON DUNAWAY CORPORATION Dover, N. H.

BERLOU STOPS MOTH DAMAGE FOR 5 YEARS OR PAYS THE DAMAGE
Yes, BERLOU is guaranteed in writing to protect your furniture, rugs, blankets, clothing, furs from damage caused by moths. The cost is small. Vanais suit may be mothproofed for only 8 cents a year, other articles equally low. Buy a bottle of this effective mothspray today from any leading department, drug, or hardware store. BERLOU Mothproofing Service is available at leading rug and dry cleaners. Write Dept. 26 for interesting free booklet on moths.
BERLOU MFG. CO. • MARION, OHIO
Also, The Berlou Company, Ltd., London, Canada
BERLOU GUARANTEED MOTHSPRAY

Extra Money Every Day
SELL EVERYDAY CARDS
Easy to sell
GET SAMPLES
PROCESS CORPORATION, Dept. H-2, Troy at 21st Street, CHICAGO 23, ILL.

"There ought to be a lethal chamber for women like you," she said, and hung up.

Martha was about to agree with her when the phone rang again.

Hank told her what to wear and when and where she was to go to a preview with Jonathan. "You two'll make a good couple," Hank said. "Jonathan's an older man and the Heart rejuvenates him. That's the angle, see?"

"Listen, Hank," Martha said. Her voice sounded like steel mail being laundered on a tin washboard. "Listen, Hank ——" She was so mad, she couldn't say another word. He hung up.

Going to the preview with Jonathan was all right. She and Jonathan were getting along fine on the set. They had lunch together often and made fun of the story of Allegro together. Then they could go back to work with their adrenalin glands functioning normally.

Sometimes, when they were both particularly weary and fed up with the whole thing, he came out to her house. Imogene filled them full of excellent food and then Jonathan buried himself in the big chair to watch Lucifer and Francesca in various treatments of The Alligator and the Fox.

In one version, called Patience Conquers All, Lucifer became Jonathan himself, directing Francesca as Martha, who paced up and down the tiny stage muttering, "It's a tale told by an idiot." The night Francesca appeared as Henrietta Welcher, taking pictures of Lucifer in many unusual and bizarre poses, ending up lying flat on his back, tiny claws clutching the air, Jonathan writhed helpless with laughter.

With the truly cultivated man, the maiden, the orphan, the poor man and the hunted slave feel free.

From The Heart of Emerson's Journals: Edited by Bliss Perry (Houghton Mifflin Company).

Truth is truth, though spoken by an enemy.

"It's more therapeutic than a psychoanalyst," he gasped.

Dragging Jonathan into this Heart mess was too much. Jonathan was her friend.

As she dressed, Martha took time out to crouch over the big powder jar, chanting in three separate and horrible voices:

"Thrice the brinded cat hath mewed. . . .

Thrice and once the hedge pig whined. . . .

Harpier cries '"Tis time, 'tis time. . . . I'll fix 'em!'"

She went back to her dressing, smiling wickedly and humming Dinah quietly to herself. As she pulled on her gloves, she said grimly, "The Heart at eve has drunk her fill."

She began with the autograph hunters. Smilingly, she signed for them all. She signed Zuleika Dobson . . . Lucretia Borgia . . . Joan of Arc . . . Moby Dick.

At the preview in the darkened theater she felt warm and happy. She reached over and took Jonathan's hand. He smiled and moved closer.

"I'd forget about that phony-autograph stuff if I were you," he whispered soberly.

To which she replied grimly, "I guess you've never been a goldfish, have you, Jonathan? Well, take it from me, here's one goldfish is going to turn."

"You want to look out a man named Welcher doesn't bite you!"

"He wants to look out his goldfish doesn't bite him!"

Jean Moore, the star, turned around and said "Sh-h-h!" at them and they were silent, giggling a little.

There seemed to be thousands of people waiting when they came out. Miss Moore looked pleased and smiled her camera smile. Until, somewhere in the back, a voice said, "Give us some of the old Heart, Miss Sherman!"

"Delighted!" Martha said briskly. "Just hold these folks back a bit, will you, Mr. Crisp?"

Now—Luxurious Hand-Loomed Weaves
Patterned in Wallpaper

Dorothy Liebes'
own hand-loomed fabric originals are reproduced in wallpaper for the first time in these nubby-textured NEW WEAVES! One of many exclusives in these 3 new United Wallpaper books.

You'll see thrilling new possibilities for interior styling when you see these breath-takingly beautiful WEAVES by Dorothy Liebes, "poetess of the loom"...and you'll be amazed at the low prices.

You'll see New Florals, Plaids, Stripes, Solid Tones, too, in these 3 new books. The newest in modern and traditional papers for every room in the house. Many of them shown as ensembles for use together in the same or adjoining rooms.

You'll see that every paper is guaranteed 4 ways: 1. Washable. 2. Fadeproof. 3. Style-tested. 4. Wall-tested for perfect matching and hanging. And price-marked at the factory to assure you fair retail price.

You'll see DDT Ceiling and Cedarwood Papers! They KILL ON CONTACT—flies, moths, mosquitos, etc. Guaranteed effective for two years, non-hazardous to people and pets.

You'll see the United Wallpaper Seal—your guide to extra value at no extra cost. Look for it on the back of every pattern in these 3 new books, and every genuine United Wallpaper pattern in other books now at your dealer's and decorator's.

Now at Wallpaper Stores, Department Stores and Decorators Everywhere

UNITED WALLPAPER

World's Leading Designers and Largest Manufacturers

Merchandise Mart, Chicago 54, Illinois

"You can't give your Daughter away in a Give-Away Suit"

1. "YOU JUST CAN'T WEAR that cutaway at your daughter's wedding. What would her new in-laws think? Why, it's as old as — as the rug you're standing on. And almost as bad a misfit."

2. "WE'VE SIMPLY GOT TO BUY a new rug. We can't have a wedding reception here with a rug like this! Can't you hear the guests afterwards, 'My dear! Did you see their rug?' "

3. "SHE'S RIGHT AS USUAL. I'd hate to have anyone see this number. It's so threadbare you can't even make out the pattern. And it only covers half the floor."

4. "IT'S A BEAUTY, MARY. But it looks frightfully expensive." . . . "It's a Smith Broadloom Patrician — in the new B.H.F. colors. All-wool pile, too. And it cost less than your new cutaway." If your rug has become "down-in-the-heel," we suggest that you see the new Smith Floor-Plan Rugs and Broadlooms at your favorite store. And send for "Colorama," Clara Dudley's new color-idea book.

Alexander Smith & Sons,
Dept. C-7, 285 Fifth Avenue, New York 16, N.Y.

She stepped into the small cleared space and opened her mouth. She sang:

"I got Heart from the start by the cartload,
Heart and Me cannot be far apart;
My auricle and ventricle
Are perfectly symmentricle
And all my veins and arteries
Are from the finest hearteries.
A very special dish, served à la carte—
That's me, the Heart . . . Heart . . . Heart!"

She ended up like Miss Ethel Merman.

Then Jonathan recovered, took her firmly by the arm, and shoved her into a taxi. "You're crazy!" he growled.

"Let's go to the Swanee!"

"You're going home, before you make any more trouble!"

Five minutes went by.

Then Jonathan said, "I didn't mean to be harsh."

"Oh, harsh!" She wasn't really paying much attention. The exhilaration of her first lunge toward revolt was a heady thing.

"Martha, I don't blame you a bit."

"Well, who cares?"

"I do. I care about your getting hurt. They won't let you get away with this, you know."

She turned and looked at him. In the sudden flashes of the street lights, his kind face was very sad.

"What's the matter, Jonathan?"

"Look, I don't like this business any more than you do."

"Why do you stay in it, then? Think you're going to improve it?"

He shook his head. "Not any more. But I know why I stay in it. I've thought it all out. I'm used to the excitement of it, and I couldn't get along now without the excitement. I'm not very exciting myself."

"Why, Jonathan ——"

"No, don't stop me. I know what I'm talking about. I've got a swell little lumber business up in Portland. But I know I couldn't stand to devote all my time to it. I can't make my own excitement, like you can."

"Well, I'm sure I think that's very nice of you -I think!"

"Don't laugh, Martha. You wouldn't understand about stodginess and dullness because everyplace you go, everything you do, everything about you is exciting!"

"Really, Mr. Crisp, this is awfully sudden!"

She was sorry as soon as she had said it. He drew back in the corner of the seat as if she had hit him.

"Jonathan! I'm sorry. I didn't mean Come here, Jonathan."

He moved back again.

"Listen, Jonathan, I do understand wl you mean. But, remember, they never tr to make a goldfish out of you. I live i fish bowl, completely surrounded by fla lights. Do you know that a Montana rancl lassoed me in front of the studio the otl night so he could get to meet me?"

"How could I miss it? It was in ev paper in the country."

"They can't do that to me, I can tell y If you think I've acted badly so far, wait you see what I've got up my sleeve!"

"Martha, don't!"

"Why not? It won't hurt anybody I c about but me."

"It'll hurt me."

"You! They won't fire you."

He didn't look at her directly. He look at a point just behind the driver's ear. "I but they'll fire you. You'll leave, and never see you again."

Martha couldn't believe her ears, but believed the look on Jonathan's face. "I your arms around me, Jonathan," she sa "I'll behave."

They rode on home very contentedly.

She had enough good sense not to look the papers next day. But Hank Welcher not so sensible. He shouted over the pho

"Listen, baby, I'm the one thinks up angles. How am I supposed to explain t picture of you singing like Merman?"

"You mean people won't think it's a p view of Allegro?"

"Shut up! New York's been on the phc all morning. A guy wants to sign you fo musical. Said he didn't know you co sing."

"I can't."

"Who said you could? And what abc this escape in a taxi with Jonathan? Y two didn't run off and get married by a chance?"

"Certainly not! We did get some brea then, didn't we, Hank?" She made it sou as innocent as she could.

"Listen, wise guy, there are breaks—a breaks! Don't let these kind of things h pen again!"

"No, Hank. I guess I was just drunk w power. Can't you cover up for me, Hank

He spluttered and fumed some more told her not to let it happen again. A writer from New York, he said, was com out for an interview. She wanted a story what girls all over the country could do acquire Heart.

(Continued on Page 116)

THE NOTION COUNTER

By Elizabeth Metcalf

YOUNG Mr. and Mrs. Gibson call their baby daughter The Gibson Girl. . . . "That wolf had better not come inside our door," said the young father with an eye on the rising cost of living, "or the kids will eat him." . . . One woman finishes her superb gray Persian cat's bath with a platinum rinse. . . . If the Christmas doll has tired of opening and closing her eyes by now, rub a little talcum around her closed eyelids.

"Are you sure these are 7½-AAAA's?" she worried to the shoe clerk.

"Well, it says so right here on the box," he drawled.

"Maybe I'd better try on the box," she snapped. "It might be a better fit."

Please don't call dogs doggies, nor aunts aunties—but please call pants panties. . . . My friend wears a pair of handsome wide sterling bracelets which used to be napkin rings. . . . "Before fifty, a man trades his health for money," our old banker used to say. "After fifty he tries to trade back."

Add familiar home scenes: mother, peer up at threatening skies as the clock closes on noon recess or afternoon school clos time. . . . What we call a grab bag, British call a lucky dip. And what Ameri babies call a choo-choo, English babies a puff-puff. . . . When I stop to think h filthy paper money gets, I pretend tha don't want any. . . . Heine's one-line scription of The Thin Man: "He was so l that his full-face looked like a profile."

Emergency beauty hint: if you snag fingernail and have no emery board at ha smooth the nail on the scratching surface a pack of matches. . . . We'll miss white lace fences around town when the sn begins to drip off into dirty water. . . . you are incredulous about Jacob's Joseph's having been embalmed, check with the fiftieth chapter of Genesis. . When a wife noticed that the ceiling pla above her pillow was beginning to crack, asked her husband to change sides of the with her—because he was insured.

Janie's dancing with a college man

A MIRACULOUS change has swept the room. A name band plays where the divan once stood. The carpet has turned to a gleaming dance floor.

And as Janie glides with little Sue—she's at a night club, high over New York, dancing with a dashing college man.

Only a young girl dreaming . . . ?

True enough, but wait until you hear the thrilling tonal realism—all the delicate shadings of sound—of your favorite broadcasts or records on a magnificent new Sparton Radio-Phonograph.

See this superb model at your Sparton dealer's* now. Under the Sparton plan of selling direct to one dealer exclusively in each community, even the Sparton price is sweet listening.

Consult the Yellow Pages of your telephone directory.*

Sparton Model No. 7-BW-76-P.A.

Sparton

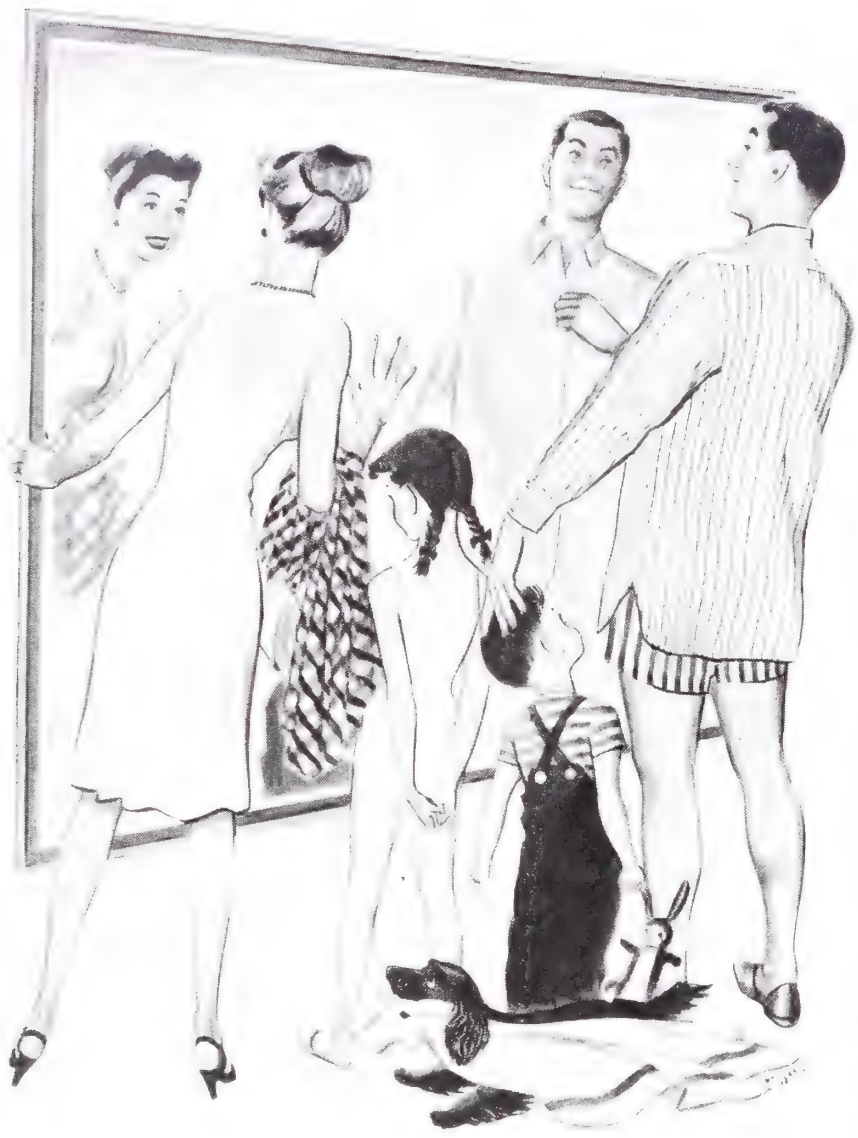
RADIO'S RICHEST VOICE SINCE 1926

This handsome apartment-size Sparton Radio-Phonograph harmonizes beautifully with the finest furniture. Available in matched mahogany or matched walnut veneers, hand-rubbed by craftsmen to a gleaming luxurious finish. Thrilling performance assured by Standard Broadcast, two Short-Wave bands, two built-in antennas and trouble-free record changer.

THE SPARKS-WITHINGTON CO., JACKSON, MICHIGAN

Sparton of Canada, Limited, London, Ontario

Washday Reflections



"AS we lined up in front of the mirror this morning I thought, 'What a lovely family. And what a lot of washday problems I'd have without my Easy Spindrier!'

"Jim wears seven shirts a week, sometimes more if we go out. Three-year old Buster is scarcely past the diaper stage, while clothes-conscious Nancy changes her dress three times a day if I don't look out. And with all their sheets and pillowcases and towels, you can imagine the fix I'd be in without my speedy two-tub Easy!

"One tub washes a full load while the other spins a full load damp-dry. Whirls out up to 25% more water than a wringer. That means faster drying. No deep hard-to-iron creases. And no broken buttons!

"My Easy is safe for my finest blankets. Even does washable drapes and slipcovers. Best of all, it gives me more time to live . . . because it gets my week's wash on the line in less than an hour!"

You'll be glad you waited for an Easy Spindrier! See it in action tomorrow! Easy Washing Machine Corporation, Syracuse 1, New York.

(Continued from Page 114)

"And no monkeyshines," Hank ended up.

"No monkeyshines," repeated Martha softly.

The fan writer was a fairly hefty woman whose fuzzy black hair emerged stiffly from behind one of those hats made of gladioli and green ribbon.

"Now just what can I advise other girls to do to acquire Heart, Miss Sherman?" she said brightly, pencil poised.

Martha looked at the woman. She seemed to be a perfectly normal, serious-minded young person. She spoke the words as if she had been saying, "What are the approximate dates of the Wars of the Roses?"

Briefly, the thought of Jonathan came between Martha's impulse and a growing, compelling fury. The thought of Jonathan passed She stepped to the little bluestone fireplace.

"In my opinion, the important thing is to be all things to all men," she began sweetly. "Now, first, there's the Girl Scout type."

"Well, I never would have thought of Girl Scouts as romantic, as the Heart type, Miss Sherman." The woman was glad they were going to be pleasantly informal.

"You didn't! Well, can you make a fire with flints?" She struck a match to the fire Imogene had laid that morning. "You see, first you rub the flint as hard as ever you can against an old log. Beech, if you're lucky. But, whatever way you do it, the Girl Scout gets her man."

The woman began to write, tentatively, "Girl Scout type. Romantic? Build fire for two. Beech is best."

"Of course, there is the fascinating, unpredictable type too. This girl overwhelms a man, keeps his brain reeling."

Martha led the way to the patio. With the most courteous explanations, pausing frequently to inquire sweetly, "Am I going too fast for you?" she proceeded in rapid succession to climb up and down the banana tree, do a soft-shoe routine on the hearth, demonstrate the card trick where you produce the ace of hearts, knock over the coffee table with the pottery cigarette box in an impulsive thrust for a match.

"Of course, this type is pretty confusing," Martha wound up. "But if there's anything a man hates in a girl with Heart, it's to know where he stands. Then, we have the life-of-the-party type of Heart Girl."

Now she sat on top of the tiny upright piano in the hall and sang a chorus of Bill, tapping out the basses on the black keys with the heel of her slipper. In the middle of the song, the fan writer closed her notebook and left, slamming the door behind her.

AFTER she had gone, Martha dressed again, put on her hat and coat and gloves, and sat down to wait for the phone to ring. It did in about an hour.

"Listen to me, you little double-crossing smart aleck," Hank bellowed. "That dame is having hysterics in Tilwyn's office right now. You get down here this minute!"

She was not prepared for her reception. Hank was in his office, alone.

"We're to go to Mr. Tilwyn's office at once," he said.

Martha had never seen the president of TNT before, but she did not think he could look worse than Hank did. Hank's face was an even, delicate yellow-green. Mr. Tilwyn's, when they finally reached his massive gray-and-maroon office, was a deep, apoplectic red-purple.

The writer and Jonathan were coming out as she and Hank were shown in. "If you think you'll ever get another TNT line in my mag——" threatened the fuzzy-haired gladioli hat. The glitter in Jonathan's eyes might have been rage, joy, revenge or determination. Martha really didn't have time to notice.

Mr. Tilwyn was a small man, and Martha got the impression that only his head emerged above the huge, flat-topped desk. That was because he was slumped back in his chair, looking a little like Bela Lugosi.

"Is this her?" he began ominously.

"This is her," Hank said, leaning gloomily against the window frame and thrusting his

AMAZING RESIN AND OIL PAINT DOES A ROOM FOR ONLY

$3.49 PER GAL.

ONE GALLON DECORATES AVERAGE ROOM

(ONE GALLON MAKES 1½ GALLON FINEST PAINT, READY TO APPLY.)

GOES RIGHT OVER WALLPAPER, PLASTER, PAINT, WALLBOARD.

REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

The modern miracle wall finish

Kem-Tone

COVER THE EARTH

AVALON E

DRIES IN 1 HOUR
ONE COAT COVERS

PRODUCT OF SHERWIN-WILLIAMS RESEARCH

BRINGING THE MARVELS OF SCIENCE TO YOUR HOME

SEE YOUR Kem-Tone DEALER

viciously into his pants pockets so that at folded into a little peplum behind

y did not ask her to sit down. Silence d for several minutes. Then Mr.
n spoke.

iss Sherman," he began in a reedy
"you may not realize it, but we've put of money in you. Today you are a n-dollar property, potentially. Mind ot that TNT is concerned so much with eturn. Hank, didn't I say to you that Miss Sherman is a beautiful girl. She go far in pictures'? Didn't I, Hank?"

eah," said Hank from the window.

e wanted to give you your chance,
Sherman. A ten-thousand-dollar pub-man we put on the problem. I mean ank Welcher."

k turned his back and looked out the w.

e sits up nights and figures out angles.
y he creates a new title: The Heart."

ilwyn's expression indicated that he aring sweet, faraway music as he spoke ords. "The Heart. He created it es-y for you, Miss Sherman. He gives a
, all for you. Overnight you are
s. That brings us up on the details, Sherman?"

atmosphere was funereal. Numbed he possibility of even whispering,
a nodded.

Tilwyn's voice grieved reedily on.
ad she rewarded such thoughtfulness?
kind of gratitude had she shown? She ted like a crazy person. She had dis-the whole studio and him. And that efenseless writer—how had she treated
And her married to a cousin of his
ly. And what about all those loyal fans preview?

is is not the way to get on in Holly-Miss Sherman. I am very much we were mistaken in taking up your
. I'm sure you understand why Miss Moore will take over Allegro—a n Love Story."

rose to his feet. There was still not nuch of him above the massive desk.
s voice had a good brass quality now.
I advise you not to contest the breakyour contract, Miss Sherman."

Tilwyn touched a button under his eaning slightly askew to do so, and a man came in and led Martha gently

u sure pulled a boner, kid," Hank said, ing her out. "When I think of the way
I had that thing laid out. It would have been beautiful. Well, no hard feelings. G'by now."

Martha stumbled along the hall to the elevator. Once outside again in the sunshine, she shivered.

"And I never said a mumblin' word," she murmured to herself in an awed whisper.

She forgot she had driven down, and began to walk blindly along Sunset Boulevard. Numbness enveloped her, as if she had just escaped a terrible doom. She'd been fired before, but usually with quite a lot of swearing and noise and good, honest anger; never in this hurt, icy silence. She shivered again.

"Where you going?" It was Jonathan. He fell in step beside her.

"Home. To fire Imogene and pack."

"I already fired Imogene's sister and packed."

"They fired you too? Well, of all the ——"

"No. I quit." The glitter in his eyes emerged clearly as determination. Anybody could have seen it.

"What are you going to do, Jonathan?"

"Well, I thought I'd take a flier at the lumber business."

She thought that over. They were passing a supermarket. A woman in a bathing suit and a short silver-fox jacket pulled a Pekingese out of their way. The Peke yelped a lot. The woman went on buying oranges.

"What happens to your excitement, Jonathan?"

He grinned, and she liked the way his face looked, open and friendly and pleased. "You remembered about it," he said, as if it were something very remarkable.

"Of course I remembered about it. Don't you think I have any feelings. What about it?"

He caught her hand, and she was surprised to note how warm and strong his felt. Maybe it was just because of that awful chilliness in Tilwyn's office.

"I thought I'd try importing my excitement."

"Meaning me, Jonathan?"

"Meaning you."

"Do you suppose I could find a marionette theater in Portland where I could put on The Alligator and the Fox?"

"I could personally build you one of Crisp lumber."

Martha stopped walking and turned to put both her hands gravely in his. "Lucifer and Francesca and I will be very happy to excite you permanently in Portland, Jonathan," she said.

THE END

"Golf is to be organized, we can eliminate ... [illegible] ... and night work."

It's like Extra Help in the kitchen

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Why successful meals are so easy-to-get on the New Caloric

Flavor-Saver Dual burners, guaranteed for life, save flavor, vitamins and minerals ... Give you the correct heat for frying, boiling and simmering ... And save up to 39% on fuel. 6 or 4-burner divided top.

You're sure of evenly broiled, delicious foods with the all-over uniform flame of the Veri-Clean Broiler. For easy cleaning, the entire broiler is completely removable. Glides in and out on 8 roller-bearings.

No more cooking in the dark — new brilliant light illuminates entire oven. The Hold-Heat Oven Seal and insulation insure a cooler kitchen and even baking temperatures, so oven foods can be just right everytime.

The new Ultramatic Caloric gas range has all the work-saving features you've always wanted.

It's fast—Flavor-Saver Dual Burners give you a complete range of high heat, simmer heat, even "keep-warm" heat. It's convenient—with the Automatic Oven Timer you can bake a dinner while you're away. It's a beauty—smooth, modern design makes it America's easiest range to keep clean.

See the Ultramatic Caloric at one of our 4000 dealers, or write: Caloric Stove Corporation, Widener Building, Philadelphia 7, Penna.

Specially Engineered Models for L.P. Gas Users out beyond the city gas line

Ultramatic Caloric

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

THE GAS RANGE YOU WANT

★ FOR DRAMA, CHOOSE A FASHION COLOR LIKE WATERMELON PINK AND USE IT THROUGHOUT FOR UPHOLSTERY, HANGINGS, RUG.

PHOTOS BY HAROLD ROWLER

THIS spring, decoration emphasis seems to lie on color. Rich, vibrant pinks, greens, blues and yellows sing out in the gayest harmonies imaginable. Of course you have already guessed that one doesn't go all out for bright color in the average lived-in room, but uses it as a bouquet to pick up a dull scheme or change the light quality of a dark interior. Yet if you are doing an entire new room and like a bit of swish, by all means choose your favorite watermelon pink, glowing emerald or Ming yellow; and use it everywhere as if you were painting a picture with it, allowing the contrasting furniture wood to become the accent. This is the easiest way to get an effect and it's safe for nonprofessionals.

For a simple treatment, choose a really wonderful printed fabric, one with overscale leaves or flowers, and proceed this way: Paint walls, ceiling and trim the background color of your fabric. Use the fabric for draperies and to upholster at least two chairs and your sofa. Pick out one of the plain darker colors in your print, but one that is prominent, and match that for your carpet. Use a stripe of another of the print colors for the remainder of your upholstery. You need not worry about balancing your color if you do this, and it is a decoration formula that works like a charm in any room, especially an informal living room or bedroom.

Few of us, however, will be doing out-and-out new decoration, but will be freshening up, or buying a few new things to mix with our old furnishings. Integrating the bright new colors into our old schemes takes more careful planning than if we were doing a whole new job. So here are ★ COMBINE SEVERAL PASTEL COLORS FOR A MODERN SCHEME IF FURNITURE HAS STRAIGHT SIMPLE LINES.

Color Schemes are Brighter

BY HENRIETTA MURDOCK
Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

Decoration colors are brighter in a new way. Flowerlike hues replace the old wine, taupe and mulberry, and the most sedate walls may be painted chartreuse or pink. Whole rooms may be decorated in one glorious color, and old schemes enlivened by introducing new-style color accents.

★ TRADITIONAL FURNITURE IS AT ITS BEST WITH BRIGHT COLOR
STEPPED UP TO CONFORM TO TODAY'S BRIGHT PALETTE

some tips to help you get best results. Watch your wall colors, and don't get them too bright. If your fabrics are strong in color, keep your walls pale. You mustn't be bright all over, and this time fabrics and upholstery have the honors. But even though soft, your pale colors can and should be chosen from the new-style colors. Chartreuse and lime, clover pink, mint green, hyacinth blue and pale shrimp are top-fashion colors for walls.

For a room based on blue: Suppose your blue is the medium blue in vogue during the thirties. The only new colors that will go with it are lighter blues of the same family for walls and trim; and if you use a printed fabric, try to find one with pink or white flowers on a light blue ground. Blue-and-white-striped wallpaper is a pickup, or blue-and-gray-striped draperies against a plain wall. Blue is one of those solo colors that look best all on their own, except for the accessory accents, and often the best bet is just to buy more blue and have an out-and-out blue room.

For a room based on red: This is easy, for red in decoration is always in style. To snap things into the decorator class, do the walls in chartreuse or lime green. Use a red-and-white stripe on the side chairs and rich green on any other upholstered pieces.

Red curtains are attractive if of nice quality. You can use a print instead, if you like. Look for big red roses with plenty of foliage on a white or chartreuse ground. Red carpets or your prize Oriental is all right if the reds match your draperies.

For a room based on green: Since green is a foil color for practically all good decoration hues, you can pick almost anything you like and come out on top. You can give your room a new look by doing your walls in yellow and hanging green draperies. Or you can use a pale green on your walls for an especially cool effect, provided you have abundant light.

If you like lavish flower prints, you may use any combination of green with pink, yellow, coral or red in them. Green retires when brought into contact with brighter hues, but makes all of them look prettier. Of course, you can have super style and drama by using one of the California prints with exquisite green leaf or vine patterns.

For an Early American room: The charm of provincial-style rooms is emphasized by using brighter schemes in keeping with the period. Try India-print calico, always red or yellow, or plain Turkey-red cotton. Roman-stripe effects are excellent for rugs or in textiles. Canton-blue print is charming, also green or red with a resist pattern in white. Pale yellow, blue or pomegranate walls are surprisingly satisfactory in a room with country-style furniture.

DULL COLORS OF A FEW YEARS PAST ARE REPLACED BY BRIGHTER

OZITE
Rug Cushion

Why does it pay to buy the best rug cushion? Because all there is to it is quality. The better the rug cushion materials and quality, the more softness and luxury it gives, the more it reduces wear and the longer the cushion itself lasts. So insist on the finest rug cushion—genuine OZITE and you'll always walk on the nap of luxury.

Genuine Circle Tread OZITE Rug Cushion saves rug-wear; quiets the room; keeps floors warm; holds rugs flat and in place. Permanently mothproofed. Odorless because Ozonized. Guaranteed. Remember . . . always look for the Circle Tread Design!

THE HELLER

(Continued from Page 35)

Mrs. Karlan growled in disbelief. "You better be up and dressed by the time I come back," she ordered, striding out of the room.

In a moment she was in her back-yard garden, yanking bitterly at weeds. Leonard Mason, one of her roomers for the past two weeks, left the house, and Mrs. Karlan glimpsed his head and shoulders over her barberry hedge in the side yard. It was nearly two hours before she returned to the house. Then she remembered, and she strode to Anne's room to see if that annoyance were still present. It was: a ball of bedclothes and a cascade of ebony hair.

"Get out!" Mrs. Karlan growled. She reached down into the bedclothes and found Anne's arm. The pull she gave might have uprooted a small stump, but it did not drag Anne out of bed. Anne had not been asleep, and she clung to the bedpost. "Get up, you lying little good-for-nothing!" Mrs. Karlan ordered. She aimed a swat at Anne's rear.

Anne kicked vigorously at her mother's stomach, but missed, and the covers flew off the bed. Mrs. Karlan stood in the center of the room, hands on hips, and stared at her daughter.

"What time did you get in last night?"

Anne was counterfeiting sleep. She did not answer.

"I don't know what time you got in last night," continued Mrs. Karlan. "But I got a pretty good head and I got ears; maybe if I don't know exactly what's going on behind my back, I got a pretty good idea. I know all about your darling Betsy and the jam she got into."

Mrs. Karlan hesitated in order to observe the effect of her words on Anne. There was no apparent effect.

"Trash like her is what makes it almost impossible for us to bring up our daughters decent. You're not to see hide nor hair of that girl again, or you go bouncing right out of this house." Mrs. Karlan moved to the door, but before she left she turned and said, "If I treated you the way you ought to be treated, I'd lather you black-and-blue."

ALONE, Anne remained motionless for some minutes. She was not unduly disturbed. A brush with her mother was the price she expected to pay for staying home from school. Nor was she at all agitated about her connection with Betsy Lane. Betsy had been expelled from school. The sewing teacher had discovered a few days before that Betsy was pregnant by comparing measurements made over the period of a semester. Anne had been not in the least horrified, although she had been surprised that this accident had befallen her own and very dear friend, Betsy. She would not have been surprised had it happened to one of some three dozen other acquaintances. Anne frequently spent idle moments wondering by whom Betsy was pregnant. But she did not let it bother her. And this morning Anne did not spend a great deal of time thinking about Betsy.

Anne was listening to whispers from another source. She closed her eyes and smiled. Anne's face was innocent of the drug and dime store make-up of the evening before. There was no hint of hardness in the curving line of her jaw and chin. Her nak arms hugged a pillow.

"I love that sweet gorilla!" Anne wh pered.

ANNE went to school that afternoon. S was in a happy mood. She was glad beca she would see Jane Whipple, and Jane, w had a talent for collecting informati would post her on the scandals, absurdit opinions and general news of the past twen four hours. But Anne was happy chiefly cause she would see Fred Halper—if the ape hasn't skipped school again.

Anne did not go directly to the school, headed across the street to the Alli Pharmacy. In her purse was twenty-f cents she had pilfered from a fruit jar in Karlan spice cupboard. She discovered booth at the pharmacy Susie Snead, S Bates, Marilyn Arnold and Chuck Simps Anne did not care for Sam and Susie. S was one of the most talented jitterbugs Shadowland Ballroom, but he liked knock couples balance with his bow. Susie was girl. Susie hac pretty face anc habit of messing other people'sda They made a n detestable combi tion, in Anne's o ion. But Ch Simpson, a hus serious senior, entirely unob tionable, altho of little interest anyone but Mar Arnold. Mari was good to h around—she min her own busi and had a syn thetic ear.

Anne was di pointed at not f ing Fred, but M lyn slipped her around her Anne squeezed the booth. "I ling," said Mari "were you sick morning?"

"I had a h ache from t awful Government exam I didn't take," Anne.

Sam Bates appeared to be studying A Suddenly Susie broke into a fit of giggle

"What's so darn funny?" asked Anne

Sam painfully straightened his face, Susie continued to giggle.

"Going out for track?" Sam asked Ch

Susie's face was becoming red. "Nee good weight thrower!" she sputtered.

"Yeah—good shot-put and javelin m Sam added.

"What do you mean—'good shot-put javelin man'?" asked Anne, nettled. "W do you think Fred is if he isn't a 'good s put and javelin man'?"

"Fred's track suit's damn near wore by now, I bet!" said Sam slyly.

At this remark, Susie relapsed into s hysterical laughter.

"I don't see anything so damn fun said Anne.

"Fred's track suit's wore out." Sam s defiantly.

Susie was trembling and sizzling li leaky boiler under a high head of steam. gasped, "His pants are full of buck holes!"

"What's so damn funny?" Anne manded. "What's all this sappy gig about Fred?"

"There isn't anything except that F pants are full of buckshot holes," said

"Say, what is all this, anyway?" manded Anne. There was an uneasy si

Next Month

The moment had come for which Catherine had been waiting. She was dizzy with the triumph and terror of it. The creature she had destroyed lay twenty feet away from her, twisted and noiseless and fearfully still. Now there could be no turning back.

This is the story of two men and a woman, and a small town that nourished murder in its heart. Unwillingly—for it was a peaceful college town and the young art instructor and his wife had lived peacefully within it. No one could foresee that a stranger's ambition was to weave a pattern of evil about them, a gray and killing—

Design for November

By Ronald Mitchell

Complete in the April JOURNAL, condensed from the novel soon to be published by Harper & Brothers.

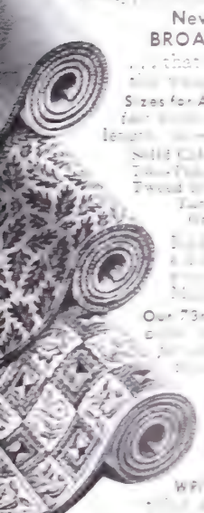
"RUG MAGIC" by OLSON

Your OLD RUGS, CLOTHING save up to 1/2

All So Easy! ... FILLE ... ng Guide in colors that tells all about ... FACTORY-to-You Way ... Material Can Be Sent at Our Expense ... e Olson Rug Factory, where ... y the Famous Olson Process, we shred ...

New Reversible BROADLOOM RUGS ... that will give double ...

Sizes for All Needs ... Solid Colors ... Tweed Effects ... Our 73rd Year ...



WRITE ... FREE RUG BOOK ... Decorating Guide ... in Full Colors ... MAIL COUPON ... OLSON RUG CO. ... Chicago 41 ... Mail Big RUG BOOK ... NAME ... ADDRESS ... CITY ...

As the hour of one P.M. approached, the ... ried to meet it. This was Jane Whipple.

"Oh ... glad you're back! I began to wonder, and thought maybe you'd do something rash."

"What are you talking about? You're hinting about something, just like everybody else."

"You haven't heard about it?"

"No, spill it!"

"Well, Betsy and Fred are married."

"Yes. You know how Betsy was going to ... brothers stopped at the track field and sent a kid over to tell Fred to come to their car ... suit when they got married, but I got it straight from the next-door kid that he bor... they wouldn't let him out of the house for ...

"Honest, kid," Jane cooed. "I hated to ... nounced. "I don't give two hoots."

... had mysteriously appeared on the black... woman with a long train. The abdomen of the young lady, or at least what passed for it ... eyes disregarded it completely. She was ... but she deigned not to notice. Miss Tready ...

As the class progressed, thoughts of Fred began to come over the dam that Anne had ... cheering crowds at football games, his name on every lip and in every newspaper, and the pride she felt as they appeared everywhere ...

Suddenly the room was in an uproar, and ... rim of tears. Gradually she came to realize that the students were laughing at Miss Tready's discovery of the drawing. Anne laid her head in her arms and cried.

... fiercely searched the room for the culprit. ... arms, her shoulders shaking, apparently with ...

Miss Tready's accusing finger jabbed at ...

"Susie Snead supplied the name Miss ... me!" she called ...

Anne suddenly jerked her head up.

"Get up!" ordered Miss Tready.

... been only vaguely aware of what had ...

To cut your heating costs these 3 ways...

Insist on G-E Space Heaters!

1. No more forcing up your furnace heat to take the chill off [illegible]

Instantly ... the Arizona gives off a warming red glow. The chilly air is drawn ... circulation.

2. Delay turning up the heat early in the morning. [illegible] on yourself, when dressing, with an instant General Electric Sunbowl Heater.

3. You can turn off your central heating plant at night [illegible]

When a room gets chilly, just plug in a General Electric Arizona or Sunbowl Space Heater. Keep warm, save money.

Remember, all the electricity that goes into any G-E Heater comes out as heat. So be sure, buy General Electric. General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

Be Sure of the Best with General Electric Space Heaters!

THE ARIZONA—Only $14.95 plus tax

THE SUNBOWL—Just $8.25 plus tax

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Once upon a color scheme . . .

the story of a modern room is told in clear, rich tones and handsome textures. You can tell the same story in your home at a very pleasant price . . . with Burlington House Fabrics, of course!

All these fabrics are color-coordinated

1. Sk[illegible]
2. [illegible] turing green; also blue.
3. Rich, leaf-textured cotton in olive; also blue, flame, coral and turquoise.
4. Heavy nubby cotton in flame; also blue, olive, coral and turquoise.

Look for this label at leading stores

UPHOLSTERY FABRICS DRAPERY FABRICS SLIPCOVER FABR

BURLINGTON MILLS CORPORATION OF NEW YORK • 271 CHURCH STREET, NEW YORK, NEW YO

(Continued from Page 121)

en occurring; her grief had blinded her to details. Then Susie's smirking face came focus. Every man, woman and child she d seen that afternoon seemed bent on her miliation. Well, they would not get away th it! Anne suddenly charged down the le. She grabbed a handful of Susie's hair th one hand and with the other slammed sie in the face with her purse. She kicked r in the shins, pounded her on the head th her fist, forced her down in her seat and mmed her knee in her side. Miss Tready ved in and grabbed Anne by the arm. ne jerked free of Miss Tready, swatted r in the face with her purse, and fled the om.

She felt that she must hide. Then she ought of an isolated spot behind the cirlar fire chute where she had, several years fore, received one of her first introductions necking. She hurried around to it, and ere, seated on the sill of the boiler-room ndow, she removed her handkerchief from r purse, pressed it to her eyes and wept thout restraint.

When Anne finally quit crying, she opened r purse and dug around for her mirror. She nd it broken, but took the largest fragnt, and with powder puff, lipstick and le finger she repaired her make-up. She lked briskly away from the school.

She stopped at a gstore, bought a ckage of cigarettes, d headed for Wilcox uare. There she ected an empty ch, lit a cigarette, e reviewed all the nifications of that ernoon.

Although she did know what she nted to do, there re negative convicns: she would not back to school. ove everything . there were Betsy d Fred to be pun-ed, somehow. She rched the dirtiest ners of her vocabry for names for m, but no name s vile enough.

Anne, despite her emotional upset, began feel hungry. She had had vague thoughts staying downtown until evening and then nming her way into Shadowland Ballm, but she had reckoned without her mach. So she started to walk home.

Several blocks from her house she noticed amiliar figure walking in her direction. It s Leonard Mason, the roomer. Leonard s tallish and his clothes hung nicely and re always in knife-edge press. Anne had ticed his black wavy hair; she knew its or because Leonard had once left his door en and Anne had gone in, found his bottle hair oil on the dresser, and had sprinkled ew drops in her palm. She estimated his e at twenty-six or twenty-seven. She had rd her mother say that Leonard was head okkeeper at the Logan Ice Cream Comny. Anne was scarcely acquainted with n, but all at once it occurred to her that might have possibilities. She halted ruptly and waited for him.

RS. Karlan was pushing her carpet eeper back and forth on the hall rug as ne and Leonard walked into the house. onard went upstairs to his room, and Mrs. rlan called her daughter into the kitchen. 'I don't want you hanging around our omers, young lady."

Anne's innocence put an injured ring in r voice. "I only met him on the way me."

"On your way home or anywheres else, don't want you hanging around him."

"I'll hang around him all I damn please,' ne said, moving away.

Mrs. Karlan's hand shot out and caught r daughter by the arm. She had the grip say that everything looks pretty darn funny about you and that Fred Halper,' she told Anne. "I heard about his having to marry your friend Betsy. I want you to know that when I was a young girl a fellow like Fred ..."

"Oh, shut up about Fred!" Anne managed to twist her arm free. She ran to her room.

MARY Karlan, the only other child of the family, was reading the evening Record in the parlor next to the telephone. She was a pert-faced girl in her early twenties, hardly five feet to Anne's five-feet-three. Mary had arrived home a few minutes before six o'clock from the Fred Wallace Farm Implement Company, where she held a job in the general office. At intervals a telephone awoke at her elbow. "No, this is not Anne," Mary would say. And then Anne's voice would come from the room at the end of the hall. "Who is this?" Mary would ask, smothering the mouthpiece. Some conversation between the sisters. "She's going to be busy," Mary would say.

In the kitchen Andrew Karlan was talking with his wife. Mr. Karlan was an unimpressive man in shirt sleeves, unbuttoned vest, and suspenders. He was no more than middle-aged, but his shoulders were bent and he had a fuzzy gray halo of hair around a shiny crown. His eyelids drooped, making him look sleepy and tired.

"Anyway, where did you hear this?" he said. "Perhaps it isn't as bad as you think, maybe. Well, I don't see where I can do anything about it."

In her room Anne had laid aside her copy of Screen Love magazine and was lying on her back on the bed, smoking a cigarette. She reflected on the telephone calls she had received that evening. All were from students of Emerson Senior High School, and she noted with satisfaction how well she was carrying out a vow of hers never to speak to anyone connected with that hated school again. But Anne also viewed with apprehension the prospect of a dateless evening.

The Karlan family ate for some time in silence. Presently Mrs. Karlan looked at her husband. "Well!" she said.

"Anne," began Mr. Karlan uneasily, "your mother and I have been talking. We thought it best that perhaps you study harder and not run around nights so much."

"So much!" exclaimed Mrs. Karlan. "She's going to quit running around entirely, at least until there's some fellow we can approve of."

"Yes. You've had a lot of good time, Anne, and now maybe you can settle down and do some good studying and maybe make some good grades."

At this moment the telephone rang and Anne scurried to answer it. When she returned to the table, she saw her mother's face furrowed in anger.

"Who was that you were just talking to?" Mrs. Karlan barked. "You're not leaving this house tonight."

"Perhaps you'd better study your lessons," said Mr. Karlan.

Anne glanced up narrowly from her plate. "Skip it!" she said. "I'm not going back to school. I quit school this afternoon."

Mr. Karlan was aroused. "You don't really mean that, do you, Anne?" he asked incredulously.

Anne delivered an individual punch with each word. "You can bet your little old bald noodle I mean it! I quit school and I got a date for tonight, and ain't that terrible!"

I Can Remember

By Bessie Saunders Spencer

I can remember little things
Like [illegible]
And big, old, noisy bumblebees
And [illegible]
trees.
Big things recalled are often stark,
But small ones slip from out the dark
With no demands or lofty boasts,
And play like chummy little ghosts.

IMPERIAL Washable WALLPAPERS

Always First in Fashion

IMPERIAL BRINGS A WEALTH OF NEW WALL BEAUTY TO YOUR HOME!

Choose from hundreds of brand new Imperial Washable Wallpapers! Glowing with color, sparkling with new ideas, every one is a decorating inspiration!

FOR QUALITY AND PRICE PROTECTION LOOK FOR THE IMPERIAL SILVER LABEL

In whatever price range you choose Imperial papers, you can be sure of fair prices . . . established by Imperial and plainly shown in sample books. And you can be sure of the quality . . . Imperial Washable Wallpapers are Color-Locked*, guaranteed washable and light-resistant for lasting beauty.

SEND FOR COLOR HARMONIZER . . . IMPERIAL'S NEW BOOK ON COLOR HARMONY

[illegible] authentic color charts and many full-color sketches. Send for your [illegible] you can create new beauty

*COLOR-LOCKED . . . an exclusive Imperial process by virtue of which all Imperial Washable Wallpapers are guaranteed for 3 years from date of hanging to withstand room exposure without fading and to clean satisfactorily in accordance with the instructions included in every roll. Should any Imperial Washable Wallpaper fail in these respects, it will be replaced without charge.

Imperial Paper and Color Corporation
Dept. L-45, Glens Falls, New York
GENTLEMEN: I am enclosing 25c for my copy of your new Color Harmonizer booklet

Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State ....

for gracious living . . .

air-wick

is as necessary

in the bathroom as soap itself!

Regardless of ventilation, you can keep your bathroom fresh and immaculate always. Simply uncap a bottle of air-wick* and keep it on duty throughout the day. air-wick, the little bottle with the magic wick, began its spectacular career in the kitchen. It kills all unpleasant odors of cooking food . . . including cabbage, onions and fish. In the living room, it kills the odor of stale tobacco smoke. Throughout the house, in bedroom and bathroom, it makes indoor air "country-fresh". There's nothing to light . . . nothing to spray. air-wick contains more than 125 basic compounds as found in nature, including chlorophyll, which nature uses to freshen the air in gardens.

*air-wick deodorizer and household freshener is fully protected by U.S. patent . . . a trademark of Seeman Brothers, Inc., New York 13, N. Y.

Tune in "Monday Morning Headlines" Sunday, coast-to-coast ABC network, 2 to 2:30 p.m. EST, following Drew Pearson use air-wick for...

1 cooking odors
2 stale smoke
3 airless bathrooms
4 bedrooms
5 children's nurseries
6 sickrooms
7 pet odors
8 musty closets

why risk offending?

air-wick kills household odors

costs only a penny or so a day!

PAT. NO. 2,326,672

"So!" crowed Mrs. Karlan. "I suppose it would be just too much to ask the little lady who she thinks she's going out with tonight."

But Anne in her turn could be sarcastic. She leaned over the table and spoke to her mother with a dramatic whisper. "Why, no, indeed! It so happens that I'm going out with Mr. Tony Kruper."

"Oh, no, you're not!"

"You can pardon me from here to hell, but I am!" Anne stood up. "You just wait and see whether I go out tonight."

Mrs. Karlan did not attempt to follow her daughter. She ate silently for a while, then told Mary to clear off the table and went into the living room. She moved a chair to the corner of the room where she could command a view through the curtains to the foot of the stairs.

In her room Anne flopped on the bed, lay on her back and stared at a crack in the ceiling. She had no desire to go out with Tony Kruper. But Tony's call had come at such an opportune time that she felt a slight wave of benevolence toward him.

Presently Anne arose. She unhooked her dress and tossed it carelessly on her bed. Slipping into her house coat, she collected her rat-tail comb, brush, facial tissue, lipstick, powder, mascara and eyebrow pencil.

Then she hurried upstairs. From Leonard's room came the tapping of a typewriter. Anne shut the bathroom door and locked it.

She removed her make-up and applied fresh. Her procedure was so involved, however, that it was twenty minutes before her face was ready. Gathering her house coat around her, she hurried to her room. Anne let her house coat slip from her shoulders and tossed it on the bed. As she did this, she noted absently that the dress she had worn that day was missing. The significance of this did not impress her immediately, and she began to fluff her hair in front of the vanity mirror. Then she stopped, as though she had heard a suspicious noise. Slowly she walked to her closet and stepped inside. It was dark, and she ran her hands over the hooks and rods. There was not a single dress, sweater or article of clothing of any description.

Anne sat down in the chair by the window. She reached for her purse on the bed, took out her cigarette package, found it empty.

When Tony Kruper stopped for her, Anne strained her ears to hear what was said. First, the doorbell rang. Then her mother's footsteps and the sound of the door opening. A few mumbled words, and the door closed.

The solitary window of Anne's bedroom looked out upon a slope that terminated at Jefferson Avenue, one block away. Anne could see a group in front of Joe Svec's tavern. Automobiles, in a never-ending river, twinkled down the avenue. Couples, arm in arm, strolled past. And from the open window the May breeze played with the curtain.

Anne was lonely. She yearned for a throbbing dance floor, a motorcar racing over the highway, someone to talk to. She wanted Fred. She despaired because, incredibly and irretrievably, he was lost.

A surge of breeze ruffled the pages of Screen Love magazine. Anne pulled down the shade. She found the article on Loma Belle Cummings, folded back the cover and placed the magazine on the bed. Then she rummaged through a drawer of her vanity until she found a tape measure. With this she encircled her body at her breast, waist, hips. She compared these measurements with a table alongside a photograph of Loma Belle Cummings. She smiled. She hummed Ti-Pi-Tin.

After a few poses before the mirror, Anne opened another drawer. She found a pair of pink silk pajamas that Mary had given her the preceding Christmas. She put them on, stepped into her slippers, drew her house coat around her, and opened the door. Quietly, Anne slipped down the hallway, up the stairs. She saw a crack of light underneath Leonard Mason's door, headed straight toward it, rapped gently.

Leonard had been in his closet, examining a pair of last-year's light wool trousers for moth holes. He stepped from the closet to answer the knocking and found Anne already in his room.

"Oh!" he breathed, surprised. "Does your mother know you're here?"

Anne shook her head.

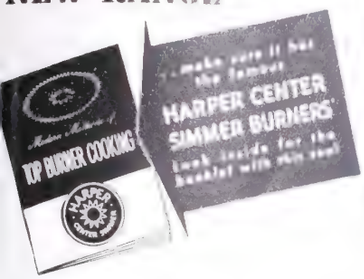
"You better watch out." Leonard chuckled nervously. "You're in line for a scalping."

Anne investigated the room, walked her fingers over the keyboard of Leonard's portable typewriter, examined a pile of magazines on the table. "My mother," she said, "I hate her guts. You know what she did? She hid every scrap of clothing in my closet. If she'd taken the stuff out of my drawers, I'd have

LITTLE GUY

"I understand they were two-for-a-nickel under the Democrats!"

Before Buying Your
NEW RANGE

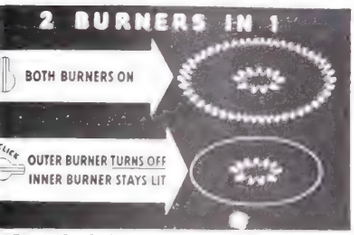


Harper Center Simmer Burners are superior to all other top burners because each Harper burner is really 2 burners in 1. As shown in diagram, the big outer burner brings foods to a quick boil. Turn handle until it "clicks" and the big burner goes out, leaving only the small, efficient inner burner to finish the cooking.

Only the separate Harper Center Simmer gives you the controlled low heats you need to keep foods warm for serving . . . to eliminate pot watching and boiling dry... to allow cooking with little water, which saves time and gas and keeps the average kitchen 9 degrees cooler. Only the Harper separate Center Simmer can help you so much in your cooking.

Insist on Harper Burners!

8 Leading Gas Ranges are Harper Equipped

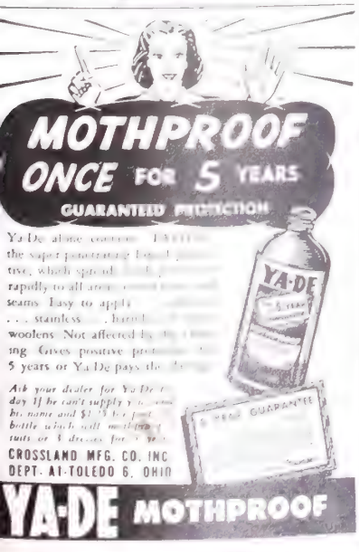


HARPER-WYMAN COMPANY
564 Vincennes Ave., Chicago 20, Ill.

E-Z-DO

WORLD FAMOUS
Wardrobes, Chests
AND CLOSET ACCESSORIES

illustrated booklet
E Z DO, Dept. DC
New York, N. Y.



had to come up here naked. Lucky she forgot that, wasn't it?"

Leonard said nothing.

"Well," said Anne, "you're not very sociable. I got so lonely down in my room I could have bit my fingers off." She sat down on the edge of the bed. "Whatcha been doing?"

"I just finished writing a letter."

That did not seem to interest Anne. "Got a cigarette?" she asked.

Leonard gave her a cigarette.

"I was dying for a smoke. Thought you might have one, so I beat it right up here." Anne's voice became confidential. "Say, there's a swell dance tomorrow night. Skeets Galloway."

"Is that so?" Then Leonard laughed. "You're an impetuous girl."

"What does that mean?"

"Sort of headstrong."

Anne was pleased. "You're deep. I was all ready to get mad at you. Who's Marjorie Purdy?"

Leonard remembered the letter he had written. He had placed it behind the platen of his typewriter, but now rather wished he had slipped it into the table drawer, out of sight.

"She's a girl I know."

"Your steady?"

"I'd call her that."

"How come she's in Wildfield? A hometown girl, I suppose."

"She works there, in a doctor's office."

"I'll bet two to one you're engaged to her, aren't you?"

"More or less."

"More or less what? Either you are engaged or you aren't." Anne arose from the bed, picked up the letter, which was in its envelope but had not been sealed. "I'll bet you've been going with her for ten years. C'n I read it?"

"No!"

Anne began to slip the letter from its envelope, but Leonard grabbed for it. Giggling, Anne swung her back toward him, doubled herself over the letter. Leonard threw his arms around her and clutched her wrists, but with his attempt to reach farther for the letter Anne freed herself, turned to face him. She was laughing silently.

"C'mon!" she pleaded. "Why can't I read it?"

"Didn't know you could read," Leonard grunted. He suddenly snatched for the letter. It fell on the floor. Anne pounced on it. Leonard followed her to the floor, but Anne had the letter and threw it under the bed.

The rug nap was bristly on her cheek, and Anne raised her head on her arm. Leonard pulled her body a few inches toward him and kissed her. They traded kisses of increasing pressure and duration, then Anne dragged his hair down over his forehead and abruptly got to her feet.

"That was fun," she said, "but I didn't want to read your old letter." She twisted her pajamas straight, noticed Leonard looking at her. "Don't you approve of me?"

"Huh—oh, absolutely."

Anne seemed inspired. "Did you know I got a figure just like Loma Belle Cummings', except my waist is a little smaller and I'm bigger-busted?" She dropped her house coat for his inspection. She further accentuated her curves by taking a deep breath and pulling in her stomach and placed her hands on her waist so that the loose folds of her pajamas were drawn close. "Well, what do you think of it?"

Leonard made a comical face, whistled softly.

"Why don't you say something?" Anne urged. "Or maybe my figure isn't as good as I think it is."

"It'll pass."

She again put on her house coat. "Anyhow," she said, "it's all mine. Half the girls I know wear girdles. Some even wear brassières with pads in 'em." She rested languidly on her elbow. "Does Marjorie wear a girdle?"

"No."

"How do you know she don't?"

Continued on Page 127

WHY TAKE A POKE AT MY HOUSEKEEPING-JUST BECAUSE I'VE GOT A GORGEOUS NEW SINK?
YOU BET IT'S GORGEOUS! BUT I STILL SAY THERE'LL BE SEWER GERMS* IN YOUR DRAIN, JUST 2 INCHES FROM WHERE YOU WASH FOOD-IF YOU AREN'T CAREFUL!
(*SURVEY MOLNAR LABORATORIES)
PHOOEY! I ALWAYS KEEP MY SINK SCRUBBED SPOTLESS SCRUBBING WON'T DRIVE OFF THOSE FILTHY GERMS — IT TAKES Drāno!
HERE! I'LL GIVE YOU SOME I JUST BOUGHT! Drāno BOILS OUT SEWER GERMS-FAST! MAKES YOUR SINK SANITARY, SAFE!

AND Drāno OPENS CLOGGED DRAINS, TOO!

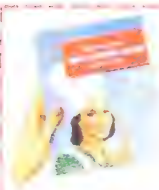
Never over 25¢ at grocery, drug, and hardware stores.

Drāno

T.M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. by The Drackett Co.

Drāno MAKES SEPTIC TANKS WORK BETTER —CUTS DOWN ODORS

This big Youngstown Kitchenaider two-bowl cabinet sink with its contrasting porcelain-enameled top is practically a kitchen in itself . . . crammed with hungry drawers and storage space. If you wish, get a Kitchen-aider fitted and sold for beautiful matching wall and base cabinets. Low Mullins terms cost about $4.45 a month!



IT'S SO EASY to plan. Send coupon with 25c (sorry, no stamps) for an exciting 20-page booklet. You'll get 51 dramatic cut-outs of Youngstown kitchens to pre-test your layout.

Youngstown Kitchens
Mullins Manufacturing Corp.
Dept. L-347, Warren, Ohio

Send me your book on Youngstown Kitchens and the 51 cut-outs. I enclose 25c in cash.

I plan to remodel ☐ I plan to build ☐

NAME (PLEASE PRINT)

ADDRESS

CITY ZONE

STATE

Beauty, beauty everywhere and not a wasted step! Look, how those big Youngstown cabinets flank the handsome Kitchenaider sink. On the floor. On the walls. A place for every cup and kettle, with half as much of work surfaces too. Seem out of this world? Not when it comes to price! This gleaming combination, complete and installed, costs surprisingly little on most budget plans after minimum down payment. Others shown, in proportion. And every unit is white-enameled steel!

Dream kitchens...for a song

OH what dazzlers—right out of your dreams!

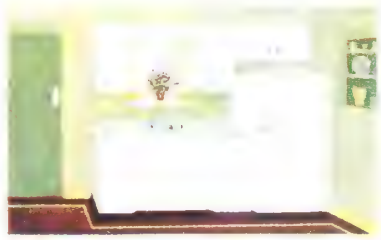
A whole line of the smartest cabinets and cabinet sinks that ever graced a kitchen, priced at a song!

They're Youngstown Kitchens and these sketches show only a hint of the arrangements possible with these gorgeous white-enameled steel units. Your Youngstown dealer can show you dozens more pla . . . your own dream kitchen included! So put on th new spring bonnet, hustle down and see him tod

MULLINS MANUFACTURING CORPORATIC
WARREN, OHIO

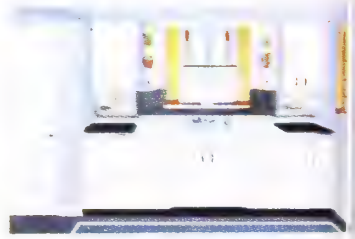
Porcelain Enameled Products, Large Pressed Metal Parts, Design Engineering Service

Youngstown Kitchens
BY MULLINS



No drudgery in a Youngstown Kitchen! Trim units hug walls and corners . . . give you right of way . . . with roomy shelves, spacious work surfaces and big porcelain-enamel sink top right at hand every step.

Pick your plan, select your units, presto . . . you're practically owner of a thrilling kitchen then and there. For almost any Youngstown Kitchen can be quickly installed without fuss in new house or old.



Whatever bugaboos your kitchen p sents, there's a handsome Youngstown rangement to lick them. Units go beau fully with any range and refrigerator. S your Youngstown Kitchens Dealer n

(Continued from Page 125)

Will you shut up about Marjorie!"
nne giggled. "And you two've been going ther ten years."
Nobody said anything about ten years!"
nne did not seem to hear. "I'll bet she has l doped out how she's going to hook you have a little home and kids and measles mumps and dogs and cats. I'll bet she's so ed somebody else'll hook you that she es you stay cooped up in this old room ou never get out to dances or nothin'. I you don't even know how to dance."
eonard laughed. "Oh, yes, I do."
What are you laughing at?"
Nothing."
I suppose meaning me. How old are you,
now?"
Twenty-six. How old are you?"
I'm seventeen—won't be eighteen until ber. How much money you making n at that ice-cream company?"
Why do you want to know?"
Guys always tell me how much they're ing without my asking. But of course all lie about it. Come on, tell me!"
Why?"
I'm just curious."
eonard was not ashamed of his salary.
undred and sixty-five dollars a month," aid.
And living in a dump like this! If I made much, I wouldn't hang around here."
I'm saving my ey."
I bet Purdy gave that idea. What
't ten years of hangaround a girl do to erfectly good guy!
went with a fellow en years, I'd shrivel nd kick off. The
I ever went with a
w was ten months,
then he knocked girl friend of mine
had to marry her.
to think of the
I loved that guy!
, I—you know,
's the reason I school today."
You mean," said
ard, "your girl
d and boy friend
le-crossed you?"
That's exactly it, and I just found out
y." Anne had been longing for the right on to whom she could tell her story. She unted it briefly to Leonard.
e began speaking, but so gently Anne
d distinguish only a few words.
What did you say?"
was just wondering. I think you're ing a mistake. I know the way you feel, quitting school isn't such a smart trick.
r on I think you'll regret it."
am not going back, and that's that!"
What are you going to do?"
Oh, I dunno." Anne was momentarily us. But it did not worry her for long.
glanced quickly at Leonard. "If you n't heard that trumpet player of Skeets oway's, you've never really lived. I love ance. Do you?"
usually enjoy myself. But this school ness is a serious ——"
Can't you take a hint?"
Did you want to go to the dance?"
think it might be arranged." Then e giggled. "You knew I was crazy to go.
't you?" Anne was on her feet, heading he door. She stopped abruptly. "I al-forgot. My mother don't want me to ut any more. But you stay in your room.
I'll come up when we can give her the G'night!" She disappeared.

seven-thirty the following morning
Karlan entered Anne's room, as usual.
t up!" she growled. "You're not going queeze out of going to school this morn-nne stretched lazily. "I can't go to ol," she yawned. "I went to my closet night, and whaddayaknow, every stitch had been stolen!"

Mrs. Karlan left the room with a snort and returned presently with a cheap cotton print that Anne hated and a pair of anklets and low-heeled shoes. "Wear these!"

"Those!" Anne was ready to say something much worse, but she held her temper.

At eight-forty-five Anne left the house in the direction of Emerson High School. But, instead, Anne headed for the business district. In her purse were three small gold footballs, a school pin and two rings boys had given her. She planned to visit Federstein's Loan Office. But first she went to Tronheim's department store.

ABOUT five-thirty Anne returned home. She was wearing a fine light blue jersey dress, an imaginative hat, silk hose and a pair of neat high-heeled slippers. Anne had left her low-heeled shoes in the wastebasket of Tronheim's ladies' rest room. With the ready cash she had obtained from the sale of the jewelry, she had attended two movies and purchased a package of cigarettes and a sack of chocolate-covered peanuts. She was feeling serene and, once home, she lay down on the living-room rug with the evening Record, while her parents spoke to each other heatedly. There was a suggestion of tears in Mrs. Karlan's voice, and Mr. Karlan spoke with more certainty than usual.

"Why didn't you tell me you hid her clothes?" he asked his wife. "I can't say I blame her for charging something."

When Anne went to her room after dinner, she saw her shoes, dresses, suits in a pile in the middle of her bed.

Mrs. Karlan repeatedly beat Anne to the telephone and scotched prospective dates with a few words. Had she stopped to think about it, she might have realized that her victories were too easily gained. Leonard came in and went to his room, and a few minutes later Anne quietly slipped upstairs and opened his door. He was in his shorts.

"Hi!" Anne whispered. "You be ready and I'll come back when the road's clear."

When she left, Leonard reflected that it probably would have been the same had he been stripped. He glanced at the door uneasily as he dressed. In twenty minutes he was ready. And then he waited. He began to wonder if she would come at all. She was probably one of the least dependable, least principled persons on earth. But at eight-thirty his door opened.

"Come on," said Anne quietly. They slipped through the outside door, apparently unobserved.

At Shadowland Ballroom Jane Whipple noticed the entrance of Anne and Leonard. She watched the couple as they selected a table next to the wall.

"Kid," asked Dolores Tyler, "who's Anne with?"

"I dunno," Jane admitted.

"She sure is acting high-hat," Dolores observed. Dolores was a childish-appearing girl, big-eyed, pretty. She and Jane were sitting at a long table with an assortment of boys and girls of high-school age.

"I'm gonna bust in on 'em," Jane announced. Jane was not a particularly bold person, but she did cherish her reputation of knowing everything about everybody. She reached Anne's table. "Kid!" she gasped. "Why don't you two come and sit with us?"

Anne drooped her eyelids. "Perhaps we'll come over and say hello," she said lazily. "Later."

Anne noticed Jane taking an inventory of Leonard. She introduced the two.

"He's one of the heads of the Logan Ice Cream Company," said Anne. Leonard opened his mouth, as though to protest, and Anne kicked him under the table.

FIRST WOMAN TENNIS PLAYER

Nowadays names like Alice Marble, Helen Wills Moody and Pauline Betz are newsreel bywords. But few, if any, have ever heard about Mary Ewing Outerbridge, who was not only the first woman to play tennis in America, but is generally credited with starting Americans at the game. After she first saw tennis played at the British garrison in Bermuda in 1874, she proceeded to import paraphernalia and instructions to the U.S., set up a court at the Staten Island Cricket and Baseball Club and teach her friends the game. Among her disciples must have been the first U.S. male player.

—JUDITH CHASE CHURCHILL

with

LESS CARE!

No Wonder Millions of Housewives are Switching to Self-Polishing Simoniz

Do your floors justify the care you give them? They will . . . with Self-Polishing SIMONIZ to keep them beautiful and care-free! A damp cloth wipes up dust, dirt, soiled spots and spilled things. And still floors sparkle . . . because only Self-Polishing SIMONIZ gives them the same longer lasting beauty that makes SIMONIZ so famous for cars. Spread it with cloth or mop applicator . . . no rubbing or buffing . . . it shines as it dries crystal-clear on floors . . . revealing full natural linoleum beauty and finish richness. Switch to Self-Polishing SIMONIZ . . . today!

Sold by grocery, hardware, variety, drug, paint, 5 cents to $1, auto accessory and department stores—and by linoleum dealers everywhere.
THE SIMONIZ CO., CHICAGO 16, ILL.

Self-Polishing SIMONIZ FOR FLOORS

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

"SIMONIZ" TRADE MARK REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. & FOREIGN COUNTRIES

TRADITIONALLY AMERICAN

WILLETT Golden Beryl MAPLE

Solid hard sugar-tree maple as used in the new Willett pieces for the dining room combines distinction and charm in the finest American tradition. Consider H. Willett, Inc., Louisville, Ky.

ALSO MAKERS OF REPRODUCTIONS IN WILDWOOD CHERRY — ARISTOCRAT OF AMERICAN CABINET WOODS

Dress up your Boudoir too!

WITH KAYE WALT SCARF SETS

PERSONAL beauty is important yes. But what's more personal than your boudoir? Add warmth and charm to it with the delicate, softening accents of a Kaye Walt Embroidered Scarf Set. Kaye Walt Scarfs provide the perfect decorator touch to dresser, vanity, bureau and night table. An ideal bridal or hostess gift. At all fine stores.

W. F. BREUSS

WEST NEW YORK, NEW JERSEY

Jane returned to Dolores and Beverly. "His name's Leonard Mason," she told them. "He's head of the Logan Ice Cream Company."

"Who did you say he was?" asked Millie, who had just returned to the table.

"Leonard Mason," said Jane. "President of the Logan Ice Cream Company."

The next day was Saturday. Anne slept until noon, was not fully dressed until her father and sister had returned home. The family ate dinner about one o'clock. Anne gulped her food, then immediately stepped out on the porch. The air was warm, the sky blue. Two days before, Anne was not sure whether she cared to go on living. Now all that was changed. Every few moments she glanced at the corner of Sixth and Adams. The probability was that Leonard Mason would make his appearance at this point within a few minutes, and Anne longed to see him.

But Anne grew restless waiting. She set off in the direction of the Adams Pharmacy.

She remained at the pharmacy for the better part of an hour. The soda clerk, a boy Anne's age, had a great many slugs that would operate the record-playing machine, and the proprietor of the store was out. When Anne arrived home she headed directly up the stairs. Leonard's door was closed. She walked in without knocking.

Leonard was not in his room. Anne was about to leave, but something about the roommade her hesitate. It looked different. Anne walked to the table, pulled open the drawer. It was empty. She opened the drawers of the dresser. They, too, were empty, as was the closet. Leonard and everything that belonged to Leonard had vanished.

Mary Karlan was coming up the stairs and Anne, on her way down, nearly collided with her.

"Say, what do you know about this? Where's Leonard?"

"How should I know? Mother kicked him out of the house."

"So that's it! What's her big idea, anyway?"

"You asking me? Maybe she thought you'd accidentally on purpose wander into his room by mistake. Silly idea, wasn't it?"

Anne snorted, continued her headlong flight in search of her mother. But Mrs. Karlan was visiting her neighbor, Mrs. Bezdek.

When Mrs. Karlan returned, Anne pounced on her and a fight began that caused Mrs. Bezdek, two houses removed, to shake her head in dismay. But after the fight was over, Anne realized that it had done no good, that Leonard was gone and that for all she knew he would never even call her for a date. She settled into a mood of sullen resentment.

FROM the time Anne had fled the high school to the time of Leonard's disappearance, Anne had been following a plan. She was trying to impress on the high school that she was an independent young woman, that she neither cared for nor needed the school. Now she did not return to school, but she did resume dating high-school students. She danced, screamed, necked, joked with them, but something was missing. The school year was ending, many in her crowd were graduating; some were planning on going to college, some on going to work, others planned to marry. They moved in directions away from Anne.

If she experienced little satisfaction in going with them, she experienced less in dating the older fellows—a nondescript lot that hung around the bar at Shadowland.

One day, after an aimless afternoon spent wandering around town with Jane Whipple,

In the old days, when Greece was made up of many little states, the King of Sparta was visited by an ambassador from another part of Greece. The King showed him the city of which he was proud.

"I am surprised," said the visitor, "to see that Sparta has no walls."

The King replied, "Tomorrow I will show you the walls of Sparta."

Next day he showed him ten thousand men on the plain below the palace.

"There," said the King, "are the walls of Sparta. Ten thousand men and every one a brick."

And that is where we get the saying, "You are a brick."

—JOSEPH FORT NEWTON: Living Every Day. (Harper & Brothers)

Anne came home to find in the mailbox a l ter addressed to Leonard. Her mother gone, and Anne went to her room to exam the letter. It was square and blue, dressed in a neat, small hand. On the b was the return address—the house and str numbers and the name of the town of W field. There was no doubt in Anne's mind that it was from Marjorie Purdy. She perimentally stuck her fingernail under flap, but it was glued tight. Then she ar and went to the telephone.

ANNE leafed rapidly through the teleph directory until she found the number of Logan Ice Cream Company. She dial waited for some moments, but it was f thirty and she received no answer.

Anne was bursting with the desire to t to Leonard, but was forced to resort to next best thing. On a sheet of her moth stationery she wrote:

Hi darling!

I couldn't find a way to pry open this le from Marjorie Purdy and put it back toge again so you wouldn't know I had been in it I still don't know the kind of letters your M jorie Purdy writes you. I suppose it's from y Marjorie unless you have a lot more girl frie than I think you have, in Wildfield I mean.

Anyhow, I have something I want to tell y That is that I am awfully sorry about w happened and that I think it terrible the mother kicked you ou the house. Please for me and don't think too awful because ma I'm a better girl t you think.

Why don't you let me see you any m darling? I've been g out with all sorts bums which just ma me want to see you the more.

Yours truly, ANNE KARLA

Anne did not bo to reread her let but folded it, slippe into an envelope, addressed the en lope to Leonard at Logan Ice Cream C pany. Then she tempted to insert M jorie's letter, but was too large, so she folded it in the mid The final result was bulging and messy, Anne did not mind. She found one of mother's stamps and headed for the mail

The letter had no sooner dropped into mailbox than Anne became impatient Leonard to call. She had to remind her that Leonard would probably not receiv until the next day. Surely he would call as soon as it was delivered. With this thou in mind, Anne, the day following her mai of the letter, did not go far from the h until her date arrived. Leonard did not Anne was indignant. It was some days fore Anne's wounded pride healed s ciently for her to concede that perhaps L ard simply wanted nothing to do with he

She attempted to charge a pair of hos Tronheim's, but she was told they could tend her no more credit. The fruit jar in Karlan spice cupboard was now almost ways empty. Her father grimaced when she asked him for handouts, and g her less.

Her hose, dotted with nail polish to runners, were now beyond repair, so she barelegged. Her slips were frayed, the st broken and knotted, and her panties tor the elastic. But that was not the wor those things didn't show. At their best dresses and slacks were not very goo cheap things purchased at small bar dress shops. Now even they were sadl need of repair and dry cleaning. Anne wa most tearful. She asked her sister for mo

"Why should I give you any?" as Mary. "Why don't you get out and ea little for yourself?"

Anne knew that the only sensible thin her to do was to follow Mary's advice,

(Continued on Page 130)

BETTER SLEEP MAKES BETTER HUSBANDS

Most rewarding buy you can make...a luxurious Englander Mattress!

much depends on your mattress! ors say the kind of rest you get s your vitality—your looks—your personality, glum or gay. (Isn't 1/3 your life?)

NO MATTRESS LIKE ENGLANDER

will use and bless your Englander ress thru many wonderful years. Englander's special construction you not only blissful comfort . . . ven more important, body balance you sleep. Exclusive features at sag, bulges, the [illegible] "give" h creates muscle tension and pre- s relaxation . . . which robs you of the magic renewal that deep, restful sleep provides. Actually, fewer hours on an Englander can mean far better rest than more hours on a faulty mattress!

Englander Mattress and Matching Box Spring

ENGLANDER EQUALIZER. Built into every Englander is Englander's exclusive Equalizer of body weight to correct pressure points. Keeps spine level as doctors urge . . . prevents backache, chronic fatigue. Promotes utmost relaxation, gloriously refreshing sleep.

Ask to see mattresses by Englander . . . makers of quality bedding since 1895. Get Englander's "floating comfort", buoyantly resilient springs, superb fabrics and hand craftsmanship . . . sleep luxury unsurpassed by any other mattress in the world.

Englander
AMERICA'S MOST LUXURIOUS
mattress

© 1947 THE ENGLANDER CO., INC., CHICAGO, ILL.

blossom-fresh

as spring-garden lilacs

Wrisley lilac-fragrance

Bath Superbe Soap

Heavenly, flower-fresh Lilac fragrance skillfully blended into a luxurious, creamy-lathering, rich base. If you've never used Bath Superbe Soap, you don't know how wonderful soap can be! Smooth-textured—gentle and lotion-mild.

(Continued from Page 128)

she waited two days before calling at the Westrom Employment Agency.

Anne got a job at the Westrom Memorial Cemetery Association at eight dollars a week. But other than salary, her job had its compensations. She had only to receive an occasional caller, answer an occasional telephone call. Her boss spent most of his time trying to interest businessmen in a proposed community mausoleum, so Anne was left alone most of the day.

From her salary she must deduct eighty cents' commission for the employment agency, one dollar for registration at the agency, and twenty cents a day for bus fare.

Mr. Karlan was proud of his younger daughter, and did not hesitate to brag about Ann to his wife. Instead of spiking his guns, Mrs. Karlan took advantage of his good humor and informed him that she had written to her sister, Erma, and that Erma and her daughters, Maymie and Claribel, were coming to live with them. Mr. Karlan was in despair, but not surprised.

"How do you expect to feed them? What do you think I am, anyhow—made of money?"

"Now that Anne's working ——"

"What!" yelled Anne. "You're not getting your hooks on my money. I'm not working to support your sister and Maaaaaymie and darling little Claribel."

"That's a fine attitude!" declared Mrs. Karlan. "We've supported you for seventeen years, and now you should be willing to do a little to help support us. Why, Mary ——"

"Mary gets twenty bucks a week."

Nor did it improve Anne's humor to discover that she must give up her room, move in with Mary to accommodate Erma Hawk and her daughters.

The Hawks arrived. Maymie, though only thirteen, was about Anne's size. Maymie's nose was flat on the end, her hair straight, of indeterminate shade, and graced only by a hair ribbon the width of a shoelace. Anne's other cousin, Claribel, was only eight. She was more decorative, having corkscrew curls and dark eyes, and she poutingly guarded a comic-strip magazine.

Mrs. Karlan welcomed them to the house vociferously, and Mr. Karlan started to make polite conversation with Erma. Anne said not a word; she saw no need to make her relatives feel more at home. The first thing Maymie did upon entering the house was switch on the radio, loud. She appeared devoted to hillbilly music, which Anne detested. The evening Record came, and Maymie pounced on it. She held the section Anne wanted fast to the rug with her knees, seemed to be memorizing Leta Parrot's column, Along Hollywood Boulevard. Anne swore and went to her and Mary's room.

SUMMER was but a few days off, and Anne found herself weighted with an unaccountable depression. This Sunday was like many others. First, about six o'clock, Mrs. Karlan arose, tidied the house a bit and then went out to the garden. About six-thirty, Mr. Karlan yawned, realized it was Sunday, and went to sleep again for another half hour. The Hawk family were up and dressed by eight. Mary arose between nine and ten, and Mrs. Karlan put the roast in the oven about the time Erma and Maymie and Claribel trooped off to Sunday school and church. About two hours later Anne began to stir in bed.

The first person she saw this Sunday was Claribel. Anne resented this intrusion.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The House Undivided

By Georgie Starbuck Galbraith

When you, my lordly love, hold forth
On subjects ranged from south to north,
From up to down and east to west,
You'll note how rarely I protest
Your dictums. Sometimes this is due
The fact that I agree with you.
At other times, with guile concealed
I deem it strategy to yield
On minor issues, so I may Gain vantage for a larger fray.
But now and then I just prefer
The peace that rules if I concur.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

"G'way," she murmured. But Claribel c tinued to swing, her feet braced against bottom of the door. She muttered a sounds. All Anne could translate was "So thing for you."

"Well, for gosh sakes, what is it? Cat your tongue?"

Claribel shook her head violently.

"Come on, honey, tell me what you g

"Nuthin'," said Claribel. "I talked t man on the phone."

"Who did you talk to?" Anne could that Claribel was being purposefully m terious.

"He wanted to talk to you."

"You didn't hang up, did you?"

"Unh-uh."

ANNE got out of bed. Claribel imm ately fled. Anne fished around in the cl for her house coat. She hurried to the ph "Hello," she said, a little doubtful whet anyone was still on the line.

"Is this Anne?" The voice was not q familiar.

"Yes."

"This is Leonard."

"Where on earth have you been?"

"Anne, can you go to a show tonigh

"Oh, darling, I have a date! And one tomorrow and the night after—but I break the one for morrow. What are doing tomorrow?

"Nothing. Ca call at seven-thirt

Anne was buoy as she walked bac her room. She sni the roast, and aroma took its p in a delicious conception of world. Life was g She was half dre before she rem bered that she vowed never to s to Leonard again that was now a ter of small im tance.

After the sh Anne and Leo went riding in a Leonard had rowed from his fr Bill Denny. Aft while Leonard tu off onto a graveled road and parked or of a hillock. Anne turned on the car to an orchestra playing from a Chicago club.

"I love that music," she sighed. couldn't live without music, same couldn't live without eating."

"Did you go back to school?"

"No. I'm working."

Leonard had Anne tell him about her

"It's just a phooey little job," she cluded.

"It's all right."

Anne flopped on and against and ar Leonard with abandon. She lay down i lap, removed a mechanical pencil fron pocket, unscrewed the cap, and dumpe leads on her stomach. She fished ir pocket for cigarettes.

"Do you understand me?" she aske

Leonard kissed her. Her skirt was a her knees, and he pulled it higher.

"You don't have to pull up my dre order to understand me," said Anne, pu down the hem of her skirt.

Anne poked her fingers into Leon stomach. He collapsed, then retali Anne doubled her legs, giggled, made shrieking noises. Both feinted and p with their fingers. Finally Anne indi that she wanted to call off the tickling m It was a ruse. Suddenly she dug into ard's middle with her fingers. But Le was prepared. He did not even smile. darn you!" Anne exclaimed. "You ticklish." She tried again, but he di smile.

(Continued on Page 132)

Beautiful Edith Kingdon Gould

Gifted harpist and accomplished linguist . . . former lieutenant in the WAVES . . . daughter of one of our greatest families

Dramatic

Edith Gould accents the dramatic beauty of her strawberry-gold and smoky blue eyes with stunning new Pond's make-up colors—

POND'S MAKE-UP PAT AND DREAMFLOWER POWDER in new delicate "Peach" . . . radiant, soft-glowing.

POND'S "LIPS" in luscious new Mauvetinged "Heart Throb."

There's a dramatic Pond's color ensemble for you, too. All of Pond's new complexion and lips shades are eye-stopping and lovely! "And a Pond's make-up has the most lovable way of [illegible]," says Edith Gould.

All lovely—Pond's cake make-up . . . powder . . . lipstick

a Pond's make-up stays on . . . and on . . . and on!

that Always-Fresh look

"Beautify skin as you cleanse . . .
with Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream"

Teresa Wright

one of the stars in Samuel Goldwyn's "The Best Years of Our Lives"

this Woodbury-Wonderful Way!

8 A.M. Smiling very pretty, Teresa sits for hairdresser. Note—Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream on hands. "Between movie 'takes', I beauty-cleanse the Woodbury-Wonderful Way," confides Teresa. "So easy, skin glows with that 'Always-Fresh Look'!"

The Woodbury-Wonderful Way. ONE: Cleanse with Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream. Tissue off. TWO: Repeat for plus-softening. THREE: A brisk cold-water spanking! See how Woodbury's four rich oils soften, smooth, beautify—skin glows with Woodbury "Always-Fresh Look"!

9 P.M. Should be television . . . to "send" that dewy look! Teresa also gives beauty tip: "A Woodbury 'cream-bath' . . . a second film for my powder base . . . that's my skin-beautifier!" Results—simply captivating! Try Woodbury, girls, for your date-glamour!

11 P.M. Sleepy-time special . . . Teresa's Beauty Nightcap. "First, whisk off make-up with Woodbury—so clean-cleansing! Add a film to soften overnight." For Teresa . . . for you, Woodbury 'round the clock care for that "Always-Fresh Look"!

(Continued from Page 130)

"I've got will power," said Leonard. "All sorts of it."

"I spose it's something you got from Purdy." Anne added scornfully, "Purdy! I wish she'd croak."

"Now, was that a nice thing to say?"

"Tell me, honey," said Anne, ignoring the reprimand, "how come you were born in a hick town like Wildfield?"

Leonard told her about himself. His mother was dead, and his father had operated a grocery store in Wildfield, a town of fewer than one thousand population, until a chain store had forced him to close.

Anne was lying in his lap. She raised her arm above her head, struck Leonard's keys on the steering post. She had him hand her his key case, then she asked him about each key.

Leonard looked down at Anne. There should be something wrong with her: her ankles should be thick, or her nose snub, or her eyes too far apart, or her chest flat. Not, of course, that he wished her to have these defects; it just seemed contrary to natural law that she should be so well made. For several moments it seemed unreal to Leonard that Anne should be resting in his lap. Then he wondered whether he had made a mistake in taking her out, whether he was starting something that might develop into some kind of disaster for one or both of them. Then Leonard sharply warned himself that he was thinking of Anne in altogether too serious a vein. They were just out for a good time, weren't they?

"What a gob of keys," Anne commented, jingling the keys. "You must feel like a big shot." Whereupon she tossed the keys over her head, out the window into the darkness.

"Why, you ——" Leonard exclaimed. "Didn't you know the car key was there?"

"Sure I knew. But you got all sorts of will power. You can put up with me for the night."

"You little idiot!" Leonard climbed out of the car.

"Don't call me an idiot!" Anne exclaimed, kicking his buttocks with the toe of her slipper.

He grabbed her arms and tugged. "You come out here and help look."

"I won't! I wanna listen to the radio."

But he managed to pull her out of the car.

"Oh, it's sand!" Anne exclaimed gleefully. She slipped off her pumps and tossed them in the car. "It's sort of wet, but it feels nice."

Leonard was walking along the edge of the road, parting the wet grass with his foot. He glanced up at Anne, annoyed at her playful manner of wallowing her bare feet in the sand. "Hey, you get busy," he ordered.

When he glanced up again he did not at once see her, for she had walked some hundred feet down the road. The headlights were on her. "Hey darling, look!" she called, jingling something at arm's length.

"Bring 'em here!"

"Come and get 'em!" Anne began to move away. Leonard suddenly broke into a run, and she ran too. For a few moments she kept her lead, but then began to hop on one foot, stopped. "Owoo! I stepped on a rock."

"Serves you right," said Leonard, coming up to her.

But he had to carry her back. Hoisted in his arms, she reached her hand inside his coat, removed a cigarette from his shirt pocket, singed his eyebrows in lighting it, and blew smoke in his face.

"Am I different?" she asked.

"Different from what?"

"Different from Purdy?"

"Oh," Leonard exclaimed, tossing her roughly on the car seat, "yes!"

By all rules of common sense, he should be angry with her. He tried punishing her by paddling, poking and choking. Finally they rested.

"You're awful sweet," said Anne.

Ahead, the red lights of the radio towers of the Record station winked methodically. Far away, crawling beads of light indicated the highway. A baritone crooned Always, and Anne closed her eyes and hummed.

"Who's your favorite singer?" she asked.

Leonard thought. He had not given this problem a great deal of consideration. Then he said, "Vincent Lucas."

Anne became electrified. "Oh!" she shrieked, whirling around in Leonard's arms to face him. "Vincent Lucas! Why, he's my favorite too."

Leonard noticed that the light had grown dim. The car battery was dying. He switched off the radio. Fortunately, he was able to get the car started down the grade. He pushed, and prayed that Anne, at the wheel, would not take a whimsical notion of driving the car into the ditch. All went well, however. The motor purred reassuringly and lifted high the spirits of the two. Leonard opened the cowl ventilator and windshield, and cool washed air whipped their clothing.

Anne moved close to Leonard. "Just think, darling," she marveled, "Vincent Lucas was your favorite all the time, and I didn't have the faintest!" She hugged his arm. "Oh, but "Have you something that will suggest a white cottage, a cheery greeting at the end of the day, and a nice home-cooked meal?"

"Warm weather relief for COLD WEATHER JOINTS!

Help increase the flow of nature's own lubricating fluids

When icy blasts seem to cut through you like a knife and your joints seem to creak with every movement—there's a reason! Cold weather actually constricts tiny blood vessels, cutting down the supply of nature's own lubricating fluids to your joints—that's why they creak, and feel stiff. Rub those aching joints with Absorbine Jr. and your local circulation speeds up. That wonderful "warmth" helps those tiny blood vessels feed your joints with more lubricating fluids—and you feel like shouting for joy! Always keep Absorbine Jr. on hand. $1.25 a bottle at your drugstore.

W. F. Young, Inc.
Springfield, Mass.

Absorbine Jr.

I wish you were still staying with us so I could see you more. Soon as I get a better job I'm going to take a room where you're staying. But anyhow, darling, isn't everything wonderful!"

Although Anne had successfully defended her salary against her mother, she found it far from adequate to complete payment on a number of hats, dresses and shoes that she had optimistically laid away in various shops, placing fifty cents or a dollar on each to have them held for her. She was also bored at her job. Alone most of the time, she gave in to her penchant for kicking off her shoes, the carpet having a nice feel to her bare feet. She found a snappy magazine in the shop, and with a cigarette dangling from her lips, propped up her legs on her desk and read. She was surprised thus by her boss, accompanied by an old couple, prospective grave buyers. Her boss was a tolerant man and perhaps would not have fired her. She, however, forestalled the possibility by quitting.

She had no difficulty in getting another job. The employment agency sent her to interview Mr. Perry, of the Follies Dress Shop, and Anne went to work selling dresses the following Monday. Thirty cents an hour had been mentioned as her pay, and although this was far more than she had been getting, she soon wished she were back at her old job. She found it distasteful to be solicitous, did not call every female who carried a purse "darling," as did the other clerks, and on one occasion when asked for her candid opinion on a $10.95 dress by a woman on the verge of buying, she said the dress "stunk."

Anne worked for a week, decided to quit and get another job. Among other things she didn't like was the manager, Mr. Perry. There was a great deal of gossip about the extramarital affairs of Mr. Perry. Anne revolted at his smell, at his loose-wristed manner, the way he flexed his little finger.

She stopped for her week's pay on Monday and informed Mr. Perry that she was quitting. He protested that she hadn't permitted him to instruct her in the finer points of selling (the instruction, he had intimated, was to take place after the closing hour). But Anne was not interested in her career as a salesgirl, and Mr. Perry handed her a check in a sealed envelope. Anne dropped it into her purse and crossed the street to Applegren's Drugstore.

Sitting in a booth, smoking a cigarette and sipping a malted milk, she thought of Marlene Dietrich and let her eyelids droop.

As Anne was paying the cashier, she thought of her check. She ripped open the envelope, looked at the amount. The check was for $6.75. Anne had been expecting just twice that amount, $13.50—45 hours at thirty cents an hour.

Without hesitation, Anne marched across the street to the Follies Dress Shop. Al, the assistant manager, whom Anne detested almost as much as Mr. Perry, was in the front of the store. "I want to see Mr. Perry!" Anne demanded.

"He's out."

"Then you fix this up for me. He said he would pay me thirty cents an hour. Make me out a check for thirteen-fifty!"

"I don't know anything about the arrangement you had with Mr. Perry. And I couldn't make out a check even if I wanted to. Mr. Perry won't be back until Wednesday."

"Wednesday? I bet I'm one girl he'll never forget!"

Anne cussed as she left the store. When she cooled off, she reflected that life was very complicated.

William Denny, of Denny and Denny, Attorneys-at-Law, was Leonard's closest friend in Westrom. He was twenty-eight and, like Leonard, originally from Wildfield. He owned the car Leonard had been borrowing.

The matter of borrowing Bill's car had begun to bother Leonard. He was sensitive about imposing on his friend. In Leonard's effort to find some way to compensate Bill

(Continued on Page 135)

When your INDIAN overeats..

PALEFACE needs pink medicine

For young and old, the price of too much of a good thing is misery—a sour, sickish, upset stomach. Be gentle with such upsets take soothing PEPTO-BISMOL.

NEVER UPSET AN UPSET STOMACH

Don't add to the upset of an upset stomach with overdoses of antacids or harsh physics. Take soothing PEPTO-BISMOL.

This pleasant-tasting preparation is non-alkaline, non-laxative, non-constipating. Its action is different. It spreads a soothing, protective coating on irritated stomach and intestinal walls . . . thus helping to calm and quiet common digestive upsets.

To relieve distress after over-indulgence; nervous indigestion; heartburn . . . and to retard intestinal fermentation; gas formation; simple diarrhea.

Norwich

A Norwich Product

Pepto-Bismol*

for UPSET Stomach

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

The Farmer's Daughter

LITTLE DID LOVELY KATRIN HOLSTROM GUESS WHEN LEAVING HER FATHER'S FARM . THAT SHE WOULD BECOME FAMOUS OVER NIGHT . . AND REALIZE HER WILDEST ROMANTIC DREAMS !

WHILE ON HER WAY TO CAPITOL CITY, WITH A PAINTER NAMED ADOLPH, HER SAVINGS WERE SPENT ON DAMAGES WHEN ADOLPH TURNED "WOLF" AND HIS JEEP TURNED TURTLE !

UNDAUNTED, KATIE (LORETTA YOUNG) TAKES A TEMPORARY JOB IN THE MORLEY HOUSEHOLD . AND YOUNG CONGRESSMAN GLENN MORLEY (JOSEPH COTTEN) TAKES A PERMANENT HOLD ON HER HEART. GLENN'S MOTHER (ETHEL BARRYMORE), SLYLY LOOKS ON.

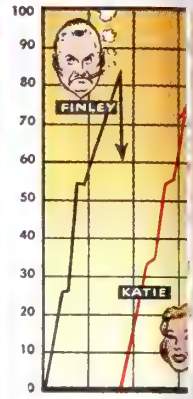
SOON AFTER, KATIE FISHES GLENN OUT OF THE RIVER AND GIVES HIM A MASSAGE THAT HAS CLANCY (CHAS. BICKFORD) POP-EYED AND GLENN'S GIRL FRIEND GREEN-EYED!

JUST WHEN LOVE SEEMS ABOUT TO BLOOM KATIE AND GLENN QUARREL OVER THE PARTY'S CHOICE OF FINLEY, A WARD-HEELER AS GLENN'S RUNNING MATE. POLITICALLY, KATIE'S OUT OF THIS WORLD. ROMANTICALLY, SHE'S OUT ON A LIMB !

AND WHEN KATIE, "THE FARMER'S DAUGHTER" SAYS HER PIECE, GLENN AND MA MORLEY ARE VERY RED-FACED

KATIE FOR CONGRESS

ACCLAIMED BY PUBLIC, PRESS AND RADIO--- AN OVERNIGHT POLITICAL SENSATION--- KATIE IS DRAFTED BY THE OPPOSITION TO RUN AGAINST FINLEY FOR CONGRESS !



KATIE'S CHANCES ZOO WHILE GLENN AND TH PARTY GLOOM

SUDDENLY, ADOLPH THE PAINTER POPS UP WITH A DISTORTED STORY ABOUT KATIE'S OVERNIGHT STAY WITH HIM AT A TOURIST CAMP. GLENN THREATENS TO BOLT THE PARTY IF THE LIE IS PUBLISHED. SO...

Capitol City Times

KATIE, "THE FARMER'S DAUGHTER," VANISHES AS PAINTER TELLS ALL! ELECTION 2 DAYS OFF!

Glenn Morley Bolts Party!

A political A-Bomb burst in ... with the ranks of the Pa... the Opposition ... rank...

WHILE GLENN TRAILS KATIE TO HER HOME AND SUCCESSFULLY PLEADS HIS LOVE, MRS MORLEY PHONES THAT ADOLPH THE PAINTER IS BEING GUARDED BY FINLEY'S MEN !

GLENN AND KATIE'S THREE HUSKY BROTHERS BATTER FINLEY'S HOODLUMS AND CAPTURE ADOLPH, WHO GET SLUGGED DURING THE FRACAS !

WITH ADOLPH IN HAND, THERE ARE ONLY FIVE HOURS TO ELECTION TIME IS THERE TIME ENOUGH TO GET THE TRUTH TO THE VOTERS ?

What can they do to bring the truth to the voters? It's Katie, "The Farmer's Daughter," for laughs...for love...for Congress! The show that'll win your heart and your vote as the happy hit of the year!

RKO PRESENTS

LORETTA YOUNG
JOSEPH COTTEN
ETHEL BARRYMORE
in
"The Farmer's Daughter"
with CHARLES BICKFORD

A DORE SCHARY PRODUCTION
Directed by H. C. POTTER
Written by ALLEN RIVKIN and LAURA KERR

RKO RADIO PICTURES

(Continued from Page 133)

r the use of his car, it occurred to him that ill might enjoy double-dating. The idea as favorable to Bill. Anne succeeded in ·tting Jane for Bill [illegible] ey stopped at Anne's. Bill did not r an introduction.

"And I thought I was pretty!" he ex-aimed, looking at Anne admiringly.

Anne laughed. "He's cute."

Bill discovered something in Jane that ppealed to him, and they began going toether frequently.

Bill's attachment to Jane [illegible]
he car problem, and one day Leonard opped for Anne with a new car.

"Whose chariot?" Anne asked.

"Oh, it belongs to a guy I know."

"A guy ——" Then she squealed and ugged his arm. "It's yours."

"It hasn't any of the cute horns and money business you wanted," said Leonard a ttle defiantly. "I'm going to have 'Logan ce Cream Company' painted on the sides in tters a foot high."

"It's got a radio." Anne switched it on nd tuned in a hot swing band. She bounced n the seat. "Say, the dimples in this seat fit
e just swell!"

Anne worked for one day at a restaurant s a waitress. She quit because she had a ght with the proprietor over her absence e following night. Anne considered she d a good excuse. She had been paying Mr.
erry, of the Follies Dress Shop, a [illegible]
Mr. Perry had oved to be tougher an she expected. He ld her that he had ade no agreement
ith her on the wages.
at the check for $6.75
presented exactly the mount she had been rth to him.

"Oh, you skunk!" claimed Anne. "I'm t leaving until I get y check."

She lit a cigarette, ndered coolly about e shop, dropping hes on the floor and talking to the clerks. hen she left the shop, leaned against the tside door so that no one could enter with-t pushing her aside. Her cigarette was ll in her mouth, and after a while she lit other from the butt of her first.

Mr. Perry watched her from the inside. A mber of women stopped to look at the esses in the window, and then looked at ne with troubled expressions. She had her ms crossed on her breast, her feet apart. d the cigarette dangled from her lips. They d not push her aside, nor did they ask to ss.

> In the days of my teaching novitiate at the College of St. Jean I was a voluble talker, and sometimes even strangers smiled at the velocity of my output. One of my colleagues, old Monsieur Deraisines, remarked in a ceremonious manner, "How lucky you are, my dear young man, to have that marvelous gift: we have to think before we speak." —ABBE FRANÇOIS DONET
> in The Wine Lover's Treasury

r would be difficult to say just how long is state of affairs lasted, although to Mr. erry it must have seemed very long. But ter a while a middle-aged woman and her own daughter approached the shop. Anne them enter, but followed them so closely eir heels nearly caught her ankles.

As she passed the booth, Mr. Perry spoke her. "Oh, Miss Karlan!"

Anne turned and came to the booth.

"Perhaps there's been a mistake. When d you come to work?"

"Monday."

"I was thinking it was Thursday. O.K., ve me the check."

"Nuts to you! You give me my check."

nne turned and walked away in the direc-on of the customers.

"Miss Karlan!"

Anne returned to the booth.

"Give me your check and take this."

Anne stared at the amount on the pro-ffered check. "Why, Mr. [illegible]
e soaked!" As he glanced down at his nts and as the customers glanced at him, nne lifted the check from his fingers. She added the $6.75 check and tossed it on the or as she left the shop.

For some time after that she made no fur-er attempt to find work. Mrs. Karlan de-manded that Anne get a job or leave her room and board. Unfortunately, the latter [illegible]

One evening Anne surprised Leonard by demanding abruptly, "Let me wear that ring. It wouldn't hurt any. I wouldn't lose it."

"How the devil did you find out I had a ring?"

"It doesn't matter."

[illegible]

this?"

"Last night. I had a date with him."

Leonard drew his upper lip in. "That was a swell little piece of two-timing!"

ANNE was angry. "I don't like that! I can go out with whoever I please. You've never yet said anything to make me feel different. I go out every night I'm not with you, and if you're jealous, it's just your own hard luck."

Leonard had been caught off guard. He knew that he had no exclusive claim on Anne. "Well, I didn't mean it," he apologized. "I just didn't think Bill would try to horn in."

"He didn't." Anne was satisfied with Leonard's explanation. "It was me that asked him to take me out. Glad to see you're a little jealous, just so it doesn't grow into a [illegible]

Anne's date with Bill was the result of her failure to trick out of Leonard the facts about Marjorie Purdy. Bill's story was vague and he hedged all he could on the subject of Marjorie. Anne did learn of a diamond that had belonged to Leonard's mother and that she had left it to him at her death, some six [illegible]

"How come you had that diamond reset? I suppose you had the bright idea you'd give [illegible] Purdy!"

"Perhaps I did. And perhaps I didn't."

"Anyhow, let me wear the ring awhile."

"No, that ring's in safekeeping and it's going to stay there."

Anne pouted. "Well, if you won't let me wear it, you could at least show it to me."

Leonard was proud of the ring and not averse to showing it to Anne. They stopped in front of Leonard's rooming house. It was nearly midnight and the house was dark. Leonard immediately had another problem on his hands, one that he had had to handle a number of times before.

"No, you can't come in," he insisted. "I'd be kicked out of the house if they found a woman in my room."

"I'll be quiet. I'd just like to get a good look at the dump where you're staying."

"It's not a dump and you're not going to get a good look at it." Leonard moved toward the house. Anne had started to follow him, but Leonard stood his ground. He said nothing, but Anne knew his mind well enough and got back in the car.

Leonard returned with a small white box, [illegible] casket, snapped it open.

Anne carefully lifted out the ring. "Crimine! This little amethyst of mine looks pretty sick next to it. Are you sure it's a diamond? How big is it?"

"Darn near a carat."

Anne marveled. She tried it on. "It just fits," she said. "Lemme wear it!"

"No. We better put it away before it causes trouble."

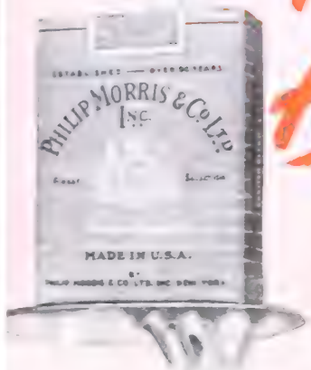
Leonard reached for the ring; Anne turned away as she slipped it from her finger. She snapped the case shut and handed it to him. "Well, all right, if you want it to go to waste," she said. Leonard locked the case in the glove compartment.

When Leonard returned to his room that night he opened the box to inspect his dia-

The Flavor's All Yours—

when you smoke

PHILIP MORRIS!



CLEAN, FRESH, PURE . . .

America's FINEST Cigarette!

No matter how much you smoke, the flavor's ALL yours — when you smoke PHILIP MORRIS! And here's why . . .

There's an important difference in PHILIP MORRIS manufacture that lets the FULL FLAVOR of the world's finest tobaccos come through for your complete enjoyment — clean, fresh, pure!

That's why PHILIP MORRIS taste better — smoke better — all day long!

CALL FOR PHILIP MORRIS

ALWAYS BETTER . . . BETTER ALL WAYS

It's by DURA-GLOSS

"It's the bright new idea in fingertip fashion"

Sylvia MacNeill
LOVELY
WALTER THORNTON MODEL

A John Frederics pink felt hat and Dura-Gloss bright American Beauty smartly contrast with a blue faille suit

It's color range for costume change

"Fingertips are color accents, too," says sparkling Sylvia MacNeill.

"So I have six of the eighteen fashion-right Dura-Gloss shades on my dressing table ready to complement whatever frock I choose.

Give your fingertips this added loveliness, too! Whisking away the old and brushing on harmonizing Dura-Gloss takes less time than renewing facial make-up . . . brings you the bright new magic of fingertips keyed to the occasion, your frock, your mood!"

Eighteen fashion-right shades . . . 10¢ plus tax.

NEW! Dura-Gloss Lipstick—creamy-smooth, long-lasting, never oily, never dry—in glowing colors to match and blend with Dura-Gloss Nail Polish . . . Smart gold-tone metal cap, slick-turning metal swivel . . . 39¢ plus tax.

© 1947, LORR LABORATORIES, PATERSON, N. J., FOUNDED BY E. T. REYNOLDS

(Continued from Page 135)

In place of the diamond ring was amethyst.

days of idleness for Anne were over. btained a job at the Midwest Cereal any, manufacturer of the famous ast food, "Poppies."

ough Anne was paid $15 for a week's she was rather ashamed of her job. moron could do it," she told her fa- She weighed each box of Poppies; in hat were underweight she dropped a tra Poppies, in those that were over- she subtracted a few.

e of the women has been on the same elve years," Anne said to her father. e does is lift boxes from one belt and em on another. I can see that I've got future."

constant use of the same muscles, the of holding her back straight all day er. On the other hand, she soon found doing her work automatically so that nd could be on other things. Her fel- rkers ranged from girls her own age to in their late fifties. Although Anne ee a dismal future badly outlined, she ved by a belief that her co-workers ealous of her. For one thing, Anne huge diamond and it quickly became n knowledge that it had been given to a very desirable young man. For an- hing, she seemed to be the pet of Mr. r, the head of the department.

e and Leonard went to a show and rd to the Westport Inn. It was ed and noisy. d was sitting the table from ling her a funny ut all she could m it were the s, a raised eye- wry grin. e rowdier it gets, fter you talk," nne. "I can't word you say." ancing couple, g out of control, Leonard in his chair. "Let's go some- here we can fight in peace," Leonard ed. ."

ooner had they climbed in the car than d grabbed Anne. "Come on, fork at ring or I'll break your arm."

u couldn't. I don't think you'd ever exercise if I didn't have that ring."

tussled. Anne, giggling, rolled back th as Leonard tugged and mauled her. her arm free, but she clenched her fist. d pried her fingers open, but Anne ly jerked her hand away, slipped the and put it in her mouth.

uess I'll swallow it."

ard put his hands on her throat. Anne ted him to choke her for a while, but ly tore his hands away.

u're rough," she complained. "What's idea?"

ARD perhaps would not have admitted he did not mind Anne's having the she had recently been stopping at the or him, the ring on her finger, and he cretly proud of her before his fellow vees. Her beauty was there for all to d she was sufficiently aware of a new t to adopt a certain graciousness of rs. Everyone at the office thought engaged, and Leonard had not gone his way to enlighten them. But still he asperated that Anne could so effec- keep the ring away from him.

I have to pry your mouth open?" he ded.

you do, down the hatch she goes, where ps nobody knows!"

re was no doubt in Leonard's mind nne meant business. He looked at her air.

denly Anne began to laugh at him. her finger in her mouth and brought it th the ring on it. "Darling," she said, are you so blame anxious for me to give

> Children are the most fascinating beings in the world, whether we paint pictures of them, write books about them, or just live with them and try to help them grow up. Fathers who share their children's growing time cannot grow old.
>
> —ANGELO PATRI
>
> Robert French Leavens (Beacon Press).

considerably. He had at first thought her mistake. Her principles were not many and not very conspicuous, but, like a sunken boulder, they were immovable. She may have come into his bedroom in her pajamas, they may have parked for hours on lonely roads; but no matter the temptation, there was a certain point beyond which Anne would not go. This may or may not have pleased Leonard, but there was one point he found agreeable. She seemed as settled in her mind about sex as though it were a simple problem in addition that had been solved. Leonard knew something of an adolescent girl's fearful doubt about how far to go, of self-reproach at having gone too far. But Anne never seemed bothered by troubles of this nature.

He had not anticipated that they would get along as well as they had. He had seen enough of her temper and quarrelsomeness, and his mind had told him their affair would never extend beyond three or four dates. But three months had passed, and there was no serious rupture. She seemed to find in him something that satisfied her.

In a different frame of mind, he might have condemned things he now found attractive. He liked her nerve. He liked her gay, sometimes blasphemous defiance. He liked her candor. She was wild and disturbing but wasn't this better than being dull?

When the couple parked in front of Anne's house, Leonard spoke. "I won't be calling you tomorrow night, dear." Date or no date, Leonard had been talking to Anne briefly on the phone each evening.

Anne stopped, struck by the strangeness of his manner. "Why not?"

"Well, if you must know, I have an early date. Marjorie's in town."

"Oh, so it's Purdickins. Why is she here?"

"She's visiting her aunt."

"Oh, she is, is she! I'll bet she's here to try to get her hooks in you. Is that the reason you wanted the ring back?"

"Take it easy. Marjorie's here and I just happened to want to see her. The ring has nothing to do with it."

"What did you want the ring for?"

"Will you shut up about the ring!"

"I will not!"

"You're acting like a jealous little fool."

"Oh, I am, am I!" Anne was silent for a moment. "Well, you can pardon me from here to hell." She abruptly got out of the car and went to the house.

It was true that Leonard did have some unfinished business with Marjorie to attend to, but he was not thinking of Marjorie now. He was wondering at Anne's immediate hurt at the mention of Marjorie, at the reason why she should be jealous of him when she could have any number of young men. Something about this capricious child had him stumped. Finally he decided he was mad at Anne, at least until next Friday, when they had a date for Jimmy Count James at Shadowland, and he wondered how long Anne would be mad at him.

The next morning, at quarter to eight, Anne descended from the Kerry Heights bus at the corner of Third and Main, near the Charming Lady Dress Shop. She hesitated in front of the window, looking at a moonstone-blue dress, her lips parted a little. She took a number of unwilling steps down the street, her eyes still on the dress, before she was able to set her eyes in front of her on the tall cylindrical elevators of the Midwest Cereal Company, several blocks down the street.

After work that afternoon she once more walked down the street, in the opposite

Only one soap gives your skin this exciting Bouquet

Do you want the fragrant appeal of popular girls?

What is the fragrance that gives a girl such sweet appeal—and quickens the beat of a man's heart? It's the fragrance men love, imparted to your skin by Cashmere Bouquet Soap. This exquisite fragrance comes from a secret wedding of rare perfumes, far more costly than you'd expect to find in any soap. Do, as popular girls have done for seventy-eight romantic years, bathe every day with Cashmere Bouquet Soap. That's the way to accentuate your fragrant appeal. Cashmere Bouquet Soap is lovely, too, for your complexion.

Cashmere Bouquet

Adorns your skin with the fragrance men love

How 47 Million Women Can Fight Fatigue With Hot Quaker Oats

If you are tired, you should know that fatigue is not always "just natural." Science says most Americans today do not get the right energy elements, or enough of them, from highly refined modern foods.

Quaker Oats is natural, complete, unchanged whole-grain oatmeal. And even among natural cereals, none equals oatmeal in highly important natural fatigue-fighting elements.*

Enjoy fighting fatigue the natural way, with the one cereal so delicious that Americans voted it best-tasting cereal in a nation-wide breakfast poll!

For youngsters, too, there's nature's magic in Quaker Oats! Oatmeal is our greatest natural grain in elements that protect growth and guard energy! Enjoy delicious Quaker Oats regularly, for greatest benefit. Serve it tomorrow to all your family. So economical. So easy to prepare. Quick Quaker Oats cooks fast as coffee.

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats Are the Same

*Protein, Food-Energy, Vitamin B_1, Iron
Received more votes than any other cereal, hot or cold!

Quaker Oats

The World's Best-Tasting Breakfast Food

direction. But she marched right by the Charming Lady Dress Shop.

At home she sat down at the old maple desk in the dining room. She called her father to her. "Dad," she said, taking out her pay check and scribbling her endorsement on the back, "Christmas present."

"Oh, I hate to take it, Anne. How much do you want back?"

"I busted the furnace. You'll need it all."

"No, you'll need some of it. I'll give you back all I can next payday."

"Take the whole thing and shut up."

As Anne closed her door she thought, If I get much more noble, no one will be fit to live with me. She did not know whether she felt good or bad; she did know that she felt different. She felt stronger and more important because she had helped—and in no inconsiderable degree, by her lights—to bolster the family's finances. She thought of Marjorie, and wondered if she was out with Leonard. She looked at the ring. It had been obtained by trickery, yet its implications were growing. For a while she had had the feeling that it was gradually becoming hers. Now she was not at all certain.

"You oughtn't to let 'em stack up that way," the woman said to Anne. "Wait'll Schluter catches you."

"He wouldn't do anything. I wouldn't care if he did."

It was Friday morning. Anne was loafing on her job. She didn't bother to weigh half the boxes of Poppies that came to her, merely glanced at the level of the breakfast food and guessed. Around her chair were scattered Poppies she had dropped.

Mr. Schluter appeared at the other end of the room, heading her way. "Miss Karlan!" He spoke so sharply that Anne jumped. "Pep it up! Keep those boxes moving!" Mr. Schluter walked a few feet along the conveyor belt and picked up several of the boxes that she supposedly had weighed, returned to Anne's station and placed them on the scale. "One quarter of an ounce over," he said, "half an ounce over, quarter over, half under. Young lady, what do you think the company's paying you for? If you don't snap out of it right away, you'll find yourself out of a job."

Live in contact with dreams, and you will get something of their charm; live in contact with facts, and you will get something of their brutality. I wish I could find a country where the facts were not brutal, and the dreams not unreal.

—GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

Mr. Schluter did not give her opportunity to contest the issue, but walked off.

"I thought he was so stuck on you," said the woman who worked nearest to Anne, sarcastically.

"Oh, shut up!"

Anne did not bother to return to work that afternoon but, after eating, walked home. She met her mother in the hallway.

"Why aren't you at work?" Mrs. Karlan barked.

"Oh, shut up!"

"Don't sass me, young lady! I suppose you've quit your job again. Have you?"

ANNE went to her room. She was weary of fighting with her mother. She took off her shoes, poked a pillow together, and lay down on the bed. She stared at the ring, took it off, put it back on her finger and looked at it again. Suddenly she began to cry. Seldom had she cried so long and so hard.

When she was over her spell, she lay quiet for many minutes. Then she rolled over on her back, stared at the ceiling. With a quick roll she was off the bed. She ran upstairs to the bathroom, washed off her make-up.

Aunt Erma was using the telephone and Maymie had just arrived at the house from playing with the girl across the street when Anne came downstairs. Maymie was wearing one of Anne's dresses. Anne felt her temper swell her throat. She exploded.

"Who said you could wear my dress?"

Maymie was scared. "Mom said I could!" she spluttered.

For a second Anne glared at her, then Anne turned and rushed at Erma. She grabbed the phone out of the hands of her bewildered aunt and slammed the receiver on the hook. She shook Erma by the shoulders.

"You told her? Whose dresses are they, mine or yours?" Anne had lost her temper but not her head. There was a kind of grim purposefulness in her attack.

"Your mother said ——" Erma managed to say.

"My mother said she could. You didn't think they belonged to my mother, did you?"

Mrs. Karlan was coming in from the kitchen.

"Why don't you and your brats get out of here?" Anne flung at Erma as her mother descended on her.

MRS. Karlan grabbed her daughter and slapped her, but Anne hardly blinked and once did not strike back. "I'm fed up with this place!" she exclaimed, ran upstairs and locked herself in the bathroom.

Anne was determined she would stand no more humiliation. She might have suffered through that afternoon without doing anything had it not been for the rumpus with Erma and her mother. She might have waited to see if Leonard would call to take her to Jimmy Count James that evening. But such patience was impossible now.

She went directly to the Logan Ice Cream Company. An ambidextrous young woman, a Miss Kegler, operated a typewriter and a switchboard.

Leonard was not at his desk. "He left yesterday," Miss Kegler told Anne.

Anne had not expected this bad news. "Where did he go?" she asked.

"Cabel City, I guess." The switchboard buzzed and Miss Kegler plugged in. Cabel City was but a name to Anne. She had heard of it somewhere, but for all she knew it might be twenty miles distant or two thousand. Anne immediately assumed that Marjorie had gone with Leonard.

"When is he coming back?" she demanded.

"I don't know. Perhaps tomorrow."

Mr. Stanley Tate, the president of the Logan Ice Cream Company, was passing by, his hand full of papers. He overheard the last of this conversation. "I told Leonard he needn't be back until Monday," he said to Anne, then disappeared through the door.

"Why did he go?" Anne asked Miss Kegler.

"He had some business to attend to. Good afternoon, this is the Logan Ice Cream Company." Miss Kegler was absorbed in the interpretation of an order for seven varieties of ice cream. Anne turned and left the building. She had expected trouble, but she had not expected this. Every barbershop, restaurant, beauty parlor that she passed had a sign with the picture of the baldish Jimmy Count James, baton raised, and the legend "The Band with the Blues, Famous Recording Artists with Jeannette Day, the Sweet Songstress." The thought that Leonard might call for her that evening to take her to the dance now seemed preposterous.

There was now no indecision in Anne's mind. She was through with Leonard and with her family and with the city. So far had this state of mind progressed that she no longer felt much anger, only bitterness and sadness.

She went to the paymaster's office of the Midwest Cereal Company and waited for her check. It had been considerably reduced due to her quitting before the week was up.

On her way back to the loop she passed the Shadowland Ballroom. Above the door was a big sign: "TONITE JIMMY COUNT JAMES." Anne crossed the street, turned at the corner and cut through the taxi stands of the Union Station.

At the ticket window she asked the fare to Chicago and the time the train left. The streamliner, the Rocky Mountain Flier, left at 2:25 in the morning, and the fare was

(Continued on Page 140)

Not Expendable

You'll take no chances with your children's well-being. Nothing is more important than for them to grow up strong and sturdy.

That is why millions of mothers think so highly of Nucoa. For Nucoa gives your children—at moderate cost—all the food energy . . . the "taste good" satisfaction . . . the protective Vitamin A which make a spread for bread important in their diet.

Nucoa's standard is set for children. Nucoa is made under supervision of one of the finest food laboratories in the world, with a consulting group of eminent nutritionists. And Nucoa is rich in Vitamin A—so rich that two ounces (about three generous table servings) supply 62 per cent of a child's minimum daily requirement.

Serve delicious Nucoa proudly on your table. You'll agree that a spread made good enough for your children is good enough for anyone.

.S PAT. OFF.

SO GOOD IT "MELTS IN YOUR MOUTH!"

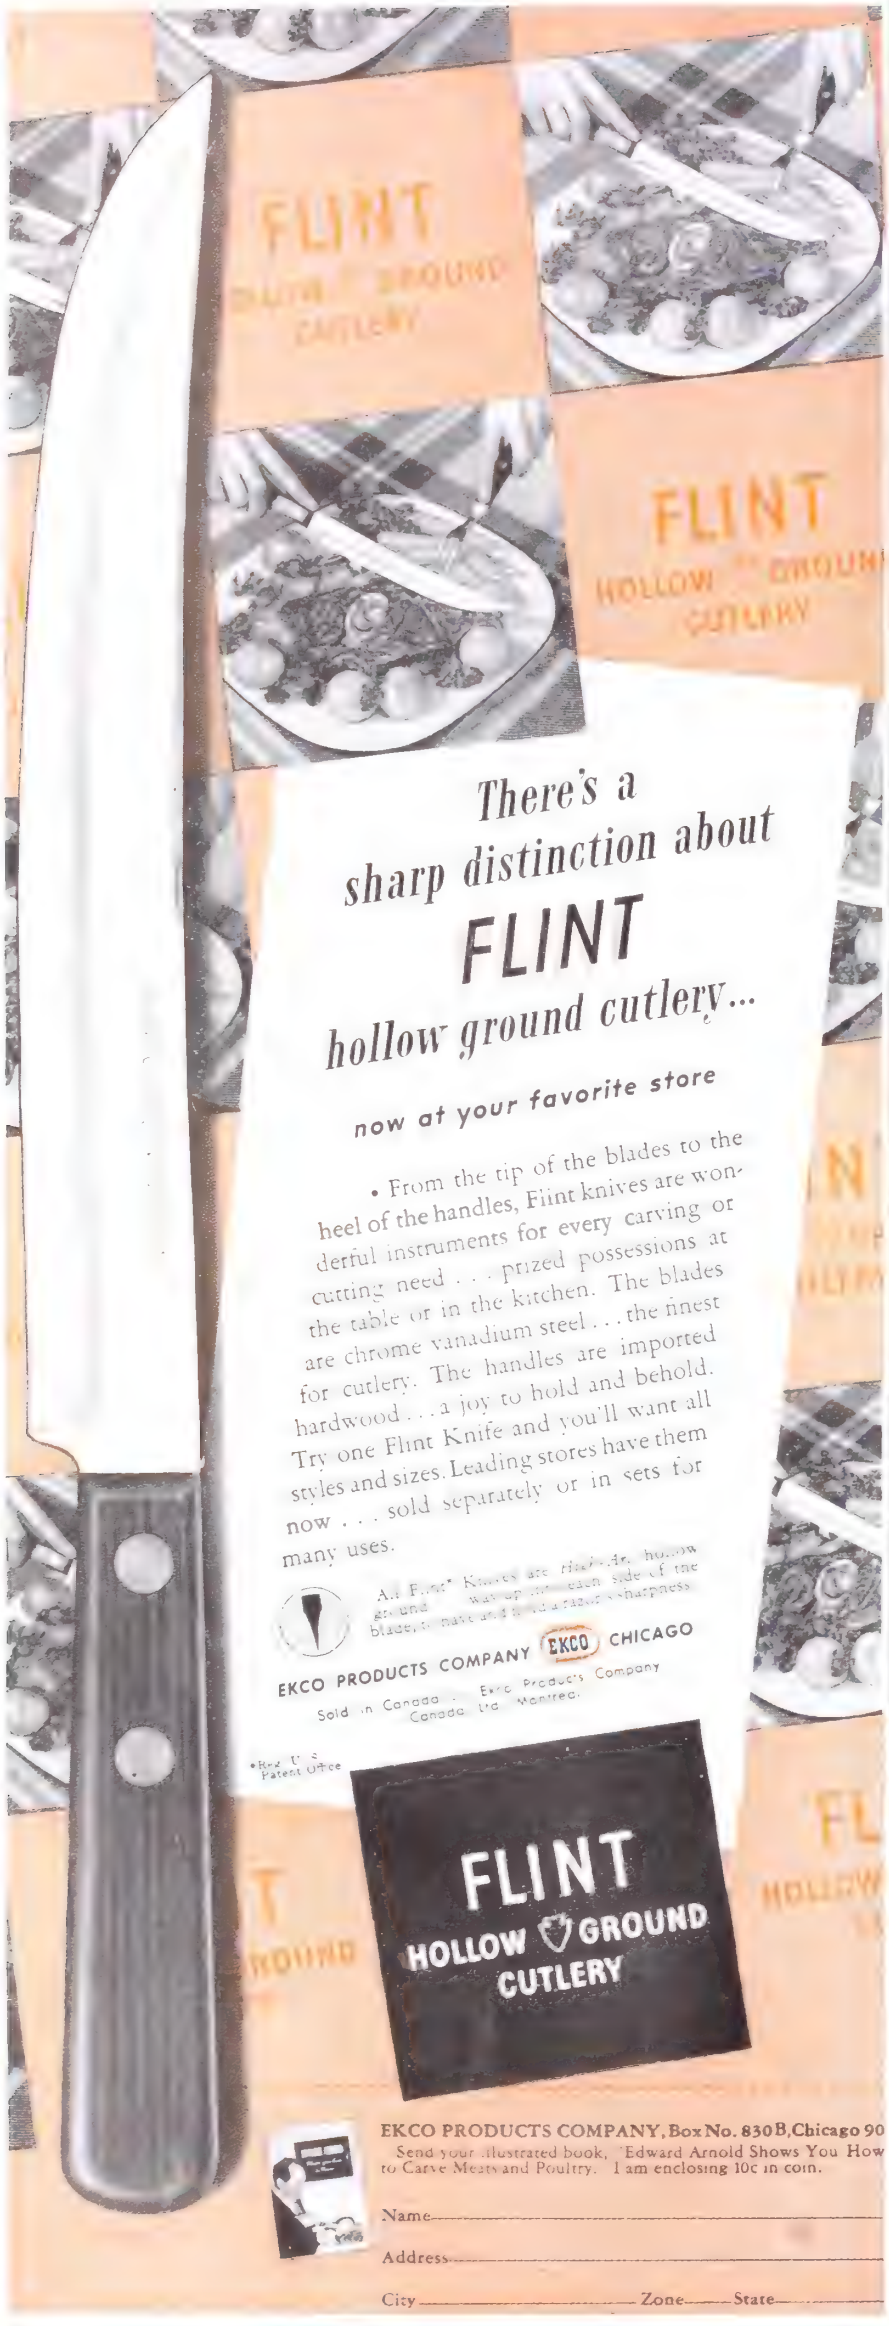
Cook with Nucoa as it comes—pure white. All the fine flavor and rich food value are in it in this form. If you like it yellow, for table use, Nucoa is so smooth-churned that it is easy to tint with the pure Color-Wafer inserted in each package.

A JOY TO COOK WITH, TOO!

CROUTON TOMATOES: (1) Melt 1 tbsp. Nucoa in saucepan. (2) Stir in 1½ tbsp. flour, 1½ tsp. minced onion, 1 tsp. salt and 1½ tbsp. sugar until smooth. (3) Add 3 cups stewed tomatoes and bring to boil. (4) Combine [illegible] cups stale bread cubes in 3 tbsp. melted Nucoa. (5) Arrange layer of [illegible] in casserole, cover with half the tomatoes, more croutons, tomatoes and top with rest of croutons. (6) Run into hot [illegible] 10 minutes. Yield: 6 servings.

UPSIDE-DOWN COFFEE CAKE: (1) Pour 3 tbsp. melted Nucoa into bottom of pan. (2) Add 1 cup orange marmalade mixed with 2 tbsp. lemon juice. (3) Sift, measure 1 cup enriched flour and 1 cup yellow cornmeal and resift with 3 tsp. baking powder, ½ tsp. salt and ¼ cup sugar. (4) Cut in ¼ cup Nucoa until it disappears. (5) Add ¾ cup water or milk, 1 tbsp. grated orange rind and 2 eggs. (6) Mix just enough to moisten dry ingredients. (7) Spoon over marmalade. (8) Bake in a moderately hot oven (375° F.) 30 min. Serve hot—with plenty of Nucoa. Um-m-m, is it good! Yield: One 8-inch square cake.

FRIED FOODS cooked with Nucoa are delicately flavorful, for Nucoa tastes sweet and fresh when hot. Nucoa is new-churned the year round, on order only. There is no "storage" Nucoa. And see how beautifully Nucoa's purity and freshness are protected by triple wrapping of parchment, waxed carton and sealed waxed paper!



FLINT
HOLLOW GROUND
CUTLERY
There's a sharp distinction about
FLINT
hollow ground cutlery...
now at your favorite store
• From the tip of the blades to the heel of the handles, Flint knives are wonderful instruments for every carving or cutting need . . . prized possessions at the table or in the kitchen. The blades are chrome vanadium steel . . . the finest for cutlery. The handles are imported hardwood . . . a joy to hold and behold. Try one Flint Knife and you'll want all styles and sizes. Leading stores have them now . . . sold separately or in sets for many uses.
EKCO PRODUCTS COMPANY EKCO CHICAGO
Sold in Canada by Ekco Products Company Canada Ltd. Montreal
FLINT
HOLLOW GROUND
CUTLERY
EKCO PRODUCTS COMPANY, Box No. 830B, Chicago 90
Send your illustrated book, "Edward Arnold Shows You How to Carve Meats and Poultry." I am enclosing 10c in coin.
Name
Address
City Zone State

(Continued from Page 138)

$11.20. Anne was dismayed. That would leave her with only slightly more than a dollar. She needed more, much more. But perhaps she could borrow. She could land a job as soon as she got to Chicago, all right. Anne had a sublime confidence in her resourcefulness.

On the street again, Anne looked in the store windows, then went home.

The first person she saw was Aunt Erma, who smiled at her, then disappeared. It was just like Aunt Erma to smile at her after what Anne had done, and it didn't make Anne feel any better.

Claribel eyed Anne, half frightened. "Maybe we're going away," she said.

"No, you're not," Anne replied. "You're going to stay here until you're a little old lady."

Anne climbed the stairs to the attic, pulled out several suitcases from under a pile of empty cardboard boxes. She immediately chose the most presentable suitcase. She quietly slipped to her room and shut the door.

She selected the best of her wardrobe and placed it in the suitcase, using more care than usual, for this was a definitive act: when she left she would not come back. She threw her house coat around her, glanced at the clock on her way to the bathroom. She discovered that she was not pressed for time, so she allowed forty-five minutes for her bath. Then she dried herself briskly, went back to her room and put on her panties, but nothing else, and lay down on her bed to read her movie magazine. Her suitcase was still standing on the floor, by the dresser. Anne scrambled to her feet, lugged it to the closet. Then she climbed back on the bed, picked up her magazine, and lit a cigarette.

Anne had acted just in time, for now her door opened. It was her mother. "I thought I'd find you here," she said, "taking it easy while everybody else is working their heads off."

ANNE ignored her mother.

"You ought to have the decency to mind your tongue," continued Mrs. Karlan. "You ought to realize Erma's had about all she can bear. You're going to march right in there and apologize."

Anne was very much absorbed in a photograph of Claudette Colbert. Mrs. Karlan stared at her hostilely.

"I have half a mind to kick you from the house. Haven't you got any feelings? Put on some clothes!" She slammed the door.

Anne maintained her silence through a dismal dinner. A little later, Mr. Karlan stepped to the door of Anne's room. He rapped lightly.

Anne opened the door. She was brushing her hair. "Well?" she said.

"Anne, your mother and I have been talking."

"That's nothing new." But there was nothing cocky in Anne's manner. She was as meek as she had been at any time in her life.

"She told me what happened this afternoon," Mr. Karlan continued. "Your mother told me that you told Erma to leave the house with her kids. Of course I know you probably lost your temper and ——"

Anne flared up briefly. "Of course I lost my temper. I had good reason to."

Mr. Karlan studied his daughter. "Well, you probably said something you wouldn't have said if you weren't mad. Don't you think you'd better apologize? Erma, I guess, was pretty much broken up about it." Mr. Karlan had discharged his duty, but he continued to stand by the doorway. "Anne," he said softly, "school is about ready to open and I thought ——"

"I'm not going back to school!" Anne cried. "I'm getting out of here!"

"Oh." Mr. Karlan obviously did not believe his daughter. But he saw that it was no use arguing with her and left.

Suddenly Anne marched from her room to Erma's. She opened the door, entered. Two minutes later she returned to her room. She had apologized. She had suffered the last humiliation. She hoped that now everyone would be satisfied.

"Now here's my platform, folks . . ."

"I'm in favor of milk we babies can eat with a spoon!—an' that means I want more rennet-custards."

When children tire of drinking so much milk, let them eat part of it as delicious rennet-custard desserts. Then it'll taste different every day, and the rennet enzyme makes it even easier to digest. Easy to make, too—no eggs, no cooking to take your time, destroy precious vitamins. Get "Junket" Brand Rennet Tablets today and give your family a treat!

Make rennet-custards with either "Junket" Brand Rennet Tablets—not sweetened or flavored—add sugar and flavor to taste; or "Junket" Rennet Powder—six flavors, already sweetened. Both at all grocers. Write "Junket" Brand Foods Division of Chr. Hansen's Laboratory, Inc. Dept. 23, Little Falls, N. Y., for free sample of "Junket" Rennet Tablets.

WORTH WAITING FOR!
"JUNKET" BRAND FOODS
Freezing Mix
Quick Fudge Mix
Danish Dessert

"JUNKET" is the trade-mark of Chr. Hansen's Laboratory, Inc., for its rennet and other food products, and is registered in the U. S. and Canada

HANDY HELPER'S
JINGLE QUIZ No 5

What paper gadgets, tied with string, Put addresses on anything? What, used to ship, express or mail, Will stay attached, come wind or hail?

Dennison
SHIPPING TAGS
At Stationery Departments Everywhere

TABASCO
"The Seasoning Supreme"
ONE DASH WORKS WONDERS

Vaughan's GARDENING ILLUSTRATED
Illustrates 265 flowers in full color. This catalog is packed with cultural information invaluable to amateurs. All about new weed killers and insecticides. FREE on request Vaughan's Seed Store, Dept. 113, 10 W. Randolph St. Chicago 1, Ill.; 47 Barclay St., New York 7, N. Y.

E WAS GOING TO

husband walked out on t meals..even the children uldn't finish them!

ound that Herb-Ox flavors in dishes. For better stew,
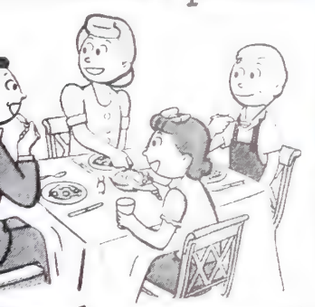
2 cubes for 4 portions..



And you have a really
grand-tasting dish!
(P.S. You can use
Herb-Ox in soup and gravy too.)

FOOD TASTES BETTER
'S BETTER FOR YOU!

vor up"
eals with FREE menu llustrated in

Herb-Ox
BOUILLON CUBES

URE FOOD COMPANY, Inc.
Mamaroneck, N. Y.

OLLY TIME
The NATION'S FAVORITE POP CORN
—HULLESS—
URE-TO-POP
OR YELLOW.
GROCER'S.

MAKE Spare Time PROFITS
Sell EVERYDAY GREETING CARDS
Easy to earn extra CASH day Greeting Cards for Birthdays, "Get-Well" Assortment of 14
ders, make up to Assortments, Start
retail 6c up. SAMPLES
PHILLIPS CARD COMPANY
719 HUNT STREET - - NEWTON, MASS.

Anne heard Mary's footsteps in the hallway and was ready for her when she came in the door. "Honey, how much money you got?"

Mary looked at Anne, lying on the bed in her slip. "Why, you're not dressed!" she exclaimed. "You look like you've lost your last friend. Why don't you get ready?"

"Ready for what?"

"Didn't you hear me call? Here I've been trying to entertain Leonard out on the front porch for half an hour."

What had happened was simple. Leonard had gone to Cabel City on business. Marjorie had terminated her visit with her aunt and he had taken her home. Wildfield was but four miles from Cabel City.

"I sure burned up the tires to get here in time for our date, and what do I find? You haven't even bothered to get ready." But Leonard was not serious.

"Well, gosh, I didn't think you'd come. You didn't call me all week. Was I ever mad at you!"

They went to the dance. Anne moved about the floor with her chin high. Leonard was a personal triumph for her. While dancing she placed her hand on his shoulder so that all could see the ring. They left the dance early. Both wanted each other alone.

The pressure had been released. Only now did she realize the strain that she had been under. She kissed him, snuggled to him, squealed her happiness. Leonard was surprised.

"I didn't realize you missed me that much, darling."

"Uh-huh. Oh, you oughtn't to ever run out on me! If you knew how awful it was, you wouldn't. Oh, darling, I love you so damn much!" She burrowed into his arms.

Noise proves nothing. Often a hen who has merely laid an egg cackles as if she had laid an asteroid.

—MARK TWAIN.

Leonard knew that if he were ever to take advantage of a moment, now was the time. He thought of what she had said. He had honestly been unaware that he meant so much to her. It made him feel responsible. No, he would not take advantage of her. If anything further were to come from their newly intensified relationship, it would have to be a considered act.

The peak of Anne's emotion passed, and she lay in his arms. They were parked at the bottom of a small hill, at a spot they had visited a number of times. It was quite isolated, a side road of a side road. A sultriness hung in the warm air, and heat lightning was kindling in the sky, illumining an old shed just off the road. That shed had been the inspiration of much of their meaningful banter: it was their "house."

"What business does a cow have in our pantry?" asked Leonard.

Anne lifted her head, looked at the shack. A flash of lightning revealed the hindquarters of a cow in the doorway. "Hell, that's no cow," said Anne. "That's Sylvester."

Leonard loved her. He had reasoned that he could dispose of his affections where and when he wished. What good did his nice reasoning do now? He suddenly realized that he loved her, that he had loved her for some time.

He placed his hand at the back of her head, beneath her hair, and let her hair trail through his fingers. Leonard wanted to tell Anne that he loved her. But he would not. He very much lacked Anne's impulsiveness. So he petted her, trusting his actions to convey what he felt.

"Yes, that's Sylvester all right," he said. "And he's in the cooky jar."

"Darling, you'll just have to chop the little brat's hands off." Anne was silent for a minute, then she turned around in his arms so that she could see his face. "Why do we just sit around and talk like saps?" she asked. "Why don't we really get married?"

Leonard was not ready to answer such a question. In a flash he knew that he should

You can't tell them from Home-Baked Beans

Drenched in rich tomato sauce

Beans baked by Heinz give that "old-time taste" because they're made to old-fashioned home recipes—really baked in hot dry ovens!

57

Heinz Oven-Baked Beans

THAT DISTINCTIVE

Taste!

That Dr. Pepper flavor is not derived from any single source . . . is not a copy of any other drink. It's an original blended creation that never tires the taste. Make Dr. Pepper your steady standby. Drink a bite to eat at 10, 2 & 4 o'clock . . . or anytime you're hungry, thirsty or tired.

Listen—Laugh—Enjoy
"DARTS For DOUGH"
A.B.C. Network—Sunday p.m.

5¢

DRINK Dr. Pepper GOOD FOR LIFE!

Drink A BITE TO EAT

have expected something like this from Anne, that he could only play house with her for a little while before she would either kick it over or else insist on the real thing.

"Are you serious?" he asked.

"I was never more serious. Will you marry me?"

"Doesn't the man usually ask that question?"

"What difference does it make who asks it? I want an answer, either yes or no."

Anne's insistence began to irritate Leonard. She seemed to have no conception of the seriousness of marriage. "Honey," he explained, "I don't think you realize what a serious step marriage is. After all, you're pretty young. You've got to be doubly sure of the way you feel, and in addition to that ——"

"Oh, quit preaching to me. I guess the way I feel is plain enough. I wanted you to marry me and maybe know something of the way you feel."

"Darling, it isn't that I don't love you." There, he had told her, inadvertently—almost. And once committed, he was not one to leave any doubt of it.

"I should think if you loved me you'd want to marry me right now. You'll never get another chance."

"What?"

"You heard me. I'm going to Chicago tonight, unless you marry me."

"You're crazy! You're not running off to Chicago."

"Will you marry me?"

"No!"

They settled back, silent, each on his side of the seat. Presently Leonard started the motor and they drove back to town. He was much disturbed. She was so unreasonable. They did not speak to each other. But when they stopped in front of her house she did not get out of the car immediately. He could not see her face, and he suspected that she was crying.

"Are you mad at me?"

"No."

He lifted her head tenderly. She was not crying, but her eyes were closed and she would not invite his advances. "Then what's the trouble?"

"Isn't it enough that I asked you to marry me and you wouldn't? I made a sap of myself. I'll never go crawling to a man again." Anne took the ring off her finger and placed it in his hand.

"Hey!" Leonard objected. "Don't you want to wear it?"

"It don't belong to me."

"Oh, come now, honey, it's not as bad as all that!" He embraced and kissed her, but she was inert in his hands. It seemed as though he had lost her.

"Darling," she said, and it thrilled him a bit that she would still address him affectionately, "will you do me one last favor?"

"What do you mean, 'last'?"

"Will you give me a lift to the station about two o'clock tonight? My train leaves at two-twenty-five."

"You're crazy! You're not running away, and even if you were I wouldn't help you."

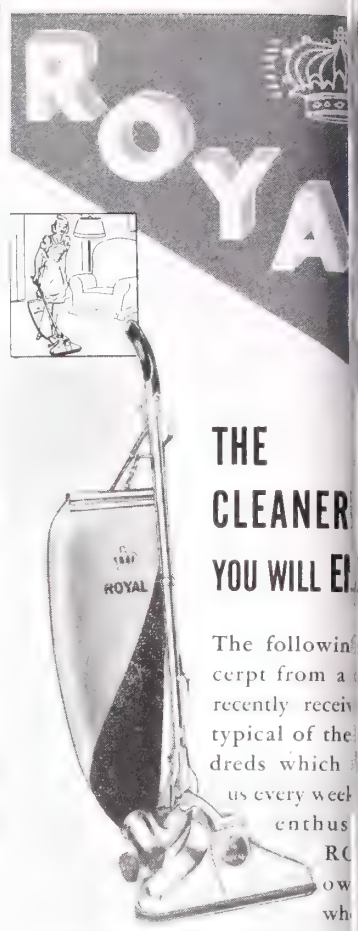
"Come on, please! My suitcase weighs a ton."

"I say you're crazy. You're not going to Chicago! You're going in that house, and go to bed!"

"Well, O.K., if that's the way you feel about it." She uttered a little cry, half articulate—perhaps it was "so long"—ran for the house and shut the door.

Several days before this, Leonard and Marjorie Purdy were seated on newspapers on top of a hill. The scraps of a picnic lunch were scattered about.

Marjorie laughed. It was a measured laugh—Leonard had been noticing that lately. "You talk differently," she said, and he noticed how carefully she had chiseled her lips with lipstick, and how remarkably attractive those lips were. "I was surprised at the number of young kids who knew you at that place—the Westport Inn. They made me feel ancient." Marjorie was twenty-six. "Lennie, I don't know what I'm going to do



THE CLEANER
YOU WILL E

The followin cerpt from a recently receiv
typical of the dreds which us every week
enthus
RO ow wh used their cleaners not for a da month, but for many years. We qu

"I have used my sweeper (RO
every day since I got it (Sept. 1,
In all those years of daily use, only cost me the
of one new c
do not know
I may need a cleaner, but
I do you ma
sure that it wil
ROYAL."

WITH ROYAL YOU GET YOUR CHOICE

You, too can enjoy the same exper
Today's ROYAL Cleaners with many important improvements,
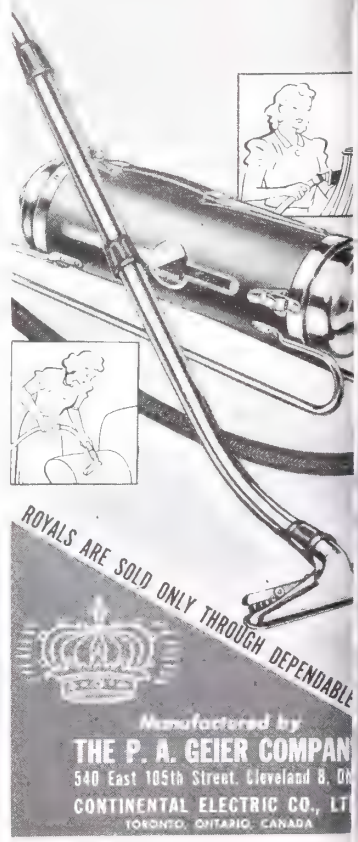
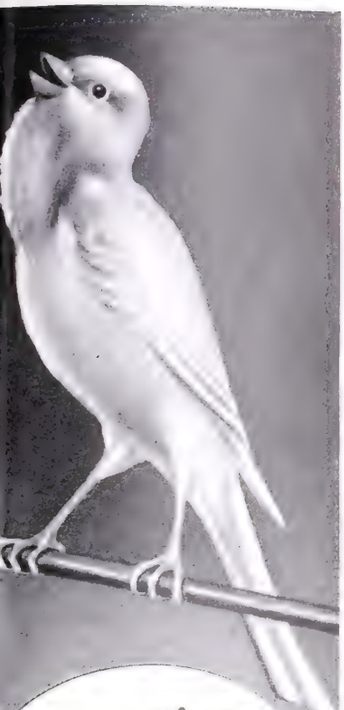
you the utmost in cleaning se



ROYALS ARE SOLD ONLY THROUGH DEPENDABLE
Manufactured by
THE P. A. GEIER COMPAN
540 East 105th Street, Cleveland 8, O
CONTINENTAL ELECTRIC CO., LT
TORONTO, ONTARIO, CANADA



He'll Sing His Sweetest ON THE TESTED TWELVE*

For the joy and brightness he brings to your home, a canary needs but little care. Keep him healthy and happy, and he'll reward you with his cheeriest singing. Always feed him French's Bird Seed and Biscuit—a carefully measured, thoroughly tested blend of twelve proven aids to health and song. Millions of singing canaries have made French's "Tested Twelve" the most popular bird diet in America!

*TESTED TWELVE INGREDIENTS—PROPORTIONED WITH A PURPOSE!

Canary Seed	Sesame Seed
Red Millet Seed	Poppy Seed
Yellow Millet Seed	Corn Syrup
Rape Seed	Cuttlebone
Soy Bean Grits	Charcoal
Yeast	Wheat Germ

French's BIRD SEED AND BISCUIT

IN ONE ECONOMICAL PACKAGE

with you! I'll get anything you've been robbing the cradle."

"I have." Leonard admitted solemnly.

"And her name is Anne?" Marjorie teased.

"How did you know?"

Marjorie looked at him slyly. "You can't fool me. I've known you too long, Lennie. I could see confusion written all over your face when that little girl asked you how Anne was. You bad boy!" Marjorie spoke as though she were reprimanding a child.

Leonard was certain that he had shown no confusion when Dolores had asked him how Anne was. He also knew that Marjorie did not regard him as a child.

Leonard wanted to tell Marjorie something. Precisely what it was, he could not say. They had been going together for a long time and they had talked frequently about getting married, without saying as much in so many words. Actually, no engagement had been made, so now no engagement could be broken. But the understanding that had existed once had now developed into misunderstanding on Marjorie's part, Leonard feared.

He did know one thing he wanted to tell Marjorie. He wished she'd shut up about Adrian Schlotterbeck. Adrian was undoubtedly a desirable young man, but her talking about Adrian did not make Leonard jealous. He did not care that Adrian owned two automobiles, three dairy farms.

Leonard, his head bent, was thoughtful. "How many farms did you say he had?"

"Three. Four, if old man Woonsocket doesn't change his mind about selling."

"H'm-m-m." Leonard raised his head. "When you and Adrian get married, it'll be a nice place to raise your kids."

Marjorie was a good actress, but Leonard noticed her clutch her knee so forcefully that her fingernails whitened. "Why, Lennie," she began, and Leonard was sure that her first impulse was to say something entirely different from her next words, "it has no modern improvements."

He who will revenge every affront means not to live long.

—SPANISH PROVERB.

"You and Adrian will love it." Then his manner lightened. He decided to tell Marjorie more about Anne. After all, Marjorie had turned the conversation that way. "I've been going with Anne for about three months," he said. "She's only seventeen, but really quite a girl. You should ——"

Marjorie shamed him. "Lennie! Seventeen?"

"Well, she's a ——"

Marjorie shook her head. "No, Lennie. It's all too sordid for me. I give up."

Leonard knew that Marjorie never gave up. He also felt angered that Marjorie would let him tell her no more about Anne.

Hardly had Anne entered the house than there was a terrific clap of thunder and a drop of rain exploded on the windshield. Suddenly the downpour came. Leonard drove to his rooming house, locked his car, made a dash for the porch.

Leonard undressed, lay down in bed, but he did not sleep. The faintly luminescent hands of his alarm clock were pointing at 1:15. So many things had happened in the past few hours that the evening seemed timeless. His mind could not handle all the problems before it. He loved Anne; she was a fool; she loved him; she hated him; she put him on the spot; she was trying to trick him; she needed him: they loved each other. Angry at his torment, he kicked the sheet off his legs.

He wondered what kind of wife she would make. Certainly not an ideal wife—he would not permit himself that illusion. But at the moment Leonard was not particularly interested in ideal wives. At various times he had imagined that Marjorie would make an ideal wife, thoroughly tamed and domesticated. But perhaps that was the way Mar-

(Continued on page 145)

LEADING CUTTERS AND DECORATORS CHOOSE FEDERAL GLASSWARE

Good company

Every hostess knows that there's nothing like tall, gleaming glasses appropriately decorated, and properly filled, to add zest and sparkle to any occasion, from a big casual party to a foursome for bridge.

So, wherever smart folks gather, you will find the best hands reaching for lovely decorated tumblers which carry the Shield F Symbol of luxury-quality Federal glassware. That's natural enough, because tumblers, like people, are known by the company they keep.

And speaking of good company, Federal luxury-quality tumblers are first choice of leading cutters and decorators. They know that Federal's matchless color, clarity and brilliance form a perfect background for beautiful, modern or traditional cutting or decorating.

So, no matter where or when you buy glassware — look for the Shield F of Federal. It's your assurance of luxury-quality unsurpassed — at the price you wish to pay.

THE FEDERAL GLASS COMPANY • COLUMBUS 7, OHIO

LUXURY QUALITY Glassware Fashioned by Federal

ADDS DISTINCTION TO YOUR DAILY SERVICE

At Home
after March third
Thirty Breakneck Lane
Milford, Connecticut

This season's gay new hostesses go their way rejoicing! For there is a silverplate with a radiant beauty that lives on and on.

The backs of the bowls and handles of the most used spoons and forks of Holmes & Edwards Silverplate are invisibly inlaid with two blocks of sterling silver. Thus: lovely patterns stay lovelier longer. It's not just "reinforced" or "extra plated," but Sterling Inlaid . . . like this!

IMPORTANT: Here is one of the few products in America that has not raised its price since the war! Fifty-two piece service, eight place settings . . . only $68.50 with chest (Tax Free). Choose from three patterns—left to right, Youth, Danish Princess, Lovely Lady—all made in the U. S. A.

HOLMES & EDWARDS
STERLING INLAID° SILVERPLATE

HERE AND HERE
It's Sterling Inlaid

Copyright 1947, The International Silver Co., Holmes & Edwards Div., Meriden, Conn. Sold in Canada by: The T. Eaton Co., Ltd., °Reg. U. S. Pat. C

(Continued from Page 143)

ie had wanted him to see her; perhaps it s a trap. Marriage and housekeeping were synonymous. It might be some years ore Anne would become housebroken. You d to know how to handle her. But if Anne d he could get along as well as they had in past, he would be satisfied. She was tless, would want to go out more than he . At least that would prevent him from ting stodgy. There was nothing wrong h her brain; perhaps it was in backward d perhaps she hadn't got around to using ne of the cells, but it was all there and lthy enough.

He now understood better one aspect of ne's personality. She liked to shock ple. She liked to do things other people e afraid to do. This need of hers to do the vy thing not only disturbed Leonard; it llenged him. Perhaps he needed more of perhaps it was a good thing. She was not id to plunge into marriage; was he?

Leonard was more restless by the minute. got out of bed. Would she go to Chicago? w would she get to the station in a rain this? If she did go to Chicago, she would broke and almost anything might happen ier.

And then he began to think that she might an business after all, and that he might er see her again. At the possibility, his oat began to feel ck. It was impose to sit still any ger. He picked up alarm clock. It s ten minutes to . He dressed hurlly, telling himself the time that he s a fool. He did bother with a ktie, had to rein himself from hing out of the r without his raint and rubbers.

He drove at high ed through the eets, his wheels aying water like a edboat. At the de his fever met the ely calm of the iting room: a man h a brief case, ding a newspaper; niddle-aged woman with a cardboard box her lap and two small children; a taxicab ver. No Anne.

There were fifteen minutes before the in was due. He got in his car and cruised Fourth Street, the logical route that ne would take. He turned and headed k toward the station.

Suddenly he applied his brakes, leaned ward. A girl was hurrying along the sidelk. She lugged a suitcase, was wearing a nsparent rain cape. He stopped, opened car door, called her name.

was Anne all right, but she paid no attion to him. He called again, sounded his rn. This time she hesitated, came over to car.

"I didn't know it was you," Anne murred. She got in the car, and Leonard put suitcase in the back seat. "My arm's out broke from that suitcase. I'm soaked."

e clutched her purse with her left hand. ren't you driving me to the station, ney?" Instead of starting the car, Leonard d moved over and was removing the water m her face with his handkerchief.

"No."

"Why not?"

"You're not going to Chicago, that's why. ere are some things we have to talk over."

"We did enough talking for one night. erything's settled and I'm going to icago."

He saw it would not be easy to dissuade r. "Darling, you said you loved me; you ked me to marry you—remember? I'm azy about you."

"Well?" She did hesitate for a moent, watching him, waiting for him to go on.

But it was a delicate and a difficult thing. Leonard wanted to ask her, and he hesitated too long. "It's no good," said Anne conclusively. "Now are you going to drive me to the station, or are you going to make me walk?"

"You're not going to the station."

"Oh, no?" They began to struggle.

There was a blast from the train's horn. It seemed but a moment before the train glided noiselessly into the depot. No sooner had it stopped than half a dozen men in overalls began tending the stainless-steel monster's wants so that it might go again. Several passengers climbed aboard.

"Let me go! Let me go!" Anne muttered desperately. She beat Leonard with her fists, tried to get at her suitcase. Leonard had to use all his strength to prevent Anne from escaping.

Suddenly a bell began to ring, steadily and rapidly. The train had begun to move, and soon the locomotive had disappeared and the passenger cars were rolling over the crossing tracks. Anne gave one last blow with both fists on Leonard's shoulders. Then she broke down.

Leonard had never before seen her cry. She leaned over, covered her face with her hands, and her shoulders shook. He did not touch her for a few moments, then he laid his hand on her back. He half expected her to pull away, but she did not. Encouraged, he told her he loved her in as many ways as he could think.

"It was a dirty trick," he admitted, "but I couldn't let you go."

Her crying was abating; presently she was still. "Yeah, it was a dirty trick. You sure deserved a bust in the nose."

It was bleeding a little, and she found his handkerchief on the seat, dabbed rather roughly at the blood. "Wait till I really get even!"

"I'm glad you're not mad at me."

"Not mad at you!" She said it with just enough force so her meaning was ambiguous. "I'll say I'm mad at you. I had a trip planned to Chicago so nice; now I spose I'll have to wait till the next train."

"Anne," said Leonard suddenly, very serious and nervous, "there's something I've got to know. Will you promise not to get mad at me?"

"I won't promise anything. Besides, I'm already mad at you."

"Anne, you aren't pregnant, are you?"

She pulled herself out of his arms. Then she looked at him curiously. "Why?"

"You didn't answer."

"I don't have to."

"Are you?"

"What difference does it make?"

"Difference!" he exclaimed angrily. "You didn't think I'd want to give my name to somebody else's kid, did you?"

"Who said anything about marrying?"

"You did. Answer me either yes or no!"

"What if I don't know?"

Now Leonard was angry at her. She had succeeded admirably in confusing him. He was divided approximately into thirds: in one third there was the suspicion that she was pregnant; in another third the belief that she was up to her old tricks again and stringing him; in another third there was simple anger at the willful way in which she had answered. For a considerable time they were silent, then Anne spoke.

"Darling, I guess I know how you feel and I don't blame you for being mad at me. But I know you're a big enough guy to drive to the station and buy me a pack of chewing gum. My mouth's dry. I want to fix up my face a little too. It's a mess."

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Modi Operandi

By Ethel Jacobson

A damsel once could Get Her Man
By making him feel protective;
By letting him hold
Her knitting wool,
Or leading him on
With a taffy pull;
What she does now
Is incredibull—
And often no more effective—
When you figure that all she stands to snag
Is the same old odd objective.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Popular-priced Hoover Model 28. Cleaning tools and Mothmizer in handy kit.

It's not to be had for the asking, it has to be earned — that Great Name on a product that stands up over the years. The Hoover Cleaner is preferred two-to-one over any other make. More than six million Hoovers have been sold. Yes—it bears the name plate you can be proudest of. And if you would look for one deep fundamental reason why, "It beats . . . as it sweeps . . . as it cleans," the unique triple-action cleaning principle made famous by Hoover.

The cleaner of cleaners . . .

Hoover

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

The Hoover Company . . . North Canton, Ohio . . . Hamilton, Ontario, Canada

Say Shefford
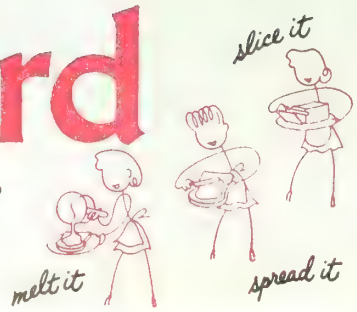
for fine cheese



Simple or Showy

Simple...

Eggs with Chevel Sauce

Blend 1 tablespoons flour, ½ teaspoon salt, 1 tablespoons melted Blue Bonnet Margarine or butter. Gradually add 1½ cups milk; cook, stirring constantly, until thickened. Add one 8-ounce package Shefford Chevel Brand Cheese Food, cubed; stir until Chevel melts. Add ½ teaspoon onion juice. Slice 6 hard-cooked eggs; alternate layers of egg slices and sauce in casserole. Top with crumbs; brown under broiler. Sprinkle with paprika; garnish with egg slices. Makes 4 servings.

Showy...

Shrimp Chevel Casserole

Cook ½ cup washed, drained rice in 2 tablespoons melted shortening until golden-brown. Then simmer in 1¼ cup water with ½ teaspoon salt until tender (20-25 minutes). Cook ½ pound well-rinsed fresh shrimp (shells and veins removed) in ½ cup salted water for 3 minutes. Drain and reserve liquid. Melt 1 tablespoon Blue Bonnet Margarine or butter in saucepan; blend in 1½ tablespoons flour. Add gradually ½ cup shrimp liquid, ½ cup cooked tomatoes, stirring constantly. When thickened, add 2 teaspoons grated onion, ½ cup grated carrots, ¼ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. Add shrimp; heat through. Put hot rice in casserole; cover with hot shrimp mixture; top with ½ package (4 ounces) Shefford Chevel, sliced; place under broiler until browned. Makes 4 servings.

"Chevel" is a trade mark owned by Standard Brands Incorporated

You can make Shefford Cheese a main flavor in a simple Lenten meal—or you can make it the gourmet accent in a showy Lenten dish. But either way, you can't miss the fine and pleasing flavor the genuine, natural flavor—that marks it as a sound, honest, quality cheese. Made from good milk, by experts who have been producing fine cheese for more than forty years. Many types and styles.

STANDARD BRANDS INCORPORATED
New York 22, N. Y.

In grouchy silence, Leonard started the car and drove to the depot. When they entered, Anne signified that she wanted to go to the rest room, while Leonard headed toward the soda fountain.

"Spearmint!" Anne called after him. "Wait for me."

He bought the gum, returned to a spot a few feet from the rest-room door and waited. It was taking her a long time. No Anne. He hesitated, self-conscious, then marched up to the girl at the soda fountain and had her go into the rest room to find Anne. She returned and said no one was in the rest room.

Leonard was not a person to swear much, but most of the names he called Anne on the way back to the car were unprintable. He looked in the back seat. Her suitcase was gone. He drove home.

By the time Leonard reached the house, he realized what Anne had meant when she had said she would get even with him, and he even grudgingly complimented her on the neat way she had handled it. Leonard walked through the darkened hallway, climbed the steps to his room, closed the door with utmost care because he wished to awaken no one. He snapped on the light.

Anne, in her slip and with her shoes and stockings off, was lying in his bed. She had her eyes closed. Her breasts swelled a little above the top of her slip, and her legs were bare for a few inches above her knees. There was a kind of graceful, spiral twist to her position. She lay there as if she owned the bed.

Leonard leaned over her. "Darn you," he said.

Anne snickered, opened her eyes.

"How did you get here?"

"Cab."

"What do you think you're doing?"

"I'm having a baby."

There was still a little anger left in Leonard toward her, still a little suspicion. Anne saw it in his face.

"Oh, you fool!" she exclaimed, raising herself on her arm. "I'm not pregnant."

He laughed a little sheepishly. Then suddenly everything cleared for both of them. They were even. The strain was released from Leonard. He sat down on the bed and embraced her, kissed her on the face, neck and shoulders. Anne watched him tenderly, but a little amused. He slipped the straps of her underthings off her shoulder, but when his hand moved along her thigh, pulling up her slip, she pushed his hand back and hitched the straps over her shoulder again.

"I want you to marry me," he said, looking up. "Will you?"

"Sure," she said.

Two hours later, in the town of Medalia, in a room in the Livingstone Hotel, Leonard lay on the bed and waited for his wife. The sky was already quite pale, and from the partly opened window could be heard the clatter of breakfast dishes in the restaurant kitchen.

THEY had taken the room only a few minutes before. A lamp on the writing stand was burning, and in its shadows Anne's figure, her breasts expanding and overflowing her brassière, had appeared deep and rich. But before divesting herself of her panties and brassière, she had grabbed her house coat and trotted to the bathroom. Now Leonard was waiting for her and smoking a cigarette so he would not appear nervous.

There was a sharp knock on the door, and he was startled. "Who is it?" he called.

There was a long hesitation. Then came a small voice, very meek, "It's Preggie."

Anne stepped from the bathroom in her house robe. Only something was wrong. She hadn't been shaped like that before. Her abdomen was unmistakably distended. Leonard sat up in surprise.

Anne lowered her head and assumed bashfulness as she approached. He saw the point, but there was something terribly vivid about her enormous belly that prevented his speaking. Anne held her face straight for yet another moment, then tossed aside her house robe. The Livingstone Hotel bath towels were well represented beneath the waist elastic of her panties.

They fell over in each other's arms, laughing. He gave her a swat, and she threw the towels in his face, and thus began their married life.

ONE morning about a month later Anne awoke at the seven-thirty blast of the Midwest Cereal Company's whistle. Normally she would have slept right through this disturbance, but this was an important day for Anne. It was her eighteenth birthday.

She had a number of times reminded Leonard of her approaching birthday, and half expected to find a present on the foot of the bed. But all that lay on the bed were Leonard's pajamas.

He was in front of the mirror, adjusting his tie. He noticed that Anne was awake. "Hey," he said, "you sick?"

He bent down to kiss her good-by. Anne took hold of his nose, turned his head around, and with her thumb removed a bit of shaving lather from behind his ear. Leonard hurriedly put on his suit coat and topcoat and left the apartment.

He had not mentioned her birthday. Anne was still not alarmed. Surely that noon he would bring her present. She got dressed. She felt like doing something. Humming, she moved about the apartment, doing unusual things—dusting, emptying ash trays, and feeling more virtuous by the minute. She decided she loved the apartment. It had three rooms, and it was a simple matter to keep three rooms in order.

Anne ran out of things to do, and it was still early. Then it occurred to her that Leonard might appreciate a more elaborate lunch than she ordinarily prepared.

A physician had as a patient a robust woman who was never without a long list of ailments. As she was telling him how she was suffering from rheumatism, sore throat, nervous indigestion, heartburn, pains in the back of the head, and what not, he interrupted her. "Ah," he said in an admiring tone, "what splendid health you must have in order to be able to stand all these complaints."

—From Those Nerves, by George Lincoln Walton. (J. B. Lippincott Company.)

The apartment was only a three-block walk to the Simpson Bakery. It was now operated by Chuck, his father having opened his new bakery on the North Side. Chuck and Marilyn had married a few days after Anne. Anne bought an apple pie, some frosted cinnamon rolls, apple turnovers and raised doughnuts. On the way back she stopped at the supermarket, wondering what she might get to complete the meal. She was uninspired until she saw a pound casing of sausage. Leonard liked sausage. She bought three pounds on the theory that three pounds would provide him thrice the enjoyment of one.

Lunch was ready for Leonard, and Anne was waiting by the window. It was ten minutes after twelve before Leonard arrived. Anne, holding her breath, watched him get out of the car. She looked for a gift-wrapped package, but he was empty-handed.

"Hi, slug!" Leonard called as he came in.

"You're late," said Anne, looking for bulges at his pockets.

Leonard took off his coat, and then Anne was certain that he had nothing for her. They ate lunch, and Anne said nothing, while Leonard was more cheerful than usual. "Swell lunch," Leonard concluded.

Anne scarcely permitted him to kiss her before he left, but it did not seem to spoil his good humor.

"So long, slug!" he called cheerily.

She had never before counted heavily on getting much for her birthday. Mary had always given her something, Erma had always sent her a card, and her father and mother had always gone together and bought her something that she needed.

Anne's marriage had not produced the sensation that she had expected. There had been some excitement among her family—Mrs. Karlan had threatened to get the marriage annulled—but the world outside

Wonderfully warm and tempting
HOT MUFFINS made with DUFF'S

PLAIN or FANCY they're sure to please the family

Delicious...
whether you serve them plain... or add the fancy touch of chopped pecans, walnuts, raisins or crushed fruit to the batter. Easy to make—any time with Duff's Mix

Just add WATER
A PRODUCT OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS

Menfolk smile all over when you serve up a dish that's fragrant with the flavor of Derby Steak Sauce. This racy blend of rare imported spices is an inspiration in cooking... irresistible at mealtime. Send for Free Recipe Book.

GLASER
Derby
Steak Sauce

● Steak Sauce... Barbecue Sauce... Hot Sauce
Worcestershire Sauce... Chop Suey Sauce
GLASER, CRANDELL (...) Chicago 6, Dept. B-3

FIRST AID FOR CLEVER COOKS

...ceived to record marriages, nothing at all unique.

Jane Whipple and Lorraine Taylor called on her that afternoon. It was on their way to the apartment Jane whispered as though out of breath, "Hey, kid, you sure got a neat dump!"

"It'll do to start out with," said Anne.

"Do! My cow, kid, you're lucky."

"Anne, it seems funny, you being married," said Dolores. "What's taking care of a guy like, anyhow? I should think it'd be awful, with the washing and mending socks ——"

"Oh, we send the laundry out," said Anne quickly. She did not mention that Leonard had suggested she try using the washing machine in the apartment basement. "I don't darn his socks until I'm good and ready. Just buy him more at the dime store. C'mere." She led them into the bedroom and took a large brown paper sack from the closet floor. It was filled with washed but undarned socks. She dumped them on the bed.

"There must be a thousand," exclaimed Dolores.

"And you're going to mend them?" asked Jane.

Anne shook her head solemnly. "Not until I'm good and ready. Just buy him more at the dime store." She opened a drawer of the chest. "He keeps it this way himself. Look!"

They peered in. Leonard's shorts, jerseys, pajamas, shirts—all perfectly folded—were arranged in mathematically spaced piles.

Dolores' jaw again dropped. "Say," she said, "Leonard must be a nice guy. I never exactly met him formally, you know."

ANNE brought out Leonard's accounting texts and practice sets he had used at business school. She leafed through them rapidly, displaying their magnitude to the girls.

"I'd hate to work for a living," Jane observed.

"You either have to," Anne said wisely, "or get some guy to do it for you."

For three minutes Anne had been vaguely aware of a feeble tapping noise from the direction of the hall door. She now decided it was time to investigate. Claribel walked in.

"She's my cousin," said Anne. "What do you want, honey?"

"I wanta see what you got!"

"It looks like she's the one who's got something," said Jane. "They look like presents. What have you got, darling?"

Claribel would neither tell Jane nor give her the presents, but she did give them to Anne. "Mamma said she thinks these are nicer than a card," Claribel informed Anne.

"Jerusalem!" exclaimed Jane, pensive. "It's Anne's birthday!"

"Are you nineteen?" asked Dolores. "Why, I thought ——"

Claribel startled everyone. "She's eighteen!" she shrieked.

"She's eighteen today," confirmed Jane. "I remember now. Let's see what she brought you."

Anne, hiding her reluctance, opened the presents. There were two square pot lifters from Erma, decorated with hand-embroidered pansies, and a small cotton handkerchief from Maymie. Claribel's present was wrapped separately. It was made of clay, painted blue, and about the size of a billiard ball.

"Did you make it?" asked Anne.

Claribel nodded.

"I guess it's meant to be a paperweight," said Anne. "What is it, Claribel?"

Claribel pulled her thumb from her mouth, but her lips remained open. She repeated, "I wanta see what you got."

"She wants to see your other presents," said Jane.

"I wanta see the thing you got from your mister," said Claribel.

"Say, what did Leonard get you, anyhow?" asked Dolores.

"Oh," said Anne, forcing a lightness into her voice, "Leonard hasn't brought it home yet. He has it at the office. A purse or a coat, I guess."

"Didn't he give you nuthin'?" insisted Claribel.

(Continued on Page 149)

Sunshine
PIMIENTO RED
The Signal to Eat Hearty!
Nothing sparks the appetite as quickly and surely as a touch of red! When it's Sunshine-Pimiento Red, you get extra flavor and vitamins, too. And you can use Sunshine Pimientos in so many, many ways. There's scarcely a vegetable, salad, seafood or meat dish that doesn't gain immensely by adding rich, red Sunshine Pimientos. Get a jar or can today and get the pimiento-habit!
Corn O'Brien
2 cups of whole grain corn
2 tablespoons butter
1/2 cup minced Sunshine Pimientos
1/2 cup minced green pepper
Salt and pepper to taste
Melt butter in a saucepan, add the green pepper and cook 5 min. Drain corn, add corn, pimiento, seasonings and cook 10 min. more, stirring. Serve hot. Serves 4.
Shrimp Rarebit
1-1/2 cups cooked shrimps
2/3 cup Sunshine Pimientos, cut into strips
2 teaspoons onion juice
2 tablespoons butter
1 green pepper, cut into strips
1 lb cheese
1 1/2 cup milk
Melt butter, add green pepper, cook 5 min. Then add shrimps, pimiento, onion juice. Slowly heat cheese and milk in double boiler, stirring until cheese is all melted; salt and pepper to taste, add dash Worcestershire. Serve the shrimps in individual dishes, with a generous amount of the hot sauce on each portion.
Pimiento helps all salads, either chopped or in strips. Good with salad dressings, too.
Do your vegetables go begging? Color them up with a tablespoon of chopped pimiento.
Unused Sunshine Pimientos keep sweet and fresh if covered with vegetable or olive oil and stored in refrigerator.
Use a cookie cutter to shape pimientos into rounds, stars, triangles, to decorate hors d'oeuvres, and other foods.
Left-overs taste like Sunday dinner when they're creamed or scalloped. Be generous with chopped Sunshine Pimiento.
Sunshine
Brand
WHOLE RED PIMIENTOS
POMONA PRODUCTS CO.
Griffin, Ga.

Stew for Sunday dinner? Why not?

It's a treat for anybody — any day — with the flavor of Del Monte Brand Peas!

1-We put extra care here

Extra care where? In such extreme precautions as the way we "vaccinate" Del Monte pea seed against the weather!

Too much rain can wash plant food out of the soil so that the peas don't develop their full flavor. We can't stop the rain — but we can and do inoculate all our pea seed to provide the tiny nitrogen-fixers which will keep the peas strong and healthy in spite of any downpour.

Providing for emergencies like this is an everyday matter at every step of growing and packing Del Monte Peas. We take no chances when flavor is at stake.

Because flavor is our responsibility — to you and to our brand. We know every bit of extra care we take means greater enjoyment for you!

2-You get extra flavor here

Any "plain" dish comes into its own with the Sunday-best flavor of Del Monte Early Garden Peas! First, Del Monte takes out the peas too young for flavor, the peas so old they've passed flavor prime. Then packs the best of all the rest together — the sweeter flavor of the smaller peas blending with the richer flavor of the larger. Insist on them for this

LAMB SAVORY

- 3 lbs. lamb stew meat
- 1 qt. hot water
- ¼ tsp. pepper
- 3 tsps. salt
- 1 cup sliced onion
- 1 cup sliced celery
- ⅓ cup uncooked rice
- 1 cup Del Monte Tomatoes
- ¾ cup chopped green pepper
- 1 cup Del Monte Diced Carrots
- 2 No. 2 cans Del Monte Early Garden Peas
- ⅓ cup flour
- Biscuit dough (based on 2 cups flour)

Brown meat in 4-qt. kettle; add hot water, pepper and 1 tsp. of the salt. Simmer 1½ hrs. Add onion, celery, rice, tomatoes; simmer ½ hr. Drain liquid from 1 can of peas, mix with flour and 2 tsps. salt. Add to stew with green pepper, carrots and ½ cup of peas. Stir till thickened; then cook slowly for 5 min. Serve over hot biscuits (baked in figure 8 scroll pattern as shown, if desired) surrounded by the rest of the peas, heated and seasoned. Serves 6.

OPEN A CAN SEE AND TASTE
THE DIFFERENCE
YOURSELF

Extra flavor? Sure—Del Monte always puts flavor first

Del Monte Early Garden PEAS

TRADE MARK

(Continued from Page 147)

Oh, shut up, Clarie," said Anne, check-n impulse to slap her cousin. "Of course
d. It's at the office. You run home now thank Aunt Erma and Maymie for their nts." Anne worked an unwilling Claribel e door.
think we ought to paddle Anne," said

t no attempt was made to paddle Anne.
did not enjoy the rest of the visit, for she thinking of her birthday, and she sus-ed that both Jane and Dolores were king of her birthday. She was glad to hem leave.
ven if Leonard did have a present for her,
e was going to tell him how humiliated had been. Further than that, she was g to have a present, whether Leonard anything to do with it or not. She was g downtown, charge the purse and gloves, aps even the fall coat.
e had resolutely marched two blocks
n Sixth Street when something made her ate. At first she did not know what it then she remembered a large Tronheim ery van that had passed her. She ed out to the curbing and looked up the
t. Sure enough, the delivery van was ed in front of the apartment. She ed around, walked back toward the tment, slowly at first, then faster when aw the delivery van drive away.
he apartment was on the third floor, and e was breathing heavily when she reached anding. A package
d by the door. It a large package in n wrapping paper,
st waist-high, and
e knew before she hed it that it was oor-model radio.
dived frantically
ugh her purse for key, opened the
, placed her arms
nd the radio and
ed and twisted it
ss the floor to the lle of the living-n rug. She stripped he wrapping paper.
Jeez!" she exclaimed.
the center, protected by a convex glass,
a black dial the size of a dinner plate.
each side of the dial were arrays of push ons, some for tuning, some for tone con-and some the purpose of which Anne not know. She looked in the back of the
o. The electric cord was looped and held a rubber band; Anne, impatient, broke band. She plugged in the radio.
ll at once the front of the radio dropped ard. Anne thought she had broken the
o. She pushed on the front, looked inside, as not only a radio, but a phonograph.
imine!" Anne exclaimed. She ran to telephone and called Leonard.

ou can't imagine how humiliated I
," said Anne happily when Leonard reed home that evening. "I'm going to e those kids over, just to show them how h you didn't forget me."
he following morning at eleven o'clock was on the telephone, calling her friends.
Come on over tonight," she said to Jane.
e're having a brawl. Bring Bill."
Oh, heck, Bill said an old friend of his
in town and he couldn't see me tonight.
Come over anyhow. It's just a brawl –
g anyone, or just bring yourself.
nne invited Marilyn and Chuck. Dolores Gene, Beverly. Dolores had a date with oung man named Rudy, unbeknown to e, but it was hoped that Rudy would ingly give up Dolores at the hour of ten take over Jane, for Gene was supposed come straight to the apartment upon fin-ng work at ten.
nne was certain of enough to make a ng" and she enthusiastically unfolded plans to Leonard.
"What are you going to serve?" he asked.
"Serve?" Anne looked at him blankly.
's just a brawl. We'll hang around here for while and dance, and I suppose Gene and Dolores will want to neck – they always do – end up at some joint. The chief thing is, I want them to get a load of my phonograph.

Jane was first to arrive, and then Marilyn and Chuck. Marilyn said that the radio-phonograph was marvelous. Jane, also, was impressed.

They stacked records on the record changer, and Marilyn danced with Chuck and Anne with Leonard. For a full hour no one else came. Leonard and Chuck finally prevailed on the girls to turn off the phonograph and turn on the radio. Both young men were followers of Doctor Stanley's Question Box and were listening to this program when Beverly rapped. Anne opened the door.

ANNE saw that Beverly, as usual, was making her appearance with someone who might do her credit. He was Nick Reed, a slender and tall young man who had achieved some fame as a tennis player and hurdler. He nodded and shook hands when introduced, but did not have much to say.

"What an exquisite radio!" exclaimed Beverly.

"Isn't it scrumptious!" Jane breathed. "But wait'll you hear the phonograph part of it. Anne got it for her birthday."

Leonard and Chuck sacrificed the remainder of Doctor Stanley's Question Box and they once more loaded the phonograph.

There were scuffing and thumping steps outside, and Rudy and Dolores walked in. Rudy was thickset, and although in his early twenties, his thinning hair made him look older. He wore an overcoat but no hat, and his shirt was open at the neck. A cigar was in his mouth and he did not remove it when he came into the room. Anne was about to introduce him to the rest when he noticed Nick.

"Well!" Rudy roared around his cigar. "Nick! What you doing here?"

This was the signal for Nick to become boisterous. His voice was almost as large as Rudy's: "Well, Rudy, I thought some fellow had put you away for good."

With Rudy's arrival, the party began to get loud and strenuous. A pint flask of whisky appeared, and presently a fifth of whisky that seemed to belong to Nick for longer intervals than to anyone else. He lost his aloofness and was revealed as only slightly more grammatical and slightly less profane and slightly less loud than Rudy.

Rudy danced with all the girls. When dancing with Anne, she said, "Can't you take that cigar out of your mouth? You'll singe my hair."

Rudy took two puffs, then removed the cigar. "Smoke twenty of them a day. Habit. Say, I feel like I've met you somewhere before."

"You want me to tell you to feel again to make sure, don'tcha?"

Apparently, though, Rudy had not heard this joke before. He laughed. "Say, that guy over there your husband?" He indicated Leonard.

"Yes. You shoulda let me introduce you around."

"Rather meet people natural.

Jane was talking with Nick. Nick suddenly pointed his finger straight at Anne, roared, "Hey, Rudy, it's her birthday! Let's paddle her!"

Anne began to retreat, but two strong hands grasped her shoulders from behind. It was Chuck.

"Look out!" Anne shrieked. "I can kick."

Jane threw her arms around her and Marilyn helped drag her to the sofa. At least four of those present pushed her down on the cushions, and Anne squirmed to keep her posterior out of reach. Her dress worked up well above her knees.

> Happiness and joy in each brother's company, an anxiety for self-development to be more worthy of the partner, a consciousness of an intellectual, moral and emotional advancement as a result of being together, a longing for each other when separated, a tolerance of each other's foibles, and a willingness to make concessions – these are the experiences had by a courting couple, then they can be fairly certain that between them true love exists.
>
> —REV. J. J. O'CONNOR, S. J.

"They'll smack their lips over this better tasting Lenten Dinner"

says Aunt Jenny

Foods fried the Spry way are so digestible, too!

CAN you make a [illegible] like [illegible]? Then you're a good cook—'specially when you're fixing something homey like fried foods.

"To be sure they're topnotch, fry 'em in pure all-vegetable Spry. Land sakes, it brings out all the natural fat-sea goodness. And even the children can eat their fill—foods fried the Spry way are so easy to digest. Just you try 'em and see!"

Fried Fish Fillets

2 pounds fish [illegible] (haddock, cod, whitefish, mackerel, whiting or herring) [illegible] Spry

Try any one of these four easy ways to prepare your fish for frying:

Method 1: Dip fillets in [illegible]. Methods 2 & 3: Dip fillets in salted evaporated milk, then in crumbs (or into mixture of half crumbs, half corn meal). Method 4: Dip fillets in seasoned flour, then in beaten egg.

[illegible] heat until golden-brown on both sides. There's no unpleasant smoke or smell when you fry the Spry way. And what delicate, delicious flavor you get with pure, all-vegetable Spry! Garnish with lemon. Serves 6.

Skillet French Fries

[illegible] you the crisp, sunny goodness of deep-[illegible]

Cut 6 raw, pared potatoes into ½-inch cubes. Melt ⅓ cup Spry in heavy skillet over full heat. Add potatoes. Fry quickly, turning often with wide spatula until crisp and golden brown, about 20 minutes. Sprinkle with 1½ teaspoons salt and serve immediately. Serves 4. Potatoes fry so crisp and tender—so good tasting in pure, bland Spry.

Lighter, More Delicious Cakes

Have you discovered how easy it is to make superb cake with Spry and its One-Bowl Cake Method? Spry gives you a magic cake-making secret you don't get in any other type of shortening. Pastry success is child's play with Spry to help. Rely on Spry for ALL your baking and frying.

Spry is a Product of Lever Brothers Company

Aunt Jenny says

"BELIEVE ME, YOU'LL BE A Better Cook WITH Spry"

How to keep Sunday's Veal Roast fresh for Tuesday

It's a slick trick to make my finicky Bob love leftovers. I learned by taking out flavor-insurance with waxed-through Cut-Rite! My leftover roast, those extra carrots and onions, are just as flavorful as first-serving . . . if they're wrapped in extra-heavy Cut-Rite.

Air's the culprit, so keep out air! Don't let it rob cooked meat of moistness and flavor! Quick as you whip dishes off the table, wrap up good leftovers in flavor-protecting Cut-Rite!

Now I'm cooking with Cut-Rite and listening to those masculine praises! So easy to wrap one thickness of Cut-Rite around precious leftovers and keep their fresh, yummy flavor. Try my favorite recipe at the right for leftover veal. It's scrumptious!

VEAL GOURMET

Flavor-Saved by Cut-Rite

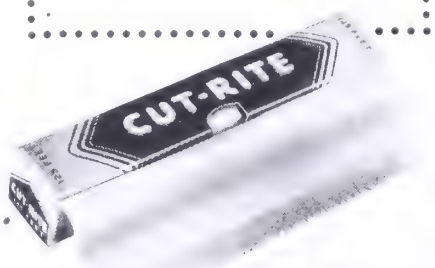
Cut 3 small acorn squash in half, remove seeds. Bake at 425° until center is soft (about 40 minutes). Fill with creamed veal, sprinkle top with grated cheese mixed with bread crumbs, return to oven, bake until top is brown.

Creamed Veal

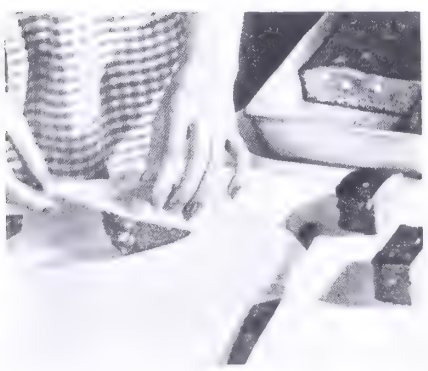
2 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. flour
1 cup milk
½ tsp. salt
2 cups leftover veal cut in small pieces

Melt butter, add flour and combine. Add milk and salt. Cook, stirring constantly until thick. Add veal, and 2 or 3 drops lemon juice.

THE BOX WITH THE FAMOUS CUTTING EDGE . . .



"Cut-Rite" Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.



Wrap sticky cookies, pieces of fudge in one thickness of Cut-Rite to help keep them fresh as the moment you take them from the pan!

Save dishwashing. Grate cheese or onion on extra-heavy, waxed-through Cut-Rite. Tears evenly, easily. A Scott Paper Product.

Several swats were delivered. Anne kicked and twisted, and the target was difficult to reach.

Leonard was talking with Beverly. He did not hear a rap at the door, but Beverly did.

"It must be Gene," she said.

Leonard opened the door. It was not Gene, but Bill Denny and Marjorie Purdy.

"Well, hello!" Leonard exclaimed, completely surprised. He asked them in, although he was uncomfortably conscious of the row in the neighborhood of the sofa. "A birthday paddling," he apologized.

Rudy delivered a terrific swat. Anne screamed.

"Cut it out!" ordered Leonard. It was obvious that things were getting out of hand.

Anne sat up. She said to Rudy, "Why don't you use a horsewhip?" She rubbed her seat.

"Hello, people," said Bill. "I'd have barged in sooner and helped you out, but I left my billy club in my other pants."

"Hello," said Jane coldly.

Bill placed his hand on Jane's head, but she pulled away. "Cut it out!" she protested.

"Who you with?" asked Anne.

"You know who it is. Margie. Now I would suggest that you go over there and strike up a beautiful friendship; she's been wanting to meet you."

"I'll bet she's been getting a swell impression. She can come over here if she wants to meet me."

But Leonard also wanted her to meet Marjorie, and Anne arose reluctantly. Leonard introduced them.

"Hi," said Anne.

"Hello, my dear," said Marjorie.

Anne found that Marjorie did not at all resemble the snapshot Leonard had carried. Instead of the straight lip, here was a graceful little chiseling painted bright red. Her nose and chin were curved sharply and neatly. Her jet-black hair was set off by a small yellow ribbon, and Anne wished that she had remembered to put something in her own hair. Marjorie's ankles were slender and her bosom lifted her blouse nicely.

Stuart Cloete, who has made South Africa an interesting and fascinating country, tells a story which deals with an early courting custom there that ranks with our own custom of bundling in colonial days. When the Dutch settled in South Africa, suitors could visit with their girls for only as long as one candle burned. A fellow knew just where he stood: if the girl lit a long candle he was in solid; a short candle meant the sooner he left the better.

Anne noticed Jane and Bill arguing. "Bill seems to be having a helluva time with Jane," said Anne to Marjorie. "I guess you made her jealous."

Marjorie laughed. "Bill and I are just old friends—he used to chase me home from school when I was in fourth grade and he was in sixth. That's a lovely phonograph Lennie bought you, Anne, even if your crowd likes it rather loud. How are you two making out?"

"O.K. You still going with Adrian What's-his-name?"

"Oh dear, yes. You have a nice ——" Marjorie began, but Anne interrupted Marjorie by leaping to her feet.

Jane, her face white, her eyes red, was running across the room. Anne, on Jane's heels, entered the bathroom, shut the door. Anne helped support Jane while she vomited, and then they sat on the edge of the bathtub.

"Feel better?" asked Anne.

"I guess. Whew! I wanna go home. I ain't waiting for Gene or anyone else."

"I'll get Bill to take you. You two can make up in the car—just see if you don't." It was settled as far as Anne was concerned. She explained to Bill.

"I'll tell Margie," he said.

"No, I'll tell her. Jane's pretty sick, and you better get going."

Anne returned to Marjorie, who noticed Bill and Jane going out the door.

"Where's Bill going?" asked Marjorie.

"Oh, Jane was sick and I had him take her home," said Anne.

Marilyn came over. "Anne," she said softly, giving a meaningful nod toward Dolores and Rudy, "when Gene gets here, there's going to be an awful lot of trouble."

Dolores and Rudy were in the big chair, firmly in each other's arms.

"Dolores is hopeless," said Anne. "We better get them out of here."

"Speaking of leaving," said Beverly, "I'd give a great deal to be rid of this inebriate." Nick was sprawled over two chairs. "He can never drive," said Beverly. "I'm afraid I'll have to ask some gallant gentleman to help me out."

"I'll drive," said Chuck.

Dolores and Rudy stirred.

"Hey, you two," said Chuck. "We're leaving."

"S'long," Dolores murmured.

"You're coming with us," said Leonard. "Come on, Rudy. Give me your car key."

Rudy was on his feet. Dolores stood unsteadily. "No guy's goin' to drive for me!" Rudy announced loudly.

"I guess you can drive, all right," exclaimed Chuck. "We have to get Nick home."

Rudy and Dolores lurched to the door.

Nick was still occupying two chairs. Chuck got under one arm and Leonard the other, and they half walked, half dragged him to the back door.

In the car, Anne seated herself between Leonard and Marjorie, while the rest of the crowd got in Nick's car.

They drove past the long blocks. Anne fished a cigarette from Leonard's pocket, lit it. No one spoke until they reached Marjorie's aunt's house.

"I guess you'll have to wake your aunt," Leonard apologized. The house was dark.

"That's all right, Lennie," said Marjorie. "As long as I'll probably have to get her up anyway, I wonder if you'd mind driving me to the drugstore. My head aches—I'd like some aspirin."

As soon as Leonard had got out of the car at the drugstore, Anne said to Marjorie, "Your head don't ache."

"It does. I've had a long train ride, and, frankly, your friends are a little noisy for me."

"They suit me."

"Perhaps they do. But, my dear, here's a word of advice: Lennie isn't going to ——"

"His name's Leonard!"

"All right, then. Leonard isn't going to stand for your type of friends indefinitely. He doesn't want just a giddy high-school kid whom he's afraid to introduce ——"

"In other words," Anne snapped, "he should have married you instead of me."

"Not at all. Lennie and I are just very good friends. I merely was trying to say that if things between you two continue in anything like the fashion I've witnessed tonight, you're going to find yourself without a husband. Your marriage won't last a year."

"Now let me give you some friendly advice! If you go sticking your big nose in our affairs again ——"

At this moment Leonard returned to the car and Anne's "advice" was cut short. However, on the way back to Marjorie's aunt's, Anne contrived to make both Marjorie and Leonard uncomfortable.

"Darling," she cooed, "I don't think Margie got a very nice impression of my friends. Darling, don't you think it would be nice to have Margie and A-dri-an down for Sunday dinner sometime? I want her to see how cozy we really can be, and I could bake a cake and afterward we could go to a dance—that is, if she and A-dri-an dance—do you, dear?—or perhaps it would be nicer if we had a little party, only this time a nice party."

After they left Marjorie, not a word was spoken between Anne and Leonard until they were undressing for bed. Then Leonard said, "I didn't like the way you acted."

"Shut up!" said Anne crossly.

(Continued on Page 152)

Read what you get in 2 Glasses of

OVALTINE

more VITAMIN A than 2 servings of Peas

more VITAMIN B1 than 3 servings of Oatmeal

more VITAMIN C than 4 ounces of Tomato Juice

more VITAMIN D than 10 ounces of Butter

more VITAMIN G than 1 pound of Sirloin Steak

more CALCIUM and PHOSPHORUS than 2½ servings of American Cheese more IRON than 3 servings of Spinach more PROTEIN than 3 Eggs more FOOD-ENERGY than 2 servings of Ice Cream

more NIACIN than 6 slices of Enriched Bread

It's the Newer Way for Better Results

Get ALL your Vitamins in Food

As you know, authorities agree that most people should get extra vitamins as a safeguard to good health. And authorities also agree, beyond question, that the best way to get vitamins would be in your everyday food. But that's hard to do:—

Because everyday foods vary considerably from day to day in vitamin and mineral values. And, besides, they lose a lot of their vitamins in shipping, storing and cooking.

That's why so many people are supplementing their meals with Ovaltine. Ovaltine is standardized. Its content is scientifically controlled. It never varies. Each spoonful supplies the same generous amounts of vitamins and minerals. You know exactly what you're getting. It's a supplementary food that makes up deficiencies in ordinary foods.

So you don't have to worry about variations or losses. You know that a serving of Ovaltine in a glass of average milk always gives you the same substantial quantities of Vitamins A, B_1, C, D, G and Niacin—and Calcium, Phosphorus and Iron. And you can be sure that 2 glasses of Ovaltine daily and just normal meals will give you all the vitamins and minerals any normal person can use. And when you drink Ovaltine you get these vitamins and minerals the preferred way—in food.

You'll find, too, that Ovaltine has a very agreeable taste—a taste that grows on you. So for better results, why don't you start drinking Ovaltine at meals, just as you would tea or coffee? Or, if you prefer, between meals or at bedtime. Then, if you're a normal person, you'll know, as far as you are concerned, you've solved the vitamin problem.

FAR MORE THAN VITAMINS... Ovaltine also contains virtually every other precious food element needed for buoyant health and vitality, including the elements that vitamins must have to function properly. That's why Ovaltine is so widely recognized as the ideal supplementary food-drink.

Yes, hands can scour a coal-black stove and still be milk white

If you think that daily hard housework must leave your hands all roughened up, red, and scratchy dry . . . you're wrong! You're right . . . if you use creamy-rich Pacquins to help combat that housework look. This snowy, fragrant cream helps keep hands looking delicately whiter, romantically softer and smoother.

Pacquins was first made for Doctors and Nurses

Yes, Pacquins was first made for doctors and nurses who scrub their hands thirty to forty times a day. They had to have something that would really work . . . really help keep hands softer, smoother. And Pacquins proved effective . . . as it will for you too!

Pacquins
HAND CREAM
Creamy-smooth, fragrant . . not sticky . . not greasy. More hands use Pacquins than any other hand cream in the world.
Pacquins
HAND CREAM

AT ANY DRUG, DEPARTMENT OR TEN-CENT STORE

(Continued from Page 150)

In the days immediately following, the party was scarcely mentioned. But the words and thoughts had not evaporated. Anne thought of Marjorie and Marjorie's advice, and was uncomfortable. That there had been anything wrong in the way she had acted at the party had not occurred to Anne at the time. Marjorie had returned to Wildfield, and there seemed a tacit agreement between Anne and Leonard that her name not be mentioned again.

Leonard had had no great illusions about Anne, and thus had not been forced to make a drastic downward revision of his concept of her since their marriage.

But his idea of Anne as a housewife did need modification, in some respects for the better, in some for the worse. He found her to have a good sense of money value with no unreasonable cupidity, although she did claim all loose coin lying on the vanity scarf as her own. On the other hand, she was a more lax housekeeper than he had anticipated, and his anticipations had not been high. She prepared only the simplest of meals, and then frequently only after she had lost an argument about eating out at a restaurant. She permitted the dirty dishes to stack in the sink. The furniture became disarranged and the apartment dirty until Leonard, his sense of order and cleanliness outraged, pitched into the housework.

She had ample energy; during one of her rare spells of tidiness she would work hard. What she did not know about housekeeping she was capable of learning readily enough, but she seemed to fight clear of the idea of housekeeping.

He got the idea that she should associate with someone better than Dolores, and began to tell her about Mrs. Irene Frame, wife of Dean Frame, the young advertising manager of the ice-cream company. Anne evinced no interest in Mrs. Frame, and as Leonard was not too sure that Irene would like Anne anyway, that campaign did not get very far.

Nevertheless, Leonard was not discouraged. He bought a pork roast, the first roast they had had since their marriage.

Anne looked at it dubiously. "What do you want me to do with it?"

"Why, roast it, of course. I've been hungry for roast pork for weeks."

Anne silently took the roast and placed it in the refrigerator. That afternoon Leonard optimistically thought of Anne preparing the meat for the oven. But when he returned home, he was not surprised to find Anne had done nothing with the roast.

The next day, at noon, Leonard was more emphatic. "See here," he said, "I want that roast for dinner tonight. If we keep it much longer, it will spoil."

"Oh, all right."

"There's nothing better than roast pork. Now you know how it's done—half an inch or an inch of water is enough, and keep it around three hundred and fifty degrees. I want that roast pretty darn bad. You will fix it, won't you?"

"Sure. But I'm not promising to eat any."

Leonard was blissfully confident that Anne would keep her word. He whistled as he drove home, and hoped that the roast was still in the oven so that he would be sure of having gravy. Anne probably would not think of making gravy. Leonard's appetite became yet more eager. He opened the apartment door, saw Anne in a chair, reading a movie magazine, but smelled nothing but a slight, stale tobacco odor.

"Where's the roast?" he demanded.

"I intended to fix it," said Anne, "but Dolores called."

"So what? Who is Dolores, anyhow? She's nothing but a cheap little piece of trash."

"My friends are none of your business."

"Yes, they are."

But no amount of argument would prepare the roast for the table that evening. The next day, fortunately for Leonard's appetite for roast pork, was Saturday. He prepared the roast himself, although he insisted that Anne watch.

"Allo-ette"
BRASSIERES BY Maiden Form
* Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

"Allo-Ette" superbly moulds and controls the average bosom and that "in-between" type, the just slightly larger-than-average bosom. Made with 2-inch diaphragm band for additional support and featured in 100% Pure Silk at $5.00, as well as in other fabrics, $1.75 up.

"There is a Maiden Form for Every Type of Figure!"

Send for free Style Folder: Maiden Form Brassiere Company, Inc., New York 16, N. Y.

Smart Women wear INVIZ-A-GRIPS

5 REASONS WHY
- Easy to fasten
- Eliminate garter bumps
- Keep hosiery seams straight
- Help prevent garter runs
- Keep hose from slipping

Replacement garters available at leading chain stores

INVIZ-A-GRIP
The Modern Garter on Finer Corsetry

O YOU SHRINK
FROM WASHING
SWEATERS?

Quick as a wink, I wash sweaters, sox, blankets and baby things . . leave them clean and fluffy as kittens! Colors remain bright; delicate fibres stay alive!" Endorsed by America's leading sweater manufacturers. A 25¢ box of WOOLFOAM washes 6 sweaters. Grocery, Drug or Department Stores.

Made for Wool by a Wool Firm

WOOLFOAM

WOOLFOAM CORP., NEW YORK 10, N.Y.

INVISIBLE MENDING
AS FAST AS YOUR MACHINE CAN SEW

ACME
Stitch Master
WITH THE MAGIC FINGER

MAKES YOUR SEWING MACHINE TWICE AS VALUABLE--SO SIMPLE A CHILD CAN USE IT!

Say goodbye to costly alterations . . . and get the nuisance of trying to keep blind stitches from showing. It's easy with Miracle STITCH MASTER, the amazing invention that doubles the value of your sewing machine . . . enabling it to do the entire sewing job—from blind collar seams to blind skirt hems as well as any other sewing job that calls for hidden or invisible stitching. Comes to you completely assembled . . . all ready to use! Eliminates hours of tedious handwork . . . Miracle STITCH MASTER gives you trim, tailored hems, professional-looking cuffs and edges in a matter of minutes. See it—try it — buy it — today. At your favorite department store .....

$6.95 EA.

Included . . .
"HOW TO SEW SO EASY"
48 pages of sewing short cuts.
If STITCH MASTER is not yet in your favorite department store, write to:

STITCH MASTER CO. Dept. L Bridgeport 1, Conn.

Leonard had various errands to perform that afternoon. He [illegible] to the apartment and looked in the oven. "You let the water boil away," he accused Anne. "Why didn't you look at it?"

"Ho-hum," said Anne.

After pouring more water in the roaster, Leonard burned his fingers while replacing the lid. "Damn it!" he exclaimed. "What do you have to be such a big baby for? Why can't you give me a little co-operation?"

"I did look at it," Anne declared. "It didn't need any water then."

Finally the roast was served. Anne tasted it.

"It tastes foul," she said.

"It tastes all right," Leonard maintained. "It would be perfect if you hadn't let it burn."

Leonard was surprised one day when Anne, quite without warning, said seriously, "You get awfully disgusted with me sometimes, don't you?"

"What do you mean?" he parried.

"I mean that you get to thinking you ought to have married a home girl."

"I wouldn't say that."

"Just the same, half the time you're wishing I was a better home girl."

Few words that Anne had spoken created a greater impression on Leonard than these. They meant that Anne had been thinking.

There was no overnight reformation, but there were favorable indications. For one thing, she finally got around to mending his socks. For another thing, Anne baked her first cake. This was for her mother, whose birthday ironically coincided with several days' illness. Leonard got to eat none of the cake, but was nevertheless pleased.

There are no small steps in great affairs.

—DE RETZ: Quoted in Human Nature. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

"It will make her even sicker if she eats it," said Anne. "I don't know what she'll think, but dad will be proud of me."

Leonard interpreted the cake to mean a new interest in family ties, in quieter, more substantial things. He had some news for her.

"By the way," he said, "Tate's putting in a new man up at Cabel City and he wants me to go up there next week and help him get started."

"How big's Cabel City?"

"About three thousand."

She immediately lost interest in Cabel City.

"Sunday we could drive over to Wildfield," Leonard suggested. "I want you to meet my dad."

"Oh, I don't want to poke away a week end in any hick town."

Several things occurred that week to put Anne in sullen humor.

She learned Tuesday that Vincent Lucas was appearing in person that evening in the city of Liverton. Liverton was only seventy miles distant, yet Anne's entreaties, which approached the point of tears, would not get Leonard to take her. Wednesday night she had wanted to see the motion picture, Enter, Mr. Cupid, but Leonard had insisted on postponing this movie in favor of littering the apartment with uninteresting accounting books he had brought home from the office.

So, on Friday, Anne was in sullen humor. She sat at the apartment window and glared at the fallen leaves on the parkings of Buchanan Avenue. Toward the middle of the afternoon, however, her spirits were lifted by a telephone call from Dolores Tyler. Dolores said she had a date with Luther Griswold for that evening "if Luther can get a guy to work in his place." Some time later Dolores called Anne again to inform her that Luther, after all, had to work. Whereupon the two girls agreed to walk to the GoodnKrisp together, and Anne left the apartment.

(Continued on Page 155)

SHORTBACK

Foot Savers

shoes with a dual personality

so feminine— Foot Savers have it—femininity-plus! Gentle, graceful lines that enhance your foot . . . your costume, too. In luxury leathers with deft dressmaker detailing or trim tailored touches for a truly feminine Spring.

so fitting— Foot Savers fit—perfectly—from heel to toe. Made over the exclusive Shortback* Last, they hug your heel firmly, yet free your toes amply. Fitting? Yes! Comfortable? Oh, so!

Write for name of nearest store. The Julian & Kokenge Company, 38 W. Main Street, Columbus 15, Ohio.

Only Foot Savers are made over the Shortback Last which prevents looseness and gapping at the heel without pinching at the toe.

FOOT SAVERS ARE A PRODUCT OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

"WE REDHEADED HINCKLEYS NEVER FIGHT (AT BREAKFAST)"

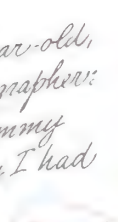
The Herbert Hinckleys of Hartsdale, New York

"Wow", said my enthusiastic Johnny at breakfast today, "I could eat Grape-Nuts Flakes forever." He's sold on that Sugarroasted flavor—and I'm sold on the wholesome nourishment in delicious whole-grain Grape-Nuts Flakes.

My husband, Herb, is all for Post-Tens. And no wonder! "Even redheads are peaceful," says he, "when they can each pick their own cereal." Today Herb chose Post's Bran Flakes—says it's a delicious way to get the bran that helps keep him feeling so fit.

Paul ate two boxes of Corn Toasties this morning—and asked for more! Certainly proves that new Post's Corn Toasties really are fresher, crisper and toastier than ever! And I know they're an important energy food!

Lovable Alice, my 6-year-old, told the POST-TENS photographer: "Yesterday I had yummy Grape-Nuts and today I had yummy Rice Toasties and tomorrow I haven't decided yet."



7 favorite Cereals to please any taste

Post-Tens

3 POST'S CORN TOASTIES, 2 GRAPE-NUTS FLAKES, 1 GRAPE-NUTS, 1 SHREDDED WHEAT, 1 RAISIN BRAN, 1 BRAN FLAKES, 1 RICE TOAS ES

(Continued from Page 154)

Although it was only ten minutes after when she returned, she found Leonard eady at home.

"We better hurry the dinner so we can get rted," he said.

"I'm not going," Anne declared.

Leonard began to swear. "Why aren't you ng?" he demanded.

"I just don't want to go. Besides, I prom-d Dolores I'd go to the Paramount with tonight."

"Do you mean to say that hanging around t trash is more important than going with to Wildfield?" Leonard was thoroughly ry, but there was no changing Anne's
d. He went to the bedroom, jerked open chest drawers. "Where's my shirts?" he uted. "Didn't they get back from the ndry?"

"They never got to the laundry. I forgot call them."

The bedroom was noisy with a number of rds Anne seldom heard from Leonard.
t finally his temper subsided.

"Well"—Leonard hesitated awkwardly—case you have to get in touch with me, can call long-distance. Just the Logan Cream Company in Cabel City. Dad esn't have a phone, but if I'm in Wildfield, can call the Purdys."

"I wouldn't be caught dead calling the rdys!" Anne exclaimed.

Leonard had his traveling bag in hand, his t on. "Well, good-by," he said, leaning r to kiss his wife.

Anne remained seated after Leonard left,
t leaned forward to peer out into the street.
e heard the familiar slamming of their car or, saw the lights switch on, heard the tor start.

She felt less and less like going to the show h Dolores. She felt as though she had n running a race with all her might, only discover, when she was exhausted, she d been running in the wrong direction.
The telephone rang and Anne answered. was Dolores. "Say, kid, it's all off. Luther pped in a few minutes ago. He got the guy work for him after all. I'm a million times ry, kid, but maybe ——"

"Oh, that's all right," said Anne. "I don't d much like going out."

Anne did maintain a proud if lonely in-pendence that evening and did not leave e apartment. The next afternoon she at-mpted, without success, to reach Jane and arilyn by telephone. She walked downwn and saw Enter, Mr. Cupid, alone. It s a poor show, and like most poor shows it t Anne with a feeling of emptiness, of istration. Anne returned home with the intention of [illegible]. She picked up a magazine and started a story, but by the time she was at the bottom of the first column she found her eyes skimming the print without leaving the slightest impression on her mind, and she threw the magazine down.

So there was nothing left to do but seek company. She decided that she could stand the apartment no longer, so she put on her coat and headed for Jane's. There was no light on in the front of the house; nor was there a light in the back. She rang the doorbell, but no one answered.

Once more Anne returned to the empty apartment. In the hallway she was greeted by one of her neighbors, a young man in topcoat hurrying toward the outside door. There was a slight questioning look on his face, and Anne could almost hear him say to himself, "Where is your husband?"

She switched on the center light. The apartment always looked brightly bald and uninviting under the center light, and Anne hastened to get out of her coat and turn the center light off and switch on a lamp. She had to make the apartment look as cozy as possible, as though there were nothing missing. It was strange, Anne considered, the difference that Leonard's absence made.

She went to the kitchen, made herself a bread, butter and brown sugar sandwich, and sat down at the dinette table. She heard the young man she had met in the hallway come back and enter his apartment. Liberty was a strange thing. She might that night have a lover, and Leonard would be none the wiser. She might invite this young man over to eat with her, or ask him in to fix the sink drain. She knew him to be a bachelor, so it would be simple to get him to come and simpler to get him to stay. Anne was not much tempted; it was just strange to think how very easy it would be to be unfaithful to her husband.

Anne wondered where Leonard was at that moment. He had probably finished his business in Cabel City and was in Wildfield. Would he walk across the street and see Marjorie? Anne suddenly had a disturbingly vivid picture of the Purdy living room with a realistic Marjorie and Leonard talking and laughing and a vague Mrs. Purdy in the background preparing refreshments.

Anne began to wonder why she had been so stubborn about not going. She wished now that she had gone.

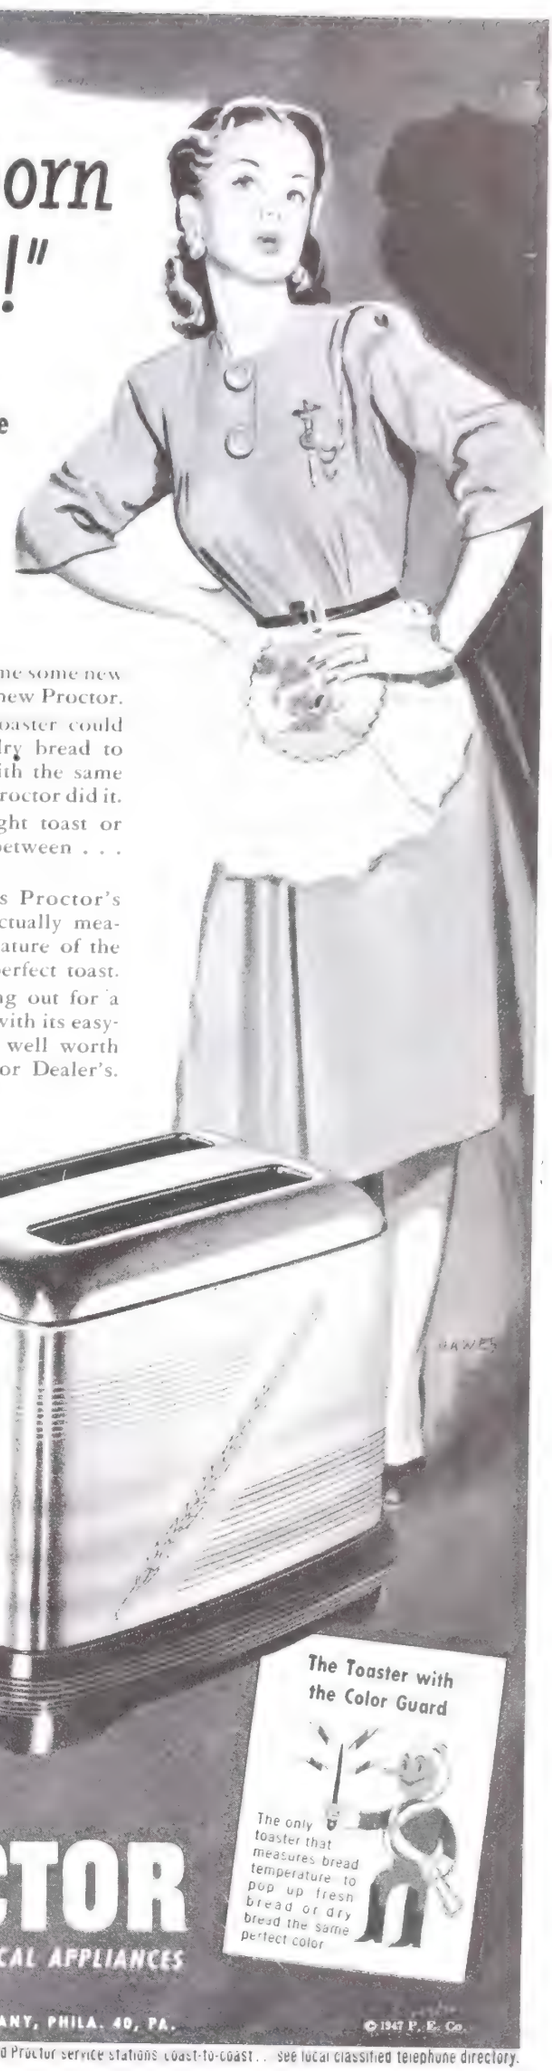
Next morning, when Anne was up and dressed, she found that the complexion of everything had changed from that of the evening before. For one thing, Leonard

(Continued on Page 157)

"I used to be the star, but now I'm only an extra."

"Stubborn me!"

"Holding out for the newest thing in toasters—the PROCTOR Color Guard"



Edith did it. She showed me some new toaster tricks...with her new Proctor.

I never thought any toaster could toast fresh bread and dry bread to the same even brown with the same knob setting—until her Proctor did it.

You can set it for light toast or dark, or anywhere in between . . . And that's what you get.

Unlike other toasters Proctor's amazing Color Guard actually measures the surface temperature of the bread itself to pop up perfect toast.

That's why I'm holding out for a smart gleaming Proctor with its easy-to-clean crumb-tray. It's well worth seeing . . . at your Proctor Dealer's.

The Toaster with the Color Guard

The only toaster that measures bread temperature to pop up fresh bread or dry bread the same perfect color

PROCTOR

AUTOMATIC ELECTRICAL APPLIANCES

PROCTOR ELECTRIC COMPANY, PHILA. 40, PA. ©1947 P. E. Co.

For efficient repairs 160 factory-supervised Proctor service stations coast-to-coast . . see local classified telephone directory.

JUST MEANT FOR LENT!

*Fish and Fixin's... 58¢ to 62¢ a portion

MENU
(Serves 4)

Broiled Fish Fillets†
Creamy Hashed Potatoes Broiled Tomatoes
Hot Cross Buns Spread
Avocado and Grapefruit Salad
Lemon Snow Pudding
Coffee Tea Milk

† BROILED FISH FILLETS

Place 1½ pounds fillets in greased shallow pan. Brush with melted margarine, butter or cooking oil. Season with salt, pepper and paprika. Place in heated broiler under moderate heat 10 to 20 minutes, depending upon thickness of fillets. Baste several times with melted fat or cooking oil.

Fish fillets for broiling: Haddock, Cod, Pollack, Yellow Pike.

Recipe cost estimated for price of Haddock.

Menu and recipe tested and priced by the A&P Test Kitchen

A&P TESTED

Picture this spread on your Lenten table! Flavorful broiled fish fillets with creamy hashed potatoes, succulent broiled tomatoes, and a zesty fresh fruit salad, served with tempting Hot Cross Buns. Complete the picture with lemon snow pudding, a beverage, and a smile of satisfaction . . . remembering it costs only 58¢ to 62¢ a serving.

It's a snap to make delectable dinners at prices that click with your budget . . . when you plan a little and shop regularly at your friendly A&P Super Market. You see, A&P buys dozens of fine foods direct from their source . . . has others made for its exclusive sale. This eliminates many unnecessary in-between expenses . . . and you share the savings! Come shop the A&P "Super" saving way today!

A&P SUPER MARKETS

FOR GOOD EATING AT SENSIBLE COST...
TURN TO A&P
A&P

Cost based on average prices in A&P Super Markets at time of going to press.*

(Continued from Page 155)

probably get home that night. Anne d as she went to the door to pick up nday Record. She scattered the paper floor, got down on her knees to read.
she had finished it was almost noon,
ıe decided to combine her breakfast
nner in one meal.

meal was even more sketchy than she usually prepared, but Anne de-that, with a cigarette for dessert, she be satisfied. But she could find no to light her cigarette.

search led her into the pockets of rd's suits. She did find a match book, so found a sales slip of the Penley Shop, dated ten days previously, for zen chrysanthemums.

ow who the hell were those for?" Anne ned.

y certainly had not been for her. Leonid given flowers to someone and had ld her about it. Of course, if he had them to Marjorie Purdy, he would not
r. Perhaps there was a great deal n between Leonard and Marjorie that did not know about. Perhaps the business about going to Wildfield was
.

v Anne did not actually believe all this.
he possibility occurred to her. Anne d somebody substantial to talk to. She ht of Mary.

isit to her family in the evening might erpreted as a loss of independence on s part, but a visit in the afternoon
l appear casual. Anne marched toward partment door, then
ed, scribbled a note:
e to folks. Be back
ec."

s. Karlan was visiting Bezdek, but the rest
family were at home.
found Mary in her
, dressing.

Hi," said Anne.
atcha doing?"

Why, hello, sis," said
. "I've got a date.
's on your mind?"

h, nothing much." Anne flopped on the "Leonard ain't in town. Had to go on business."

ary continued to powder her face.
ere'd he go?"

Cabel City. And then up to Wildfield to is dad."

Didn't he ask you along?"

Yes,"

ary turned around. "Well, you nut!
didn't you go?"

Oh, I dunno." Then she was truthful. "I s I was kinda mad at him."

ary remained partly turned in her chair ce Anne. "You should have gone," she sed her sister.

rs. Karlan returned, and she and Mr.
an asked Anne to stay for supper, but e refused. "Leonard's away, but he's home any minute."

THAT was a nice bouquet you and him
e me," said Mrs. Karlan. "I don't know
I come to be sick I never was sick be-
Are you sure you won't stay?"

o that was where the flowers had gone.
)," said Anne. "I gotta run straight ne."

e wondered whether [illegible] tell nard that she had found out about the ers. She felt ashamed. He had shown sideration for her family, but she had wn no desire whatsoever to visit his. As hurried home, she was not sure that she ed that he were there waiting for her it ld be better if he did not come until she the newspapers picked up, her clothes away, the bed made, the dishes washed.
ler note was still leaning against the lamp
e. For the first time since Leonard had , Anne was fully conscious of the messi-s of the apartment: the chairs were awry draped with her house coat, a slip and a r of hose; on top of the radio was a pile of gazines, and on top of the magazines were ottle of Passion Red nail polish and a tle of polish remover.

Anne furiously went to work [illegible] in order. She was hungry [illegible] would have to wait until the apartment was presentable. Then she fried two eggs and ate from scraps in the refrigerator.

In the cupboard, she discovered a bottle of stuffed olives. Few things, at the moment, could have given her a more pleasurable thrill. Leonard did not like olives. What could be more boyish than [illegible] wondered, excitedly prying at the lid of the bottle. There were a great many things about Leonard to recommend him, she thought as she contentedly munched olives.

SHE washed the dishes, and then she cleaned the apartment further. In putting away her clothing in the closet, Anne bumped against the large laundry bag. She became thoughtful. She opened the chest drawer in which Leonard kept his shirts, found only three shirts, and those with collars frayed.
Aside from laundering small items in the wash-bowl, Anne had never attempted the washing. After fifteen seconds' deliberation she clattered down the steps to the first floor, rapped on the landlady's door.

The washing machine, it developed, was claimed by other tenants on all days but Wednesday, Friday and Sunday. She might, however, do her washing that evening, provided she promised to get her clothes off the line early Monday morning. Anne agreed.

Now that Anne had made up her mind to do the washing, she found herself buoyantly self-confident, although she had but a rough idea about the procedure. She had soap and she borrowed bluing and clothespins from her landlady.

She dumped clothes into the washer, ran them through the wringer into the first tub, then into the second, then again through the wringer before hanging them on the line. The whole procedure operated beautifully. Anne, whistling, went about the business with an almost arrogant assurance. To all appearances, it might have been her hundredth washing rather than her first. Until she made an unpleasant discovery.

She held in her hand one of Leonard's white shirts that she had just lifted from the washer. Only now it was an uneven pink, not white. She dragged four other shirts from the wash water, and they, too, were of the same unlovely color.

Anne now remembered that she should have separated the clothes. She found the cause of the disgrace: a pair of red anklets that she had bought a number of days before.
She could find no remedy. She drained the washer, refilled it, washed the shirts again,
but the pink persisted.

"Oh, damn!" Anne muttered as she climbed the steps. Her eyes were moist and her throat thick. "He wanted me to do the washing. I hope he's satisfied."

She then had nothing to do but think of her failure and think of Leonard. As during the preceding evening, she felt restless, but she did not leave the apartment, because she was sure that Leonard was due any minute.
She played her phonograph and found some consolation in her blues records. As it became later she began to concede that Leonard might not get back that night at all. She wanted to call him. But not badly enough to call the Purdys.

Next morning she calculated that Leonard would spend the morning in Cabel City and not get home till five or six o'clock that evening.

Not without trepidation at again seeing the shirts she had spoiled, Anne went to the basement to take her washing off the line.
Anne crammed the clothes into two pillow-cases and lugged them to the kitchen. Although not extensive, her experience in ironing was enough so that this work proceeded without mishap.

Finally she had everything ironed but the pink shirts. She studied one of the shirts to see if it could be folded in any manner so that

> Marriage resembles a pair of shears, so joined that they cannot be separated; often moving in opposite directions, yet always punishing anyone who comes between them.
>
> SIDNEY SMITH. From Table Talk From Ben Johnson to Leigh Hunt: Everyman's Library (E. P. Dutton & Co.)

Jane Parker

Hot Cross Buns

Serve them for dessert, or serve them for breakfast . . . they're always in big demand throughout the Lenten season. For these delicious oven-gems are full of the tasty fruit tidbits and tempting spices that make you say "Ah!" when you taste them. Of course they're always fresh . . . because Jane Parker Hot Cross Buns are delivered fresh daily every day of Lent! Try these oven-treasures today!

Delivered FRESH DAILY throughout Lent . . . February 19 to April 6

AT ALL A&P FOOD STORES . . . Except on Pacific Coast

A&P

Don't be a Rubbit!

Don't try to clean that messy, crusty skillet with elbow grease and a sloshy dishrag! Whisk it smooth with a spunky Brillo pad! Brillo is quick! Tidy!

Be BRILLO wise!

Lightning-quick, Brillo swoops off greasy scorch and crust! Fast! Neat! Easy! Brillo's sturdy, square metal-fiber pads make pots and pans gleam like silver! Give all your pans daily care with Brillo. The special shine ingredient in Brillo soap keeps 'em mirror-bright! Wonderful for aluminums!

BRILLO EVERY DAY keeps pans like new!

Keep all your pots and pans looking new as the day you bought 'em! Give them a quick easy Brillo shine-up every time you use 'em. Brillo won't let them get that old sooty look! Get your Brillo today!

BRILLO comes 2 ways!

★ GREEN box—soap & pads

★ RED box—soap pads

Shines aluminum fast!

the most nearly white cloth would be on the outside. It was no use, but she decided that the shock to Leonard might be less if the shirts were neatly ironed.

Anne ate her lunch at Sally's Shack early that afternoon. As she was sitting at her table, she decided the situation was intolerable and determined to do something about it. She considered herself foolish for sitting around, waiting, hoping, expecting—and then being disappointed. If necessary, she would take the first train she could get to Cabel City or Wildfield. First, however, she would telephone, even if it meant calling the Purdys.

As Anne climbed the apartment steps she was thinking of what she might say to Marjorie, if such a disagreeable eventuality came to pass. Her forehead was furrowed as she opened the door, entered the living room. She looked up, startled. Leonard was sitting at the dinette table.

They could not talk fast enough. "Holy cow!" Anne exclaimed. "I was just going to hop a train and come up after you."

"What's happened?" said Leonard. "I see you cleaned up the apartment. I had a puncture."

Anne sat down opposite Leonard. She looked at her husband as though he were a novelty. Presently their nervous enthusiasm at again finding each other quieted. Leonard went to the bathroom, took off his shirt and jersey to wash, while Anne followed him.

Then she admitted, "I should have gone."

"Well, nothing much happened." Leonard, in turn, was being conciliatory. "You probably would have had a dull time."

"I guess I should have gone, anyway," Anne repeated.

He wiped his hands on a towel, marched to the bedroom to open his traveling bag.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

Leonard had a shirt removed from the traveling bag. "I'm going back to work. I have to go downtown anyway. I have to buy some shirts to carry me over until the laundry gets back. You remembered to call the laundry, didn't you?"

Anne shook her head uneasily.

Leonard was forgiving. "I'll call."

"No," Anne interposed quickly. "You don't have to call. You got shirts."

"You did the washing?"

"Yes," Anne replied miserably. "I did the washing and ironing. But you don't have to be so enthusiastic about it."

"Why not?" Leonard said. "That's the most astounding piece of good news I've heard in a long time."

"I wish you weren't so happy. You won't be after you see what happened to some of your shirts."

Anne jerked open a drawer, tossed Leonard's pink shirts on the bed. He regarded them dumbly.

"Well," he said at last, "they might come in handy. If I wanted a red rag to tie on the end of a ladder. If I had to tow a ladder behind the car. If I only had a ladder."

"You wanted me to do the washing. Maybe a bleach ——"

"Cheer up. I've got other shirts. Nicely ironed too." He kissed her.

THE next day, while Leonard was at work, there was a wild clatter of feet on the steps and then an imperative pounding on the door. It was Jane.

"Guess what!" puffed Jane. She bounced into a chair, breathing heavily. "Go ahead, kid, guess!"

"You're going to be married?"

"No. Guess again."

"You know I don't like to guess. What is it?"

"Vincent Lucas—he's coming!"

Anne shrieked. Jane threw her arms around Anne and they collapsed, giggling, on the sofa. Then Anne sat up. "When?" she asked, excited.

"November eighth."

"Oh," Anne groaned, "I don't think I can live that long. Three weeks!"

"Ain't it awful!" gasped Jane. "If Bill won't take me, I'm going to get someone else to. And if I can't find anybody else, I'm going alone, even if my parents won't let me. Honey, let's listen to all your Vincent Lucas records."

Anne needed no teasing. Finally, after the last note of the last record, a reverent quietness prevailed in the apartment. The girls did not screech or giggle, but talked seriously. This mood continued until Beverly Marshall quite unexpectedly arrived.

"Well, hi!" Anne exclaimed. "Long time no see. Guess what, kid—Vincent Lucas is coming! November eighth!"

"That's nice," said Beverly.

"We're going," declared Anne, "if it's the last thing we do on earth. Are you?"

"I don't know. I may have another engagement."

Jane and Anne, momentarily struck dumb by Beverly's disinterest, stared at her.

"You never acted like this before, Bev. You were always just as nuts about Vincent Lucas as anyone."

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

When Fighting Men Return

By Mildred Louise Bole

Not the physician's but the lover's hand
Can dress the jumping nerve and heart, avoid
The shell-shocked regions, deftly understand
The needed secrets, hated or enjoyed.
Not the reporter but the listening love
Hears half the glories, shame, and sleep-torn words, Reads what the blinded eyes are speaking of,
And sets the crippled body free as birds.
Better than any commanding officer
The loved one, giving no orders, knows how best
To channel muscled service and refer
Power to living jobs and fruitful rest.
Remember love, when fighting men return,
And gently give them home, and wait, and learn.

—From Better Than Laughter (University of Minnesota Press.)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

"People change," said Beverly. "I liked his orchestra—I still do—but, frankly, I'm rather tired of his boudoir baritone."

"Say," said Anne, belligerent, "you don't have to go talking that way about him."

Beverly laughed. "Now, Anne, don't get angry. Perhaps I'll go to see him. I will if I'm not tied up at the Little Theater."

Contact with Beverly sometimes created unusual sparks in Anne. "I don't know whether I like Beverly or not," Anne admitted to Leonard that night.

"What's wrong?"

"Oh, she didn't give a damn that Vincent Lucas was coming. She started to poke fun at him, but I stopped her."

"I'll bet she doesn't spend two minutes a week thinking about Vincent Lucas. Beverly's a well-balanced girl."

"Huh? Now you don't have to go running him down, and then try to squeeze out of taking me."

"I promised."

Anne was sad and thoughtful. "I don't know what's got into Bev, because in some ways she's all right. She asked me to come to the Little Theater and help paint scenery."

"Why don't you go?" asked Leonard hopefully.

Anne did go to the Little Theater to paint scenery.

Had she any illusions that she was e ing a glamorous new world, they promptly destroyed. Westrom's L Theater had formerly been a church. worked in the basement, in a room clut with old scenery and properties. She however, enjoy her associates, and pleased to discover at least one other r ber as ignorant as she. She was know "Rosie," and she was immediately frie Rosie was in her early twenties. The co of her mouth suggested sly humor, an slant of her nose impudence.

"I DON'T know if I belong here," she to Anne, "but I see no sense in sitting ar upstairs all evening without doing anyth

"Are you in the show?"

"I sure am. Along toward the end c third act I come in with a tray of dishes just as the curtain for the second act go lo and behold, there's me going over th niture with a feather duster."

"You're a maid?"

"That's me. Nobody wanted the par Mark was about to do away with it w said I'd try it. Do you suppose I cou that if I had a brush?"

Anne had tacked muslin to a flat fram was now brushing on glue sizing. She t Rosie a brush.

Anne developed no consuming inter the Little Theater, but it did bring h contact with a variety of people she v not have met otherwise. There was Sn the technical director, who during da hours was Mr. J. S. Smith, office mana the Fred Wallace Farm Implement pany—Mary Karlan's boss. There was Crandall, earnest young dramatic st from the State University, who was dire this production. There was a well-k lawyer in the cast, and a girl who clerk the Acorn Shop and who had once Anne a blouse. There was Mrs. Phil

"Mrs. Philbeck?" asked Leonard.

"She's make-up," said Anne.

"She must belong to the Philbecks run Midwest Cereal," said Leonard.

Mostly, though, Anne talked about "Rosie and I painted the fireplace w sponge. It was my idea—we stippled made it look just like stone. Everybody it looked swell."

Her connection with the Little Theat to one of the most unusual and ex events of Anne's life.

"I'm gonna have my picture in the pa Anne shrieked to Leonard.

"What?"

"A woman was down with her ca taking pictures of Rosie and me and Be the rest. She was from the Record."

"Oh, they'll probably throw your pi out," Leonard cautioned.

But Anne did not think so.

The next day Anne snatched the from the delivery boy before he had a ch to toss it against the door. The Little Th pictures were not there.

"Your picture will be in Sunday," Leonard, "if they use it."

"If they don't, I'll go right down to newspaper office and tell them what I thi

The suspense of waiting three days Sunday was almost too much for Anne. suddenly felt a grave concern over her ents' health and paid them a visit, d which she casually mentioned seven the possibility of her picture's appeari the Sunday Record. Finally, Sunday n ing, Anne heard the paper thump ag the door at three minutes after six o'c She padded to the door in her paja The entire outside page of the so section was headlined: LITTLE THE OPENS NEW SEASON AMID SCENES OF J INDUSTRY. Mrs. Philbeck was picture plying make-up to an actress' face, was shown directing the cast. And i center of the page was a picture of in flattering profile, Rosie and Beverly. neath the picture was the caption:

Miss Beverly Marshall, 1040 Washi Avenue, South, watches approvingly

(Continued on Page 161)

ovely, luscious, tried and true Swans Down "Mix-Easy" Cakes!

Make the most of that treasured sugar! These three Swans Down "Mix-Easy" cakes have starred on thousands of party tables.

Simple, fast, no creaming! Beating and dishwashing cut way down. Still, they're dream-soft as only Swans Down cakes can be. Below: Happy Day Cake (recipe on your Swans Down package).

SWANS DOWN "MIX-EASY" RAISIN SPICE CAKE

Preparations:
Have shortening at room temperature. Line bottom of 13 x 9 x 2 inch pan with paper; grease. Start oven for moderate heat (350° F.). Sift flour once before measuring.

Measure into sifter:
2½ cups sifted Swans Down Cake Flour
1 teaspoon soda 1 teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon nutmeg ½ teaspoon allspice

Measure into mixing bowl:
¾ cup shortening

Measure into cup:
*Sour milk, or buttermilk—see note below for amount

Have ready:
1½ cups brown sugar, firmly packed
3 eggs—unbeaten
1 cup finely chopped nut meats
1 cup seedless raisins, dried and fluffy—chopped
1 cup sour milk. With vegetable or any other shortening, use 1 cup sour milk.

Now—Swans Down's "Mix-Easy" Part!
Mix by hand or at a low speed of electric mixer. Stir shortening just to soften. Sift in dry ingredients. Add sugar. Add milk and mix until all flour is dampened. Then beat 2 minutes. Add eggs and beat 1 minute longer. Add nuts and raisins; blend. Count only actual beating time. Or count beating strokes. Allow about 140 full strokes per minute. Scrape bowl and spoon often.

Baking:
Turn into pan. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 50 minutes, or until done. Spread with yellow tinted butter frosting and decorate with nut meats.

Note:
You may substitute ¼ cup corn syrup for ¼ cup of the brown sugar in the above recipe. Reduce milk ¼ cup. Add corn syrup to the milk.

*With butter, margarine, or lard, use ½ cup sour milk.

SWANS DOWN "MIX-EASY" DAFFODIL CAKE

Preparations:
Have shortening at room temperature. Grease and lightly flour 9-inch tube pan. Start oven for moderate heat (375° F.). Sift flour once before measuring.

Measure into sifter:
2¼ cups sifted Swans Down Cake Flour
2 teaspoons Calumet Baking Powder
1½ teaspoons salt 1¼ cups sugar

Measure into mixing bowl:
1 cup shortening

Measure into cup:
*Milk (see note below for amount)
¾ teaspoon orange extract
¾ teaspoon almond extract

Have ready:
3 eggs and 1 egg yolk, unbeaten

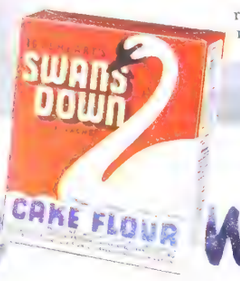
*With butter, margarine, or lard, use ½ cup milk. With vegetable or any other shortening, use ½ cup milk.

Now—Swans Down's "Mix-Easy" Part!
Mix by hand or at a low speed of electric mixer. Stir shortening just to soften. Sift in dry ingredients. Add milk and mix until all flour is dampened. Then beat 2 minutes. Add eggs and beat 1 minute longer. Count only actual beating time. Or count beating strokes. Allow about 140 full strokes per minute. Scrape bowl and spoon often.

Baking:
Turn into pan. Bake in moderate oven (375° F.) 1 hour, or until done. Spread with ½ recipe seven minute frosting made with the remaining egg white. Beat one 4 minutes. Decorate with slivered post toasties. This cake is also good without frosting.

Note:
If desired, ¾ to 1 cup finely chopped nut meats may be added to batter before baking.

(All measurements are level.)



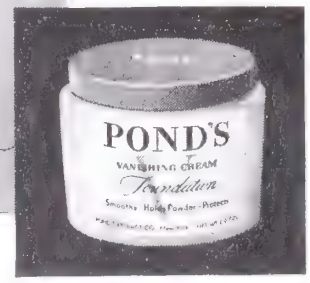
Product of General Foods

ake a better cake with Swans Down

Mrs. Ellen Tuck Astor attends the Musicians' Fund Opera-benefit

"Before I go out—always a 1-Minute Mask"

Smooth on a thick cream. Pat in. Tissue off. Pond's Vanishing Cream has a "Keratolytic" action dissolves off dead skin cells. Helps keep skin radiant. Right away, your skin looks lighter, brighter, smoother. Get a big jar of glamour-making Mask today.



It's a lovely foundation cream, too!

Startlingly lovely against her auburn hair and white gown is Mrs. Ellen Tuck Astor exquisite skin, smooth and cream-white as a gardenia petal. "Always before I g out, I refresh my complexion with a 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream, Mrs. Astor says. "No beauty treatment I've ever tried gives m skin a so much clearer, brighter, softer look—so quickly! You'll find, too, that the Mask makes a wonderful difference i the smoothness of your make-up! Give yourself a 1-Minute Mas every time it's important for you to look your very bes

(Continued from Page 161)

"Oh, that's all right, as long as it's no gger'n a chair. Anne, tell me about the i crowd. I never see anyone any more." Anne began a scattered account of the do- gs of Jane, Dolores, of Marilyn and Chuck. At length Betsy asked, "Do you ever go dances any more?"

"Some, but not so much now that I'm arried."

"Gosh, but I haven't been to a single nce since I was married, unless you count ce when we stopped at Hurska's Beer rlor and played the nickelodeon a coupla nes." Betsy sighed deeply. "Lots of times urn on the radio at night, and if Fred isn't re I turn out all the lights, and I listen to those big orchestras from the Chicago ght clubs. Sometimes I get so blue I cry."

There had been a fissure between them, it now Betsy had crossed it. Anne felt etsy standing close to her. "Kid, why don't ou come over?" she asked anxiously.

It was a golden and bright suggestion for etsy, but there were difficulties. "Truly I'd e to, Anne. But I don't know if I could ake it to the bus now. Having a baby is— ell, inconvenient. The busses are so jammed d I might be bumped and I oughtn't." A lution kindled hope in Betsy. "Do you ve a car?"

"Yes. But Leonard won't let me drive. aybe I can get Leonard to scoot you over noon, then we can run you back when he ts home."

This was a marvelous solution, and Betsy as happy for a while. Then her happiness gan to dim. "This baby of mine, Anne, is e almost any minute. Anne, sometimes I ink I won't live through it. Sometimes I ow I won't live through it." Betsy's lips ere trembling. "I'm so sorry," she sobbed. I've been sorry right along for what I done, nne."

Anne had not counted on Betsy's being so oved. She sat down on the davenport be- de Betsy and put her arms around her. That's all right, Bet. It don't matter a bit ow. Let's just skip it."

But Betsy did not want to skip it. The ates were open and she might let out the evils that had been punishing her. Her houlders shook. "I don't see mamma or papa ny more and I don't have a thing. I been so ck, and once I threw up in the dime store in ont of everybody. Everything's been otten and sometimes I just wanta die to see they care."

"Snap out of it, Bet. Things ain't that ad."

"Yes, they are. I been wanting to see you so long to tell you I was sorry. If anyone ever got what was coming to her, I did!"

"No. Fred came over one night and honked. I guess you busted a date with him and went out with someone else, and he was sorta mad. Anyhow, he wanted me to go out to the Sta-A-Mite and have a hamburger, and like a fool I went. But we never got there. He parked. And then—well, Fred's so damn strong. I fought back and everything—truly I did—but I guess it was just too much. But I swear up and down, Anne, that I never meant to do you dirt. I sure did you dirt, but I really and truly never meant to."

"Honey, in a way maybe it was a good thing."

Betsy was contemplative for several moments, then spoke. "I mighta done you a favor in a funny way, but for me it was a terrible thing. I had to be expelled and everybody found out about me going to have a baby, and my parents—oh, Anne, my parents!" Betsy stopped, unable to convey the horror that she felt.

"Maybe you're a lot better off married to Fred, Betsy. I'm not mad at you about it now."

"Married to Fred maybe isn't what you think. He says that they never would have got him to marry me except that he was convinced that they were nasty enough to get him charged with rape. Doesn't that sound—well, awful. I got to be honest, Anne—it wasn't exactly rape except that I was seventeen. You were eighteen October sixteenth, weren't you?"

"Uh-huh."

"I remembered. I wanted to send you a card, but I was scared because you might take it funny."

The room was chilly. Anne pushed the davenport close enough to the stove so that Betsy could rest her feet on the nickeled ornaments at its base. The sky had clouded, the room darkened so that the fire showed with red eyes at the mica windows. The girls were silent. The fire snapped quietly.

"I can't see where I deserved all I got," said Betsy at last. "Lots of girls are really and truly terrible, but I don't see anything like this happening to them. I wasn't really such a bad girl, Anne. You knew me better'n anyone else and you don't think I was, do you?"

"No."

"I admit I wasn't a virgin; before Fred, I did it twice and once almost. That's all. Once I guess I was curious, and the other

"Don't be in such a hurry to walk. They'll be sending you to the store soon enough."

a green light combination

Miracle-Tread

AND

Lovely Ankles

... going places together ... footwear that is cleverly designed for ankle flattery.

$6.45 and $7.50
Distant Points Slightly Higher

The Cross

The Aristo

WRITE FOR NAME OF NEAREST DEALER

MIRACLE-TREAD DIVISION

Be a Fragrant Symphony

To step out a symphony of loveliness, choose all your toiletries in one fragrance
—— in Friendship's Garden. All are perfumed with the haunting bouquet of old-fashioned flowers such as heliotrope, jasmine and pinks.
Toilet Water, Dusting Powder, 3 cakes Toilet Soap,
Talcum, Body Sachet, Bath Salts, Sachet Tablets
Each 1.00 plus tax

SHULTON
Rockefeller Center, New York

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

time I just couldn't help myself. But my gosh, Anne, when you think of how frequently lots of girls do it, and nothing happens to them—well, it just don't seem fair."

"The cards were stacked against you. But you'll have your baby, and maybe things will be better'n you think."

"Do you want a cup of coffee, Anne?"

"Unh-uh."

"I don't either. I don't want to be gloomy, Anne, but there are a million things I haven't told you. First of all, we moved way out here in this gosh-awful dump. I didn't mind it so much at first, because I didn't want to see anyone. Fred told my family if he ever caught them hanging around the place, he'd knock them endwise. Can't say as I blame him."

"Do you want him to make up with your family?"

"Well, I dunno. Fred ain't much of a husband. But my gosh, he never wanted to marry me and I never wanted to marry him. I kinda think he runs out on me, but I don't care, just so he don't leave me till after the baby comes and I get on my feet again—providing I live through it."

"Oh, Bet, what's all this blah about 'not living through it'? What does the doctor say? Don't he say you're all right?"

"Well, he says I oughtn't to have any trouble."

"See there! What are you worried about? Some women have five or ten kids without thinking nothing of it."

"I've done everything they told me to. I got my stuff all ready to go to the hospital. I tried to get Fred to put in a phone, but he says the baby won't be here until December first and the phone company won't put one in before then, anyway. He beefs around all the time about how much the baby's costing."

"You ought to have a phone, at least."

"Yeah, I know. But Fred says there's no reason why we can't use Smedley's—they borrow enough of our sugar."

A happily married college president concluded a graduation address as follows: "Gentlemen, many of you will marry. Let me entreat you to be kind to your wives. Be patient with them. When you are going out together, do not worry if your wife is not ready at the appointed time. Have a good book near by. Read it while you wait. And, gentlemen, I assure you that you will be astonished at the amount of information you will acquire."

FRED RUSSELL in Try Anything Twice. (McQuiddy Press)

There was an interval of silence, and Anne wondered herself into depths to which she was not accustomed. A moment of weakness, a broken date, a silly rumor—little things like that determined the big things. One or two little things altered, and Anne's and Betsy's situations might be reversed. She might be the girl huddled on the davenport; Betsy might be the girl who longed to get home to her pleasant apartment.

Anne looked at the big alarm clock standing alongside Fred's trophy. The hands were pointing to three-thirty. "Is that clock right?" she asked.

"I wish it was. But it's always stopping." Betsy switched on the radio, turned the dial until she was receiving a news broadcast. "I guess it must be about five-thirty."

"Holy cow! I gotta scram."

"Truly, Anne, I hate to see you go. If you can wait awhile, Fred can take you home."

"WHEN will that be?"

"Well, I gotta be honest. Today's Friday, and he gets his pay check. That means he'll stop at Hurska's Beer Parlor to cash it, and he'll get to fooling around and I don't really expect him until seven or seven-thirty. Most nights he's late. He generally goes to the Y to swim, or else to Hurska's, and I never start dinner till seven-thirty."

Anne was not a girl to make lengthy overtures before leaving, but she hovered a few minutes. Betsy was distressed at her leaving, although she made an effort not to show it. The brave front did not fool Anne, and when, at the moment of parting, Anne kissed her friend, the steel turned to water. Anne reached behind Betsy and paddled her buttocks lightly. "There!" she said, and left.

Anne arrived home late; at the prospect of seeing her husband she had, while walking from the bus stop to the apartment, worked herself into a state of conflicting emotions and thoughts. She was on the defensive, a little apologetic, but mostly she felt an intense desire to instill in Leonard some of the warm sympathy she felt for Betsy.

Perhaps she tried too hard. Her words tumbled over one another and Anne knew them to be sadly inadequate. Leonard looked at her solemnly, but said nothing.

Leonard's coolness toward Betsy disturbed Anne, but it lessened in no way her determination to see her friend. She did not tell Leonard the following noon that she intended to visit Betsy that afternoon, but soon after he returned to work she gathered a number of magazines, and set forth.

BETSY was thrilled to see that Anne had, after all, returned. Thereafter Anne's visits were an almost daily occurrence. Once she persuaded Betsy to try to make it to the bus stop with the intent of spending the afternoon at her apartment and of having Leonard bring her back in the evening.

They had gone a number of blocks when Betsy stopped. "I don't think I can make it, Anne."

Anne, although vague on medical matters, spoke with professional sharpness. "When did you go to a doctor last?"

"Oh, a coupla months ago," said Betsy evasively.

Anne scolded her, suspecting that "four months" would be closer to the truth.

One day Betsy looked out the window and said, "Oh, I sure wish it would snow! I'd give anything just to sit here and watch it come down; and then everything would be white and I wouldn't have to look at those darn junked cars and vacant lots any more."

But, save for an occasional utterance such as this, Betsy had lost much of her gloom. She ceased to worry about whether she would die; at least, she did not now voice these worries to Anne. Anne was pleased, and beyond nagging her to go to the doctor again—Betsy continued evasive on this—she said nothing to stir up fears.

The lift in Betsy's spirits was obvious and it was unavoidable that Anne be proud of herself. Betsy's dependence on her was so marked that on one occasion a shade of independence on Betsy's part hurt Anne's feelings. She arrived at Betsy's, found the door unlocked and, as usual, walked in. Betsy was nowhere.

Well, darn her! Anne thought. Where could she be?

Anne thought cruelly of teaching Betsy a lesson by leaving and not coming back for two or three days, but at this moment Betsy called to her. She had been at Mrs. Smedley's, two vacant lots and one house removed. Betsy was forgiven.

Anne had, as yet, seen nothing of Fred. In view of Fred's treachery toward her and of his thoughtless or cruel treatment of Betsy, Anne had thought of Fred with his bad characteristics in relief. Her brief meeting with him in the grocery store had dispelled a certain bothersome feeling that she might immediately fall in love with him again were they to meet.

One afternoon as Anne was about to leave Betsy, she heard the sound of a motor.

"It's Fred," said Betsy. "He can take you home."

Fred wore the same outfit she had seen in the grocery store—scuffed leather jacket, sweat shirt, overall trousers, work shoes. His curly black hair, however, had been carefully brushed, and his face had the ruddy color of a well-ripened peach. He brought with him the smell of the outdoors and, when he saw Anne, a broad grin.

But he was silent until he and Anne were in the front seat of his car. Then he spoke

(Continued on Page 166)

LA CROSS HANDS YOU A NEW IDEA FOR PERFECT FINGERTIPS!

a new idea in nail polish

a new idea in nail polish bottles

a new idea in nail polish applicators

a new idea in nail polish colors

Naylon is such a perfect nail polish idea you'll wonder why it was never dreamed of before! Apply glistening Naylon from this streamlined bottle that won't tip or turn over. Use the Naylon applicator to stroke on flexible, adherent Naylon. It's as easy as writing your name. Revel in the ripe, rich, glowing Naylon colors and you'll agree...Naylon is Fingertip Perfection! 60¢ a bottle, plus Fed. tax. At fine stores.

naylon By La Cross

Glorifying your figure to the sleek, rounded, modern look. It's the magic of a Flexees girdle... and the bosom beauty of a Flexaire bra in the new Pulchra Design.

FIGURES in

FLEXEES* world's loveliest foundations

*REG. TRADEMARK

(Continued from Page 164)

boisterously: "Well, how's the kid? What do you know, anyhow?"

The ghost of Fred that had haunted Anne's mind for months immediately fled and the real Fred took its place. Once Fred's bluster had been amusing; now Anne was somewhat annoyed by it.

"Everything's just fine," she said, keeping her voice as impersonal as possible. "How are things with you?"

Fred abruptly dropped his bluster. "I can't blow," he said.

Anne thought it best to inquire no further. "I live on the corner of Buchanan and Sixth, not far from where I used to."

Fred began to whistle. He expertly took the corners at high speed, but leisurely drove along the straightaways, and Anne was sure he was making the trip last as long as possible.

"This don't look like the right way back."

"Short cut." Fred hesitated. "How is this husband of yours?"

"He's fine."

"What's his name?"

"Leonard."

"I'd like to meet him. Darned if I wouldn't. Know you wouldn't marry anybody but an all-right guy." Anne knew that Fred, in his clumsy manner, was trying to cross the bridge between them. "I've been thinking of going out for pro football," said Fred, angling with his eyes for a favorable response.

"Why don't you, Fred? That's more in your line."

"Yes, I have been thinking seriously about it. What does your husband do?"

"He's head bookkeeper at the Logan Ice Cream Company. Are you sure this is the right way back?"

"Yep. But I don't wonder you're confused, the way this blame section of town's laid out."

Anne glanced at the speedometer. It registered thirteen miles an hour. "Oh, come on, Fred! Don't you suppose you could drive twenty miles an hour? I've got to get dinner started and I'm starved."

"How about a hamburger?"

"No, thanks."

"Bet you really want one. I remember how you used to go for them."

Anne did not respond, so Fred returned to a discussion of athletics. After several blocks Fred swung the car to the curbing and stopped in front of Harry's Diner, a railway passenger car converted into a café.

"What's the idea of stopping here?"

"Hamburgers. Ever taste Harry's hamburgers?"

"No, but I'll have dinner in a coupla minutes and I don't want to spoil my ——"

"You'll go for Harry's hamburgers. Best in town." Fred precluded further argument by getting out of the car and going into the café.

Anne had an impulse to leave Fred and walk the rest of the way home alone. Then she considered that Fred just wanted to be thoughtful and polite and she decided to wait.

Presently Fred arrived with a paper sack. Anne unfolded the wax paper in which her hamburger had been wrapped, spread it on her lap. Fred's opinion of Harry's hamburgers was certainly not far wrong; they were good.

The two were quiet for some minutes. Then Fred said, "Betsy sure likes to read those magazines you brought." It had been his first mention of Betsy. "I hadn't thought, but I might subscribe to something so she can read." He started the motor, raced it, swung his car into the middle of the street and drove silently for a block. Then he said, "I do some pretty dumb things."

"What?"

"You know what. You know how I botched things up between us."

"It's over the dam, Fred. Let's forget it."

"You can't forget it easy," said Fred. "At least, I can't. For a while I was dumb enough to think maybe you were coming over to see me, not Betsy. I know it was dumb of me, but ever since I was married I tried to think

Be honest! Check these unlucky

SEVEN SYMPTOMS

due to irregularity

ANY ONE IS A WARNING YOU MAY NEED PROMPT, GENTLE SARAKA!

Don't neglect any of the Seven Symptoms when due to irregularity. At the first sign of a single one of the Unlucky Seven, try Saraka! Millions know this pure vegetable laxative is so gentle and pure, so thorough and sure!

GENTLY URGES—NEVER PURGES

Saraka is entirely different from mineral oil, milk of magnesia, and psyllium seeds! It's a combination of two pure vegetable ingredients, each with a distinct, necessary function. One acts much the same as beneficial, high-residue foods, like apples and dates . . . but in concentrated form!

The other provides just the right amount of gentle action needed to give you the thoroughness you desire! With Saraka, results are so nearly natural that most people have no sensation of ever having taken a laxative!

THE IDEAL FAMILY LAXATIVE

There are no unpleasant seeds, oils, or chemicals in Saraka! And Saraka usually works overnight to start your day right! Saraka is economical because it's concentrated. Your own doctor can tell you about Saraka's superiority. Caution: Use only as directed. Buy Saraka at your druggist!

Double your money back if not satisfied

The Original Pure Vegetable

SARAKA

SO GENTLE AND PURE, SO THOROUGH AND SURE!

He's an economist

by profession and in practice. "Extravagance," he says, "is usually the sum total of waste in little things." On advice of their dentist, his family (there are four) now brush their teeth with Arm & Hammer Baking Soda (pure Bicarbonate of Soda). Not only are they all delighted with the way Soda cleans their teeth, but he has figured out to a penny the dollars they are saving each year at "Arm & Hammer's" few-pennies-a-package cost. He's a working economist.

Arm & Hammer Baking Soda and Cow Brand Baking Soda are among the dentifrices that meet the exacting requirements of the Council on Dental Therapeutics of the American Dental Association. Both brands are classified as acceptable dentifrices and have enjoyed the Council's seal of acceptance longer than any other dentifrice.

Accepted COUNCIL ON DENTAL THERAPEUTICS AMERICAN DENTAL ASSOCIATION

ARM & HAMMER BAKING SODA OR COW BRAND BAKING SODA

CHURCH & DWIGHT CO., Inc.
10 Cedar Street, New York 5, N.Y.
Please send me FREE BOOK describing uses of Baking Soda; also a set of Colored Bird Cards.
E-92
Name
Street Address
City or Town

"You couldn't do that."

"I know I couldn't," agreed Fred.

"It's all settled now," Anne declared.

"Yes. Somehow, now that I know it's all settled, I feel better about it. It's sure been an all-right thing for you to do, coming over to see Betsy. She sure has brightened up since you came to see her."

"It [illegible]"

They reached the apartment. Anne was getting out of the car when Fred said, "You're forgetting something." Anne immediately wondered if it were possible that Fred was going to demand a kiss for bringing her home. But Fred added, "There's another hamburger in the sack."

"Who for? I can't eat another."

"Your husband. What did you say his name was?"

"Leonard."

"You ought to get him to join the Y. I'll teach him the crawl. Well, Anne, be seeing you!" Fred waved, made a showy U turn, careened around the corner.

Anne was holding the sack containing the hamburger and it then occurred to her that she should have made Fred take it home to Betsy. But it was too late for that, so she turned and walked up the steps to her apartment.

"Well," asked Leonard, "how's Freddie?"

"Freddie's just fine," said Anne. "He brought me home. Bought me a hamburger."

"Oh."

Anne attempted to read jealousy, suspicion into her husband's face, but he was inscru-

[redacted]

Nothing is so dangerous as being too modern. One is apt to grow old-fashioned quite suddenly.

—COLE

[redacted]

table. His manner, however, was not particularly exuberant.

"He bought you a hamburger too—just so you wouldn't get mad." She offered him the sack, but Leonard waved it aside, saying something about eating it after dinner, and Anne placed it on the end table.

Immediately after dinner Anne took a bath. When she returned to the living room, she saw the sack still on the end table. He don't have to act like a baby just because Fred brought me home, she thought. Perhaps he should be commanded to eat the hamburger.

But Leonard eventually went to bed and nothing was said. Anne, in her pajamas, thought it a pity for one of Harry's hamburgers to go to waste, and decided to warm it. She picked up the sack. It was featherlight. Leonard had eaten the hamburger and puffed out the sack, apparently hours before.

Leonard had, without Anne's asking, decided to stop at Betsy's each afternoon to bring Anne home.

He had had a picture of Betsy: a screeching, painted, nasty young woman. But when he first entered Betsy's house, saw Betsy sitting in the corner of the davenport with a blanket over her shoulders, her flesh gave the lie to his preconception. Betsy was a child of seventeen and looked not a day older. She was meek, and her eyes were big to see what Anne's husband was like. A checkerboard lay on the davenport, and on a chair a dish of bobby pins and a bobby-pin curler indicated a beauty treatment had also been in progress. Leonard tried not to notice her abdomen; it was strange that a child could become a mother.

On one of the few days that Anne did not see Betsy, Leonard returned home to find Anne curled in the big chair. Her eyelids were red.

"What's eating you?" asked Leonard.

"Oh, I saw Mary."

"What did she have to say?"

Anne started to speak, but was unable to continue. She was doing her best not to cry.

"What's the trouble, honey?"

[redacted]

So I'll Live in California ...With You

At Pasadena Playhouse, we'd seen "make-believe" love. But—"This is it! This is real," you said, "the way your soft hands make me feel.". . . Her hands were deliciously soft. Like Hollywood Stars, she uses Jergens Lotion.

Orange grove in bloom. "Bride's flowers," you said. "How about it, darling? Do I keep these soft hands for life?" 'Deed you do, dear. And I'll trust Jergens Lotion to keep my hands soft.

The most darling women trust Jergens Lotion hand care*.

How about you? Your hands feel even sweeter, smoother, softer now, using Jergens Lotion; it's even finer since the war, due to wartime skin research. Postwar Jergens protects longer, too, against unlucky roughness.

Know what? Two ingredients in Jergens Lotion are such whizzes at skin-smoothing that many doctors use them. Still 10¢ to $1.00 (plus tax) for this more-effective-than-ever Jergens Lotion. Never oily or sticky.

For the Softest, Adorable Hands, use

JERGENS LOTION

* See how strongly lovely women prefer Jergens Lotion hand care:

Hollywood Stars use Jergens Lotion, 7 to 1
N. Y. Models prefer Jergens, nearly 5 to 1

Free! YOUR CHANCE to see that Jergens Lotion is now even finer.
Mail coupon today for a generous bottle. (Postcard is okay if you wish. Print name, address plainly.) Mail coupon to Box 27, Dept. 90, Cincinnati 14, O.
Name
Street
City
(Sorry, offer good in U.S.A. only.)

Introducing Mrs. Les Pretend

She's a lovely little fibber
She's a story teller born

Birthday secrets she refuses to share even with her mirror. A gay deceiver, she loves it when people guess her to be years younger. They do because her skin tells little white lies about her actual age. She's over thirty, but shh! . . . that's her secret. In the scant few minutes it takes her to apply Bonne Bell's Plus 30 Cream, with its natural skin-enriching hormones, she keeps her years unapparent.

Overnight your skin can absorb the active hormones in Plus 30 Cream. The result? A fresher, younger look — in only a few wonderful "story book" days.

You'll love it Imagine! Your age a guessing game and you the winner by 10 years! You'll find Plus 30 a real luxury cream for your skin at night — not greasy or sticky but richly emollient, fragrantly fresh and softly creamy.

You can look younger in one month

Every night take 3 minutes to apply this youth-awakening Bonne Bell Plus 30 Cream on face and neck — using gentle upward stroke.

While you sleep, the active hormones in Plus 30 can be absorbed to replenish and bolster nature's own failing supply — help the skin resist the passing years after 30.

In one month, or even less, you'll awaken to a thrilling sight. Your skin has a softer, smoother, younger look—no longer tells the real truth about your age.

Plus 30 Cream

60-day supply $5.00, 30-day size $3.00 . . plus tax

Bonne Bell CLEVELAND, OHIO

(Continued from Page 167)

nally Anne became articulate although ed. Mary had heard that Anne had visiting the Halpers on the pretense of g Betsy, but in reality to see Fred. To e the story shabbier, there was an impli-n that Betsy's helplessness, resulting her pregnancy, gave Anne and Fred just kind of advantage they had been want-

Mary didn't believe that, did she?"
d Leonard.
She said she didn't, but she began by ching to me about how much better a you were than Fred, and I asked her she was driving at and she told me, and d her that she sure turned out a swell r, believing that dirt, and she said she
't believe it, and I told her she better or I'd paste her nose flat."
Where did she hear it?" Leonard wanted
now.
She wouldn't say."
onard sniffed. "It will blow over. Don't think it about time to give Betsy a rest?
can overdo anything."
No," Anne declared. "No, I don't."
After all, you've hardly missed seeing her day. And as long as you two are so thick,
's bound to be gossip."
don't care what they think. But"— Anne's defiance wavered and her voice ed—"I've been wanting to give her a er. She's gonna have a shower for that of hers if it's the last g I do."

tsy thrilled at the pect of the shower, at prospect of seeing her ds again.
nne thought it wisest
to get Betsy's hopes high. "Naturally, we 't have such a big
d. Our apartment's small."
Oh, Anne, just one or would be enough."
he first thing to do in planning for the ver was to set a date. In view of Betsy's anced pregnancy, it would have to be
. Anne decided on the following Thurs-
The next thing should be the invitations.
nne found the telephone number of Olive lison, who had gone with Betsy and her lates a few times. She dialed. "Hello,
e. This is Anne Karlan—Anne Mason.
remember Betsy?"
Yes?" There was more interrogation n assent in Olive's answer, and there was rtain timidity.
Well, Betsy's baby is coming pretty soon,
I'm giving her a shower. Thursday. Can come?"
here was a hesitation, then Olive was k: "Oh, kid, I got a date Thursday. My y, I'd sure like to make it, but I just
t."

HEN Anne hung up the receiver, she mut-d, "She don't have a date! No guy ever ed that mug more'n about an hour ahead
ime. Anyhow, we don't want her."
nne phoned two more without receiving answer, dialed a third and the operator rmed her the telephone had been re-ved. Anne did secure a solemn promise
n Jane that she would come.
Monday morning Anne tore from the tele-ne directory a bus-route map of the city, fed it in her purse, and scribbled a note for nard that she might not be back for ch. She had decided to make it as hard as sible for the girls to refuse, and she was ng to talk with them face to face.
By noon Anne had made four visits. Two s had said with reasonable conviction t they would come, one had hedged so ch Anne considered her unlikely, and one l stated that she was invited to another ty that evening and could not be there.
ne managed to make four more calls bee six o'clock. Two more girls said they uld come, one was not at home, one reed flatly.
Well, I guess that's that, Anne sighed, walk-slowly along the street. It was dark and cold, but before her Anne saw the friendly light of a drugstore.

She telephoned Marilyn and Beverly from the drugstore. As Anne had expected, both said they would be there. Anne now considered her task of making calls completed. If half the girls who had said they would come appeared, the party should be a success.

"BETSY," Anne asked, "do you have anything to wear to the shower?"

"Sure."

"Does it need fixing up or anything?"

"Now, Anne," said Betsy, gently scolding, "don't go worrying about what I'll wear. I've got something, all right, and you've got enough to do without bothering about it."

It was Tuesday, and as Leonard drove her home from Betsy's Anne recounted the many things yet to do to prepare for the party. Leonard had had no idea that a simple party would involve such preparation. Anne had suddenly become an expert on bootees, buntings, parka hoods, crib blankets, sleepers. Although Leonard possessed the eye for order, it had been Anne who had noted the window curtains' griminess, who had rushed them to the cleaners and exacted a solemn promise that they be returned by Thursday. Games, favors had to be purchased, card tables and chairs borrowed. The housecleaning had to be done.

"When in the world are you going to get all those things done?" asked Leonard.

"Oh, I've got it all figured out," said Anne. "I'll get it all in."

"Haven't you forgotten something?"

"Not a thing," she told him.

"What are you going to do tonight?"

"Clean."

Leonard was silent.

"Why?" asked Anne.

"I thought we were going out." There was a trace of mischievousness in Leonard's voice. "I thought you had 'vowed.'"

"Oh!" exclaimed Anne. "I completely forgot about Vincent Lucas."

"Well," Leonard comforted her, "I think we can arrange it somehow. I'll help with some of the work."

Anne pondered. "No," she concluded. "I can't make it. There's altogether too much for me to do to go." Anne spoke regretfully, but she was not brokenhearted; it was only a minor tragedy.

Anne's plans apparently did not work out as nicely as she had expected, for early the next afternoon Leonard, at the office, received a telephone call from her.

"Dear," she said, "can you get to the store? The only thing I've got for the baby is this fuzzy bunny, and I don't see how I'm going to get down again. Couldn't you try your hand at picking out something real nice?"

Leonard detected a trace of weariness in Anne's voice and, although he did not fancy the errand, agreed.

Shortly after calling Leonard, Anne was on her way to Betsy's. She had become so familiar with every turn, every house, every landmark that no longer did the journey seem endless. She wore her boots as protection against stones in the road; she calculated the time to make bus connections.

As usual, the door stuck when she first pushed, then flew open. Anne heard Betsy before she saw her: a smothered gasp from the bedroom. Anne stepped quickly to the door.

"What's the trouble?"

"Nuthin'. Nuthin at all." Betsy managed a grin, but the mark of tears remained around her eyes.

Anne saw two dresses on the bed, a spool of thread, scissors. "Hum-m, dress trouble," she observed. "I should have guessed."

"Uh-huh," Betsy admitted. "I wasn't going to bother you—truly, Anne—but I've had just an awful time."

Anne picked up the more colorful of the two dresses. It had a bodice of gold metal

Out in Illinois, Dick Oglesby, recovered from bullet wounds, was running for governor on the Union ticket and saying that in 1858 at Urbana in a walk together with Lincoln, Lincoln told him: "Remember, Dick, to keep close to the people—they are always right and will mislead no one."

Fashion is Feminine. The defined waistline . . . molded torso . . . accentuated bosom. Underline your new clothes with Gossard's Nylon elastic and Rayon satin step-in . . . Gossard's low plunging satin and lace bra.

the Gossard line of beauty

THE H. W. GOSSARD CO. • CHICAGO • NEW YORK • SAN FRANCISCO
DALLAS • ATLANTA • TORONTO • MELBOURNE • SYDNEY • BUENOS AIRES

AN OUTSTANDING "BUY" WHILE IT LASTS!

Libby's TWICE-RICH* Tomato Juice

'ROUND THE CLOCK REFRESHMENT

It's the sparkling "vitamin drink" that's smacking good at breakfast, luncheon, dinner and between meals. The tomato juice that's really *RICH IN FLAVOR! That special rich-ripe goodness has made Libby's America's favorite brand by far!

And Libby's is *RICH IN VITAMINS! For example, a single 6-ounce glass provides, on the average, an adult's minimum daily requirement of precious Vitamin C! This thirst-quencher also helps supply Vitamins A, B_1 and B_2.

Right now there's still plenty of Libby's—but harvest time is months away, and stocks are steadily dwindling. So stock up on Libby's now —a wonderful "buy" in flavor and food value.

LIBBY, McNEILL & LIBBY, CHICAGO 9, ILL.

IN ALL CANNED FOODS

LOOK TO Libby's FOR PERFECTION

LISTEN TO "MY TRUE STO

Thrilling dramas from real life. E morning Mon. thru Fri. 10:00 E 9:00 CST, 11:30 MST, 10:30 I American Broadcasting Compan

(Continued from Page 169)

a deep-blue skirt. "With this, you not to howl," she exclaimed.

is lovely, isn't it? But I've had the nedest time trying to get it to fit right. other one"—Betsy held it up disdain—"jeepers, isn't it horrid! But it does ne smock fits just like a flour sack and I let the skirt out a couple more feet, if I ed to. But who'd want to wear a thing hat?"

ast what's wrong with the other one?" asked.

h, I could slash it to pieces, I get so It ain't a maternity dress, but I can st wear it. See, it's shirred in the waist it's big enough, except at the very top of kirt where I begin to bump out. Even ash is made right, so it ties in front and cover me up. But my gosh! The way em hikes up in front is fit to kill."

'hat's nothing serious," said Anne. e had Betsy put on the dress.

Look at the way bodice overlaps kirt," Anne said. 'll rip it apart, the jacket but- over, then baste kirt back on and e hem. Nothing "

Gosh, Anne," Betsy, watching ly, "yououghtn't other; you've got nuch to do."

Phooey, we'll get ished this after- . If not, I'll take me tonight and on it. I'm not tonight," she etsy went to the t and came out ring a bathrobe of d's. "Do you v how I got that s?"

How?"

Fred brought it me. I saw it at Charming Lady, Fred bought it me without me lly asking. I love dress. You know, ne, Fred's been ty decent lately. een thinking be I don't have a ttogroucharound I been, wishing I dead, like I used I'm beginning to t a baby now. I ss it's pretty much fault Fred ain't been better'n he has, and brighten up I think we'll get along. We'll in mixing with people again. And imag- you're the one with every reason to be enough to kill me, and to think instead 've been doing all this—it's truly, truly ll!"

E sky became dark, but Betsy's spirits wed. Anne switched on a light and moved se. She did not succeed in finishing the ss, yet she did get the buttons moved over, skirt and bodice basted, the hem pinned, i she could finish the rest at home.

"I can hardly wait for the shower, Anne!" tsy exclaimed as Anne was about to leave. hope the baby decides he can wait."

"Oh, we'll just paddle his little butt if he nes tomorrow and postpone the shower for week or two. So long, kiddo."

Anne, not knowing the time she would ve Betsy's, had not told Leonard to call. e raised her collar against the wind, rue- ly thought of the damage she had done to r schedule. She was so preoccupied with r thoughts she did not notice that the auto- obile approaching her was slowing until the iver sounded his horn. It was Leonard.

"My gosh!" Anne exclaimed. "I didn't now you would call."

"I thought I might bump into you."

Leonard was in excellent spirits. That afternoon he had hurried to Tronheim's and there discovered the Stork Shoppe. He had the preconceived idea that a dress would be a most appropriate gift. There were fine handmade dresses on display, and he purchased the best. The clerk handed it to him in a small envelope, and Leonard became disturbed at the unimpressiveness of his gift.

When he and Anne reached home, he showed her a larger package. "It's a bunting," he explained, using the word for the first time. He unwrapped the package. "Look. You drop the baby in this end, stick its arms in these sleeves, yank this cap over his head, zip it up, and you've got him! He can thrash around all he wants to, but it won't do him any good."

Anne was surprised at the interest Leonard had taken in the shopping. "It's lovely," she said.

"It's the very best they had."

Anne exhibited more enthusiasm over the dress than Leonard had anticipated. She held it up with her spread hand slipped inside. "Look at those little armholes!" she exclaimed. "It's the tiniest and sweetest little thing I've seen. You did very well, papa."

That evening Anne launched into a flurry of activity, cleaning up the house. Then she worked on Betsy's dress. It was one o'clock in the morning before she laid it aside, and she was tired and her eyes ached. Anne hesitated at the window for a moment before retiring. She uttered a little cry. The world was white; great flakes of snow were falling. The first snow! she thought. Betsy wanted it.

WHEN Anne awoke, Leonard was standing at the bedroom doorway. Patches of snow were on his overcoat.

"I won't be home at noon," he said. "The car's snowed in. Not even the busses are running. It doesn't look so good for your shower. If you decide to postpone it or if there is anything I can do, just call me up."

Anne was on her feet instantly. "Postpone the shower, just for a little snow? I never heard of such a thing!" She ran to the window.

"More than a 'little,'" Leonard said. "I could hardly get out to the car, let alone get it going. And it's cold!"

"There goes a bus now," said Anne hopefully.

A number of people were walking in the center of the street, toward town. It was about the heaviest snow Anne could remember having seen, but she would not admit it.

Leonard left, and Anne dressed with unaccustomed speed. If people could get downtown, they could get to the party, all right. She called Marilyn, and her hopes were buoyed at the voice of her friend. Sure, Marilyn would be glad to come over and help that afternoon. Anne vigorously set to work cleaning the bathroom. The morning was well advanced before she finished scrubbing the kitchen floor, and then Anne heard over the radio that the public schools had been closed because of the snow, and she began to worry anew.

Farewell

By Patricia McDonald

Fare you well, my lover;
Keep you well, and free.
And do you meet another,
Be mindful then of me.

Ride you swift, my lover,
Move in sunny ways;
And do you praise another,
Recall you gave me praise.

Bed you soft, my lover;
In scented hayfields lie.
And do you heed another,
Remember: soft my sigh.

Remember, too, my lover,
Should a later lass
Catch your heart: another,
Once, did let you pass.

And should a newer maiden
Careless-loose your tongue
And snare your dreams—ah, say then
"The dark one, she was young."

Then fare you fine, my lover,
Fine and well and free.
And do you leave another,
Oh, then remember me.

Make and enjoy REAL CHILI CON CARNE and many other delicious MEXICAN DISHES

Write for Free Recipe Book

Genuine Flavor-Rich ANCHO CHILI PEPPERS are grown and sun dried in Mexico especially for Gebhardt

MADE IN SUNNY SAN ANTONIO SINCE 1896

WITH THIS Original GEBHARDT SEASONING

It is a complete seasoning for real Chili con Carne and other deliciously-different Mexican dishes. With it you can duplicate the flavor-secrets of real Mexican cookery, and add new zest and flavor to your everyday dishes, too. Use it in your sauces and gravies. See how it adds a new taste-tang to your favorite spaghetti or beans.

Only the Gebhardt process blends imported Mexican ancho chili peppers and other fragrant spices to produce this original seasoning. Only Gebhardt's Chili Powder captures the incomparable flavor that distinguishes real Mexican cookery. Try it in the famous Mexican recipes packed with every bottle. They'll add delightful variety to your menu.

Famous MEXICAN RECIPES PACKED with EVERY BOTTLE

Gebhardt's EAGLE CHILI POWDER

This label stands for the FINEST FLAVOR ever packed in a can

America's favorite since 1865

Spread it on hot toast under eggs!

In early spring, Iroquois Indians gathered at their council house in ceremonial thanksgiving for the gift of the sugar maple tree.

Treat yourself to real maple sugar flavor

Probably the earliest of early American treats, maple syrup was first made by the Indians. But their crude, primitive methods could not produce the smooth and uniform maple sugar flavor that you can enjoy today.

In our Vermont Maid Syrup, we capture real maple sugar flavor by selecting a maple sugar with a rich, full flavor.

Then we blend the maple sugar with cane and other sugars. This makes the maple flavor uniformly rich and delicious.

Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc., Burlington, Vermont

Vermont Maid Syrup

FLAVOR
HEATS FROM ALL SIDES
See how the heat curls evenly around food on all sides. "Waterless" principle means vitamins and minerals don't drain down the sink. Low-heat method saves fuel.
How to cook "fluff-up" rice
use...
Club Aluminum
You've wondered how some people put the snow-white fluffy tenderness in rice. Lady, you don't have to be a Chinese expert or know a deep-dyed secret to do it yourself. You just need a Club Aluminum saucepan and these simple directions:
Rinse rice in cold running water until water is clear. Then put it in your Club Aluminum saucepan. Add, not oceans of H_2O but just twice as much water as rice and a teaspoon of salt per cup of rice. Bring to a boil, then let cook for five minutes with heat very low. Turn off heat, leave on cover, and let stand for 35 minutes.
The "Full Flavor" principle of cooking in Club Aluminum Hammercraft Waterless Cookware is fine for other foods, too, as more than 3,000,000 women have already found.
Get it for more fun, flavor and form in food. Nine different pieces, all with that exclusive hammered "jewelry store" look. And what a "natural" for gifts.
CLUB ALUMINUM PRODUCTS COMPANY • CHICAGO 14, ILLINOIS
Other distinctive Club lines:
Club Glass Coffee Makers...Club Coffee Dispensers...Club Household Cleaners and Polishes.
Tune in "Club Time," ABC Network, Monday mornings.

Anne prepared her lunch with one hand and started the salad with the other. She was anxious for Marilyn to arrive so she could go over to Betsy's. Actually, Marilyn was tardy not at all, but Anne was so impatient that this seemed to be the case.

Marilyn took off her snow pants, produced a skirt from a paper sack in her pocket. She stepped into her skirt, rolled up the sleeves of her blouse, said philosophically, "Let's get busy."

Anne outlined the thousand tasks and sat down at the telephone to call a cab. Marilyn was slicing apples when Anne returned to the kitchen.

"I can't get a cab for more'n an hour!" said Anne.

Marilyn was thoughtful. "Honey," she said at length, "I don't really think you ought to have the party tonight. I heard over the radio the roads are all blocked and drifted."

Anne sat and sulked while Marilyn continued working. When the cab did arrive, the driver, a talkative fellow, whistled as Anne told him her destination.

"Anything wrong?" he asked.

"No. I can get there and back if anyone can. Heard they had an emergency call for the plow somewhere out there this morning; it's probably open."

Eventually he deposited her at Betsy's, by the mailbox. Anne hesitated for a minute, looking for a path to the house. Someone had left the house hours before, but only the ruffle of a path remained. There seemed no way of getting to the house but plunging straight ahead through the drifts.

Only now did she fully realize the terrible obstacle of deep fluffy snow. Anne measured the distance between herself and the house, took a deep breath, plowed ahead. She finally reached the porch. The front door was ajar, open a couple of inches. Anne paused to get her breath, then entered.

> People are always only too ready to inform the victims of the minor tragedies of life that they ought to be thankful that they are so small.
>
> —RICHARD KING: Folded Hands (Hodder & Stoughton).

"Hey, Bet!" she called. "Here's Santa."

The house was cold. The fire was out. Anne rushed through the house looking for Betsy, calling. But Betsy was gone.

It was obvious that Betsy had gone to the hospital to have her baby. Anne hesitated for a moment, then made a long, panting detour to the driveway. On the road, she hurried to Mrs. Smedley's and was thankful to find there a shoveled path to the door. She knocked.

Mrs. Smedley was a worn woman of fifty, with staring eyes but an expressive mouth.

"Is Betsy here?" Anne asked.

Mrs. Smedley stared at her. "Oh, Mrs. Halper," she exclaimed. "Oh, dear! Come in."

"No one was at her house," said Anne.

"Mrs. Halper's at the hospital. I came home this noon from Silvie's—she's my daughter—and I was worried sick about the snow. No sooner had I got in the house when Mrs. Sedenka called. Mrs. Halper had been here while I was away."

"Do you mean she waded through all that snow?"

"She must have. She tried to get to Mrs. Sedenka's to use their phone—you see, she was going to have a baby—and it certainly is a lucky thing that Bill Hicks came along just about then. He found her in a snowdrift. They carried her into Mrs. Sedenka's, and in a little while they got her to the hospital."

Anne was alarmed. "Where is Mrs. Sedenka's?"

"That house across the road and up on the bank." Mrs. Smedley pointed through the window.

Anne looked. Sedenka's was perhaps a hundred yards distant. It seemed incredible that Betsy, in her weakened condition, could have walked that far through the snow.

"She couldn't have!" Anne exclaimed "How is she?"

"Oh, dear, I'm worried about her, I have to admit!"

Anne saw she was getting nowhere. S brusquely took leave of Mrs. Smedley.

A familiar taxicab squirmed at the side the road, unable to negotiate a small ri The driver, the man who had brought An waved to her. Had circumstances been most anything else, Anne would have razz him mercilessly. But she was thankful to fi him. Without hesitation she went to the and pushed with all her might. The whe spun. The driver spoke to his car as he wou to a horse, and slowly the car pulled forwa free. Anne climbed in.

"Take me to Saint John's Hospital," s told him.

Marilyn fitted easily into Anne's apa ment and into the work Anne had outlin for her. She carefully dished out the salad lettuce leaves and placed the dishes in t refrigerator; she emptied the drawer of s verware, cleaned the drawer, polished t silverware and returned it; she washed all t dishes. Then she relaxed in a chair and look at the clock; it was four-thirty. The te phone rang.

It was a strange voice, thick and choke "Marilyn," it said, "the party's off. Ther a list in the table—call everybody. C Leonard and tell him to come home. I coming home." The voice trailed off, and t receiver clicked before Marilyn had a char to reply.

Marilyn sighed resignedly, wondered ju what had occurred to change Anne's min She called Leonard. "Anne seemed aw broken up about it," she warned him. S found the list in the tab drawer, and it was fi thirty before she finish her telephoning.

Leonard came in. Th chatted for a little, a then Anne arrived. H step on the stairs befo she opened the door w slow and lifeless. Leona had never seen her look beaten.

"Betsy's dead," Anne gasped. "She lay the snow so long. The baby's dead. Th operated to try to save it. It wasn't no us

Marilyn cried with her. Leonard had agonizing feeling that he should do sor thing, but he was at a loss to know wha might be. Marilyn had her arm arou Anne. She became more coherent and tal tive.

"I saw her when she was conscious, a I'm sure she knew me. Fred was there. didn't think he'd take it like he did. musta cared a lot more for her than thought. The baby was a girl. There j ain't anything fair about it. Betsy's had st a hell, but just yesterday she said she a Fred were getting along better. Everyth was going to be all right, then this had happen!"

That evening Leonard borrowed a sho and dug his car out of the snow. They dro to Fred's. It was more than a sympathy vi

"Fred," said Anne, "I have that dr Betsy liked so much. I wonder—do y want her to wear it?"

Fred did not comprehend. He was sitti on a kitchen chair by the stove. He look stunned and worried. Oddly enough it curred to Leonard for the first time that Fr was only about eighteen or nineteen ye old.

"I think Betsy would have wanted i Anne continued. "It's a nice dress. It loo lovely on her."

Fred nodded approval but did not spe Anne took the baby dress from a small sack her purse and displayed it.

"We were going to give it to her at t shower," she explained. "Do you want it the baby?"

Fred made a pretense of examining "Sure, Anne. You take care of it. I do know nothing about those things."

On their way back Anne said, "It seems awful and strange. It don't seem like it w me who used to come along here. It was j yesterday, but it seems like a million ye

6 MONTHS WORK
60 MINUTES!

That's right—
1 coat of lustrelast
DELUXE LINOLEUM LACQUER and linoleum
lishing is cut to twice a year!

* BRUSHES on in 10 minutes!
* WALK ON 40 to 50 minutes later!
* WIPES CLEAN with a damp cloth!
OLISHES, protects, eserves Linoleum!
* ECONOMICAL, waterproof, stainless, Non-skid!

A Product of Lakes Varnish Works, Inc.
ole National Distributors
HOWARD COMPANY
Michigan Avenue • Chicago 11

art looking action free..
Billyalls*

It's the garment both mothers and youngsters like—smart, good-looking, long-wearing, with freedom for real action. Western made; expertly tailored, adjustable shoulder straps. Sizes 2-8; about $2.25. Colors: tan, copen, maize, red, navy, brown.

Styled by Billy the Kid
IN SANFORIZED, FAST COLOR, RIEGEL TWILL.

Your orite e, or for name of nearest dealer.

HORTEX MANUFACTURING COMPANY, INC.
209 SOUTH OREGON ST., EL PASO, TEXAS

ago. It seems like there ought to be some thing I could do about it. And I can't get it through my head that there just isn't anything else."

"You did your share for Betsy. You did more than anyone."

The next morning Anne set up the ironing board and carefully pressed Betsy's and the baby's dresses. She placed them in a suit box, and with the box under her arm left for the Chambers Mortuary.

Seeing Betsy in the hospital had been unnerving. The baby had been taken from her, and Anne had talked to her, but Betsy was beyond answering. Anne had witnessed the dissolution: the faltering and weakening breathing, the strange aimless movements of the hands, the staring eyes. It was not the dying she had witnessed so many times in the movies; it was more horrible: the loss of co-ordination, the dying of one organ at a time, and finally the unspectacular stillness that came at an uncertain moment, and then the nurse firmly ushering Anne out of the room.

But the haunting picture of Betsy dying moved away. The acutely painful hurt became less painful but greater. Anne marshaled the smaller facts that made up the whole of her relationship with Betsy.

Betsy's locker at the high school had been close to Anne's, and one day Anne had borrowed some notebook paper from her; that is how the relationship started. It was rare for Betsy to show any independence; she tagged after Anne, letting Anne make the decisions and not complaining. She was the kind of adjunct whose presence is frequently forgotten but whose absence is immediately felt.

So immersed had Anne been in thoughts of Betsy that it had been a shock for her to receive, on the very day of Betsy's funeral, a cheery telephone call from Irene Frame. Irene demanded to know where Anne had been keeping herself, what she and Leonard were doing, and why didn't they come over. Of course Irene knew nothing of Betsy, and Anne had told her that she would call her back. Anne felt that she would never call Irene. She was thinking of the funeral, of the pitifully small number who had turned out. There were so many things to think of about Betsy.

But she remembered also that Leonard had said that she had done more than anyone else for Betsy, and she knew that it was true—and she was profoundly thankful that it was true.

Betsy's death caused some comment at Emerson High School, but it was forgotten shortly.

A much greater event was approaching—the Emerson-Decatur football game. Around that game a situation had developed that reached the pulpit, the press and the police court—a situation that caused the deepest concern in the hearts of all loyal Emerson High students.

Emerson High's team had had a most successful gridiron season, and the final game, the great Emerson-Decatur contest, must not be lost.

Several days before the game Brick Brown had, unfortunately, broken a date with Marybelle Crabb, pleading that the coach had sat down on him hard for breaking training rules. But Brick was seen that very evening with Beatrice Stone. Speed Cook, one of the students who had seen Beatrice and Brick together, had unintentionally mentioned the matter to Beatrice's steady boy friend, Irish Liskovosky, and Irish and Beatrice had a fight. The tension was augmented because Speed was riding on the running board of Brick's car and Brick was driving. Brick drove through a mud puddle, and Speed was drenched. The two came to hot words and then blows.

Speed and Irish Liskovosky collaborated on a plan that was perhaps a bit warped by the outraged feelings of the two. The plan consisted of placing a bottle of whisky in Brick Brown's locker, leaving the locker doors ajar, placing a broken liquor bottle on the floor in the middle of the hall, and beat-

How do you vote on this?

"This new cleaner's a wonder...the best for washing dishes!"

says MRS. H. F. DUNN of E. Hartford, Conn.

"The gentle suds of Ethyl Cleaner float away the heaviest grease from dishes, pots and pans in a jiffy!" (No messy scouring. Kinder to the hands than famous beauty soaps.

"Is that so? I believe Ethyl Cleaner's the best for fine fabrics!"

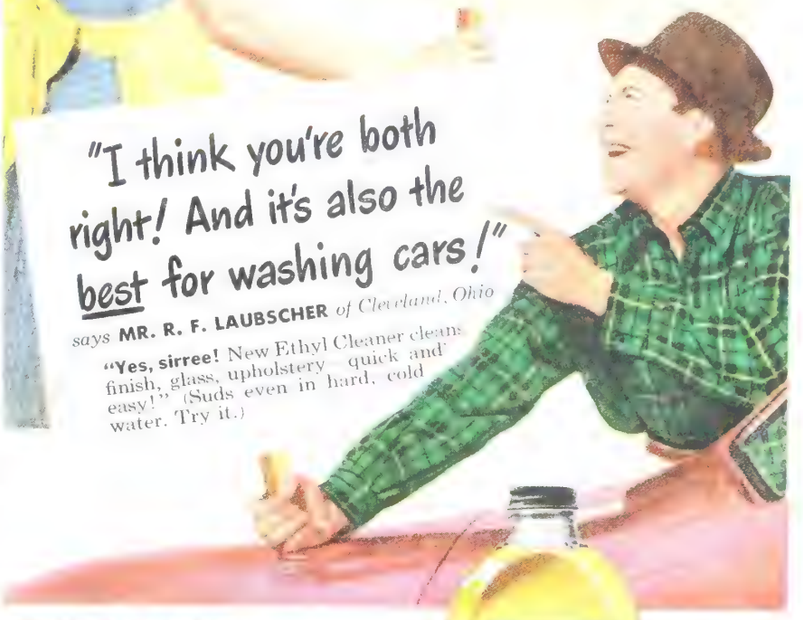
says MRS. M. WOLF of Kingston, N. Y.

"New Ethyl Cleaner keeps my nice things looking lovelier. It's grand for nylons and woolens, too!" Keeps colors bright. Leaves no soapy deposit.

"I think you're both right! And it's also the best for washing cars!"

says MR. R. F. LAUBSCHER of Cleveland, Ohio

"Yes, sirree! New Ethyl Cleaner cleans finish, glass, upholstery—quick and easy!" (Suds even in hard, cold water. Try it.)



EVERYONE AGREES...
New Ethyl Cleaner is best for so many things!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

AVAILABLE AT LEADING STORES AND AUTOMOBILE SERVICE STATIONS

You'll be so proud

of the bright new beauty
TAPPAN
gives your kitchen

SO PROUD of the better meals you'll prepare with far less work on your new Tappan

SO PROUD of the compliments Tappan ownership always brings

You'll be so glad of all the extra help TAPPAN gives you: Exclusive Tel-U-Set automatically times and signals...Storage and cutlery drawers, towel drier, condiment set—all thoughtfully provided to make the Tappan a marvel of convenience.

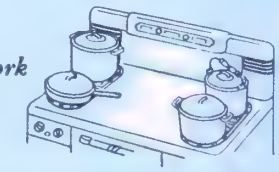
See your pies and cakes bake to a richer, tastier brown in the brilliant chrome Visualite oven!

Even with four large utensils, there's always plenty of work space on the famous Tappan Divided ÷ Top.



Specially engineered models for LP (bottled or tank) Gas.
Dept. J, The Tappan Stove Company, established 1881, Mansfield, Ohio.

TAPPAN

EVERY ... RANGE

ing it. The plan was to do this about four-thirty.

The initial stages of the plan worked nicely. Only when it came to leaving the broken liquor bottle, did they meet trouble. They had the bottle, but had neglected to break it. Irish hurled the bottle, and they fled.

Miss Cushman, working late, heard the crash and stepped to her door. She recognized the boys.

The upshot of this affair was that Frederick Hopkins, principal of Emerson High School, expelled Brick, Irish and Speed. All were first-line gridmen. With the great Emerson-Decatur game but a few days off, imagine, if you can, the howling consternation at Emerson High School. Petitions were circulated among the students, angry meetings were held, Frederick Hopkins found it necessary to hire a police guard to protect his house. The affair reached the front page of the Westrom Record.

Anne and Leonard were visiting Dean and Irene Frame. Anne and Irene were in the living room, the men in the basement.

"What's keeping them, anyhow?" asked Anne. Leonard and Dean had left the card game when Irene had gone to the kitchen to get the coffee started.

"Oh, you get Dean started talking about those machines of his and he never knows when to quit."

"Well, you've gotta humor them," Anne opined.

"I know, but the other night Dean got to messing around with those machines and blew out a fuse. Still," Irene conceded, "he built a mighty cute birdhouse. He set it up on a pole, and put tin around the pole so the cat next door can't get to it."

"Sometimes I think men have more brains than we give them credit for," said Anne. "Leonard built me a shelf for my vacuum cleaner. Did you know he got me a vacuum cleaner?"

"No!"

"He did. One of those bullet-shaped things you kick along the floor. It's swell."

There was a shuffle of feet on the cellar steps, the sound of masculine voices.

"Hey!" Anne shouted. "We looked at your cards, and Rosie and I are going to take you two for a cleaning."

"You ought to see the setup Dean has down there," said Leonard. "A jigsaw and a sander and a lathe."

They played cards, but presently Anne heard a noise, glanced out the window. "Is that company?" she asked.

"No," said Irene. "Mr. Hopkins lives across the street. There's been a lot of fuss going on over there the last several nights."

"Hopkins, the principal of Emerson?" asked Anne.

"I guess so."

"Did you read about it?" asked Dean. "He expelled three of their best football players, and they have a game coming up."

Anne glanced up from her cards. "Expelled? Why?"

"I saw something about it," said Leonard. "Liquor on the school premises, wasn't it?"

"I guess so," said Irene.

Dean went to the window. "There's a sign. Brick, Speed, Irish. Come and look." They crowded around the window.

Cars were lined up for the better part of the block. Aside from some horn honking, most of the noise had subsided, for three squad cars had arrived. The police had, however, permitted two members of the student body, a boy and a girl, on the porch to ring the doorbell.

The two couples left the window and sat down at the card table. "When did they begin letting kids out after dark?" asked Anne. "Hey—who snitched my joker?"

"That means she has the joker," said Leonard, who had the joker himself.

In the meantime, the crowd had discovered that Mr. Hopkins was not at home and the procession was moving away, scattering, and soon there was quiet.

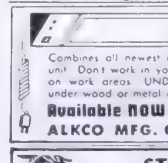
"I'm glad that racket's over," said Anne. "Say, who dealt this phooey hand?"

It's really so easy to choose your pattern and color scheme from the big array of new Fincastle fabrics now in your dealer's hands. Ask to see them for every home need—draperies, slip covers, upholstering, and a host of other uses. They're new in styling, new in color, and so reasonably priced!

Fincastle FABRICS
LOUISVILLE TEXTILES, INC., LOUISVILLE, KY

BE WISE SELL INDIVIDUAL 5¢ AND 10¢ GREETING CARDS
COST YOU ... UP
Extra money quick. Up to 100% profit. Extra bonus. Large variety Birthday, Gift Wrappings, Correspondence Notes assortments. Send at once for FREE catalog of wonderful year 'round money making line, super value assortments and FREE samples nationally advertised stationery. Request special feature $1.00 All Occasion assortment on approval.
19 NEW 1947
$1.00 & 60¢ ASSORTMENTS
30¢ EACH UP
Special Offers
FREE SAMPLES 50 for $1.00 PERSONAL STATIONERY
NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHERS
BOX A, NORTH ABINGTON, MASS.

MONEY QUICK
Sell GREETING CARDS AND PERSONAL STATIONERY
New 1947 line. Just show friends, [illegible] All-Occasion assortment retail Sales for only $1.00. Your mark-up [illegible] per box. Also [illegible] Gift Wrapping, [illegible] Name Imprinting, Gift Wrapping, [illegible] offer. Write for Feature Everyday assortment on approval in U.S.A. Personal Stationery, sample portfolio
FREE SAMPLES PERSONAL STATIONERY
Elmira Greeting Card Co., Dept. M-201, Elmira, N. Y.



NEW UNDER-CABINET KITCHEN LITE
Combines all newest refinements in kitchen lighting in one practical unit. Don't work in your own shadow! Enjoy glare free diffused light on work areas. UNDER-CABINET KITCHEN LITE is easy to mount under wood or metal cabinets or to any wall in your present kitchen.
Available NOW at appliance shops everywhere
ALKCO MFG. CO., CHICAGO 16, ILLINOIS

STRAWBERRY PLANTS
Our FREE Berry Book Tells about All of

MRS. CHRISTIANSEN'S HARVEST

(Continued from Page 72)

were a quarter of a mile away over a rough rocky road.

Now Selma got up before it was light and went down alone to the fields, carrying two pails. Somewhere a dog barked, and once a heron flew up and frightened her nearly out of her wits. But she went on till she reached the familiar fields and could fill her pails and bring them back. The road back was much longer and the pails seemed determined to pull her down to earth, but the road back was filled with hope and somehow her frail shoulders supported their burden. By the end of the week she had made a tiny plot of earth, a garden.

The day came when she could plant her seeds. "Poppies and Marigolds" it said on the envelope. How she wondered what poppies and marigolds would turn out to be! What color? What shape? She sat for a moment with the package in her hands, hardly breathing, her blue eyes black with excitement. The time for sowing the magic had come.

But for some reason her father got up early on that morning, and, pushing open the door, was startled to see the tiny figure bent down over the rocks in an attitude like prayer. His voice boomed out, harsh with surprise:

"What are you doing?"

"Oh, father," she said, her voice full of pleading, "I'm making a little garden. I've been carrying earth from the field ——"

Did he hesitate for one second, seeing his youngest gaze up at him with all the vulnerable human hope in the world? If he did, no one would ever know. His voice was iron.

"You'll have to take the earth back. We haven't time for such things here," and then, as the blue eyes filled with tears she was too proud to shed, he added, "Give me those," and took the magic out of her hands.

They were a family of few words. Selma carried the heavy pails down the rocky road again, one by one, with every one pulling her down into despair, her stomach a knot of misery and anger. Her mother tried to comfort her, but she did not even cry, just pushed away, her heart burning with the determination to grow up quickly and escape.

Whether it was from sweating in the dark cold mornings or from a brain fever, no one knew, but she came down with a fever almost at once. She lay for weeks on a mattress by the stove, too ill even to slap at the flies that crawled over her face. And when her brothers brought her wild flowers she turned her face away. But she kept herself alive with two words which she never spoke aloud: "poppies" and "marigolds."

And when, years later, she was working for an old lady in an American village by the sea—for she did escape—and when Jan Christiansen asked her to marry him, her first question was, "Can I have a garden, Jan?" And only when he had said "Yes," and laughed with the pleasure of giving her whatever she wanted, did she answer that she would be his wife.

It was strange now that so many years after all that childish bitterness was past, it should come back and haunt her, so much so that she associated it with the pain in her back. I never thought of all that till I began to have this pain, she told herself. It seemed like a premonition. And if I should die, she thought with a pang, what will happen to my flowers?

"Well, well, Selma"—it was Jan, pushing open the door—"sitting still for once?" But the voice was gentle and kind, so kind and gentle that for once the strong firm figure leaned against him for comfort.

"Help me up, Jan." She smiled a little grimly. "I can't seem to get up by myself."

"It's time you gave it up, Selma," Jan said gravely, and she knew it was true.

The doctor insisted that she be taken to the hospital. "As long as she lies there where she can look out, she'll worry herself to death about those flowers. She's tired out, Jan."

So once more, for the second time in her life, Selma Christiansen lay in bed after sunrise, and all day long. She was such a quiet patient, her face so clear and brown and quiet, that the nurses loved her. They came in now and then just to take a look at her, and to hear her talk about the great bunches of flowers which Jan brought in to her every day.

Neither despise nor oppose what thou dost not understand. —WILLIAM PENN.

"The larkspur is pretty," she would say, "that pale-blue kind. See the dark spot the stamens make—they call that 'the bee'—pretty things," she would say. She had had so little time in all the years to look at her flowers the way people did who could afford to buy them. Now she slept and woke and looked and then slept again.

They did not tell her that it was cancer and that she hadn't long to live. But they told Jan it was a mercy she suffered so little. "She must have an iron will to have held out so long."

"We're a strong-willed people," Jan answered with pride, "we Finns."

And when he came to her every evening on his way back from work, she always greeted him with a smile she had saved up all day. And once she said to him:

"It's the harvest, Jan—it's the harvest of that little plot of earth my father wouldn't let me have." For she had told him the story only now since she had been in the hospital. "Now I have it at last. But wouldn't he be shocked, though, to see such luxury all around me? And wouldn't he think it a sin?"

She smiled again, a mischievous smile, and then laid a strong brown hand in Jan's, as if they were making a pact together against death, that other kind of death, the death of the heart. Beside that, this physical death seemed little to bear. Her heart would lift the weight of it without breaking as it had lifted the heavy pails of earth long ago.

IN THE GROOVE

(Continued from Page 75)

"a poor sugar season" this year. Same old excuse. And all on account of this miserable month. No, sir, I'm not having any—I'm going to skip March from now on.

One cheering thought. One sweet consolation in all this—and I haven't spoken of the worst aspects of this month—is that we can still eat. And, in that way, mitigate to some extent the troubles that beset us. I don't know of any month when the ability to eat doesn't help to assuage the pangs of existence in some small way at least. But it does seem to me that when it's dreariest outside, it's cheeriest inside, especially when

Right in the groove. This is no time for dalliance with a cold soup and a salad. No time for a waffle and a bit of iced fruit. This is the season for the hottest, heartiest, most filling and ample sort of dish you can think up.

And, right in the groove, as they say in the circles in which I move, is the sort of provender I am about to tell you about at this point.

Take it piece by piece. To start off with you may look on the cheese when it isn't just cheese, but a sort of glorified dream dish

So you think you're good at the sink?

THEN TEST THIS BETTER WAY TO CLEAN POTS AND PANS

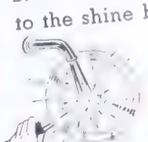
ALL YOU NEED—

With a black pot, greasy skillet or dull pan—you can prove S.O.S. is the one cleanser you need for all those pesky jobs. Handy, too—with soap right in the pad!

HERE'S ALL YOU DO—

DIP the edge of an S.O.S. pad in water. Instantly, the magic S.O.S. combination of grease-cutting and scouring materials is ready to go to work.

RUB briskly over scorches, stains or crusted food. Good-by all! And if the problem is grease, S.O.S. cuts through it in no time to the shine beneath.



RINSE—and the job's done—the shine is there. Easily—quickly! Get long-lasting S.O.S. today and make

The New

PREMIER DUPLEX

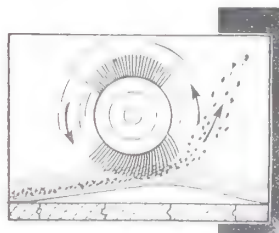
adjusts itself automatically to any rug, thick or thin... ends stooping

Of course, you want the latest work-saver in your new vacuum cleaner!

Premier Duplex has it. This new model automatically adjusts itself to any floor surface. You don't have to stoop to adjust it.

This improvement is just one reason for selecting the Premier Duplex. Another: Premier's Vibra-Sweep Action swiftly removes even the most deeply embedded grit—thoroughly—safely!

Ask your Premier dealer to demonstrate the new floor- and also the cylinder-type models. When you buy a vacuum cleaner, you want the best. So—wait for a Premier in case your dealer hasn't a complete stock today. But place your order now. Premiers are sold by authorized retail stores exclusively.



THE SECRET of Premier efficiency is its 3-way Vibra-Sweep Action. This agitates the rug on a "cushion of air" bringing even hidden grit to the surface and removing it!

Premier clean is Completely clean

With your new Premier Duplex, you'll want Premier Attachments—so easily connected, so easy to use in whisking away all dirt above the floor. Because of the tremendous demand, you may have to wait for these. But place your order; refuse to accept substitutes and bound to bring you close to guest and greeter. It's a self-server, too, and you should have an unlimited output. And it must be as tangy as March weather and as comforting as a fire on the hearth and slippers by the chair. Do you get it?

PREMIER VACUUM CLEANERS · CLEVELAND 10, OHIO

ANCHOVY CHEESE

To 1 pound cottage cheese add 4 drained anchovies, shredded fine, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley (it has to be, so don't say a word), 2 tablespoons minced chives or onion, and 1 teaspoon poppy seeds. If no poppy seeds are in the bank, forget them. Mix well and season to taste with a little salt and plenty of black pepper. The anchovies help salt the mixture, but you taste it before you make up your mind. Heap the cheese in the center of a serving dish. Surround with Melba toast. Have plenty of butter spreaders so everyone can spread his own toast. (One spreader to a person is plenty; more are only temptatious.)

Next on the agenda. The main reason for this supper has now to be introduced into the conversation. Men love this dish—or are credited with so doing, and probably they do. I guess most everyone gets along pretty comfortably with it, and right at this time of the year it's a welcome addition to your repertory, but it would never do on the Fourth of July. So don't file it away, in your mind, for any but cold-weather eating. And it's only a good old-time beef stew, swaggering around under the more or less familiar name of goulash. Gone Hungarian on you, that's all. But here's the receipt—so go ahead.

BEEF GOULASH WITH NOODLES

Have 4 pounds beef cut as you do for any stew. A goulash is a stew with a slight disguise. Season the pieces with salt and pepper. Dredge with flour. Brown the beef on all sides in hot shortening or salad oil. Add 2 cloves garlic, minced, 2 cups chopped onions and 5 tablespoons paprika. (Five is right. Sounds desperate, but it's O.K.) Add 1 quart water, ¼ cup tomato paste (back on the market now); cover tightly and simmer about 2 hours, or until the meat is very tender. Lift out the meat, skim off all the fat. Add a can of beef broth to the gravy if there doesn't seem to be enough. (And there seldom is, for the gravy is the best part.) Cook 1½ packages wide noodles in boiling salted water until tender. Drain. Rinse with boiling water. (This gets rid of the blanket of starch, as you know.) Add the noodles to the beef and gravy, mix well. Put in a casserole. Serve when it's ready, or keep it hot in a moderate oven, 350° F., for a few minutes. (Or until you can drag them to the table.)

High style. On the up-and-up is the lovely salad that goes with our supper. Very high style and all that sort of thing, you know. One of the nice things about this whole supper is that almost everything can be gotten ready the day before, and certain sure you can polish off what you've left until the morning of The Day. Only the coffee and the hot French bread have to come along at the last, and what are they in a girl's life? Just what they are, that's all. Hot coffee and hot French bread!

As to the salad, it's different—in a nice way, of course—from most other salads, and putting it together to look as orderly and formal as you find it in the picture is just fun. Maybe you'll dream up an even handsomer plan. I wouldn't know. But this is ours:

ASPARAGUS TIPS AND CELERY HEARTS VINAIGRET

Cook 2 cartons frozen asparagus according to the directions on the pack Drain and chill. Remove the outer st from 4 bunches celery. Cook the ce hearts (getting rid of the bridal bouq on the tops) in consommé or bouillon til just tender. Chill the celery heart the consommé and drain well. Split celery hearts in half, lengthwise. Mari the split celery stalks and the aspara tips overnight in French dressing. Arra the whole array on salad greens. Gar the asparagus with finely chopped or gr hard-cooked eggs. Sprinkle the ce hearts with freshly ground pepper from pepper mill. Radishes look well with salad, but if they aren't about, d worry. Some little hothouse toma neatly stuffed, are pretty elegant.

Such a delicious thing. If there's dessert I like better than most others, ex ice cream (and I want coffee ice cream that), it is coffee jelly—made right, mo well and truly, and carrying along wit rich, clear, tempting flavor a rich cus or a highly flav whipped cream. S very cold—serve l custard and cr if you're so min If your guests a bit like me, the be no complaints.

SPICED COFFEE JEL

Add 3 whole cl and 1½ sticks cin mon to 6 cups strong hot cof Simmer 10 minu Strain throug cheesecloth—do one too. Add 1 sugar and 3 ta spoons (3 envelo unflavored gel softened in ½ cold water. Stir til the gelatin is solved. Chill u the jelly begin set. Stir in 1 ta spoon minced served ginger an cup toasted, sliv Brazil nuts. D add the nuts w they're hot. J slow up the wh thing, so let th cool off first. C the jelly until very firm, break it into crystals with a ver fork, and serve in a bowl with a tard sauce. Flavor your custard with nilla. But now that you can have whip cream, what's wrong with that?

SNOB

At Cambridge University during the seventeenth century it was decided to admit some of the common people as students. When they registered they were required to indicate their social position with the Latin phrase sine nobilitas. This phrase was abbreviated on the records to sine nob., then to s. nob., and finally to snob. At Cambridge today the term "snob" is still commonly used to distinguish between the student permitted to wear a gown, and called a gownsman; and a commoner, ordinarily called a townsman. Since these commoners took great delight in rubbing elbows with the students of higher social status, the term gradually came to have the signification of affectation of learning and social position one does not merit or deserve.

—DAVID T. ARMSTRONG.

Specialty of the house. Every kitc should sport a "specialty." Make it a s a hot bread, a sauce or dessert; let it known that, whatever it is, it will proba be on hand whenever there are guests. H more than one specialty if you wish, whatever you do, make your specialty to your reputation.

I knew a woman, many years ago, made the most divine lemon-meringue p They became her as an ermine wrap beco a young beauty at the opera. It was a lu day for anyone who was invited to house, because he or she knew that specialty was bound to show up.

So, whether it's angel cake or mas potatoes, get yourself a reputation for m ing one dish perfectly and serving it with fail when guests are there. That will be y specialty, and by your works shall you known. So here's a hint. Why not hav very special cake that isn't a cake for y pet notion? Try the orange crumbles. T may make you famous.

ORANGE CRUMBLES

Cook ½ cup pitted dates, cut fine, w ½ cup orange juice (stirring occasiona to form a thick, smooth paste. C slightly, add 1 tablespoon grated ora

(Continued on Page 178)

Make good cooks experts—cooking more fun!
Utensils with TRIPLE-THICK BOTTOMS

TRIPLE-THICK BOTTOM

The greatest utensil improvement in years—easily identified by the ridge. Cooks better, wears longer, better balanced because weight is in the bottom. Heat resistant, easy to clean, with a brilliant lasting finish. Bakelite handles protect against heat.

NO HOT SPOTS
NO SCORCHING
PERFECT FOR
"WATERLESS" COOKING

With triple-thick bottoms and Lifetime precision-fit moisture-seal covers you can cook the "waterless" way . . . get tastier vegetables, rich, even browning when you want it. Never before have there been utensils [illegible]

RECESSED COVER KNOBS
FOR EASY STACKING

Stack the utensils together on the stove to keep foods warm—stack them in the closet to save space. See these Reynolds Lifetime Aluminum utensils the next time you're in a leading department or housefurnishings store.

REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

Lifetime guarantee! If you are in any way dissatisfied with your Reynolds Lifetime Triple-Thick-Bottom Utensils, send them back and they will be returned like new, or replaced —without charge. Reynolds Metals Co., Housewares Division, Louisville 1, Ky.

REYNOLDS Lifetime ALUMINUM UTENSILS
TRIPLE-THICK BOTTOM • GUARANTEED FOR LIFE

REYNOLDS METALS

Happy the Bride Who Remembers

IT'S SMART TO CHOOSE THE FINEST STERLING

Gracious living, these days, is more a matter of how you live—than where you live. That's why choosing the finest sterling is so important. It makes hospitality luxurious—anywhere. So choose Reed & Barton sterling as so many brides have done for over a century and a quarter. Reed & Barton offer many lovely flatware designs and magnificent tea services. It costs very little more to own the best.

HELPFUL HOSTESS HINTS. For fascinating and valuable booklet, "How To Be A Successful Hostess", send 10 cents to Reed & Barton Box 970, Department L, Taunton, Massachusetts.

Reed & Barton
STERLING SILVER

(Continued from Page 176)

peel. Cream ¼ cup butter or margarine. Add gradually ½ cup sugar. Cream together as you'd do for cakes. Beat in 1 egg. Sift together 1 cup cake flour, ¼ teaspoon baking soda, ½ teaspoon baking powder and a little salt. Add alternately to the creamed mixture with ¼ cup orange juice. Beat until smooth after each addition. Spread out in a greased shallow pan. (I mean a jelly-roll kind of pan.) Spread the date paste in a thin layer over the cake batter. Cover with ¾ cup crushed corn flakes. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., about 25 minutes. Cut in squares while hot. Keep them quite small.

From time to time I'll take up this spe cialty business and we'll see what we sha see—whatever that means.

One last word. But not of advice. Leav that to the wise and prudent, which I ar not and cannot be. But—it will be wonde ful to see the rose trees and sweet almon in bud. And what a pull with the apple tre a few hours of sunshine have. And if we g three feet of snow before the week is ove remember that snow isn't like stone. Sno endureth for a day—but stone may last million years.

OUR READERS WRITE US

(Continued from Page 8)

not?" I have had to meet and reply to it often, and the answer I have found is convincing enough to return a resolute "I won't" on every occasion.

The girl that I am going to marry and I, like everyone in love, are finding it hard to wait. It would not be difficult to slip away for a night, and through a careful use of birth control the danger could be at least minimized. We are so much in love that we might be tempted to take the risk. But we won't, because we have ourselves to live with for the rest of our lives.

In many youthful groups sexual experience is a highly glamorous thing, enhancing the prestige of the guilty, and those who have dared it are lionized and emulated by their friends. The movies have hinted at it, large segments of literature seem to condone it, prosperous industries derive their incomes from tempting us to it. The loosening of the apron strings, the apparent safeguard offered by birth control, make it seem, for a deed so strenuously tabooed, fantastically easy to get away with.

So it is up to us. If we fashion and adhere to an intelligent moral code of our own, if we realize that happiness is possible only through doing what we ourselves believe in, we will grow up in self-respect and in the quiet joy which that feeling brings. The answer is not in the power of the older generation; our parents have done for us what they can. The answer is in ourselves.

Sincerely,
P. Y. B.

How About That!

Des Moines, Iowa.

Dear Editors: In regard to left-handed people writing "upside down," my 3½-year-old daughter started drawing and "writing" over a year ago. I purposely would place her paper at an angle just the opposite of the way I write, thinking that in this way I could prevent the "upside down writing." At other times I let her place the paper to suit herself.

The result is this: She writes upside down, just like every other southpaw I ever saw! Sincerely, MRS. E. W. CHERRY.

Crime and Hypnotism

New York City.

Dear Sir: I would like to direct your attention to some misinformation conveyed by What Do You Know About Hypnotism? which appeared in the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

1. "The hypnotized individual will not do anything contrary to his moral code. . . . TRUE."

The subject is highly debatable, but most experimental evidence leads to the opposite conclusion. Wells, for example, in Experiments in the Hypnotic Production of Crime, concludes, "This investigation has been devoted to the problem of whether a hypnotized subject who is of noncriminal character can be made to commit real crime. The answer, on the basis of the actual experimental achievement of this result, is most emphatically in the affirmative."

2. "A person can be hypnotized without his knowledge. . . . FALSE."

This is another questionable conclusion. Persons who have been hypnotized at one time often go under at other times when sleep suggestions are made to near-by subjects.

3. "Actual tests prove that the mentally deranged are difficult or impossible to hypnotize."

This is a misleading oversimplification. Wohlberg's book, Hypnoanalysis, treats of the cure of a hebephrenic dementia praecox case with hypnosis. G. W. Williams (A Study of Three Psychotic Groups to a Test of Suggestibility, Journal of General Psychology, 7, 302–309, 1932) found a 54 per cent positive response in paranoiacs. If the author intends the neuroses to be included under this heading, it should be pointed out that clinical experience shows hysterics to be among the most easily hypnotizable of all groups.

Yours very truly,
ROBERT W. MARKS.

50% Live on Less Than $2000 a Year

Coatesville, Pennsylvania.

Editor: I am one of your ardent readers and subscribers and read every one of your How America Lives. However, I find that I could live in luxury on any of the salaries of the families listed. Don't you think the people of America would like to know how people manage to build a home

Norma and Joseph Flowers

raise two children, can over 300 quarts of fruit and vegetables, and live very happily on only $2368.60 a year with no extra income? And meet doctor's bills and medical expenses for a semisick wife and mother every week? And when have you printed a story of colored people? You know you do have a lot of colored readers and admirers. Sincerely yours,
JOSEPH AND NORMA FLOWERS.

See August, 1942, for story of a colored family. ED.

More and Better

Hawthorne, California.

Dear Editors: Due to your tremendous price increase, I deliberated two months before finally deciding to renew my subscription.

I had been purchasing from the newsstands your popular rivals—ones who have also increased prices with you. If any of you rate my quarter—you get it! At least I cannot cover the JOURNAL in an evening. There is just more to it—and generally of better quality. Sincerely yours,
MRS. DAN F. HAYS.

Due to paper shortage, JOURNAL circulation will be held to around 4,750,000—we're glad you got your copy. ED.

Let's have the cheer of colorful meals

But there's more than cheery color to Green Giant Brand peas. There's a one-and-only tenderness and flavor.

glass swan holds pale gold mayonnaise red of lobster is sharpened by wedges of
on. And in this interestingly patterned dish he fresh green of Green Giant Brand peas put a touch of summer on the meal

At one brief moment in the pea vine's green growing, its tender pods hold peas of perfect flavor. A few hours earlier, the flavor sweetness is undeveloped. A few hours later, it is gone. Science and a tenderometer have found a way to chart that moment of peak flavor for our very special peas (pioneered by the famous breed S-537). That is when we gather them—that is why we get them into the cans within three hours from the vine. "Picked and packed at the fleeting moment of perfect flavor" isn't easy to do. But you can tell it's there in the tender, delicate eating you get in Green Giant Brand peas.

Minnesota Valley Canning Company, headquarters, Le Sueur, Minnesota; Fine Foods of Canada, Ltd., Tecumseh, Ontario

Green Giant Peas

BRAND

MEANS OF "GREEN GIANT" BRAND REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

There's peace of mind...
unclouded by sombre skies or heavy rains...for those who know the casket of a water in the ground by a
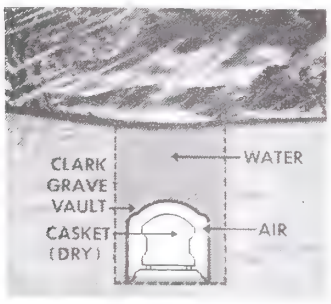
Clark Metal Grave Vault



Placed over the casket, the Clark Metal Grave Vault is scientifically designed to use the pressure of air in the dome to keep seeping water from the rains and melting snows from reaching the casket.

Your funeral director will gladly show you stately, beautiful Clark Vaults within your means. All made of enduring metal instead of porous material. And available in styles armored with 25 to 35 lbs. of zinc by Clark's exclusive process to insure up to 2 to 5 times as long-lasting protection as the same vault uncoated.

Write for FREE 28-page booklet, "My Duty." Tells what to do when you are asked to "make charge." Over a million copies distributed. The Clark Grave Vault Co., Dept. E-37, Columbus, O.

Copyrighted, 1935

CLARK GRAVE VAULTS

THE FINEST TRIBUTE . . . THE MOST TRUSTED PROTECTION

THERE IS A WAY OUT

(Continued from Page 45)

other facts that cannot be measured by any economic rule. How, for instance, can we measure the bitter discouragement and oppressive worry that strikes bring to countless homes, or estimate the impact on the hearts of children of the empty Christmas stockings that resulted from the strikes of last December?

Put in these terms—and they are justifiable—it makes one wonder how such conditions were ever permitted to develop in America, or, having developed, why they have been permitted to continue.

Whole communities have been made to suffer. Food has been kept from those who needed it. Many have been injured—even members of the public who have had no connection with or responsibility for the difficulties that have arisen, and no influence that could have aided in their solution. The Government now and again has found it necessary to restrict vital services—the railroads, for instance—because of this recurrent strife. And millions of dollars in cash, in products and in services have been lost to us—to all of us, strikers, nonstrikers and employers alike—because of these unnecessary struggles; lost, too, in a way that can never be made up, for time—time lost from the job, time that should have been given to constructive work, time that, properly used, could so greatly have benefited mankind—is one thing that can never be made up.

There is, unfortunately, a somewhat widespread idea that these feuds and brawls that arise between labor and management are the affairs of no one else. Those who hold this belief seem to imagine that the public has no more right to enter the contest than the occupants of the stands have to take part in a football game. And it must be admitted that where the public interest is not affected, that is true. But when, as seems to be happening with more and more frequency of late, strikes are able to interfere with the rights and the convenience of hundreds of thousands of "disinterested" people, or are able to interrupt the vital activities of great cities or even of the nation, it is time to point out that no government is worthy of the name unless it sees to it that the public welfare, whenever it is seriously involved, takes precedence over the desires of any lesser group.

The night before the première of his great opera, Don Giovanni, Mozart went to a party and had to be sent home to write out the overture, so that it could be copied and played the next evening. He sat up all night, with his wife telling him stories to keep him awake. The overture was finished, but it was played at sight, with the ink still wet upon the pages.

—SIGMUND SPAETH: Stories Behind the World's Great Music (Whittlesey House).

HERE and there some extremist will say that any such view is ultraconservative—even reactionary. But Woodrow Wilson, whose liberalism is proof against attack, made this point clear in reference to a situation that was somewhat similar to several that have arisen recently.

"The difficulty," he said in 1916, "about situations like that we have passed through is this: that the main partner is left out of the reckoning. These men were dealing with one another as if the only thing to settle was between themselves; whereas, the real thing to settle was what rights had the hundred million people of the United States. The business of government is to see that no other organization is as strong as itself; to see that nobody or group of men, no matter what their private interests, may come into competition with the authority of society."

And the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, another liberal of unimpeachable record, made an even stronger statement of the same kind. "I have no doubt," he wrote, "that when the power either of capital or labor is asserted in such a way as to attack the life of the community, those who seek their private interest at such cost are public enemies and should be dealt with as such."

On the other hand, it seems fair to say that we should not be too harsh with those who follow what they assume to be their interests beyond limits that society has not yet u equivocally set. To a very considerable d gree, the fault lies with society for permitti striking tugboat men and truckmen in Ne York, striking employees of the power plar of Pittsburgh, striking merchant sailo coal miners and others to interfere so great with the rights and the convenience of t public and the nation.

Even labor itself has begun to see t dangers that are inherent in the prese situation, and though most labor lead object strenuously to the proposal I ha made, some favor it.

"THE simple truth is," says The Wh Collar Unionist, of Pittsburgh, "that t only fair way of deciding a dispute is to su mit it to the judicature of a fair and i partial tribunal. . . . However, labor shou not be denied its constitutional right strike unless a court of competent lab judges—who will not be bound by unic management or political pressure—can established where the union and manag ment may air their differences and t scales of justice will be balanced in favor the righteous group.

"True, boards of competent labor judg will not be infallible. Mistakes of judgme will occur now and then. . . . But in t long run, they will yield a larger measure justice to both capital and labor than t present irrational method of hurling brick tear gas and bullets at one another. A aroused public opini that will insist upon t establishment of a lab court to handle all lab disputes, with special f cilities for getting at the facts, will go a lo way toward meeting t growing epidemic of strik with all their fright wastefulness, their v lence and bloodshed, a their threat to the orde processes of law and go ernment."

And The International Teamster, the official ma azine of the International Brotherhood of Teamste in pointing out that "strikes are a natio menace," goes on to say that "they must curtailed or the nation will sink into cha and organized labor will perish."

Such viewpoints, of course, can hardly said to be typical among those who repres labor. The excessive powers and privileg that have come into labor's hands in rece years will be no more willingly released th were those that were formerly held by ca ital. It is even contended by some that su authority as I propose for our courts wou interfere with fundamental rights that a vital to labor's welfare—the right to strik for instance. But that right is so frequent referred to without any understanding of true meaning that it may serve some usef purpose to examine it.

As we now conduct our affairs in the Unit States, labor is the sole judge of whether not it has reason to call a strike. But it axiomatic that no one has the unquestion right to be the sole judge of his actions they may result in injury to others. Furthe more, no right is absolute, and this right strike cannot be held to exceed the co munity's—or even the individual's—right the necessities of life.

I realize that in certain instances strik may be justifiable, just as war may be. B strikes, which, in principle, should be t very last resort, are, in the hands of certa labor leaders, frequently the first. And seems clear to me that no strike, in and itself, can possibly be considered a desirab thing. After all, a strike is nothing but a r version to force, the whole unreasonab idea being to beat sweet reason into t heads of employers who, on grounds th may be good, bad or indifferent, believe, pretend to believe, that the claims made by the strikers are excessive. Now and again, perhaps, some employer will grant just claims only when faced by overwhelming force in this form, but such tough and unimaginative characters are rare. And when we realize that strikes are very often "settled" for no better reason than that one side or the other is the more powerful, it seems reasonable to me to look about for some means of handling labor's problems that will result less frequently either in the desire or the need to strike.

It is well to point out, too, that my proposal would not eliminate the right to strike. This right, however, were our courts given the proper authority, would become nothing more than an academic abstraction, for the right to strike is of value only when some proper end of importance can be attained in no other way, and labor, were it given this infinitely better method of attaining its just ends, would be without the necessity for strikes.

There is also the matter of injunctions, to the use of which, in labor disputes, much objection has been made. It must be admitted that in the somewhat distant past, injunctions were frequently and sometimes unfairly issued as restraints on labor. It was because of this that the Norris-LaGuardia Act was enacted, practically eliminating the use of injunctions in labor disputes, even in emergencies. Had it not been that the Government, at the time of the recent coal strike, was, at least technically, operating the mines, there is a definite possibility that Judge Goldsborough, under the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, could not have issued any restraining order whatever, and certainly he could not have done so without hearings that would have been immensely prolonged and time-consuming.

WERE our courts to be given the responsibilities I suggest, therefore, it would be necessary, in the interests of justice, to modify the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. It is my belief that the act must be redrafted and that it must permit more promptness in the issuance of injunctions when the public interest is seriously involved.

It is natural, also, to ask what would occur were a union to refuse to be governed by a decision of such a court, but the answer is reasonably simple. The court's decisions, except as they would be subject to possible reversal upon appeal, would have the weight of law, and would consequently be enforced by the constituted authority.

It is an odd fact that some labor leaders, and even some employers, who have expressed their objections to the suggestion I have made, have aimed their criticisms primarily at the courts themselves, overlooking the fact that the decisions of any proper court must be based upon the law as Congress spreads it upon our statute books. On that account it is not the courts that anyone need fear; for when, as now and again happens, they fall into error, higher courts are happily prone to right the wrong. But if labor continues to demand an unfairly privileged position in our society, as it has been doing with much force of late, the public, in the absence of an impartial court before which labor may state its case, is likely ultimately to demand of Congress such laws as will eliminate not merely labor's unfair privileges, but some of its just rights as well.

Even the courts, of course, will not instantly solve every problem that may arise in the field of labor relations, for we are confronted with the necessity of developing a smoothly working economic and industrial system on the gigantic scale our immense affairs call for. And at the same time we must adequately protect the rights and freedom of the individual, whether he be employee, employer or disinterested member of society. But were the courts to be properly authorized to operate in this field, they would at once begin to restrain the arbitrary and antisocial forces that are so frequently at work. In the past, employers sometimes held what amounted to arbitrary power. Of late, we have somewhat hurriedly transferred such power to organized labor. And any thoughtful

More freedom in your foxtrot, too, when you wear this Real-form Panty Girdle! Raschel-knitted of Lastex and DuPont rayon, it's fashioned to fit with ont and back rayon satin Lastex panels for up and down stretch. Won't ride up or roll, guaranteed non-run. Sizes: 26-32. Also comes in girdle style.

JUST $6.00

Real In-Form-ation! Send 25¢ in coin stamps for the Arthur Murray Dance Book. Real-form Girdle Co. Dept. 3L, 358 Fifth Avenue, New York 1

Are you really sure of your present deodorant? Test it against Fresh
See for yourself why more and more women are switching to Fresh—the new cream deodorant they find the most effective and so safe

Use FRESH and be lovelier to love

Lovely to know . . . that you can really rely on Fresh. Fresh contains the most effective perspiration-stopping ingredient known to science!

Lovely to use . . . gentle Fresh stays smooth . . . never greasy, gritty or sticky. . . doesn't dry out.

And safe . . . Fresh contains a patented ingredient that makes it truly safe for skin and fabrics.

No wonder . . . more and more women are switching to Fresh.

FRESH CREAM DEODORANT
STOPS PERSPIRATION
FRESH is safe. Approved by the American Medical Association for advertising in their publications ©1947, The Pharma-Craft Corporation, Inc.

Dress up your dinner with SPAM*

(SEE BAKED SPAM RECIPE ON LABEL)

Slice it...dice it...broil it... bake it...fry it...TRY IT!

HORMEL
GOOD FOOD

*"SPAM" is a registered trademark. It identifies a pure pork product — packed only in 12-ounce tins — made exclusively by Geo. A. Hormel & Co., Austin, Minn.

COLD OR HOT SPAM HITS THE SPOT!

person must realize that too much power, in whatever hands, endangers society itself, as well as its individual members.

It is here, I believe, that the crux of the matter is to be found. Wherever there is arbitrary power, injustice is certain to develop. And if the American people wish, as I believe they do, to bring essential and even-handed justice to labor, it is vital that they bring it as well to management and to the public. Nor does that complicate the problem; for if justice be real, it will be just to all who are concerned.

It seems strange to me that in our search for a proper solution to our labor problems we have not long since turned to our courts. They have been wonderfully successful in solving the problems that have to do with all our other relationships, and not having used them to improve our labor relations in the past is no reason for failing to do so now.

No other method has been suggested that would more surely protect the interests of everyone involved. No other would more adequately guard the fundamental principles upon which our political, social and economic structures have been reared. And how can either labor or management more greatly improve their standing in the eyes of the people of America than by aiding in the protection of the system that has given them such unparalleled opportunities? Or how can they better serve their own great interests than by accepting their responsibilities, making their claims and defending their rights before an impartial Federal court whose only reason for existence would be to maintain justice in a field that, up to now, has so frequently lacked it?

VISITORS WELCOME

(Continued from Page 78)

or bother. Or if a mother or a sister lingers for a cup of tea, there will be no feeling that dinner will be late because of her. In fact, it's a delightful place to visit with family or friends while keeping on with the day's business.

Early-morning breakfast would be perfect here for the young businesswoman and her husband. Enough time will be saved for the cook to have a chance to glance through the morning paper with her husband and start the day pleasantly.

Perfectly organized cabinets and equipment make the work go smoothly. The snack corner saves thousands of steps. Tray meals are easy, and the lounge is convenient and comfortable. The folding luggage racks provide a good steady place for the trays, which would please any husband. Men don't like balancing things on their knees. A rack at the right of the lounge provides space where the trays and stands may be tucked away quickly when not in use.

For a snack after the movies or a foursome of bridge, there are two extra trays with racks, and plenty of room for four to sit companionably on the lounge. A handy linoleum-covered service tray fits conveniently into slotted strips on the wall over the service counter by the range.

Many breakfast nooks or dinettes are hard to get into and out of; they often accommodate at best only two people, and are full of corners to clean. With this comfortable lounge, there is no problem. The trays can be lifted away, and the space is open for the mop or broom. The seat cushion can be wiped off with a damp cloth, since it is covered with a new fabric which has a plastic film, applied on cotton. This makes it washable, wipable, noncrushable and stainproof. The lounge is roomy enough for relaxation. I don't know why, but cooking is always hard on the feet. A convenient place where the cook can drop down and relax is a most marvelous thing.

The cabinets themselves are of wood with a baked-on enamel finish, which gives much the same clean and easy-to-clean effect as metal. They are custom-built and were designed with women's needs in mind. Colors are specified by the customer. (I love cabinets that add color, if they are easy to clean!) Moreover, the cabinets also have

FOR RICH FULL-BODIED Lip-Smackin Flavo
BREW YOUR COFFEE IN Vaculator
T. M. REG.

VACU-lating Gets All Coffee Goodness

Vaculator's new Automatic Flavor C clothless filter eliminates guess-wor always gives you delicious flavorful as pure and as sparkling as the "H brand glass it's brewed in.

Vaculato
CHICAGO 6, U. S. A

Every Housewife Wants One!

No more staying at home to watch pots, or to look in ovens, just set the dial on the stat . . . the broiler does the rest. Makes ap new oven dinners that retain all their juic and vitamins.

A COMPLETE PORTABLE COOKIN

Thermo is a full size electric broiler . . whole fowl, broils steaks, chops and fish de Bakes without disappointment. Don't hard way Thermo is simple and saves tim

Made of high finish, heavy aluminum wi handles, rustproof and easy to clean. range from 400 to 1000 watts. Scientifically Ask for a demonstration at your appliance store today.

THERMO-BROILER CO., IN Brooklyn 17, New York

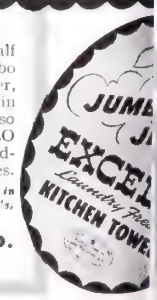
JUMBO SIZE! JUMBO VA

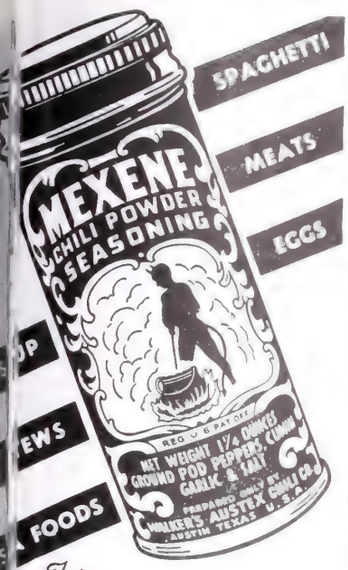
EXCELL
KITCHEN TOW
With a Traditi

Whiz thru dishes in half the time with "Jumbo Jenny". Wipes faster, easier, cleaner dries in a jiffy—launders so quickly. Buy EXCELLO Kitchen Towels at leading department stores.

Mail orders for anywhere in U. S. A. filled by Bullock's, Los Angeles, Cal.

EXCELLO, LTD.
Chicago 6, Ill.





For

ll Seasoning Purposes

AGIC MEXENE is the all-purpose soning to help you make your own xican foods and to add new flavor American dishes. If your grocer does t have Mexene, send us his name, dress, and 10c; we'll mail you post- id a regular can of Mexene and new ipe folder. Walker's Austex Chili ., Dept. J-72, Austin, Texas

WALKER'S
USTEX
ILI COMPANY

MALES • BEEF STEW
AGHETTI and MEAT BALLS

Oelerich
LD MANSE
SYRUP

True maple taste . . . Old Manse, as old as New England.

OELERICH & BERRY CO

SOMETHING NEW and SENSATIONAL in EVERYDAY CARDS
Gorgeous Satin and Velour Designs
Make Money Easily
Locust, Dept. 713-C, St. Louis 3, Mo.

plastic handle, be had with brown or cream any color you wish.

Especially good features are the three large galvanized vegetable drawers on slides, which are smoothly loaded and unloaded. And I like the strong stainless-steel plate which pulls from the counter for the food chopper to bite on. Nothing will eat up a wooden counter faster than a hungry food chopper. The storage for soap and scouring supplies pulls open like an old-fashioned flour bin, and makes the supplies available with no stooping. Under the sink are the concealed garbage can and wastebasket and the empty milk bottles.

A pull-out towel rack at the left of the sink is handy. Too many housewives have to hang the towels in unsightly places. The drawer at the left of the sink is fitted to hold knives in place without dulling their edges. And I think the carrousel unit in the corner near the range is what every woman wants, for it is large enough to take roasters and large salad bowls and there is a place for the rolling pin, that stepchild of most kitchens.

The upper cabinets have step-up shelves for spices. Also there is a place provided for wax paper and paper towels, inside the cabinet door at the right of the sink.

The cleaning closet has tall storage space for brooms, mops and vacuum cleaner, and additional shelf space for wax, cleaners, extra paper towels and such. In many kitchens I have known the vacuum cleaner had to live in the front-hall closet, and the broom and dust mop hid in the cellarway, lying in wait for an unwary person. I would put a good tall cabinet at the top of my list for any kitchen as a temper saver.

> A smile speaks the universal language. "If I value myself on anything," says Hawthorne, "it is on having a smile that children love. They are such prompt little beings, too: they require so little prelude: hearts are won in two minutes, at that frank period, and so long as you are true to them they will be true to you. They use no argument, no bribery. They have a hearty appetite for gifts, no doubt, but it is not for these they love the giver. Take the wealth of the world and lavish it with counterfeited affection. I will win all the children's hearts away from you by empty-handed love. The gorgeous toys will dazzle them an hour; then their instincts will revert to their natural friends."

For the woman who comes in late from a club meeting and wants to start dinner before changing her dress, there is nothing sticking out anywhere to snag her nylons or stub her open-toed sandals. Wastebasket, garbage can and those inevitable bottles that must go back are all out of sight.

The warm spring sun comes into the kitchen all day long, for there are plenty of wide windows. At night there is lots of light, dramatic lighting to spotlight the important working areas in the kitchen. Here no one would feel like slopping around in an old pair of her husband's slacks. It's a kitchen to dress up to! And to slip into a soft pink, green or blue brunch coat to match the kitchen, step over to the make-up mirror on the back of the door of the cabinet at the right of the dining-room door and powder your nose when a friendly step is heard on the gravel walk outside.

Although French prints are seldom seen in kitchens, I thoroughly approve of this Laurencin. It is delicate and charming. These prints are not too expensive, this one being $7.50, and a wedding present. Why not hang it where it can be enjoyed the most!

Lovely for the morning, but maybe even lovelier at night, with a moon like a crushed pear riding over the budding apple trees and the drifting scent of hyacinths coming in from the border, I think this kitchen might be the happiest, friendliest place in the world.

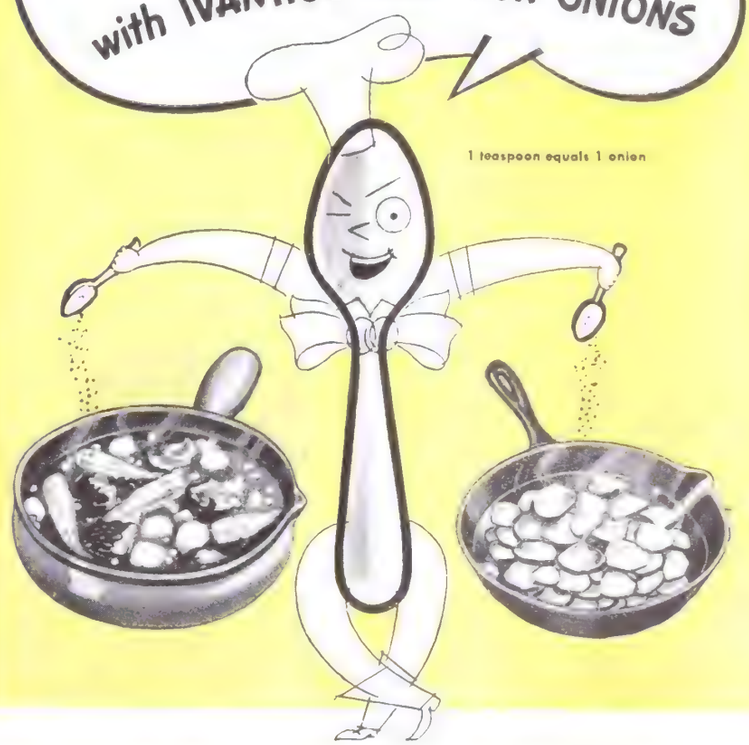
THE END

Have you discovered this grand new way to cook with onions?

Homemakers and food authorities agree that Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions are a marvelous discovery. They're so handy and pleasant to use. No peeling—no waste—no cooking odors. Each jar contains 12 fresh onions, grated and superdried. So concentrated that 1 teaspoon equals 1 onion. Recipes on the jar. Ask your grocer for Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions today. Send us his name if he has not yet stocked them. The Tupman Thurlow Co., Inc., 155 East 44th St., New York 17, N. Y.

Mr. T. Spoon says—

It's EASY to add PURE ONIONS to favorite dishes with IVANHOE TEASPOON ONIONS



TASTIER STEWS—Just before thickening the gravy, add 2 to 4 teaspoons of Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions to the liquid. The flavor is wonderful.

HAMBURGER, CHOPS, STEAKS—When cooked to desired brownness, sprinkle top of meat with 1 to 2 teaspoons of Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions. So delicious—and you don't scent up your house with onion odor.

FINER HOME FRIED POTATOES—Fry potatoes to light brown, stir in 1 to 2 teaspoons of Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions, continue frying to desired brownness.

MASHED POTATOES—Add 1 to 2 teaspoons of Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions with the hot milk. Gives them extra goodness. Use Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions whenever the recipe calls for onions. 1 teaspoon equals 1 onion.

P. S. You'll love Ivanhoe Potato Redi-Salad and Ivanhoe Macaroni Redi-Salad, too. They taste like the home-made kind. Just open and serve.

SPEEDY! THRIFTY! HEARTY!
this delicious
7 minute
macaroni-and-cheese

• For this elegant-looking, good-eating main dish, get 2 boxes of Kraft Dinner. Kraft Dinner's magic ingredients—the special macaroni and the golden Kraft Grated—will give you delicious macaroni-and-cheese in 7 minutes' cooking time! Just follow directions on the box.

Pack the hot, fluffy-light Kraft Dinner into 6 well-greased custard cups. Unmold, serve with hot, well-seasoned tomato sauce, and garnish with pimiento strips. There's just one of many speedy, thrifty, delicious main dishes you can make with Kraft Dinner! Stock your pantry!

KRAFT DINNER
FOR Delicious MACARONI-AND-CHEESE
ONLY 7

QUICK AND EASY for Two

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

CAN your husband cook? If so, you're in luck. Young JOURNAL staff members whose husbands like to cook as a hobby say that cooking for two is great sport. They warn that you may come in for a bit more dishwashing than usual the nights your master chef is presiding; that the carrot scraping and less interesting routine details may be your lot; and if he has his heart set on brewing a stew with every seasoning on the shelf, you may have to wait for your dinner. But the results and the fun you have are well worth it.

One young husband became so fascinated with a new cookbook one evening that he left his armchair and rolled out a batch of homemade noodles at ten o'clock draped them over the radiators to dry sat up till midnight to cut them.

Though it's dangerous to curb a man's enthusiasm for contriving complicated dishes like curries, ragouts and so on, maybe you can maneuver these sessions with the stew pan or rolling pin to week ends and plan week-night meals on the simple and speedy side that will still give him a chance to do his stuff, with your very helpful obbligato. Here are some hints.

He-Man's Bill of Fare

Marinated Steak
Pan or French Fried Potatoes
À La Carte Salad French Bread
Apple Crisp or Apple Pie
Coffee

You don't have steak dinners frequently. When you do, it's an occasion. Even a man who cooks only occasionally likes to show off his talents on a steak or a special salad of his own creation. And here's a meal beamed to a man's tastes, whether he decides to don a butcher's apron and perform, or not. It's a good choice for guest night, too, as it's easy and quantities can be doubled just as well as not.

You can always buy an apple pie for dessert at a bakery if you're really pressed for time, but Apple Crisp is like a quick deep-dish apple pie without the trouble of rolling out piecrust. Make it first thing when you get home. While it's baking, the steak will have time to marinate—unless you bought your steak the evening before and put it to soak overnight. "A good steak," you'll say, "doesn't need any coddling"—but once you've both tried one this way I think you'll consider it worth the make-up.

Thinly sliced raw potatoes make good pan fries and you may not always have cooked potatoes on hand. If you can buy quick-frozen French fries or the potato stick packages, this is a quicker choice.

Here's the recipe for the Apple Crisp you can get it into the oven to bake w you inventory the refrigerator for the s or make the marinade for the steak.

APPLE CRISP

Peel, core and slice 3–4 apples. Put shallow baking dish with ¼ cup wat apples are somewhat dry. At this tim year they aren't always at their juicy b Also add 1 tablespoon lemon juice un apples are quite sour. In a bowl, m tablespoons flour, ½ cup brown sugar ½ teaspoon cinnamon. Add ¼ cup bu or margarine and cut it into dry ingr ents with 2 knives or pastry blender u crumbly. Sprinkle over the apples. B in moderately hot oven, 375° F., about minutes, or until apples are tender. Se 2–3. Double if you're having guests.

MARINADE FOR STEAK

For a small steak for two, put ½ spoon salt into a bowl, mash 1 clove g in the salt. Add 1 tablespoon salad o tablespoon Worcestershire sauce an tablespoons red-wine vinegar. Add a dash of Tabasco sauce—mix well—, over the steak, turn it and let stand ready to drain and broil. You shoul need any additional seasoning. This originally was meant for outdoor-bro steak, but it works like a charm ind too. If your kitchen doesn't provi broiler, have you investigated the plu type table broilers?

Rummaging in the refrigerator may produce all the ingredients for the follo salad but all's well that blends well, bits of this and that combined with gr and a good dressing will produce a salad; you can bet on it.

À LA CARTE SALAD

Slice ½ large Bermuda onion. Sepa in rings. Crumble about 2 tablesp blue cheese. Quarter a tomato, and if have any one of the following, add 1 hard-cooked egg, ⅓ cup cooked pea Lima beans, ¼ cup diced cucumber, slice crisp bacon, crumbled. It's all cording to what you have. Break greens into bowl. Add the extras and together with French dressing.

Sunday-Night Supper

Oyster Pan Roast, New Orleans St
Toast California Coleslaw
Coffee

If scalloped oysters were a dish mother often served with a big bowl of slaw on Sunday nights, you sort of thi oysters as a Sunday-night dish. I know alloped oysters are out for you if you don't ve an oven. But you can have an oyster roast—an epicurean specialty of sea-food taurants from coast to coast. You needn't timid about trying it at home. It's a ick and easy for sure feasible on a hot te or just in a chafing dish. If your sband is in the mood for a little skillet , give him the recipe. You make the ad—he'll like to eat it, but it isn't the kind usually performs on.

CALIFORNIA COLESLAW

Shred 1 cup cabbage. Section ½ grapefruit, or section a whole one and save part for Monday breakfast. Slice ½ small avocado. Dice ½ apple. Leave the skin on. Sprinkle the fruit and cabbage with the juice you can squeeze out of the grapefruit shell. Season ½ cup thick sour cream with 2 tablespoons sugar, 1 teaspoon lemon juice and salt to taste. Mix into the fruit and cabbage. Serve in crisp lettuce cups.

OYSTER PAN ROAST, NEW ORLEANS STYLE

Oysters bought on Saturday will keep well in the refrigerator until Sunday if you put the container up where the milk is. You'll need 1 pint. Mix ¼ cup chili sauce with ¼ cup cream and have the salt and pepper shaker and Worcestershire and Tabasco sauce bottles handy. This dish takes so little time to cook that it's best to wait until the table's set, coffee and salad are already made. Overcooking is the ruin of any oyster dish. Drain the oysters. Put 2 tablespoons butter or margarine in frying pan or chafing-dish pan. Let it melt over low heat. Pour in the oysters and cook gently about 2 minutes, just until they begin to plump up a little. Add the chili sauce and cream. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and some pepper, ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and a dash of Tabasco sauce. Stir together. Cook gently (the emphasis is on low heat all the way through if the oysters are to stay tender and juicy) just until the sauce is well heated through—several minutes. Serve at once on hot toast. Because of its ingredients, this version of a pan roast is almost like a hot oyster cocktail, which may give your chef of the evening an idea—he'll add a bit of horse-radish. The classic pan roast, of course, is made by cooking the oysters in the butter or margarine with only salt, pepper and a little cream added—but I think you'll like the addition of the snappy seasonings.

Half-and-Half

Bitoques (Russian Meat Balls)
Quick Mashed Potatoes
Green Vegetable or Salad Bowl
Rye Bread Jelly Peaches
Coffee

If you're doing this solo it can be easily managed, as the main dish is the only star. If there are two of you in the kitchen, so much the quicker. The salad or green vegetable plus the quick mashed potato and dessert take very little of your time.

BITOQUES (Russian Meat Balls)

Have ½ pound lean beef ground fine. Add 1 tablespoon butter or margarine. Soak 2 tablespoons fine dry bread crumbs (you can buy them in a package) in 6 tablespoons cream. Add ½ teaspoon salt, 1 tablespoon finely minced onion, a dash or grind of pepper and last, but not least, a pinch of cloves and 1 of nutmeg. It's the seasoning touch that gives this dish such a good flavor. Mix very thoroughly with spoon or your hands. Shape into little balls half as big as a golf ball. Fry on all sides in ½ tablespoon hot shortening or salad oil. Remove meat from pan and make a sauce from drippings—to 1 tablespoon fat add 1 tablespoon flour. Add 1 teaspoon meat paste or a bouillon cube and ¾ cup hot water. Stir over low heat until thickened. Add ⅓ cup sour cream. Put meat balls back in pan and simmer in sauce about 10 minutes.

Have you tried mashed potatoes that come in packages? We have sampled several brands, but one we know, in powder form, can be prepared in jig time and the resulting mashed potatoes are as fluffy and white as you can make from scratch and without the armwork of mashing. They are really just what a quick-and-easy cook would order, and if your husband wants mashed potatoes seven times a week, it's just your dish. Follow the directions on the package. And you'll be surprised and delighted.

JELLY PEACHES

Add the juice of 1 lemon and ⅓ cup jelly or jam to ⅓ cup syrup from canned peaches. Bring to boil. Stir until blended. Pour over canned peaches and chill a few minutes. Serve with cream, if you wish.

Broiling—His Hobby

Broiled Mackerel—Anchovy Butter
Pickled Beets
Spinach with Scallions—Lemonaise
Rolls Fruit Compote
Coffee

If a man cooks at all, he gives no quarter to a woman when it comes to broiling meats and fish. Though there's really no trick to broiling, men seem to make a rite of the procedure. And they do it so well, why not let them? In fact, I learned the following way of broiling any fish on a preheated sizzling-hot platter, as well as anointing mackerel in particular with anchovy butter, from a man who took his broiling seriously. And it certainly gives good results!

BROILED MACKEREL—ANCHOVY BUTTER

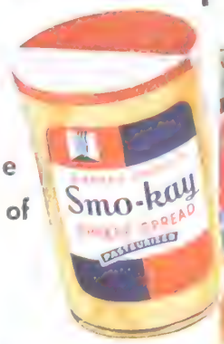
Select a small mackerel just right for two. Have the fishman split and bone it for you. Place skin side down on a well-greased heatproof platter or shallow pan that has been first preheated to the sputter-and-sizzle stage. Brush the flesh side of the fish with melted butter or margarine or salad oil. Sprinkle lightly, not generously, with salt and pepper. Broil about 8 minutes, or until nicely browned. Do not turn it. Spread with anchovy butter (½–¾ teaspoon anchovy paste mixed with 1 tablespoon butter or margarine). Serve garnished with lemon wedges and, if you like them, pickled beets. You can buy them now in jars.

Unfortunately, someone has to wash and peel a bunch of scallions and wash the spinach unless you can buy it washed and packed in transparent bags, or the quick-frozen variety. This laundry job will probably be yours.

SPINACH WITH SCALLIONS

Add salt to 1 pound washed spinach. Cook in just the water that clings to the leaves without adding additional water. The packaged fresh or the quick-frozen spinach will of course require added water. Cook just until wilted—when it's still chewy-tender and a lovely green. In another pot cook 1 bunch scallions, washed and peeled—leave a good bit of the green on—and tied with string, about 5 minutes in salted water to cover. In fact, if spinach and scallions are cooked simultaneously, they will both be cooked and can be drained at the same time. For the lemonaise: heat just a few minutes ⅓ cup mayonnaise mixed with the juice of a lemon. Drape the scallions over servings of spinach. Pour the sauce over all.

Now...a NEW favorite among Kraft Cheese Spreads



"SMO-KAY is Okay!" You'll agree when you taste the tantalizing blend of hickory smoke and cheddar flavors

For fast sandwiches that are hearty good eating . . . for fancy snacks, too . . . there's nothing to equal the famous Kraft Cheese Spreads. Eight of 'em now: For zestful flavor—the new Smo-kay, golden Old English, racy Roka, mellow-ripe Kraft Limburger Spreads. The creamy-rich kinds are Kraft Pimento, Olive-Pimento, Pineapple and Relish Spreads.

Keep an assortment of your folks' favorite Kraft Spreads ready for eating fun all the time.

Copr. 1947 by Kraft Foods Company

BACK AGAIN—golden Old English Spread in the half-pound packages. Also get Philadelphia Brand—the cream cheese that's guaranteed fresh. And rich, deliciously mild Velveeta that always melts perfectly. It's the cheese food that's digestible as milk.

THE WORLD'S FAVORITE CHEESES ARE MADE BY KRAFT

Of course you want a window like this!

Picture Windows welcome daylight into your home . . . add the beauty of outdoor views to indoor living. And when Picture Windows are glazed with *Thermopane, winter cold and summer heat are kept outside.

This original "windowpane that insulates" has improved indoor living in small homes and large ones . . . in all climates, from Iceland to Mexico. That's why so many people are counting on Thermopane to add the joy of large windows to their homes.

Because of Thermopane's popularity, orders are scheduled many months ahead—so place your order as soon as your plans are completed. Thermopane is made in 55 standard sizes which can be shipped in advance of non-standard sizes. Your architect will advise which to choose. And your nearest Libbey·Owens·Ford distributor can give you the latest news about delivery dates. Send 10c for your copies of our 32-page book "Planning Ahead with Glass" and our Thermopane booklet. Libbey·Owens·Ford Glass Company, 637 Nicholas Building, Toledo 3, Ohio.

*Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

L O F LIBBEY·OWENS·FORD
a Great Name in GLASS

REPORT To the Housewife

BY JUDY BARRY

THROUGH THE LOOKING GLASS

"Curiouser and curiouser," Alice would surely have said of the new transparent mirrors. These amazing glasses are real mirrors on one side, and cannot be seen through, but from the other side they're like windows, and can be seen through with startling clarity! If you had one set into your front door, for example, you could look straight through it and observe your caller while he straightened his tie or tweaked his mustache in what he unsuspectingly believed to be a convenient mirror. They should prove to be useful, too, for panels between kitchens and dining rooms or playrooms.

•

One of the rumored joys of the future: nylons in slot machines, in railroad stations or hotel powder rooms!

•

IT'S A PARTY

To any child, and most adults, ice cream makes a party. A new little white ice-cream freezer, which may, if you wish, be used right on the dining-room table, freezes everybody's favorite dessert in about ninety seconds. Ninety seconds is, of course, the actual freezing time—the period during which the creamy mixture is rolled over the ice-cube-and-salt-filled drum. The whole operation, from the first pouring of cream into a mixing bowl, right up to the raising of the first spoonful to our lips, took us about twenty minutes for approximately a pint of ice cream, here in the Workshop, and we used three trays of ice cubes in the drum. Which is fine fast freezing, and the ice cream was fine too. French vanilla! But the freezer makes only a pint at a time and isn't easy on anyone's budget.

•

THE FAT'S IN THE FIRE

If it is, please remember not to use water to put it out. Every member of every family ought to know that water will only spread flames caused by fat, grease or electricity. Try instead to smother them with a cover, soda or earth. Every home ought to be equipped with a fire extinguisher, a good one, approved by the Underwriters' Laboratories. No other kind is worth buying. It's dreadful to realize that more than 10,000 people die, more than $500,000,000 worth of property is lost each year in the United States because of fires—90 per cent of them caused by carelessness. Yes, there are several things you can do about it, to protect your own home and loved ones. Above all, teach your children to be wary of fire-making possibilities, and set them a good example. Never let your house be guilty of closets stuffed with paper boxes, old magazines, oil-soaked dusters, or similar invitations to disaster. Stay in the kitchen while the broiler is on—fat catches fire so quickly, and when it does, it leaps! Watch your electric iron. Keep your chimneys clean, and see that fireplaces are all safe before you go up to bed. Be sure that kitchen curtains cannot blow near any open flame.

•

And speaking of blowing curtains, many of the new paper draperies are flameproofed. These paper draperies provide a lot of freshness and brightness for kitchens or summer cottages for little more than the proverbial song.

•

SNOW-WHITE

Perhaps you've stained one of your favorite ecru lace tablecloths badly, as we did, or perhaps you have an aged one that's looking a little tired. We gave ours new life by boiling it in dye remover, then dunking it in laundry bleach, then washing it in mild suds. And now we have a snowy white lace tablecloth that looks brand-new.

•

Save the drippings when you defrost your refrigerator; they provide the "distilled" water that you ought to use in your new steam iron.

•

BOOTS, BOOTS

Just about now, your overshoes are probably pretty badly soiled both outside and in, so that there's danger of their linings' staining your stockings. What to do? Just toss them in the washing machine! We gave ours a five-minute whirl in suds, let them travel on through the rinsing and damp-drying cycle. Then they dried overnight with their tops turned well down so that the air could get in, and the next day we wore them proudly. Warning—not for those fur-topped velvety ones.

For safety's sake: little rubber tips, shaped like pointed thimbles, for protecting the points of scissors, knitting needles, ice picks, or any sharp tools. Isn't it too bad someone doesn't invent a similar gadget for sharp tongues?

COLD, ISN'T IT?

We're not talking about the weather, but about any bottle that's been cooling its heels in one of the new insulated "party bags." These attractive zipper bags, covered with a silv'ry plastic waterproof finish, have a spun-glass insulating interlining, which keeps bottles chilly for several hours. Of course the bottles must be very cold when you put them in. There are also hand-span-tall insulated "mittens" for tall glasses, to help keep the heat of one's fingers from melting the ice cubes. By the same token, they keep fingers from getting stiff and wet and chilly.

Good news: During the first ten months of 1946, 1,763,505 vacuum cleaners found their way from their factories to your dealers. That's thousands more than the last full year of prewar production. Keep your chin up—yours may be next.

PROTECTION FROM SNOW AND WET

March, it seems to us, is the sloggiest month underfoot, so we're glad to tell you that a waterproofing compound, first developed for the Army Quartermaster Corps, is now available for civilians who get their feet wet. It comes in a tube for home use, and makes leather shoes (or gloves or luggage) impervious to the ravages of rain and snow. Mothers of bobby-soxers, who can't or won't wear rubbers over their beloved moccasins and saddle shoes, take note. We Workshop women, who always wear our galoshes, have found it a very good plan to treat the shoes we wear under them with this dressing, for snow is likely to seep in and stain one's pet pumps. It also does a good job of bringing back some of the lost essential oils to dried-out hardened shoes and gloves unfortunate enough to have been caught in a blizzard.

If you're as nearsighted as I am, you'll be interested in a new kitchen wall clock, with great big plain numerals that shift each minute and keep you right up with the time. The plastic case is slanted so that it's easier to read from below.

SO EARLY MONDAY MORNING

Newest member of the community of those fine useful citizens, automatic washing machines, is one that prides itself on its low cost as compared with most of its contemporaries, and its simplicity of design—only thirty moving parts. This machine can be used in a home which has no water heater, simply by pouring in hot water from a kettle. All rinsing is done with cold water, since the construction of the machine's action is such that its makers claim that 92 per cent of the soap is pressed out after the washing action, without the use of a single drop of rinse water. After the pressure soap removal, the remaining soap is forced up and out by a powerful stream of water which carries the suds and scum out of the top of the machine's inner sphere, away from any likelihood of settling back onto the washed clothes. The machine will wash a full load of five double sheets, or just a handful of baby clothes; the mechanical action is the same with a few gallons of water and a spoonful of soap as with a full measure. . . . Bleaching, bluing and starching can be done in the machine, and the automatic cycle begun at any point. Thus you may use the machine to damp dry a piece which you might prefer to wash by hand. Of course, like its fellows, this machine cleans itself and shuts itself off when its work is done.

Did you know that synthetic-rubber gloves don't disintegrate in turpentine or grease as the real-McCoy rubber ones are likely to do?

FUDGE 'N' LOLLIPOPS

Probably the two top-favorite sweets of the very young are fudge and lollipops, and happily you may make them at home without sugar. A new lollipop kit comes equipped with a bottle of sweetening, as well as the coloring, flavoring and sticks for a great many red, green and yellow pops. It's fun for children old enough to make them themselves. As for fudge, a good packaged mix needs only water to emerge as a panful of rich black squares, or a bit more water to make frosting.

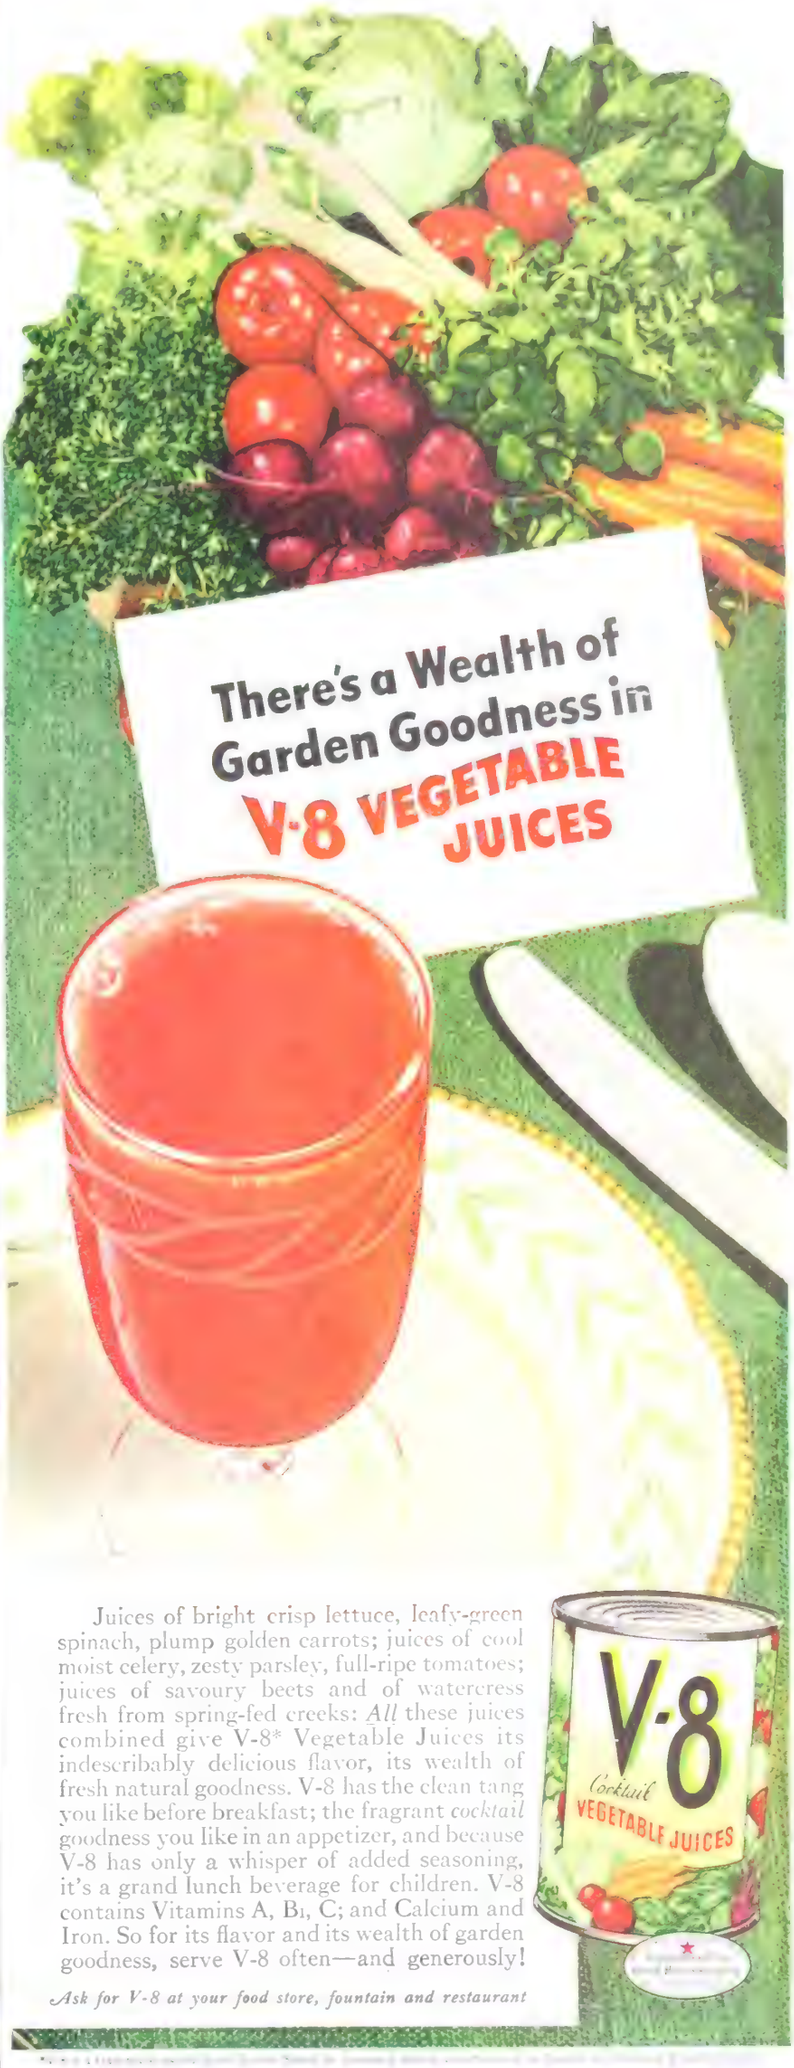
Bathing beauties: new ruffly shower curtains of plastic film in flowery pastel prints. The ruffling is welded, then welded to the shower curtain, so it's there to stay.

FOR DOUGH TO GROW

Do you have an electric roaster? Here in the Workshop, we've found that ours provides a fine, evenly warm, draft-free nook where yeast dough may rise, with the control set at the lowest point at which the oven will operate. Turned out a delectable batch of risingküchen!

FEET ON THE GROUND

One of the most dangerous moments in the life of a housewife is that period of dizzy teetering (all too often on a rickety chair!) while she hangs curtains. Now along comes a new device which makes it possible to hang or take down curtains while remaining safely with both feet where they ought to be, firmly on the floor! The curtain raiser can be installed at any window with a screw driver; loosening its two knobs causes the rod to drop to eye level. Then, using the knobs as handles, the rod may be raised to any height, even right up to the ceiling if you want to make your windows look taller.

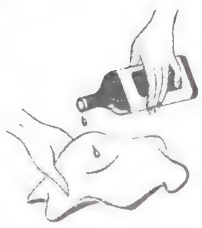


There's a Wealth of Garden Goodness in
V-8 VEGETABLE JUICES
Juices of bright crisp lettuce, leafy-green spinach, plump golden carrots; juices of cool moist celery, zesty parsley, full-ripe tomatoes; juices of savoury beets and of watercress fresh from spring-fed creeks: All these juices combined give V-8* Vegetable Juices its indescribably delicious flavor, its wealth of fresh natural goodness. V-8 has the clean tang you like before breakfast; the fragrant cocktail goodness you like in an appetizer, and because V-8 has only a whisper of added seasoning, it's a grand lunch beverage for children. V-8 contains Vitamins A, B1, C; and Calcium and Iron. So for its flavor and its wealth of garden goodness, serve V-8 often—and generously!
Ask for V-8 at your food store, fountain and restaurant
V-8
Cocktail
VEGETABLE JUICES

5 Short-Cuts to Furniture Shine-Ups!

1. SAVE STEPS by keeping your polish, cloths, brushes in a special cleaning basket. And carry it from room to room!

2. CUT DOWN ON POLISHINGS by doing one super job at intervals. Apply O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish sparingly and let it clean, polish, and nourish the wood, all at once. Many women let this rich polish "feed" into the wood a few minutes before polishing. Makes the gleam last even longer!



3. FOR QUICKER DUSTING, add a few drops of O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish to a dampened cloth. It keeps dust from scattering—gives extra sparkle with no extra effort!

4. PIN A PAPER BAG to your apron for collecting stubs and litter. And put dirty ash-trays in your cleaning basket!

5. WATER MARKS, SMUDGES, and small scratches often respond to an extra rub with O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish. More homemakers use this polish than any other brand, because it's really all purpose!

Genuine O-Cedar
ALL-PURPOSE POLISH
CLEANS – POLISHES – PROTECTS

IF YOU PREFER A CREAM POLISH, say O-Cedar, too. Quick—easy—no rubbing—to make refrigerators, venetian blinds, woodwork, and other surfaces gleam! O-Cedar Corp'n., Chicago, Ill.; Toronto, Canada.

O-CEDAR—"THE GREATEST HELP IN HOUSEKEEPING"

DATE GIRL

(Continued from Page 59)

the house and into the noise and bustle of the business section. The streets were gray and rimed, the buildings streaked with the winter's dirt. He had a cup of coffee and a cruller in the Coffeepot around from Si & Flo's, and when he came out it was as if he couldn't breathe. The college bus came along just then, and even though he had no class until ten, Johnny caught the bus.

It was spring all around the college. There was no mistaking that. You could see it in the haze that was faint about the bare trees, in the hint of green on the lawns; and it was in the way the kids walked as they went to catch their nine-o'clock classes. Bareheaded as usual, but differently. The lads in bags and pull-overs; the girls in skirts and roll-sleeve pastel sweaters, or dungarees and colored shirts.

Johnny sat on the bench about Founders' Fountain and saw the college for the first time. He felt the warmth of the late March sun. He saw the kids, not so much younger than he, but removed from him in time and every other way, and that was when revolt stirred in him.

The soft weathered walls of the buildings; the quiescent tentacles of the creeper vines; the sound of the bell from the tower of First Building. They all joined to feed a sense of loss.

He looked at the boys and girls clattering up the steps of Aldis and Brown, of Bulkyn and of Broker Hall. There were a few of the G. I. men and women among them, but it was the youngsters Johnny saw. The kids they considered witless, unknowing burners of time. The kids who groused about them as spoilsports and grinds.

Tenderness has no deeper source than the heart of a woman, devotion no purer shrine, sacrifices no more saintlike abnegation.

SAINT FOIX.

Johnny didn't think of that then. He was conscious of the college, of its personality; and for once he thought as the kids thought. He knew what they meant by the things they tried to say. It wasn't just what you learned. It was the whole thing. The fun of it—the four years of a unique world. A world you lost when you took your cap and gown. That you lost but ever after had with you. And there was in him this sense of loss that it had never been his.

He wanted it. He'd have had it if it hadn't been for the blasted Nazis and their blasted war. Something he'd dreamed about when he was a kid in Claremont and a hero was some fellow at college.

It all came back to him and he wanted that part of his life. He wanted it terribly. And that was when Penny stopped and spoke to him.

She came up the walk cuddling two books. She had on a yellow skirt and pull-over and there was a ribbon trying to hold back the shimmering waves of her red-gold hair. There was a gold locket on a thin chain about her neck, and her eyes were green and silky-lashed.

It wasn't that she was so young and so pretty—so almost magazine-picture pretty. It was that she represented, as Johnny looked at her, all the pretty girls who ever went to college; all the pretty girls a fellow mooned about when he was a frosh or soph or junior or even a senior.

He'd seen her before. He'd seen her in Lit 2 and he'd seen her downtown in cars with other kids. She was so unmistakably Midwest. Myra had been with him once when they'd spied Penny with a crowd and Myra's red lips had curved. "The perfect Date Girl," she had said without rancor and Johnny had nodded, smiling agreement.

But now he looked at her and he envied the kids she ran with. The kids so little younger than he and yet so far removed. She was not much more than eighteen. And he was not only twenty-four, but older than six years of any sort could make him older than she was.

She wasn't a real person to him then. She was a symbol of all he had missed; of all he wanted now. He knew he couldn't have it. Nothing could give it all back to him, but he thirsted for a taste. Just to know it; to have it to remember. He knew it was silly. He even knew it was the spring and that it would pass.

He didn't look up. He saw her slim legs, the swirl of her skirt. Then she said, "Hello," and Johnny had to look up. She stood before him, holding the books to her firm breast. Her lashes blinked and her green eyes were straight and friendly. "This isn't Thursday, is it?"

"Wednesday," Johnny said in his deep voice.

Her smile sent shimmers of light dancing over her creamy face. "I know. But I see you only on Thursdays. Isn't it funny how you expect things to be the same and get confused when they change?" Her voice was clear and young and breathless. Full of wonder at life and enjoyment of it too. Johnny had to smile.

"Blame the weather. It brought me out like a snake from winter quarters."

Her nose wrinkled. She blinked at the sun. "Grand, isn't it?" She hugged the books tighter, lifting her face to the sky. She was like the day itself. Lovely and young; not touched by cares or even thought. She sat down beside him.

Johnny said, "Have you got a class?"

"I was going over to the library." She said, "Hi, Slug," to a lad who was sprinting up the walk. He said "Yay, Penny," without stopping.

The bell from First ceased its clanging. The doors of the buildings looked blankly and benignly out at the campus as if bovinely ruminating upon their full interiors. Penny closed her eyes and leaned against the stone back of the bench.

Johnny took out his pipe and lighted it. He felt at once guilty and defiant. This was wasting time, and yet he wanted to hold on to this feeling of well-being, of unhurriedness. This was what it would have been like, he thought, if there had been no war. In those days when his father was still alive and it had been understood he was to go to college. Now it was different. The family broken up. Mother in the East with his older sister Ethel and her family, and he here because when he'd thought of a university he hadn't been able to think of any but Midwest.

He turned to find Penny's eyes wide upon him. There was nothing in her gaze but friendly interest. "You're not so frightening."

Johnny laughed, surprised. "Am I supposed to be?"

"Sort of. All your crowd. The Exclusives, we call you."

Johnny chuckled. "Hardly that. We're just pretty busy."

Her curling hair shook. "You're never around campus after classes."

"Part of being busy," Johnny said lightly. "Is it fun?"

"Golly, yes." She looked at him with the first doubt in her eyes. "You're laughing at me, aren't you?"

Johnny said sincerely, "No. I don't know anything about it. I take my classes and I go to work. I wouldn't know if it's fun."

"It is," Penny said, her lips parted, and Johnny looked at her as maybe her father did. Indulgently, appreciatively. She said, "You ought to try it sometime."

"Maybe I will," Johnny grinned. "I'd need a guide. Would you be available?"

Penny nodded and Johnny's grin deepened, because he'd never seen her when there weren't at least two lads in attendance.

He said, "I may take you up on that," not meaning a word of it.

(Continued on Page 191)

The signature of Prestige in Sterling
For all its beauty, Towle Sterling — solid silver — is not expensive. See the exquisite Towle patterns at your jeweler's; and if you'd like to know more about Sterling and table settings, send for our book, The Gracious Living. Write: Towle Silver Mills, Dept. J-3, Newburyport, Massachusetts.
TOWLE
STERLING
OLD MASTER
CAS ADE
SILVER FLUTES
RAMBLER ROSE
ROYAL DANISH
CRAFTSMAN
OLD MIRROR

A Peach 'n' Butterscotch Lovely

...so easy with golden canned cling peaches!

Easy Recipe

NEW PEACH UPSIDE DOWN CAKE

Plump, colorful California-grown peaches give new glamour to an old favorite!

- 9 canned cling peach halves
- ¼ cup soft butter or margarine
- ½ cup brown sugar (packed)
- Maraschino cherries
- ½ cup shortening
- 1 cup granulated sugar
- 2 eggs
- 1 teaspoon vanilla
- 2 cups sifted cake flour
- 3 teaspoons baking powder
- 1 teaspoon salt
- ⅔ cup milk
- Whipped cream

Drain peaches. Spread softened butter in bottom of deep, square 9" pan. Pack brown sugar evenly on top of butter. Arrange peaches cup side down on sugar mixture. Lay cherries in uniform pattern between peach halves.

Cream shortening, add sugar gradually, creaming thoroughly. Blend in well beaten eggs and flavoring. Stir in sifted dry ingredients alternately with milk, beginning and ending with dry ingredients. Pour batter carefully over fruit. Bake in moderate oven (350 degrees F.) about 1 hour. Loosen sides of cake with spatula and turn out of pan immediately, allowing pan to rest over cake a few seconds so that syrup will drain. Serve warm or cold with whipped cream. Serves 9.

Peachy Quick Tricks

Jiffy Salad: mix a pint of cott cheese with ½ cup of thick comm cial sour cream and ½ cup fi chopped water cress. Salt to ta Place cheese on four salad pl with a drained, chilled canned pe half on either side ... two to a s ing. Garnish with water cress, s with French dressing.

Fruit cocktail tips: add to ch gelatin for an easy, delicious des ... or heap high and handsom avocado halves...or pour over terday's cake to add a glamo touch. And, of course, what c be better than fruit cocktail r from the can as a meal starte dessert. Keep plenty on hand!

In California's rich, sun-drenched valleys grow the sweetest, biggest, golden cling peaches in the land! Use 'em right from the can ... or in desserts, salads ... hundreds of ways. Check the label. Make sure they're flavor-rich "clings"!

They're wonderful so many ways!

California Cling Peaches

Canned Halves · Canned Slices · Canned Fruit Cocktail

(Continued from Page 188)

...y got up. "I live at South Dorm."
...iled, nodding. Then she called, "Hey,
... wait." She said, "So long," and went
... g down the walk to where the blond
... th the crew cut waited
... mally that would have been all there
... it, because Johnny wasn't particularly
... ted. Penny Ames was a swell kid and
... y one, but she was a kid and he was
... eyond all that. But the spring weather
... around and the Greek sprang the word
... ys later that he was closing the restau-
... r a week beginning Sunday, and that
... in Si & Flo's the talk went flat for
... y.

...re'd been the usual palaver. About the
...he world was in and the mess Fall City
... s were in, not to mention county and ... matters. Someone said something
... their being pretty young and Ed
...am snorted, "Pitt was Prime Minister
...gland at my age."

...ra said, "I think, anyhow, just for the
...ce, we should shove an oar in. What do
...ink, Johnny?"

... y looked at him, waiting as they al-
...lid for what Johnny had to say on the
... t, but tonight he failed them. He said,
...n't think. Maybe I've got spring fever.
...s you'd better count me out of this
...ar. Excuse, please."

... grinned, but he got up and went out.
... damp in the noisy, traffic-filled street,
...e spring was all about and suddenly
...s tired of the going. Of the steady,
... tonous grind.
... 'ork and the
... and plans for
...g out the old
... who milked the
...s; who made
... cs a paying,
...ss profession. It
... the spring.
...y knew that.
...en knew it was
... of him; senti-
...al. But he
...ht, I'll wallow if
... t to.

...ra came from
... the blue-and-
... neon sign. She
...ed back her
... black hair. "What gives, Johnny?"
...nny shrugged. "I said it. Must be
...g fever."
...r blue eyes questioned.
...nny said, "No sulphur and molasses.
...ave to let it take its course. Nick is
...g down for a week. Saint Athanasius
...ving a birthday. I think I'll loaf."
...ya nodded. "Best thing if you're stale.
... calling up the D.A. We thought we'd
...wn and ask him some pertinent ques-
... Would you lend your quietly forceful
...nce?"
...nny hesitated.
...ra said, "Okay. I used to be like that
...t candy. I'd buy me a dime's worth of ...chocolate babies, licorice and stuff and
...od and sick. That cured me till the next
... You loaf. Be seeing you."

...e went back inside and people stepped
...of her way. Johnny looked after her,
...ing, She's a swell guy. She's someone.
...e wasn't any doubt of that. She'd go
...s; count.

...vagrant puff of spring that had no right
...rnold Street touched his cheek. Johnny's
...rs curled; his feet moved.

...m the top of Arnold he could see the
...s winking on College Hill. He didn't
... the bus. He walked. When he got to
...gates he could hear the sound of singing
... he walked that way until he came to
...e the columns of Chapel were a nebu-
... white blur. The seniors were having an
...romptu sing on the steps, hidden by the
... mass of onlookers.

...ere, farther up the wide walk, little
...ps leaned against the railings, laughing
... talking. Johnny stopped beside one of ... big elms. He lighted his pipe and a
...ly awakened moth fluttered in the ruddy
... of the flame.

The distant music blending, made a nostalgic background for the lighthearted gab of the kids. Johnny stood, relaxing, surprised to realize how tense he had been for months past. I need this, he thought. I need a breather. Myra is right. I'll be okay when it's over. Because there was serious stuff ahead and this was weakness.

A couple of lads, skylarking, pushed each other about. One of them bumped into Johnny. The boy said, "Sorry," and Johnny said, "That's all right."

THE lad looked at him in the vague light of the campus lamp that came past the dark boles of the trees. He said, "Oh, hello, Mason," and when Johnny said, "Who is it?" the boy said, "Smith. We take old Carter together."

Johnny said, "Sure. How are you?" He felt a feeling of warmth, though he didn't know the boy by name and couldn't distinguish his face.

Smith said, "Good sing, isn't it?" and went back to the group of fellows and girls up ahead.

Johnny struck another match. The seniors were embarked upon Midwest Above the Plains, and Johnny listened, giving way to a welling of sentiment that he knew he should be laughing at.

From the group above one of the figures detached itself; came toward him. He saw the flare and sway of a skirt, the glimmer of slim legs. Penny Ames planted herself before him, a little breathless, her hands on her hips. "So you've come to see how the other half lives."

Johnny laughed. He'd felt a stir of pleasure when he recognized her. She made it complete. Midwest's Date Girl. She drew herself up on the smoothness of the railing and Johnny could smell the faint perfume of her hair.

She said youthfully, enthusiastically, "Isn't it super? It can't last though. We'll have foul weather again."

"Certain to," Johnny agreed.

The voices swelled, faded. A clear tenor took up the thread and the chorus came in again, strong yet softened by distance. Johnny drew at his pipe, careful lest it bubble. He didn't want her to go away. She was part of it. Part of this moment of sentiment that had him in its spell.

One of the girls called to Penny. The group drifted to them. In a moment they were all about. Johnny smiled beside Penny as she sat enthroned.

The sing broke up suddenly. Voices were louder and figures floated past until the steps of Chapel were bare and visible.

Penny said, "We're going over to the Poodle." She didn't wait for him to speak. She slipped from the rail and caught his hand. The others moved with them, laughing, talking.

The Poodle was jammed. It was brighter than Si & Flo's and practically all the crowd was young—purely Midwest. The booth they sat in was meant for six. There were ten of them in and about it. Sodas, pop, great gobs of ice cream. Johnny ordered plain chocolate. It tasted better than the ice cream they ate at the Greek's.

The talk went on. Johnny didn't say much more than he did at Si & Flo's. But he didn't have to wonder what the gang would think and say if they could have heard. It was such infantile stuff. Wisecracks, puns. Puerile statements received with laughter. You didn't have to think—there was nothing to think about. Johnny found himself grinning; giving his quiet chuckle when someone threw a crack at him. It was restful, relaxing, this descent into childishness.

He walked Penny back to South Dorm. Two of the other girls were ahead with some

(Continued on Page 193)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Reprieve

By Alma Roberts Giordan

Living dead I was who went Loving none, nor trying;
Since a child looked long on me,
I have done with dying.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Royal Chef's Newest Achievement

THE Perfect COFFEE MAKER

Gleamingly handsome in heavy gauge, solid aluminum, the sleek new Royal Chef Coffee Maker is as ornamental on the table as it is efficient on the range. Using the tried-and-true method of percolation, the Royal Chef Coffee Maker enables even a beginner to make coffee that is consistently good.

Easy To Clean

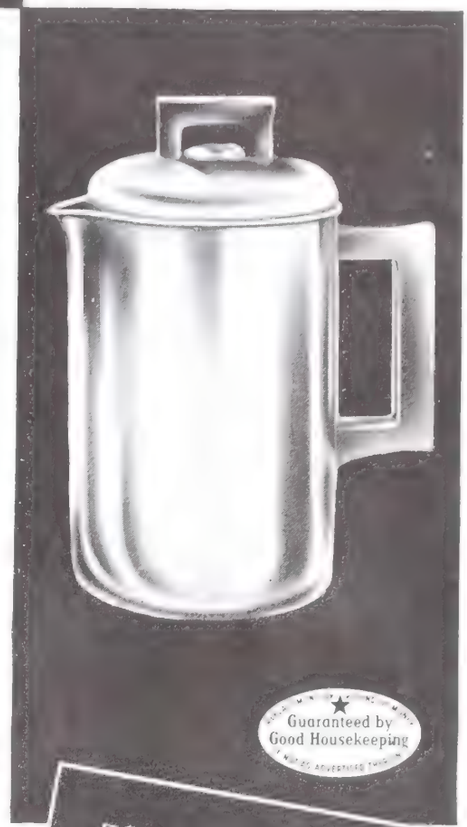
Spout is built-in rather than attached, no rivets, no hard-to-reach crevices where flavor-destroying scum can accumulate — it's as easy to clean as a cup.

No Drool — No Dribble

Streamlined spout pours clean to the last drop—no filter holes to clog—no chance of uneven pouring. CAN'T drool, dribble or drip.

Does Double Duty

Because of its ultra-modern design and its highly polished Mirror-finish, you can use your Royal Chef as a carafe and to serve iced tea or iced coffee.



See other beautiful "Royal Chef" utensils at your leading department & hardware stores.

MANUFACTURED BY
POULSEN & NARDON, Inc.
MAIN PLANT - 2665 LEONIS BLVD. - LOS ANGELES 11, CALIF.

Gibson HOME FREEZER

5 FAST-FREEZE LOCKERS!

Join the big swing to frozen foods—farm-fresh goodness all year round!

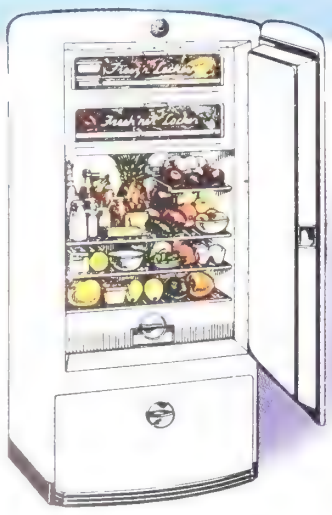
FROZEN foods are here to stay! And with the Gibson Home Freezer everyone can eat the very finest of frozen foods any day and every day of the year. In the Gibson, 5 big, wall-to-wall compartments, each behind clear-glass doors, freeze and preserve frozen foods—and plenty of them—for weeks and months! The upright design of the Gibson Home Freezer does away with awkward stooping, diving and fumbling for food packages; everything is easy to reach!

Every day is harvest day!

Stock your Gibson when Nature's choicest food is most plentiful—when prices are at their lowest—when fruit is ripe and most delicious; when vegetables are at their best; when meat and fish and game are at their juiciest.

Eat whatever you want—whenever you want it—in season or out!

Enjoy "fresh-caught" fish months later. And strawberries picked in June—how tasty for Thanksgiving dinner! Fall's finest ducks or pheasants at your leisure. Tender corn on the cob at Christmas. Visit your nearby Gibson dealer and inspect the wonderful, new Gibson Home Freezer today!



GIBSON FREEZ'R SHELF REFRIGERATOR—

Plenty of room for frozen foods in the Freez'r Locker, plus big Fresh'ner Locker for fresh meats, fruits and vegetables. Wall-to-wall shelves. Dry crisper compartment in base for crackers and cereals. Faster freezing. More ice cube capacity.

GIBSON KOOKALL AUTOMATIC ELECTRIC RANGE—

Features UPS-A-DAISY, a Gibson innovation providing 4 surface cooking units, or 3 surface cooking units plus deepwell KOOK-ALL, all on the same range! Waist-high broiler. Banquet-size oven. Concealed oven vent for cleanliness.

GIBSON REFRIGERATOR COMPANY

GREENVILLE MICHIGAN

(Continued from Page 191)

ie boys. Johnny smoked his pipe, his ls in his pockets.

enny said with a sidelong glance through dark. "What are you thinking about?"

Nothing," Johnny said truthfully.

You aren't making plans for remaking world?"

Not at the moment. I'm enjoying my overy of the afterdark life of Midwest."

enny said quickly, almost like a child, e do other things than lark around pus and sop up sodas."

Like what?"

Oh, golly." She laughed. "Depends on weather and what happens into our ls. Why not?"

ie sat down in the shadow of the tall ico and swept her skirt aside in a gesture nvitation.

ohnny let his big frame down onto the beneath hers. "It was fun, anyhow."

It's grand fun," Penny said and Johnny n't say, "That's the trouble with it," igh the thought sprang into his mind.

ny said, "You should try it more often. u were quite human tonight. Everyone ight so."

ohnny lifted his face. "I didn't hear a d."

We use the sign language. But we aren't wful either, are we?"

Super," Johnny said and Penny laughed, ost crooning.

Then you will come again?"

Maybe I will. I've no work next week. u might slide in a little time to show me re—if you're not too y."

Penny said, "I'd love You're my lion. It's ather in my cap to e an Exclusive in ." Her glinting hair ayed. "I bet the e's buzzing right v."

ohnny laughed. ass the grains of ."

Penny said, "A mod- man. Honest. You k at your mirror with objective eye. The nsensus, feminine, hich is all that nts, is that you're one quarter Rex Har- on and the rest Gable."

"F'evven's sake," Johnny found himself oting.

The bell tolled, vibrating from First close . Penny said, "Eleven on the dot and at's in for us." She said, "Monday at ree. Keep your fingers crossed about the ather." Her face bent and her lips touched Softly, fully, and then she was gone into e dim light of South.

Johnny didn't move. The pressure of her s lingered. It made him smile. It had en the merest nothing. Like a child's kiss. e was sure it was the gesture she made in rting to all her dates.

He walked around the campus before he ade his way down the hill and through the sidential district to Mrs. Sullivan's. He d no inclination to go to the grill, though e booth wouldn't be empty. He had no esire, either, to look at a book, though there as a volume of Trevelyan he had brought ome to get some light on seventeenth- entury England. He still felt as he had with l those kids around him. Relaxed and in- olent and concerned with nothing but feel- ng that way.

THAT was Friday, and he thought that per- aps by Monday he would be over it. The eather might change and that would surely ash it all out. And most probably Penny ouldn't show up.

But the weather held and Mrs. Sullivan's melled mustier than ever and the Greek's made the campus seem like the Elysian fields. The mood was still with him when he took his classes on Monday and he did not go back to town in between. He had a bite at the Poodle with two of the kids who had been with them the night of the sing. It was pleasant. It was the way it would have been had he been four years younger and there had been no war.

Penny wasn't at South when he got there that afternoon. Johnny grinned wryly to himself. He waited five minutes. He was just walking away when he heard the squeal of brakes. He turned and Penny waved There were five boys and girls in the car They made room for Johnny, all talking Penny shouted in his ear, "We're going out to Doctor Dunbar's. Weenie roast."

DOCTOR DUNBAR was lean and gray. His wife was short and plump and rosy. Johnny never found out the why of the gathering But it was fun. Inconsequential, pure fun The garden was still sere, the trees bare But the sun was golden and the fire in the barbecue pit, even if it smoked, cooked the wieners. They had supper at five and it was almost dark at six. Damp enough to drive them indoors where they sang and drank sodas and Doctor Dunbar grinned happily and Mrs. Dunbar hurried in and out as if she loved waiting on them. It was, Johnny decided when he got back to Mrs. Sullivan's, a very pleasant evening though certainly when he was over his spring fever he would know it for a wasted one.

He went with Penny and her crowd to the movies the next night. It was a third-run house on the far side of town. The picture was pretty sad, but a lot of Midwest was there, come evidently not to see the picture but to talk to it. The hero's motives were loudly commented on. The heroine was given excellent advice. Johnny wondered, when he wasn't laughing, why the manager didn't throw them all out.

People who have never married have not really lived. (People who have married and had no children have only half lived. People who have had one child only are a long way from the crown of human life.) Old age with nothing to look back upon, nothing to lean upon, is poor stuff as compared with the old age that renews its youth and life and interests in its children and grandchildren. Ask a few lonely old people going out with the tide.

—From Last Leaves, by Stephen Leacock (Dodd, Mead & Co.)

He saw Myra in Broker Hall at the end of the week as classes were changing. She came toward him, big and vivid. Her smile was full. "Hi, Johnny. How's the spring fever—or is that what it was?"

Johnny didn't avoid the question. He said slowly, "That or a mess of sentiment. The feel of college." He gestured. "It is college."

Myra's blue eyes were steady. "Sentiment," she agreed. Her shoulders lifted ever so slightly. "It's all experience, and at least you've got an attractive bit of fluff to demonstrate for you." She put her arm in his as they walked down the hall. "Big stuff, Johnny. We've an invite from Governor Creed. A week from tomorrow. Lunch at the statehouse and we sit in on the session afterward. Six of us. You're in. Okay?"

"Swell," Johnny said. That was Myra's doing, he knew, and he was grateful.

Myra nodded. "A lot of noble palaver with the invite, but it boils down to their knowing we're around and that we mean business. If not now, in a couple of years. Be seeing you at the grill, Johnny."

"Right," Johnny said. He turned in at the lecture room, thinking, She's decent. Understanding too. Time I got back to normal

The next afternoon Penny drove up in a borrowed car and they went into the hills to look for arbutus. She had a picnic basket, and after they'd failed to find any of the waxy blooms they sat on a sun-warmed rock and ate.

Penny ran her fingers through her hair and looked up at the hazy sky. "Radio man says rain tomorrow. I knew it couldn't last. But it'll come again. Really spring."

Johnny said, "It's been fun." He felt her eyes on him. When he looked she smiled.

"You sound like no more."

"I start at the Greek's again tomorrow."

Penny said lightly, "Been nice knowing you. But you did enjoy the nursery."

"A lot." Johnny looked at her. She was such a kid. "What are you planning to do, Penny? I mean—when Midwest is over for you."

(Continued on Page 195)

What other coffee ever gave you all this?

1. More delicious—or your money back!

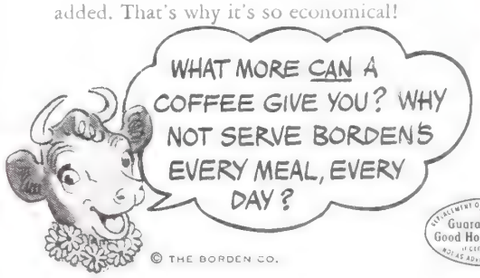
We could write you a book about that heavenly Borden flavor! But it's quicker like this: If you don't like Borden's better than any coffee you ever tasted—ground or instant—we'll give you your money back!*

2. Magic convenience—No pot, no grounds!

If cups of coffee grew on trees, they couldn't be quicker. Just drop ½ to ¾ of a level teaspoonful in a cup, add hot water. No pot. No wait. No grounds. No waste. That's why Borden's is perfect for breakfast.

3. And, half again as many cups!

Most users tell us they get half again as many cups from a regular jar of Borden's as are usually obtained from a pound of ground coffee. You see, Borden's isn't half coffee. It's all coffee—no dextrins, dextrose, or maltose added. That's why it's so economical!



Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

© THE BORDEN CO.

* Use at least half a jar of Borden's. Then, if you don't agree it tastes better than any coffee you ever used, send us the jar with unused contents, and we'll refund your money. The Borden Co., 350 Madison Ave., N. Y. 17, N. Y.

Postman, Postman, Did you bring a letter?
Postman, Postman, Two would suit me better
— I can hardly wait to see
What is in your bag for me

Copyright, 1936, by G. Schirmer, Inc.

You never quite outgrow
the thrill of getting a letter!
(Two would be much better!) And as time goes by the thrill deepens, for letters mean someone has remembered.
But . . . remembering works both ways.
So write those letters you have meant to write
. . . write them before this week's end
. . . and experience, again, how much joy
the Postman's visit can bring to you.
(I can hardly wait to see what is in your bag for me!)

On what will you write? You can do no better than to choose one of Eaton's Fine Letter Papers from Open Stock. Its quality will say,
"I am doing well;" its fashion will speak for your good taste. Yet Eaton's Open Stock Papers are a wise economy, for you can always replenish your supply of either letter paper or envelopes.

How much sense this makes — to choose a letter paper that suits you perfectly,
to be able to get more whenever you want it,
to waste nothing! The better stores have a full personality-range of Eaton's Fine Letter Papers in Open Stock and in matching boxed combination.

EATON'S RANDOMWEAVE — fabricked, pen-inviting, deckle edged, with color-lined envelopes. White, Tan, Blue, Grey.

EATON'S PETERSBURG 1850 — feminine word-frame of delicate laid texture. In muted pastels with tissue-lined envelopes. White, Blue, Grey.

EATON'S HIGHLAND SHEER — like fine handkerchief linen, subtly tinted; pin-striped envelope linings. White, Blue, Pink.

Eaton's Fine Letter Papers
in Open Stock

PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS

(Continued from Page 141)

Penny bit at a blade of grass. She seemed ut to speak, but she just shook her head said at last, "That's too far away."

ohnny thought, Fun. It was all right for kids. But it wasn't all right for him or of his gang and the thousands like them. t was clouding up when Penny dropped on Arnold and drove away, her hair lift-, one hand upraised. He watched the car n the bend and he was conscious of noth- but the pleasure he had had; a faint re- t that the spring weather was gone. But t was all.

The Greek reopened the next day. It was ill and overcast and Johnny thought, I've to get down to cases. Slog at it. He'd had taste of what it would have been like. A te he would never forget.

He was at Si & Flo's that evening. The was steady and intelligent, and Myra at side was warm and down-to-earth. He w he was where he belonged, but he nd himself wondering what Penny and gang were doing this chill evening.

He walked Myra over to the Y, where she med. In the reception hall she turned to . "Got it out of your system, Johnny?"

'All out," Johnny said.

Myra nodded. "I'm glad. There isn't room sentiment. Not for our part of this gen- tion."

"I know," Johnny said soberly.

He hadn't said he'd call Penny. He didn't her in his swift passage of the campus. e cold continued; the wet. It was on esday that he got thoroughly drenched his way from the U. to the Greek's. He ought nothing of it; it was something that d happened before, and even the sore oat he woke up with the next morning s only a nuisance. He gargled and sucked a couple of lozenges and by afternoon it s pretty well gone.

UT it was there, stronger than ever, when woke Wednesday, and it stuck with him day. That night at the grill he felt logy d hot and his throat hurt every time he allowed. But they were making plans for turday and no one seemed to notice.

He felt far too ill to get up the next morn-. He tried, but he just couldn't. For a g time he lay in bed, scared. He knew it s dumb; he knew it was weak, but he uldn't help it. He wanted to yell for his ther, just as he had that day in the Bulge en all hell had broken loose and shrapnel d caught him in the thigh so that he uldn't move, but lay looking at the blood at seeped through the bandage he'd clapped on and been afraid he'd die there alone. He'd been scared right back to babyhood and he was scared now.

He was ashamed, but he couldn't help it. He managed to drag himself up. He caught one of the Sullivan kids on his way downstairs. He got over what he wanted and staggered back to bed, but it was half an hour before Mrs. Sullivan, wispy-haired, gin-breathed, came up to see if Johnny really needed a doctor.

The doctor came just before noon. He said it was tonsillitis. Just learning what it was made Johnny feel better. When the medico said doubtfully, "Got someone to take care of you?" Johnny said, "I'll be okay."

THE doctor nodded. "Stay in bed until your temperature is normal. You'll have to have those tonsils out someday, but you take your medicine and you'll be better soon." He said, "I'll drop the prescription and have it sent over. Just take it easy."

Johnny paid the doctor. The room was chill and dampish when he was alone. He pulled the covers up closer. Little Normy wailed down the hall and Johnny thought irritably, That's a foul brat.

He slept until the medicine came. He took the dose the label ordered. Mrs. Sullivan was no help. He was glad when she shambled away. She made him feel even more alone and lonely.

He was too sick to be hungry. He slept away the afternoon and the night, waking only to peer at his watch to see if it was time for his medicine. In the morning his throat was a lot easier, but he felt as sick as ever. Mrs. Sullivan's coffee was cold and overage and Johnny didn't touch the soggy toast, but he ate the soup she brought him belatedly at one he'd asked her to open a can for him. It hurt only a little when he swallowed. She brought the thermometer that he'd asked her to buy and he saw when he took his temperature that the fever hadn't gone yet.

It was dark when Myra came. A wave of relief swept over Johnny when he heard her voice downstairs; heard her contemptuous reply to Mrs. Sullivan's, "You goin' up t'him?" . . . "I'm going up to him," Myra said and Johnny almost chuckled. He knew Mrs. Sullivan would improve the shining moment by slipping out for a drink.

Myra came in, big and handsome, smelling of the damp March night. She stripped off her gloves and shrugged out of her coat, looking down at Johnny. "What's got you?"

"Tonsillitis," Johnny croaked.

Myra didn't sit down. "Anything I can do?"

"Not a thing. Glad you came. Couldn't find a way to let you know."

"The Greek said you hadn't shown. We're going uptonight bybus. It will give us a chance to see a few things before we meet the governor." A frown puckered her forehead. "You can't make it,can you?"

"Afraid not," Johnny whispered.

Myra said, "We really need you. You've got a way of getting people to talk." She shrugged. "Oh, well, what can't be, can't be. If you're not at the Greek's Sunday I'll come around and give you the low-down." She nodded. "Anything you want?"

"Nothing." He hoped she wouldn't see the disappointment in his face. It was silly of him to have thought e wouldn't go if he

"When I named her after the heroine, how did I know the book would be banned?"

In tune with Mardi Gras glitter . . . multi-color stone and diamond jewelry by Seaman Schepps; gown a Villa Zignund import designed by Molyneux; complexion loveliness by Barbara Gould.

You provide the Drama with the gala new make-up
Young as the Dawn
Gay as the Springtime
Pageant by Barbara Gould

Pageant Trio — Face Powder, deep beige with a hint of rose gold; Lipstick and harmonizing rouge in tones of clear, bright red — $2.85

Face Powder	$1.00	Cream Rouge	$ .85
Lipstick	$1.00	Nail Polish	$ .25
Rouge	$ .85

(All prices plus tax)

ONLY BY GREYHOUND

You'll find this All-Weather travel pleasure in All Forty-Eight States...

● Greyhound alone, of all the transportation systems serving This Amazing America, can take you to and through every one of the forty-eight states, up into Canada, and down to Mexico.

Trips through the glittering snows of the North are as restful and as pleasant as travel under sunny Southern skies . . . made that way by Greyhound's efficient heating and ventilation, and by reclining cushioned chairs that travelers call "the most comfortable in transportation."

Remember...
By Highway means
By Greyhound

GREYHOUND

couldn't. It was weak; sentimental. There wasn't a single reason why she shouldn't, but just the same he couldn't help feeling like that. It was being sick, of course.

Myra gathered her coat. "I've got to pick up my bag. We're meeting at the bus in an hour. You're sure there's nothing you want?"

Johnny shook his head, not trusting his voice. He managed a grin as Myra turned at the door. He heard her go down the stairs and he thought against the feeling in him. She's right. You can't be weak about anything. That's for the kids, not for us.

He shifted, trying to get comfortable, trying to lick the loneliness that held him. When he heard the door downstairs he knew it wasn't Mrs. Sullivan because he knew the sound she made. And he knew in some way he could not identify that it wasn't Myra coming back.

He sat up, listening, shaking his head at the thought that came into it; at the way his throat tightened. It couldn't be. But downstairs a pulsing voice called, "Anyone alive here?" and Johnny croaked, "Up here."

Footsteps came quickly on the uncarpeted stairs. Johnny's eyes stung. He brushed his hand angrily across them. He turned his face to the door and Penny came in, the single light gilding her tawny hair, her eyes wide and shocked.

"F'evven's sake, Johnny Mason."

"I've been sick," Johnny said and felt his voice break.

She looked so concerned; so terribly concerned. "Isn't there anyone taking care of you?"

"I'm all right," Johnny said shakily.

"I bet." She sounded angry. She pulled the tweed hat from her head. She shucked the reversible and threw it on a chair with the hat. "You've had [illegible]"

"Yesterday. It's just tonsillitis. How did you —"

"You weren't in [illegible] You didn't call. W[illegible] dropped down to that Greek place. He said he guessed you were sick." She came to the bed and put her cool hand on Johnny's forehead. She picked up the thermometer from the table, shook it and shoved it under Johnny's tongue. He grinned up at her, though he didn't feel at all like grinning. He felt like crying. Penny didn't smile. She said, "Just tonsillitis. Those bedclothes look as if they hadn't been changed since the year one and you don't look much less grimy. Don't touch that thermometer."

She went out into the hall. She came back with sheets over one arm, holding a basin of soap and water in her hands. She put the basin on the table, the sheets on the chair. She took the thermometer from Johnny's lips and frowned at it. She looked so pretty that Johnny just wanted to lie there and look at her. And what she was doing—the way she was doing it—made a warmth about his heart.

PENNY said, "Just a degree." She shook the thermometer and laid it aside. She said, "Take off your top; and where do you keep your clean pajamas?"

Johnny said, "Hey, you can't ——"

"I can wash your face and chest and back. And I'm going to. Turn, Dick Whittington."

She was thorough about it, but when she had finished and Johnny slipped into the clean pajama jacket he felt different. Clean and comfortable and deeply stirred. He even helped a bit as Penny none too expertly changed the sheets.

He lay back with a sigh and Penny said, "What have you eaten today?" Johnny started to make up something, but Penny's green eyes, nothing like a child's now, were not to be denied. She said, "I think it's shameful." She said, "Don't go away," but it didn't sound light.

When she came back she had a pot of tea and real dry toast and a gob of butter that would have made Mrs. Sullivan shriek in anguish. She poured the tea and added milk and gave Johnny the cup and saucer, setti the plate on his lap and buttering the fi piece of toast for him. The hot tea was plea ant against his throat.

Little Normy began to wail and Pen lifted her head. Johnny said, "That's t youngest. There's four of them."

"Isn't his mother here?"

"Out." Penny moved to the door a Johnny said, "He's an awful little brat."

Penny disappeared. The wailing stopp suddenly. Penny came back and picked the basin. "It's disgraceful," she said a her slim legs twinkled.

Johnny finished the toast and tea. He p the plate and cup and saucer on the tab and turned his eyes to the door. Penny can in holding a very clean baby in her arm His cheeks shone; his hair was brushed acro his square head.

SHE said, "Did you say awful? He's da ling." She sat down with Normy in h arms and Johnny stared.

"He doesn't look the same," he admitte "It—it's you, Penny."

Normy closed his eyes and went to slee in Penny's arms. Johnny watched her. S wasn't just a pretty kid. She was beautif and ageless.

He said, "Penny ——"

She raised a pink finger to her lips. S got up and went out with Normy, and whe she came back she drew the chair closer t the bed and looked at Johnny with dee quiet eyes. "You weren't going to call m were you?"

Johnny swallowed. It didn't hurt eve with the lump that was in his throat.

Penny asked, "Why?" and he turned his eyes t her and told her. He wa sure he hadn't made clear, but Penny onl nodded.

"There's nothing wron with having fun. There always time even if you' places to go. You're th sort who will get there with out hurrying." She folde her skirts about her knees and Johnny sa the color come into her smooth cheeks. S said, "You'll get there, but you won't b happy just bulling ahead. You're like my dad This Myra Stock; could she help you?"

Johnny shook his head. He saw it clearl Myra was much like him. Myra was amb tious too. Myra was going places all righ but she wouldn't ever dally for fun or sto to wait if whoever started with her lagge or fell by the roadside. Looking at Penny seeing the color deepen in her cheeks and he eyes drop away, at last he knew there neve could have been anything between hi and Myra.

Penny's eyes came to meet his, slow bu steady. "Maybe I'm jealous, but I don' think so. I admire women like Myra Stock but I wouldn't ever want to be like her. I isn't in me. I'd be too lonely that way. want what my mother has. To find my ma and help him. To admire him and—and lov him and find my success in his. You—yo think that's weak?"

"No," Johnny said, his voice deepening "I think that's natural and splendid, Penny I know that's the sort of woman I want."

Penny stood up. He saw her young body tense, her throat swell. She said almos stiffly, "You—you could easy be that ma for me. If I ——"

Johnny's hand went out, his heart turning over. "Penny ——"

She sank to her knees, both hands holding his. Her voice came shakily, "I know I'm pretty young. And I've got two years to g yet, but ——"

Johnny's free hand touched her shinin hair. It glimmered before his smarting eyes He said roughly, "I can wait. I won't be a lawyer for some time yet, and I wouldn' want an ignoramus for a wife anyhow."

He saw her face lift, shining. Then he lips were against his and he knew, as his arm went about her shoulders, that she'd neve kissed any date like that before. Never.

THE EN

> The denunciation of the young is a necessary part of the hygiene of older people, and greatly assists the circulation of their blood.
>
> —EDGAR [illegible]
> Horizon Press & Company

HE'S A FAMOUS SURGEON

"But he wanted to be a cowboy when I took his picture. I protect all my precious snapshots by mounting them with NuAce Snapshot Mounting Corners."

NuAce Corners are quick, easy to use, and attractively embossed. They stay glued, but permit instant removal of the snapshot. Ask for NuAce, the better Mounting Corners, at 5¢ and 10¢ stores or at your favorite film counter. Available in 12 colors for only 10¢ per package of 100; 60 for 10¢ in gold or silver.

ACE ART CO., READING, MASS.

BEFORE IT'S LOST OR DAMAGED..

MOUNT IT WITH NUACE Snapshot Mounting Corners

ladies Earn UP TO $23 Weekly!

LOVELY DRESS GIVEN TO YOU!

Ladies, here's your chance to earn up to $23 weekly! And besides, have your choice of gorgeous Spring dresses without a penny of cost. Don't send money for representing us in your spare time. Show our popular frocks to your friends, then send us their orders. Collect handsome cash commissions in advance. No canvassing or experience necessary. Get free details of this unusual offer and Portfolio of new styles. Everything furnished FREE. Rush name, address and dress size at once to Fashion Frocks, Dept. 43056, Cincinnati 25, Ohio.

FOR TIRED ACHING FEET
● Don't let tired feet due to overstrain get you down, rob you of recreation hours after work. Try a MU-COL foot bath MU-COL CO., Dept. B-347 BUFFALO 3, N. Y.
Mu-col
Name
Address
...SOLD AT ALL DRUG STORES

OUTSIDE THE GATES

(Continued from Page 14)

the high jumper, tall, lithe, handsome Nelson, who could swim like a duck and bat a ball almost farther than you could see picked up a piece of frozen horse dung. He felt its smoothness in his mittened hand; felt, too, the sharpness of the small stone embedded in its iciness. Swinging on one foot, he let it go in the direction of the new kid

It struck the new kid on the temple. Julia Armson saw it coming and ceased exploding. The new kid, though, didn't see it coming, and when it struck him he turned a countenance of such surprise and pain, such an expression of incredulity illuminated his face, that Nelson Poole could only think of old Jessie how old Jessie lay suffering on her straw with her broken leg, looking up pitifully at him and his father, at the revolver in his father's unsteady hand. Nelson felt the cold air sucked down his throat and he shook.

Quietly the new kid sank down in the snow. The girls at the top of the hill fled screaming toward home, their sleds banging after them. The other kids dispersed, down the alley, past the steaming pipes of the creamery, or catching a ride on the passing sleigh of the American Railway Express, vanished as quickly as ghosts. Old Julia stormed into her house, to the telephone.

Stillness was on the hill now. And the small figure moved. With weariness he rose and, taking off his mitten, felt the warm blood on his forehead, in his hair. He retrieved his shiny new sled, and slipping the rope over his arm, he trudged up the hill, turned the corner and went home.

In the early evening, when it was dark and still, old Julia's lamp glowing through her window, Nelson Poole returned to the hillside, and lighting a match, he bent over the spot where the new kid had fallen. He saw the small crimson spot in the snow. Could see, too, the imprint of the new kid's belt buckle. Here where his arm had swung out, perhaps in a quick shock of pain, or there a few steps farther, where he had stopped, for the snow was stained again.

Going home, Nelson Poole tried to whistle. But his throat was too full, and his heart beat queerly. So he picked up speed until he was running, and he ran all the rest of the way home.

THE next day was the new kid's first day at school. He came with his mother, carrying in his hand a shiny black leather bag containing his pencil box, his paints and a ruler. And he had a bandage over his eye. When they passed into the schoolyard, his mother waved to the kids and said "Hello." And so he hadn't told her he'd been hit, else she wouldn't have smiled and spoken, would she?

They put him in the sixth grade, but after recess Miss Davis, the principal, came in with him, and she had Miss Gray with her. And they talked with Miss Peters, who kept one hand twisting the pug in her hair, and the kids heard them say he was too advanced for the sixth and was ready for decimals and grammar. He stood quietly while they were discussing him, looking down at the floor, though once he raised his eyes and they came to rest on Nelson Poole, who glared at him and banged the top of his desk down as he stored his geography.

They gave him a desk opposite Nelson Poole, on the side so his bandage showed. He put his things away neatly, and then sat back and folded his hands. When he turned again toward Nelson Poole, the latter made horrible faces and turned his back to him, resting his wagging head on his hand, the better to express his contempt.

During the afternoon recess the new kid sat by himself on the big stone baluster at the foot of the schoolhouse steps. The swings were going and a snowman was being built, but no one asked him to join in the fun. Only Josie Strand stopped by him once to touch his bandage, and when Nelson Poole saw her doing this, he made up to her for her kindness

(Continued on Page 199)

Get in the Swing with new
Beau Brummell toiletries for men

If you're a man who's going places, Beau Brummell Toiletries are designed to go right along with you. "Unbreakably yours" in slim, handsome flasks of gleaming aluminum . . . compact, streamlined, unbelievably light . . . the safest of traveling companions. Two convenient sizes . . . the generous "Executive," the aptly named "Traveler." Choose them singly, or in sets of two, three or five.

Cologne After Shave Hair Dressing Talcum Deodorant

Beau Brummell Toiletries
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Sold only in better stores for men and men's sections of department stores. For your dealer's name, write Beau Brummell Toiletries, Division of Beau Brummell Ties, Inc., Cincinnati 6.

For you . . . who love beautiful shoes

Jacqueline

designed by WOHL

There's a JACQUELINE for your every costume!
There's a JACQUELINE to match your every mood and moment!
It's Jacqueline's talented designing . . . choice leathers . . . and the infinite care in craftsmanship that gives every JACQUELINE that fashion-rightness, quality and fit. See them in Vogue, Harper's Bazaar and other leading women's magazines. $7.95 to $9.95

Write for style booklet J and name of your dealer.

WOHL SHOE COMPANY • SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI

(Continued from Page 36)

tying one of her long braids to the iron e of the swing, and when she cried, he ck his tongue out in the direction of the tary figure at the foot of the steps. As ugh he were responsible for her pain.

And so the days passed and the isolation the new kid grew complete. There had ays been new kids at school, of course,
l always somehow each had broken down barriers and had become one of the gang.
t this new kid was different. He didn't
.. That is, he didn't try any of the well-own, well-used tactics. Such as getting a good fight, tormenting the girls or sing the teacher. Any one of these would ve won their admiration. Thawed their dain. Melted their fierce contempt. In-ad, finding there was a line over which he ist not step, he stayed behind it and looked

That infuriated them all the more, for y had been expecting a break in the dike his reserve, and it was irritating having n stand around, always at a distance.

He was smart enough. Smarter than most y kid they ever had known. And he could aw. When the drawing teacher came, and ey had to sketch little Benny McPherson his sled, the drawing teacher, when she ked up the new kid's work, looked hard at n, and then took his drawing up to Miss ters, who began twisting her hair worse an she had ever done before. They passed s drawing around the room, sent it up to the ghth grade, even over to the high school.
And the drawing
acher called on the w kid's mother, and
ey laughed a great
al, like old friends,
d ate a whole loaf of
sh Swedish bread.
ne new kid's mother
owed her other things had drawn, and the awing teacher went ght over to St. Paul nd bought the new kid me paints and a good
ush, and spent every nday afternoon with m.

Spring came, and the ternoon sun during ne study hour made
ne schoolroom dozy.
he kids diddled and dawdled behind their ooks, thinking already of their marbles and amming up the running gutters in the reet. Except the new kid. He was always usy with his pencil. And it was during one f those drowsy afternoons that Nelson oole saw what the new kid had been doing.
le had been making a sketch of him. Of Nelson Poole!

Silently and with the stealth of a tiger he eached behind the new kid while Miss
'eters was writing tomorrow's problems on ne blackboard, snatched the paper from beeath the new kid's pencil, stuffed it all rumpled into his pocket. Then he asked to eave the room, and didn't come back.

He had planned to lay in wait for the new id as he went home, beat him for daring to ommit such an outrage. But when he had one down four blocks, where he hid behind he budding lilacs in the vacant lot next to Kuhn's barn, he pulled out the sketch and ooked at it.

He looked at it for a long time. Smoothed ut the wrinkles, and the more he looked at t, the sorrier he was he had crumpled it.
Really, it was excellent. Why, it even had the iny mole alongside his ear which he didn't hink anyone had observed except himself hrough the broken mirror into which he was continually peering for evidences of a ong-expected beard.

Then he did a strange thing. He didn't wait to pommel the new kid. Instead he went downtown. To Sorenson's Book & Stationery Store. For a dollar and eighty cents he contracted to have the sketch ironed out and cheaply framed. When he called for it a week later he took it home and hid it in his bureau drawer, the one he kept locked, where his diary rested and the little notes Josie Strand had written him. Sometimes he would look at it before he went to bed. A few times when he woke up in the night and couldn't go back to sleep, he took it out again. It was the first picture he had of himself, and it pleased him.

Now he began looking at the new kid differently. And he saw him differently. Saw his brown eyes, open and frank. Not pleading. Not asking. But giving something bright and cheerful. And his full, round cheek. The way he smiled, shyly though, but lighting his face until it was as attractive as well, Josie Strand was a girl and she was pretty!

He took to studying the new kid closer.
Sometimes in the study hour, putting his hands up to cup his eyes, he would peek through his fingers at the small boy across the aisle. Days when the new kid was absent, on account of illness and they were frequent he felt deprived of something, and it was then at recess he would be noisier than ever. Yet once he spent half the recess period quizzing Josie Strand, who took the new kid's lessons home to him when he was sick.

"He don't look sick at all," she had answered, "but he's in bed and his mother says he has to rest in bed every so often.
They got a cuckoo clock in the kitchen. I couldn't keep my eyes off it. And he's got a chicken that was born crippled. The awfulest thing you ever saw. All scrawny and it limps, and has hardly any feathers. And that chicken comes right into the house. You should see it hop along.
And sometimes it's on his bed and puts its head under its wing and goes to sleep. But the cuckoo clock is something really wonderful."

Soon it was time to rebuild the clubhouse in the ravine. Spring that year was a dry
one, and even deep down in the ravine it dried out quickly. The crocuses were up. Even the violets were ahead
of time, and the chickens, freed from their coops at the top of the hill, came down picking and scratching for bugs and worms in the rich ground under the rotted leaves. The air was fresh as it must have been in Kentucky those distant springs when Daniel Boone felt the long winter was over and there was a whole fresh wilderness to explore. The kids were in the same spirit, so they started rebuilding the clubhouse and talked of Indians and feuds, and climbed trees, the better to scout this virgin country, though they saw only the spire of the Catholic church.

The footfalls of Snappy Johnson, who was both deaf and dumb, and who had come to dump his winter's sack of empty tin cans, stirred their blood, too, and they called him
the last of the Mohicans. And they ambushed him. He rewarded their imaginations by making horrible noises and fierce grimaces, and stole away. Just as a redskin would.

And the new kid, being a boy too, found the ravine also. Only he stayed at the top of the hill where the path came up from below.
He had his dog with him. The kids laughed when they first saw his dog, and threw rocks in his direction. For the dog was a peculiar mongrel, having the head, body, coat and tail of a collie, but his legs were those of a dachshund—bowed and short. He barked and cocked his head at the kids below, wondering why he and his small master didn't join them. He didn't understand about invitations. Finally he resigned himself to sitting beside his owner, pushing his nose into his lap, cocking his head only when some greedy hen became too noisy.

The new kid saw them build a fire and the smoke curl out of the shack. Heard them driving the nails and dragging the old matting which they hung over the door. He

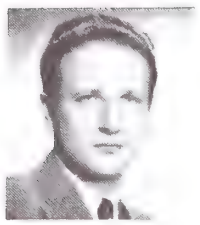
(Continued on Page 201)

A reader sends a list of questions which (he states) his four-year-old daughter expected him to answer. Here they are:

Where is far away? What do autocrats look like? Where do flies live? How much is a lot? How do we get mad? What makes the wind? When was last night? Does the rain sleep? What makes the talk come out of my mouth? Who took care of me when mummy was a little girl? What do mosquitoes eat? Do my bones make my eyes wink? Why can't mother rabbits cook? What is behind my eyes? Why do things hurt? How high is up? —Evening Mail.

BOTANY
BOTANY
Certified† Fabrics for Home Sewing
Rich fabrics designed to make your home-fashioned ensembles the envy of everyone's eye ..."Botany" Brand all-wool Certified† Fabrics bring you the joy of fashion smartness...sponged and shrunk ready to be made into the finest garments... specially selected...Feel the Difference! At leading piece goods counters everywhere! Pattern number of the style shown is available and will be furnished upon request.
LOOK FOR "BOTANY" BRAND
You will find it on Men's and Women's Wear Fabrics...Men's Neckwear... Robes...Mufflers...Sportswear..."Botany" Brand 500 Suits ...No-Dye-Lot Yarns...Lanolin Cosmetics...Certified Fabrics †(Certified by Botany Laboratories for Home Sewing). The "Botany" Brand is a trademark of a mill providing extra quality, extra fashion, extra value at no extra cost.
BOTANY-CERTIFIED FABRIC
READY FOR SEWING
SPONGED AND SHRUNK
FEEL THE DIFFERENCE
BOTANY WORSTED MILLS PASSAIC
BOTANY BRAND CERTIFIED FABRIC
* "Botany" is a trademark of the Botany Worsted Mills. Registered in the U.S. Patent Off. Copyright 1947 by Botany Worsted Mills.
Ask for a "Botany" label to sew in your "Botany" garment
BRAND
BOTANY WORSTED MILLS, PASSAIC, N. J.



Count Igor Cassini
America's foremost society reporter names lovely Henryetta as
"Beauty Bride of the Month"

Home comes Tech. Sgt. "Bud" Heyburn from air service abroad . . . to wed his blonde-satin beauty! "Smooth 'n' mine!" says Bud. "Yours 'n' Woodbury's!" teases Henryetta. Yes, for kiss-smooth skin, it's Woodbury Facial Soap. Extra-mild!

Looking at something pretty, Henryetta? "Oh, you!" she laughs. "Can't help liking the smoothness a Woodbury Facial Cocktail gives. I start with plenty of Woodbury's mild creamy lather . . . then rinse, warm and cool. My daily beauty-must!"

His bundle of charm! Alexander Heyburn, Jr., of Louisville, Ky., kisses his brand-new beautiful bride. She was Henryetta Gage, Woodbury deb of Nashville, Tenn. She entrusts her lovel honey-blonde skin only to extra-mild Woodbury Facial Soap

"My Wedded Wife—"

SHE'S ANOTHER WOODBURY DEB!

Gather, girls! Another gorgeous Woodbury deb is ready to toss her bridal bouquet. "But every gal in the land ought to grab at Woodbury," says Henryetta, "for sparkle and smoothness that mow down men!"

Riding and polo run in the Heyburn family. But the bride is shying! Come on, Henryetta, this horse is gentle. "Says who?" asks she. "I'll tell you what's always gentle—Woodbury!"

More than mild! Woodbury Facial Soap contains a rich beauty-cream ingredient prescribed for extra mildness. True beauty soap, made for the skin alone!

"Looks lovely—on me!" says Henryetta. Yes, flowers "go with" a petal skin like hers! So, girls, take a Woodbury Facial Cocktail before every glamour date. Look smooth, romantic!

(Continued from Page 199)

ched them barricade themselves against ever-imminent attack, and he smelled potatoes which were burning to a crisp he rock oven inside the shanty.

o the Saturday afternoon passed, the first mise of the long happy summer ahead. by four-thirty it was chilly. The new kid his dog got up and looked for a while n the other direction. At the river where ple were painting their boats or monkey- with the lazy engines of their launches. n when the kids in the ravine thought to c up again, the boy and his dog had ppeared.

lger Bros. Stock Company came for a k's performance, and when they left, the s went in for drama themselves. They ed up a stage in Anderson's barn and, cting the choicest scenes from the reper- e of the versatile Alger Bros., fashioned a ma amply replete with gunshots and the odiest of murders. When the new kid put appearance, hanging around outside the n door, Nelson Poole and some of the ers were for chasing him away, but Josie and argued that he, being handy with nts, could do their make-ups. Accepting logic, but still nettled, they took their oyance out on his dog, and cuffed and ked the poor animal until the creature ld stand it no longer. Finally he snarled d made a lunge for Nelson Poole.

The commotion was horrible and then inie Bernstein, who was to be the villain the play, did a ange thing. A ter- ying thing! He be- n to moan and soon was twitching. hen he fell to the ound, and foam me to his lips and s eyes turned up- rd and his face be- me gray, almost ack. The girls were ruck dumb with ght. Beulah Bas- on began to vomit the sight. and the ds looked at one nother and were ared pea green.

Then the new kid ehaved equally as rangely. Taking out is handkerchief, he ent over the stricken Heinie, and gently put in his loathsome mouth, careful lest it cover is agitated tongue. Then he strove to hold he tossing arms, calling at the same time to osie Strand to bring some water. He bathed he tormented face and laid his wet cool hand n Heinie's brow. It was but a few more inutes until Heinie was sitting up, looking heepish, dusting off his clothes. The new id helped him to his feet. Then, taking Heinie's arm and calling to his dog, the new id took Heinie home.

The kids talked of this event for weeks. n whispers. But they felt no admiration for he new kid. In the rawness of their young ives they were unconsciously ashamed of heir own inadequacies and fears. The new id had in some unfathomable way belittled hem and for a few minutes robbed them of heir egos which they had so jealously ourished.

ALL except Nelson Poole. Something moved within him. As though there were a growth that made his blood flow warmer, and when- ever he ran across the new kid, he felt a wave of kindness overpower his thoughts, and he had an intense longing at times to talk with him. Once in the cloakroom he touched him, but when the new kid in response turned questioningly, he became his old self again, and pushed him against the clothes peg and strode away.

For Nelson Poole had never seen affliction or suffering before—not even when he hit the new kid with a frozen piece of horse dung—until Heinie fell to the ground. At first it had sickened him whenever he recalled it. Then resentment set in. To see a boy like Heinie, big and strong—to see Heinie in that revolting condition was something almost beyond bearing. He talked to his mother about it, and she said "fits" were something that couldn't be cured. They had to be borne like the other crosses of life. And God pity the bearer! Nelson had clenched his fists and told himself something was wrong. If not with God, then with something. Certainly not with a fine kid like Heinie Bernstein. And he brooded over it and thought about it. And somehow inexplicably he always thought of the new kid too. He vowed he would, if he could, do something someday for people like Heinie Bernstein. Perhaps make a million dollars and send them to Vienna to the great doctors.

Doctors? They ought to find something to help poor Heinie.

THEN one morning old skinflint Stranberg, tighter than bark to a tree, went into the Daily Gazette and planked down two bits. "I want to advertise," he said. "I want me a small boy. A young'n what can crawl in Bean's old limekiln. The outside ain't worth a whoop. But inside I figure nigh two hundred good bricks have tumbled down. I'll pay sich a brat one whole shiny dollar to fetch 'em and tote 'em to my smithy. Big money for just three blocks of totin'!"

Skinny Sargent's father read the ad. He laughed when he read it out loud to Skinny. "Old Stranberg's aiming to bust some kid's back. Lucky for you, son, your dad's a grocer. Here's your allowance for the month." And he tossed Skinny a fresh crisp dollar bill. Old man Sargent liked doing things in the grand style. "And you needn't tote no bricks either." Skinny Sargent's father knew how to laugh.

Skinny put his head together with Nelson Poole. With Heinie Bernstein. They pooled their allowances. Two dollars and ten cents among them. Now with another dollar—no, only ninety cents more—and off they'd go next Sunday on the electric urban to St. Paul: fifty cents apiece round trip, fifty cents apiece for the bleachers, and, they'd watch the Saints lick the Millers. The grand windup of the American Association. The pennant!

They got hold of the new kid. "Now lissen here," they said, "you've been wanting to join our club. Simply nuts, ain't you, for all them privileges of the shack? Down in the ravine. Well, the initiation is one dollar. But that includes your dog. Though your maw's got to fork over a loaf of Swedish bread whenever our respected president, Mr. Poole here, requests the same. See?"

The small boy nodded gleefully. Even his dog pricked an ear. You see, dogs know.

Heinie Bernstein hiked up his suspenders. "Now this old man Stranberg ——"

And so it was the shining face of the new kid came before the old skinflint. The old man hired him on the spot. Kinda small, but just about fitting the old limekiln. "Come round next Saturday. But you gotta fetch 'em all in one day. I start shoein' horses Monday. Got a barrow? Well, I got a nice one. Just takes the smallest kind of pushing."

The new kid was there all right come six-thirty Saturday morning. The wheelbarrow looked mighty big, and the bricks in the limekiln—why, a body could hardly turn about! But membership in the club in the ravine! The new kid looked at his dog. A dog can smile, you know.

So the new kid tugged and tugged and tugged, first inside Bean's old limekiln, then toting the bricks in a wheelbarrow that Snappy Johnson would have turned his nose up at. The other kids watched him through the knothole in Allison's fence. They went swimming and came back again,

(Continued on Page 203)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Wake

By Charline Martin Moore

The windy shadows of the night
are tossed,
And all the love I knew for you is lost.
You spoke of all the joyous,
laughing years;
You never mentioned later, lonely
tears.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The color that made the world take notice

Trans-World from Dorothy Gray

Trans-World Lipstick and Nail Polish

All over the world, fashion designers took to this lipstick color. Bianchini did a fabric shade for it. A collection of clothes by the world's finest designers grew around it . . . breath-takers so beautiful they'll lift you high as the T.W.A. plane that brings them to you.

Watch the papers . . . scan the skies . . . for this great Dorothy Gray Trans-World fashion flight.

Trans-World fabric by Bianchini

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

The next time you visit your Beauty Shop, Drug or Department Store, we hope you will become familiar with the Breck Preparations—Shampoos, Hair Lotions, Hair Creams, and Specialty Preparations. Instead of depending on an all purpose shampoo for the different hair and scalp conditions there are available three Breck Special Shampoos. The reason for this is very simple. Hair tends to be either dry, oily or normal. Breck pH8 Lather Oil Shampoo is used on dry hair. Breck Lacene Shampoo is used on oily hair. Breck Regular Shampoo is used when more normal hair and scalp conditions exist. Today the Breck Preparations are used in many homes by every member of the family. The Breck Preparations offer you a complete line of preparations for the care of the hair—produced for those who want the best—gentle enough in their action to be used on little children.

Breck Preparations are available in Beauty Shops, Drug and Department Stores throughout the United States and Canada

JOHN H. BRECK INC. • MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS • SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS
CANADIAN ADDRESS 47 CLARENCE STREET • OTTAWA

(Continued from Page 201)

atched him, toting the bricks, out of s old lot, down Linden, down Laurel, to old man Stranberg's smithy.

must have been around three in the noon when Heinie Bernstein said, "Say, ." And the kids got their heads together behind the fence. Beside the knothole. new kid's going to really finish the What say we make his initiation a little r? Let's each fetch back a few of them s to the limekiln while he's wheelin' 'em vay."

d so by four o'clock, when the new kid d the job would be over, he was puzzled d bricks still in the kiln. He looked at g. The cur wagged his tail. "We want there club privileges," he seemed to the new kid plodded on, though by this his hands were blistered, and at the r of Linden the last four trips he flung lf upon the grass, and when he raised ead his small face was like a blazing fur-

But he kept going.

five-thirty the job was really done. The kid must have made a round dozen extra

Over Patchin's berry bushes the kids watched him k on old man nberg's door. They the old miser give new kid his dollar. by gad; the old flint patted the new head—and got a glass of water.

ne sun was just set- above the Poor- e Bluff when the kid turned Fre- s corner. The other were waiting down he old pump. Wait- mostly for the dol- And when the new saw them waiting, broke into a run.

le'd run nearly a k when he gave a And then he fell. lay there now. A e bundle on the and. One suspender his breeches loose. ie Strand screamed. Nelson Poole was first to reach him. e new kid had his s open. And he was ling. Only there was ittle blood coming of his nose. A lit- blood, too, at one ner of his mouth. His dollar bill was tched in his blistered hand. "Here's my lar," he said. "I'm a member now, ain't ' And then he closed his eyes. And Nelson ole thought he never saw anything so autiful. That is, the look on the new kid's e. It reminded him sort of in a flash of picture of Sir Galahad that hung in the ool hall above the piano.

E picked the new kid up and he carried n home. There was a fierceness in his hold though he never wanted to let go. The d's mother was in the back yard weeding r garden, and when she saw them carrying n in, she ran toward them. The lame icken came, too, hobbling on its twisted . The other chickens cackled at the excite- ent, but hurried flapping the other way, to e henhouse.

They laid the new kid on his bed, and he ened his eyes and smiled at Nelson Poole. I'm really a club member now, ain't I?" hen he didn't say anything more. Maybe was because his breath came so hard. And seemed so tired.

Nelson Poole went into the kitchen and sat own by the table. He traced the pattern on e linoleum. He looked at the cuckoo clock. was as Josie Strand said. Only she hadn't entioned the little man with his umbrella oming out of the tiny house below the ther- ometer. Funny little man!

The new kid's mother came out with his shoes. She had taken them off and was dusting them. She set them on the floor and in silence went back into the front room. Nelson saw the shoelaces, dangling untied now, and he thought how the new kid had tied them that morning, when he started off to tote the bricks. The next moment the boy was bursting through the screen door. There at the foot of the steps, perched on its crippled leg, stood the chicken, preening its woebegone head. The dog lay under the tree, his nose on his paws. Quiet. Watching the house. And Nelson Poole.

THAT night at the supper table Nelson Poole heard the telephone ring. When his mother had answered it and come back and sat down, and had asked if the meat was done enough, she said it was Josie Strand's mother who had called. And the new kid had just died.

"The doctor said it was his heart," she said. "Seems he was born with a bad heart. He should never have carried all those bricks. Pity, too, because he was quite a little artist. Who knows but someday ——"

But Nelson Poole didn't hear any more. He wouldn't have heard any more had he been still at the table. Instead he was going down Second Street. Fast. Down the hill. He bumped into Rat Doyle coming tipsy out of Hanson's saloon, and Rat staggered off.

Across the bridge the boy went. Over to the other side of the river where the old mill stood and where they had been burning the sawdust. The dull fire made shadows and was reflected in the dark water. And the hills huddled behind, their treetops pointing into the night. It was quiet except for the gasp of steam now and then from the mill's old outlet. But the fire made no noise. It was burning deep down in the sawdust. Only glowing red when the wind fanned it.

And the boy thought. And his thoughts were those that smite every boy when the shell around his hard young heart has been broken, and the first pains of approaching manhood are his. Perhaps he thought of the shanty in the ravine and the lone boy and his dog on the hill. Perhaps he thought of the sketch locked in his bureau drawer. Or of the man with his umbrella, on the clock in the new kid's kitchen. Perhaps he thought of something he had seen in the snow by the light of old Julia's lamp.

Maybe that's why many years later, when a great clinic tried to induce Dr. Nelson Poole to join their staff, he wrote a polite letter and said no, he'd stay where he was. Where he is now.

Maybe that's why Mrs. Lang, who takes in washing and has something terrible in her throat, calls him "God's good man," and wipes her eyes when she says it. Or why the Catholic priest never forgets him at Mass, though he doesn't go to any church. Or why the young kids wave and holler "How goes it, doc?" as he rambles down the street in his old car, or why tiny Mrs. Abercromie, who thought she could never have a baby, calls her little boy Nelson. Or why Josie Strand Poole has never had anything but love in her heart, or why her face grows more and more each year to look like—well, like someone who used to watch a little man with an umbrella come out of a small house in a cuckoo clock. Maybe that's why.

Maybe.

THE END

When Dr. William Osler lived in Baltimore and taught at Johns Hopkins University, Doctor Walsh tells of a visit to the wards with him in 1891. Stopping by the bedside of an old woman whose case he wanted to show, "Mother," he said, "I would like you to tell Doctor Walsh something of your past life. When were you first in the hospital?"

"At twenty-seven."

"What was the matter?"

"I had sarcoma of the right knee."

"What did they do to you?"

"They cut off the right leg at the hip."

"Did you get entirely well?"

"Yes, entirely well."

"When were you in again?"

"At forty-two."

"What was the matter?"

"I had cancer of the left breast."

"What did they do for it?"

"They cut off the left breast and the left arm."

"Did you get entirely well?"

"Yes, entirely well."

"What are you in the hospital for now?"

"For rheumatism; and doctor," she said, with tears in her voice, and catching his hand, "I hope you will make me well in a hurry, because I have to go home to take care of my grandchildren."

From A Way of Life, by SIR WILLIAM OSLER. (The Remington-Putnam Book Co.)

I hate discomforts of a COLD,
I'm glad when they are gone.
So I take Alka-Seltzer
As long as they hang on.
I keep an EXTRA package
For just such times as these.
And then I'm "Johnny On-the-Spot"
As soon's I start to sneeze.

If you do catch cold here is something you can do quickly for fast relief from that headache-y, feverish, ache-all-over feeling: try the Alka-Seltzer A-B-C Cold Comfort Treatment!

A —Alka-Seltzer. Start taking as directed.

B —Be careful; dress warmly; avoid drafts; eat wisely.

C —Comfort that raw, raspy throat which so often accompanies a cold by gargling with Alka-Seltzer.

Get the large-size package of Alka-Seltzer from your drug store—better still, "Buy 2 packages instead of one!"—that's the wise thing to do. Then, you will be doubly prepared to relieve the discomfort of the cold. Remember Alka-Seltzer also for those other commonplace ailments: sour, upset stomach, muscular aches and pains and that occasional headache which can often spoil your day's work or fun. And—

Don't Forget: "When your tablets get down to 4, that's the time to buy some more—TWO MORE PACKAGES!"

A PRODUCT OF MILES LABORATORIES, INC., MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS

Serve a friendly first course!
Tomato cocktail
Cottage cheese and chives
Smoky cheese spread
Ritz Crackers
Help yourself" appetizers in the living room leave you free for fun with your friends! With plenty of golden-good Ritz as the "come-on," guests get the idea fast! For, one bite of crunchy-crisp Ritz and they can't help reaching for more! The rich, nut-like tang quickens the flavor of cheese . . . tones up the taste of tomato juice. No other cracker is such good company — whenever, however you serve it — for NOTHING TASTES AS GOOD AS RITZ — BUT RITZ!
NABISCO
RITZ
NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY
One of the many fine foods baked by Nabisco NAtional BIScuit
COmpany

NEVER A DULL MEAL

By Irma S. Rombauer

Mrs. Rombauer is the author of the widely known—and read—cookbook, The Joy of Cooking. Its title expresses her feeling about food. Her latest book, A Cookbook for Girls and Boys, is now in the bookshops.

TWO women who had been employed for a long time in my friend's household were hanging out a window watching the return of her son from a military school. He had left a tousled, stocky, lumbering boy. He returned a tall, sleek, well-groomed youth. "My!" said one woman to the other. "Ain't it too bad! Junior don't ressemble hisself no more!"

My contribution to Never a Dull Meal leans toward the practical, for even in March the market, like Junior, may not "ressemble itself no more."

★ ★ ★ SUNDAY ★ ★ ★

Dinner

Mushroom Broth
*Breast of Veal with Oyster Stuffing
Browned Potatoes
Asparagus with Drawn Butter and Parsley
Lettuce and Pearl Onions,
French Dressing
*Cream Tart with Apricot Filling
Coffee

Supper

*Bread-and-Cheese Dish
*Hot Slaw with Apple
*Pecan Slices
Tea

Breast of Veal With Oyster Stuffing: Have the butcher prepare a breast of veal for stuffing. Drain ½ to 1 pint oysters, reserving the liquor. Chop the oysters or leave them whole. Add them to any standard bread dressing which has been moistened with the oyster liquor in place of any other liquid. Season it with salt, pepper and, if you like, an herb tarragon, basil or chives, and so on.

Cream Tart With Apricot Filling: The following recipe, which serves from eight to ten people, is delicate and delicious. The cake batter and the meringue are baked at the same time. Cream ¼ cup shortening. Add gradually ½ cup sifted sugar. Cream until light and fluffy. Beat in, one at a time, 4 egg yolks, beating well after each addition. Add ½ teaspoon vanilla. Sift together 1 cup cake flour, 1½ teaspoons baking powder and ¼ teaspoon salt. Add the sifted ingredients to the first mixture alternately with 5 tablespoons of cream. Beat until smooth. Spread in two greased 9-inch slip-bottom layer pans. Cover it with the following meringue: Whip until stiff 4 egg whites and ⅛ teaspoon salt. Add 1 cup sifted sugar, a tablespoon at a time. Beat constantly. When all the sugar has been added, continue to beat for several minutes. Fold in 1 teaspoon vanilla. Sp the meringue lightly over the cake batt both pans. Stud one meringue with ⅓ blanched and shredded almonds, placin shreds very close together. Bake the la in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., fo minutes. Increase the heat to 350° F. bake the cake 30 minutes longer. Ren from the oven. Allow to cool in the p Shortly before serving the cake place layer, meringue side down, on a cake pl Spread with the following cream filling serving 4 tablespoonsful for the top. Wh cup heavy cream. Fold in ¾ cup pur apricots. Place the almond-studded la meringue side up, on the cream filling. In center on top place the reserved filling.

Bread-and-Cheese Dish: For ye this simple dish has been my stand-by. white bread into ½-inch slices and spr lightly with butter or margarine. Cut tw the slices twice across, making 8 triangu pieces. Cut the remaining bread into cub There should be about 4 cups of diced, b tered bread. Place layers of diced bread a greased baking dish. Sprinkle the lay with 1 cup grated cheese. Combine and be 2 eggs, 1 cup milk, 1 teaspoon salt, ¼ t spoon paprika, a few grains of cayenne, a ½ teaspoon dry mustard (optional). Po these ingredients over the bread and chee Place the triangles of bread upright arou the edge to form a crown. Bake the di in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 20 minut Serve it at once—serves four.

Hot Slaw With Apple: Place in saucepan 3 cups shredded cabbage. Add tablespoons vinegar, 2 tablespoons water, tablespoon sugar, 1 teaspoon caraway seed 1 teaspoon salt and 2 tablespoons butter margarine. Cook these ingredients ov quick heat until they boil. Reduce the he and add 1 large apple, peeled and grate Heat the slaw for 1 minute longer.

Pecan Slices: This recipe has long bee one of the most popular in The Joy of Cook ing. Combine 1 cup flour with ½ cup butt or margarine and work with a spoon unt th and well blended. Spread this mix- in a 9" x 12" pan. Bake it in a moderate , 350° F., for 12 minutes. Spread with following mixture: Beat 2 eggs, add cups brown sugar gradually, beating Add ½ cup grated coconut and 1 cup ped pecan meats. Add 2 tablespoons , ½ teaspoon baking powder, ½ tea- n salt mixed together. Flavor with 1 poon vanilla. Bake again in a moderate , 350° F., for 25 minutes. When it is spread it with 1½ cups confectioners' r thinned to a spreading consistency lemon juice. Cut the cake into ob- s—about 48 one-by-two-inch bars.

★ ★ MONDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

Cottage Cheese on Lettuce with Mayonnaise
Hot Biscuits and Grape Jelly
Tea or Coffee

Dinner

*Veal-and-Spinach Casserole
*Risotto
Tossed Salad with Herb Dressing
*Chocolate-Date Torte with Rich Pudding Sauce
Coffee

Veal-and-Spinach Casserole: Herman ith cooked and served this fine dish when visited him in his Connecticut home. Its ccess depends largely upon how well you ok spinach. His, as I remember it, was de- iously creamed and flavored delicately th grated onion and lemon rind. While you e preparing the spinach, cook enough to ake Wednesday's cream of spinach soup. ve the spinach water for this purpose too. ace in a casserole a one-inch layer or more creamed spinach, and over this slices of ast veal (or lamb, and so on). If you have avy, pour a little of it over the meat. over the top with bread crumbs, dot ghtly with butter or margarine, sprinkle ith grated cheese and bake in a hot oven, 25° F., until the top is brown. Garnish ith parsley.

Risotto: This way of preparing rice gives he dish a distinctive and piquant quality. Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine, auté in it, for 1 minute, ½ cup washed and rained rice. Heat to the boiling point 2 ups stock (you may use stock made with he bones of the veal roast, celery leaves, egetable liquor, and so on). Pour it over he rice and add ¼ cup grated cheese, a few rains of cayenne, ⅛ teaspoon paprika, a inch of saffron (optional but traditional), nd salt to taste. Steam the rice in a double oiler for 1 hour. Stir it several times during the steaming. Serves four. Minced garlic may be added to the stock.

Chocolate-Date Torte: Sprinkle 2 tablespoons flour over ¾ cup chopped dates, ½ cup chopped nut meats and 1 tablespoon grated orange rind. Toss them lightly until they are coated with the flour. Sift 2 cups sugar. Melt over hot water 3½ squares unsweetened chocolate, add 1 cup milk and 1 cup of the sifted sugar. Cook and stir the mixture until it is smooth. Beat until light 4 egg yolks. Add gradually the second cup of sifted sugar. Beat until these ingredients are well blended. Stir in the hot chocolate mixture. Sift 1¼ cups cake flour with 2 teaspoons baking powder and ¼ teaspoon salt Fold these ingredients into the batter with ½ teaspoon vanilla. Mix gradually until they are well blended. Fold in the floured dates, and so on. Whip 4 egg whites until stiff but not dry. Fold them lightly into the batter. Bake the cake in an ungreased 9-inch tube pan in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for about 50 minutes. Allow the cake to cool in the pan. Do not invert it. Note: Without the dates, nut meats and additional flour, this makes a very good chocolate sponge-cake. The orange rind may be omitted, but it makes the cake taste as if it were flavored with curaçao, so use it by all means if you care for that flavor.

★ ★ ★ TUESDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

Cream of Tomato Soup
Romaine Salad
Cheese and Crackers
Tea or Coffee

Dinner

Baked Ham Slices
*Sweet Potatoes and Apples
Brussels Sprouts
Chef's Salad
*Vanilla Soufflé
(with Candied Ginger)
Coffee

Sweet Potatoes and Apples: Cook 6 medium-sized sweet potatoes until nearly done in boiling, salted water to cover. Peel and cut into ¼ inch slices. Grease a baking dish and place in it alternate layers of sweet potatoes and pared and thinly sliced apples. Sprinkle the layers with brown sugar and dot with butter or margarine. Pour over them ½ cup water and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1 hour. If the apples are not tart, sprinkle them with lemon juice.

Vanilla Soufflé: Sift ½ cup flour with ¼ cup sugar and stir in ½ cup cold milk. Scald 2 cups milk. Stir in the flour mixture with a wire whisk. Cook and stir these ingredients over low heat until they thicken. Remove from the range. Stir in ¼ cup butter or margarine. Add 5 well-beaten egg yolks. Mix well. Cool batter and add ½ cup chopped nut meats (optional) and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Beat until stiff 5 egg whites and ¼ teaspoon salt. Fold lightly into the batter. Bake the pudding in an ungreased 9-inch baking dish in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for about 1 hour. For a change in flavor use ¼ cup ginger sirup in place of the sugar, and in place of the vanilla ¼ cup chopped preserved or candied ginger. Serve the pudding with cream. Or, if you have not used ginger, with strawberry or other fruit sauce. Serves eight. For a smaller serving use 2 eggs and half of the other ingredients.

★ ★ ★ WEDNESDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

Grapefruit and Celery Salad
*Luncheon Bread
Preserves
Coffee

Dinner

Cream of Spinach Soup
Broiled Steak
*Pan-Broiled Potatoes
Cauliflower with Brown Butter
*Grandmother's Sour-Cream Apple Cake
Coffee

Luncheon Bread: The French call this "Pain Mollet des Ardennes." It excels any bread I know how to make, and I am glad to pass on this recipe, given me by Bertrande de Lecluse. The result, I am sure, will delight you. Beat 3 eggs with 3 tablespoons sugar. Add ½ cup soft butter or margarine, 2 cups flour and ½ teaspoon salt. Dissolve 2 cakes fresh yeast in 3 tablespoons lukewarm milk. Add these ingredients to the batter. Beat well for three minutes. Place in a greased bread pan or a 9-inch tube pan. Let it rise in a warm place until it has doubled in bulk (about 2½ hours). Bake the bread in a hot oven, 450° F., for about 20 minutes. Serve it piping hot. Pull it apart at table with two forks.

Pan-Broiled Potatoes: These are good, quickly made, something like a potato pancake. Wash, grate on a medium grater, skin and all, 3 medium-sized potatoes. Spread them in a well-greased skillet to the depth of about ¼ inch. Cook, covered, over medium to slow heat until the bottom is brown. Turn and brown the other side. Season with salt and serve piping hot. Serves four. Grated onion may be added.

For a Velvet Blend...
use Carnation
A discovery for Lent! Little fish loaves, moist and tender, are enriched with a whole can of Carnation Milk, to make good food go farther . . . and produce a perfect velvet blend. Carnation is heat-refined and homogenized to super-creamy smoothness, for a velvet blend in all milk-rich dishes. You'll see the difference it makes, when you try this tempting recipe!
LITTLE FISH LOAVES
Zesty, flavory . . . never a dull morsel!
2 tablespoons butter
6 tablespoons flour
1 tall can Carnation Milk
1 teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon pepper
1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
2 tablespoons minced parsley
2 cups flaked salmon or tuna
1 cup finely rolled crackers
½ teaspoon grated lemon rind
Melt butter in saucepan, blend in flour. Gradually add Carnation Milk and seasonings. Cook until very thick, stirring constantly. Cool. Stir in parsley, salmon or tuna, crackers and lemon rind. Shape into individual loaves and place in greased baking dish. Bake in a moderate oven (350° F.) about 30 minutes. May be served with tomato sauce. Garnish with sliced stuffed olives. Serves 4 to 6.
FOR MORE RECIPES, write for the new "Velvet Blend Book" of milk-rich Carnation dishes. Beautifully illustrated. Address Carnation Company, Dept. I-3, Milwaukee 2, Wis. And for entertainment, tune in Carnation's thrilling new daytime serial, "Lone Journey," Monday through Friday, and the "Contented Hour," Monday evenings. See your newspaper for stations.
For Baby ask your doctor about a formula prepared with safe, nourishing, digestible Carnation Milk, fortified with pure vitamin D3—universally approved for babies, and for older children, too.
Carnation
EVAPORATED
MILK

We wish we could make millions more of these handy Kitchen Helpers!

Like all good kitchen help these days, ScotTowels are not yet as plentiful as you—and we—would like. Shortages have cramped our style. And more women want strong, absorbent ScotTowels!

But we're doing our best, and hope before long to catch up with the big demand. Then there'll be ScotTowels aplenty . . . to help you cut down laundering, and speed up kitchen work! Scott Paper Co., Chester, Pa.

ScotTowels MADE STRONG TO WORK HARD!

Hurray! No more sewing on buttons!

Say goodbye forever to "button-bother"!

Now the makers of famous Gripper fasteners for ready-made garments bring you Gripper fasteners to put on at home!

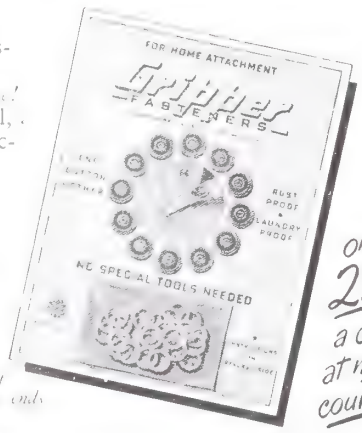
No special tools needed—only a pencil, a spool, and something to tap with. Instructions on every package.

So work-saving! Try them and see!

GRIPPER* FASTENERS

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

the laundry-proof snap fastener that ends "button-bother"



only 25¢ a card at notion counters!

Oakville Company, Division Scovill Manufacturing Company, Waterbury 86, Conn. America's leading manufacturer of snap fasteners

Grandmother's Sour-Cream Apple Cake: Pare, core and slice 5 cups tart apples. Melt in a skillet ¼ cup butter or margarine. Add the apples and cook them, covered, over very low heat, stirring them from time to time until they are tender. Mix together ½ cup sour cream, rind and juice of 1 lemon, 1 cup sugar (scant unless apples are very tart), 2 tablespoons flour, 8 egg yolks and ½ cup blanched, shredded almonds (optional). Pour over the apples. Stir all together over low heat until they thicken. Remove from the heat. Cool. Beat until stiff, but not dry, 8 egg whites and ½ teaspoon salt. Fold them lightly into the apple mixture. Spread the soufflé to the depth of one inch in a large pan or ovenproof dish. Sprinkle the top with a mixture of 3 tablespoons sugar, ¾ teaspoon cinnamon, ¼ cup dry bread crumbs and ¼ cup blanched, shredded almonds. Bake the cake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., until firm—about 45 minutes. It may be served hot, but it is best very cold with whipped cream flavored with vanilla. Serves twelve or more.

★ ★ ★ THURSDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

Biscuit Roll Filled with Creamed Ham and Tomato Sauce
Lettuce with French Dressing
*Butterscotch Brownies
Tea or Coffee

Dinner

*Emergency Soup
Broiled Chicken
Potatoes in Their Jackets With Sour Cream and Herbs
Braised Celery
Orange Whip
Coffee

Butterscotch Brownies: Easily made and so good that they deserve attention. Melt ¼ cup shortening and stir into it until dissolved 1 cup brown sugar. Cool slightly and beat in 1 egg and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Sift ½ cup flour with 1 teaspoon baking powder and ½ teaspoon salt and add to first mixture. Add ½ cup finely chopped nut meats. Pour the batter into a greased 8 x 8″ pan lined with wax paper. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 30 minutes. Cut into bars. Makes 32 one-by-two-inch bars.

Emergency Soup: An excellent result with little effort. Run through a strainer or food mill a can of condensed vegetable soup. Add 1 can condensed consommé or strong stock and ½ to ¾ cup water. Heat and serve. Serves four.

★ ★ ★ FRIDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

*Creole Kidney Stew
Hot Biscuits
Fruit
Tea

Dinner

Chicken Broth
Baked Fish—Butter Sauce
Baked Tomatoes Filled With Mashed Potatoes
Cucumber Salad
*Banana Cake
Coffee

Creole Kidney Stew: Remove fat and outer membrane from 2 medium-sized beef kidneys. Simmer in salted water over low heat about 20 minutes. Drain and cut into ½-inch slices. Sprinkle with ¼ cup flour. Sauté slowly until light brown 2 slices bacon, minced. Add 2 tablespoons fat. Brown the kidney slices in the fat with ½ cup chopped onions and ¼ cup coarsely chopped celery. Simmer, covered, for 10 minutes, then heat and add 1 can tomatoes (2½ cups), 1 green pepper, seeded and shredded, 1 teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon red pepper and ¼ teaspoon curry powder (optional). Cover the pan, simmer the stew for about 15 minutes. Stir

Need a refrigerator service man

You'll find HIM

. . . or beauty shops

. . . or plumbers

. . . or antiques

. . . or cleaners

and real help on your household or business buying problems . . . if you

Use the YELLOW PAGES of your Telephone Directory

…tly. Serve with rice or noodles or on … Serves four.

…ana Cake: Cream ½ cup short… add gradually 1½ cups sifted sugar, …at until light and creamy. Beat in one …ne 2 eggs. Sift together 2¼ cups cake …½ teaspoon baking powder, ¾ tea… soda and ½ teaspoon salt. To 1 cup … mashed bananas add 1 teaspoon … and ¼ cup sour milk. Add the sifted …ients to the first mixture alternately … anana mixture. Beat after each addi… until smooth. Bake in two greased …ch layer-cake pans in a moderate …350° F., for about 30 minutes. Remove …ans and cool. Place 2 sliced bananas …n the layers and spread the cake with …hite icing, or sprinkle with powdered …

★ SATURDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

*Economy Soufflé with Leftover Gravy or Mushroom Sauce Grapefruit-and-Orange Salad on Lettuce with French Dressing Toast
Tea or Coffee

Dinner

*Sauerbraten
*Potato Dumplings
Broccoli
Pineapple Ice
*Molasses Bars
Coffee

…onomy Soufflé: Cooked leftovers …be utilized to make a very good soufflé. … 1 cup white sauce (using 3 tablespoons …). When the sauce is smooth and boil… stir in 1 cup minced cooked leftover …ables and meat or fish. (If you do not … enough leftover food, substitute 1 … carrot, grated, finely minced parsley or …n to make in all 1 cupful.) When these …dients are hot but not boiling, stir in …aten egg yolks. Cook and stir the mix… over low heat for 1 minute to permit the …s to thicken slightly. Season with salt, …ika, nutmeg (optional), a pinch of curry, … a pinch of any dried herb. Cool. Then … in the stiffly beaten whites of 3 eggs. … in an ungreased 7-inch baking dish in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., about 30 minutes or until firm. Serves four.

Sauerbraten: You may not like Sauerbraten at all, but if you do you are apt to like it very well indeed. Have the butcher lard a 3-pound piece of beef (chuck, rump or round). Rub with garlic (optional), salt and pepper. Place in a bowl. Heat, but do not boil, equal parts of mild vinegar and water, ½ cup sliced onions, 2 bay leaves, 1 teaspoon peppercorns and ¼ cup sugar. Pour this, while hot, over the beef so that it is more than half covered. Place a lid over the bowl and put it in the refrigerator. Leave the meat there for a week or ten days, turning it once a day. Drain it, saving the vinegar, and cook the meat like pot roast. Use the vinegar mixture in place of stock. When the meat is tender, remove it from the pot. Thicken the stock with flour. Add 1 cup sweet or sour cream. I like the gravy "straight." Some cooks add raisins, catchup and gingersnaps, but I have never had the courage to do so. Serve the roast with potato dumplings. Serves six.

Potato Dumplings: Boil in their jackets until tender 6 medium-sized potatoes. Chill them thoroughly for 12 hours or more. Peel and grate or rice them. Add 2 eggs, 1½ teaspoons salt and ½ cup flour. Beat the batter with a fork until it is fluffy. Roll it lightly into balls 1 inch in diameter and drop them into gently boiling salted water for 10 minutes. Drain well. Melt ½ cup butter or margarine and stir in ¼ cup dry bread crumbs. Or prepare ½ cup croutons. Pour them over the dumplings. Many cooks prefer to put the croutons in the balls. Put 1 crouton into the center of each 1-inch ball. If you wish to make large balls, roll several croutons into each ball.

Molasses Bars: Cream ⅓ cup shortening. Add gradually ⅓ cup sifted powdered sugar. Beat until very light and creamy. Beat in 1 egg, ⅓ cup molasses, ⅛ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon soda. Add ⅞ cup flour gradually to the first mixture. Beat after each addition until it is smooth. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Fold in 1 cup broken nut meats. Bake in a greased 8 x 8″ pan in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for about 15 minutes. Cut into bars before it is cold. Roll them in powdered sugar. THE END

"He doesn't like to read comic books, doctor."

CORY
ON THE BREWER MEANS
Perfection in the Cup!

Wherever coffee lovers live and gather, the Cory provides a see-and-taste thrill. Because the brewer itself lends such a gracious, lustrous touch to any table setting. Because only the Cory-way of brewing extracts the full, rich flavor of your favorite coffee every time. Coffee filters only through coffee, touching nothing but taste-free glass. Yet, with all its beauty and day-in, day-out perfection of performance, the Cory is modestly priced . . . Cory standard brewers just $4.45 to $6.25 complete with accessories. Cory gift ensembles to $27.75. Prices slightly higher in Canada. Cory Corporation, Chicago 1, Ill. © 1947 Cory Corporation

CORY
the only All-Glass coffee brewer

The Cory Glass Filter Rod fits all standard glass coffee makers. You can buy it separately.
60c everywhere.

ONE MOTHER TO ANOTHER

Naturally, no good Mother shirks any job vital to baby's health and happiness. But, I wonder if we all make use of the marvelous, modern, time-savers that allow us leisure to enjoy our children more?

Mrs Dan Gerber

CATCH ME NAPPING AT NOON? NEVER!

And if baby could really handle the language, he'd tell his Mom that sleeping past mealtime is plain silly—with Gerber's on the menu.

It's the just-right-with-baby taste—the special, so-smooth texture—of Gerber's Baby Foods that keep young appetites going strong. No wonder millions of mothers and their doctors praise Gerber's so highly.

After all, only the choicest fruits and vegetables ever reach Gerber kitchens. Washed in purest, deep well water, all are cooked by steam under pressure—to preserve valuable vitamins and minerals.

Meet the Newcomer, Gerber's Barley Cereal. Alternate it with Gerber's Cereal Food and Strained Oatmeal. Tasty pre-cooked trio, rich with added iron and vitamin B complex. Ready-to-serve.

"America's Best-Known Baby" on the label will guide you to baby's food favorites. Your doctor will give sound feeding advice. Consult him, frequently.

Gerber's BABY FOODS

FREMONT, MICH.—OAKLAND, CALIF.

CEREALS (3 Varieties) • STRAINED FOODS (18 Varieties) • CHOPPED FOODS (13 Varieties)

Free samples

Please send me samples of Gerber's Cereal Food, Gerber's Strained Oatmeal and Gerber's Barley Cereal. My baby is now ..... months old.

Address: Gerber Products Co., Dept. 83-7, Fremont, Mich.
In Canada: Dept. 83-7, 49 Wellington Street E., Toronto 1, Ont.

Name .....

Address .....

City and State .....

© 1947, G. P. C.

MARY LOUISE BARRETT

Don't restrict your child from normal activities in the hopes that you can prevent heart disease. Do guard against infection of any kind.

TO KEEP A STURDY HEART

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

HEART disease is recognized today as the greatest of all threats to the health of American children. Yet no other disease or condition of childhood is more widely misunderstood than "heart trouble." Many mothers needlessly restrict wholesome activity for normal children in the mistaken belief that they are thus warding off heart disease. Others fail to heed known danger signals, and consequently allow damage to hearts which might have been kept sturdy and strong. In the case of heart disease, proper knowledge brings rich rewards in safety for the child, and freedom from anxiety for the mother.

The most common form of heart disease in children is rheumatic fever, named for the painful inflammation of the joints that is a usual, though not invariable, symptom. The precise cause of rheumatic fever is not known, but a number of associated causes are recognized by doctors in connection with its onset and recurrence.

Beginning most often in children of five or six up to twelve years of age, then less frequently through adolescence, rheumatic fever commonly follows, by a few days or a few weeks, a severe infection of the respiratory tract, such as scarlet fever, or a streptococcal infection of the throat or tonsils. The exact relationship between rheumatic fever and these predisposing infections has never been determined, but doctors are sure enough that there is a relationship to make these rules important for mothers:

Guard against infection—any infection! Especially if others in the family have had rheumatic fever (the disease is not inheritable, but there is evidence that susceptibility is higher in some families than in others); or if the child is unusually thin or nervous or subject to frequent colds, every precaution should be taken to prevent chilling and exposure and to build up the general health. During the late-winter and early-spring months, when the weather is raw and damp, it is especially desirable to watch this. See that the child gets well-balanced meals and plenty of rest. But unless the child has already had rheumatic fever, there is no need to restrict physical activity; overexertion cannot harm a normal heart.

If the tonsils become chronically infected, they are a threat to health and should be removed. However, an occasional sore throat or tonsillitis is not alarming. Healthy tonsils are a safeguard against infection, rather than the contrary; they should be let alone unl the doctor becomes convinced that infecti is continuing.

The early symptoms of rheumatic fe may be either mild or severe, and the on of disease may be either gradual or sudd Common among the earliest signs are p appetite, pallor, loss of weight, anemia, repeated nosebleeds and persistent slight fev As the disease progresses, the child is like to complain of pains in the arms and le and especially in joints, such as the kne ankles and elbows. Small "rheumatic no ules," pea-sized lumps under the skin, may felt in the area of the knees, elbows, wris or neck. Occasionally, chorea (St. Vitu dance)—uncontrolled, spasmodic twitchir of the face and limbs—occurs with the oth symptoms of rheumatic fever.

While none of these signs is positivel indicative of rheumatic fever, the doct should be consulted as soon as any of the appears. Mother should take particular ca

(Continued on Page 210)

GRATEFUL young mothers from Maine to California tell us that Doctor Bundesen's baby booklets have been of the greatest help to them in caring for their own babies. The first eight booklets cover your baby's first eight months. They sell for 50 cents. The second series of booklets covers the baby's health from nine months to two years—seven booklets for 50 cents. The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. A booklet on breast feeding, A DOCTOR'S FIRST DUTY TO THE MOTHER, No. 1346, sells for 6 cents. Address all requests to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

The Makers of Famous
Peanut Crunch Brand Peanut Butter
Proudly Introduce

Peanut Creme

PEANUT BUTTER

A HOLSUM PRODUCT

CREAMY SMOOTH- IT'S IN THE GROOVE!

FLAVOR'S SWELL- RINGS THE BELL!

A BRAND NEW PEANUT BUTTER WITH A BRAND NEW TASTE THRILL. "PEANUT CREME" IS WONDERFUL ON BREAD·· DELICIOUS IN TEMPTING DESSERT AND PASTRY RECIPES!

Like smooth peanut butter? You'll like new Peanut Creme peanut butter with its richer, more delicious peanut flavor—smoother, creamier texture that spreads with flowing ease—just the thing for easy-to-make sandwiches, cakes and pies! Try this new taste sensation, Peanut Creme brand peanut butter! Look for it on your grocer's shelves.

Like a different kind of peanut butter? You'll like famous Peanut Crunch peanut butter, the blended combination of crispy, tasty peanut bits and smooth, delicious peanut butter.

(Continued from Page 208)

to question the child closely about the nature and frequency of pains in the joints and the limbs, so that she may help the doctor establish the diagnosis. If he decides that rheumatic fever is a possibility and orders the child kept in bed, these instructions must be followed rigidly. In the acute stages of the infection the heart becomes involved, and every effort must be made to prevent heart damage from too much exertion when the infection is present.

When the disease is at its height, there is severe and often painful inflammation of the pericardium, a saclike membrane around the heart. Depending on the intensity and duration of the infection, the harm may be slight or great. The child may recover completely and lead a normal life, or the damage may be lasting and the child require watchful care for years afterward. The most favorable results are likely when the heart has been spared all unnecessary work during the period of infection and throughout convalescence, for as long as the doctor thinks it wise. When the youngster feels better and is getting well, it will take all mother's resourcefulness to keep him happy and occupied in bed, for that is where he must stay. Schools, libraries, visiting-nurse services and other agencies are usually helpful in planning useful and interesting occupations for shut-in children, and mothers shouldn't hesitate to call on them for suggestions.

Statistics of rheumatic fever show that it is likely to recur—and repeated attacks are more and more apt to leave the heart impaired. So preventive measures are vitally important for children who have already had the disease. Fatigue and excitement, exposure to cold, dampness and crowds should be avoided as far as possible; the doctor's advice should be sought when there is any sign of infection. What is needed for these children is a well-balanced, regulated life.

Even the child with a heart impairm however, must not be coddled. Within specified limits of permissible activity should lead a full, normal life with o children; the danger of overemphasizing physical handicap and hurting the c emotionally is as great as the dange carelessness resulting in further heart d age. To stay in the middle ground betv these two hazards requires all the wisdo understanding parents and doctors wor together, but the fact that it can be ar being done is proved every day by the m growing children and young adults who leading happy, useful lives in spite of h weakness caused by early rheumatic fe

The same kind of watchful care is nee for the very few children who were born faulty heart structures and must avoid o exertion, though the number of these c is not nearly so great as is commonly posed. No steps should ever be take interfere with the normal youngster's ac life except on explicit instructions fro physician who is familiar with the case has examined the child's heart. Someti mothers are terrified to learn that t children have "enlarged hearts" or "h murmurs," but these phrases do not ne sarily have any meaning as far as gen health is concerned. The range of h sizes is wide, and irregular heart sounds o occur in perfectly normal children; ther no cause for alarm or action unless the do says there is some heart disorder presen

The scientific miracle of heart surg today offers hope for many babies born w serious heart flaws; the "blue babies," wh hearts cannot pump enough oxygen-carry blood to all parts of the body, are someti dramatic examples. But heart surgery is the few cases that can be helped in this w For the many, the best hope for a norm happy childhood lies in well-informed, a parents and wise medical advice.

I want him to fulfill the best in him . . .

"I dream, my son, that you will grow up accomplished, strong and wise. But even more important, I fervently hope that you will know true happiness . . . the happiness which comes with developing fully every asset you possess."

SINCE I KNOW THAT SOUND PHYSICAL ASSETS will contribute materially to my son's happiness, I promise to give him the special help he needs now to build a well-shaped head, a fine, full chest, a strong back, straight legs, sound teeth . . .

BY DEVELOPING THESE ASSETS FULLY FROM BIRTH, your child will have greater confidence all through life. Give him the Vitamin D he needs regularly every day to build strong, sound bones and teeth. Physicians will assure you of the need for this important factor to help develop a fine, full framework. Start your baby on the Vitamin D source preferred by many other mothers—Squibb Cod Liver Oil. Give it every day.

NO TWO ALIKE—Some babies sit up at 7 months, others not until 8 months or more. In some, the first tooth comes through at 6 months, in others at 9 months. But remember, it does not matter how fast your baby grows so long as he develops soundly. Give him the Squibb Cod Liver Oil he needs daily to help build a strong back, sound teeth.

SQUIBB cod liver oil

a name you can trust

THE VISITORS

(Continued from Page 37)

It all came back now, with almost painful clarity. The four of them had had so much fun together. Sam Fenton had been a big, rather awkward, serious young man, with, nevertheless, a quiet sense of humor. And Beth had been very domestic. She was the one who would tuck a last-minute surprise of apple tarts into the picnic basket. She'd worn her red-gold braids in a coronet about her head; and her short crisp cotton dresses had made her seem very dainty and young. Because Sam was so big, and Beth so small, he'd had always a kind of protective air toward her—though he wasn't really any older than the rest of them.

Thinking about it now, Linda found it hard to realize how close the four of them had been in those days. Why, they'd shared everything together—holidays, vacations, and problems too! When Bill wanted to change his job he consulted Sam. And she and Beth had talked endlessly about the babies—Diana and Sammy, Jr., who were almost the same age. In a way they'd formed a kind of bulwark against the world and all its possibilities for loneliness and boredom and inertia.

They'd thought, of course, that their companionship would go on forever. But then Sam was transferred to the Denver office, and the Fentons moved away. They'd missed each other dreadfully at first, and written long letters back and forth. But gradually the letters had become shorter and turned into Christmas cards with messages attached. By now those years with the Fent seemed like part of a lost dream.

But even dreams, it seemed, could en obligations. It would be impossibly crud greet the Fentons, after all these years, w the news that they were breaking up. stead they'd have to put on an act, creat neat little replica of all the beautiful e nings they'd had together six years ago.

Bill got back early. Linda recognized mood. She saw that he had decided on armed truce, with every debatable subj carefully skirted.

"I'll go up and wash," Bill said.

(Continued on Page 212)

"You're living in a fool's paradise!"

Welch's

For PURE Enjoyment

...d for free copy of ... The Welch Grape Juice Company, Westfield, New York. Copyright 1947, The Welch Grape Juice Company

(Continued from Page 240)

Linda nodded. "We're going to have broiled chicken, out on the grill," she told him.

"Good idea." He walked over to the window and inspected the sky. Already there was a lavender quality, mixed with the blue. "I'll have to rustle up some wood. I think there's some in the cellar."

"I'm sure of it," Linda said. "I went down and looked."

Bill ignored the implied criticism, which stemmed from the oft-mentioned fact that lately he'd been neglecting his share of the household routine. At the moment they were skating on very thin ice, steeling themselves against a vast, inherent bitterness—all because of the Fentons.

Linda sprinkled chopped egg on the anchovy hors d'oeuvres. Then she went upstairs to dress. Bill was knotting his tie. When he did that he jerked his chin up in a way that was as familiar to her by now as anything in life.

She said, "I wonder if the Fentons have changed."

"They're probably wondering the same thing about us."

She really looked at Bill then. His shoulders were just as powerful, his waist just as slim. "You haven't a bit," she said. "Have I?"

He stared at her briefly, and then turned away. She saw that he looked hurt and unhappy. And why shouldn't he? She felt that way too—but it had been a foolish question, and dangerous. She walked over to the mirror to see for herself. But did you ever know those things about yourself? At thirty-two she was still slender, and she had a nice summer tan. She had brown hair and blue eyes—a combination which Bill used to say was very intriguing.

"I can't remember how I wore my hair in those days," she said. "Beth did hers in braids around her head. Do you suppose she still does?"

"We'll soon know," Bill said. He shrug into his brown sports coat and went do stairs to get out the ice.

Linda hurried. She used lavishly the fume Bill had given her as an Easter p ent—and to gloss over one of their w fights. She thought, It's going to be a jeetly ghastly evening. If only we can get to do all the talking. She decided on a str seersucker dress, brown and orange, fortunately cool.

The Fentons arrived in a taxi. Linda them through the kitchen window. She s "Here they are!" She made her voice h and welcoming. Just as the taxi rolled she and Bill dashed out the front door, ing, "Well, well, how grand to see you!"

She kissed Beth and then Sam. The men shook hands and clapped each other the back. They all four said, "You have changed a bit! It's been such a long time

Linda said, "That telegram this morn was the most wonderful surprise!"

"I hope you didn't have any other plan Beth said in her high, rather breathless lit voice.

"Gracious, no!" Linda protested quick trying not to remember that her only pl had been to see that lawyer in New York

Beth said admiringly, "Linda, you do look one day older."

"Neither do you," Linda agreed at on But secretly she thought that Beth did lo somewhat different. She had a feather c now, instead of the coronet of braids; an her once girlish figure had a thinner, te spare look. But otherwise she was th same—sweet, and clinging, and childish enthusiastic.

They went straight out to the garde and Beth looked around her with unfeigne admiration. "You were planning this th year we left," she exclaimed. "I remembe now—the low stone wall, and the flower and the grill to cook on. But where did yo get those wonderful benches?"

(Continued on Page 244)

"Whoa, Mom! Can't you take it?"

BABY: Shame, mom! You said you'd like to have a baby—cozy life—but now that we've changed places, you...

MOM: D'you blame me, Lamb? These straps! That wriggling around! If I'm uncomfortable, how does your tender skin stand it?

BABY: Stand it? Mommy, I'm miserable! And now you know too why babies need Johnson's Baby Oil and Johnson's Baby Powder!

MOM: Honey, I'll get 'em—quick! Then what do I do?

BABY: Just this, Mom. After my bath, protect my skin all over with pure, gentle Johnson's Baby Oil. And don't forget to use it at diaper changes, to help prevent what my doctor calls "urine irritation."

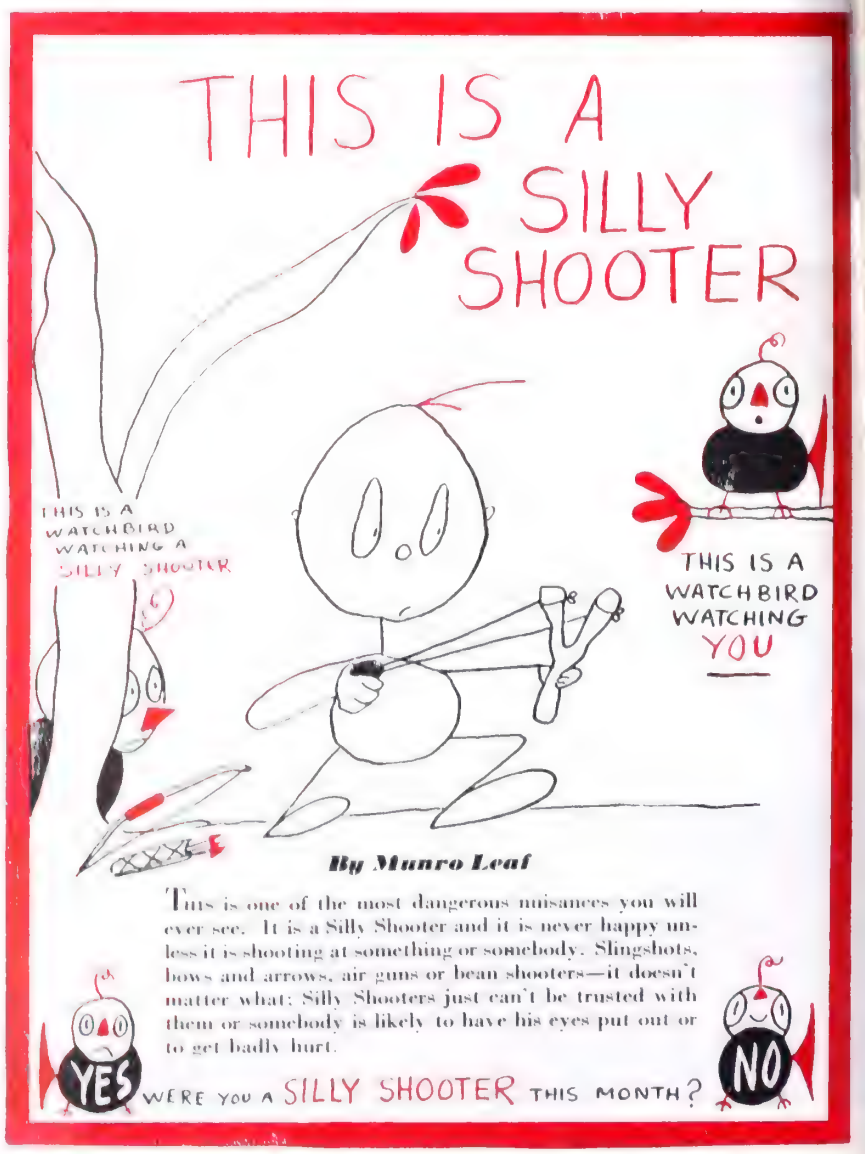
Other times, I'll thank you for soft, soothing sprinkles of Johnson's Baby Powder, to help keep chafes and prickles away!

MOM: I haven't been a careful mother, have I? Watch me reform!

BABY: Watch me reform too! With Johnson's to take care of my skin, I won't have half as many howls coming!

Johnson's Baby Oil
Johnson's Baby Powder

Johnson & Johnson



THIS IS A SILLY SHOOTER
THIS IS A WATCHBIRD WATCHING A SILLY SHOOTER
THIS IS A WATCHBIRD WATCHING YOU
By Munro Leaf
This is one of the most dangerous nuisances you will ever see. It is a Silly Shooter and it is never happy unless it is shooting at something or somebody. Slingshots, bows and arrows, air guns or bean shooters—it doesn't matter what: Silly Shooters just can't be trusted with them or somebody is likely to have his eyes put out or to get badly hurt.
YES
NO
WERE YOU A SILLY SHOOTER THIS MONTH?

YEP! Get tough with Germs!... the way lots of hospitals do

YOU: If looks could kill, yours would . . . too bad germs can't see you.

BABY: You can't see germs either. But you can crack down on 'em . . . keep 'em from spreadin' through your house.

YOU: Well, Wise Guy, how's that done?

BABY: By tacklin' 'em with a real germ-killer—"Lysol," the hospital disinfectant—every time you clean! Germs live in house dust . . . See?

YOU: But if sickness is brought in from outside?

BABY: Then you gotta follow doctor's orders . . . and better be ready with things he'll likely call for. 'Specially "Lysol," to disinfect whatever the patient touches. That's the hospital way!

YOU: That reminds me—I'd better check my sickroom needs!

BABY: You bet! Check 'em today!

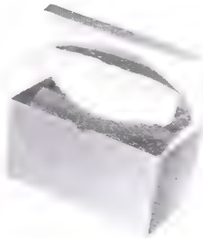
MORAL: Every single time you clean . . . disinfect with "Lysol" Brand Disinfectant

BE READY WITH SICKROOM NEEDS! YOUR DRUGGIST HAS THEM

Fever Thermometer

Hot Water Bottle

Bedpan



Absorbent Cotton

First Aid Kit

More women use "Lysol" than any other [illegible] disinfectant! Don't ever risk being without it!

For my Daughter on her Birthday
Some lovely jewelry for a gift!
How bright her eyes will shine.
How grand the moment when she cries:
"Oh, Mommy, is this mine?"
She'll cherish it with all her heart
And in her own sweet way
Will try to thank you for the joy
You've brought to her this day!

Miss Mignon
by Speidel
Copyright 1947 by Speidel Inc.
at fine stores everywhere, or write for booklet to SPEIDEL CORPORATION • 74 SHIP STREET • PROVIDENCE, R. I.

(Continued from Page 212)

"Bill made those himself, a couple of years ago," Linda said.

She looked at Bill then, and she saw that he was grinning from ear to ear. No one could possibly have guessed that it was a Cheshire-cat sort of grin.

Characteristically, Sam Fenton sank at once into a roomy chair under the shadiest maple tree. But Linda decided that Sam had changed, too, in a way. He had more assurance; he wasn't awkward and tentative, the way he had been in the old days. And his kind, humorous brown eyes had a new sort of discernment. She thought, Probably he was always headed in that direction. He really is a grand guy! She fought down a rising panic then, a kind of echo of future miseries that simply mustn't be faced right now.

Beth said, "Where's Diana?"

"At camp."

"So is Sammy, Jr.; but Joey is with his grandmother. He's only five, you know."

"Of course. I loved those pictures you sent of them."

Sam smiled his slow, rather wonderful smile. "What happened to that pup you had? A black-and-white setter, wasn't it?"

"She got distemper," Bill said. "That was several years ago."

Linda went into the kitchen after the anchovy hors d'oeuvres. She stood in front of the stove for a minute, trying to get her bearings, thinking, This will last only a few hours. The best system is not to think at all.

Bill came in after the olives. The Cheshire-cat grin had vanished abruptly. His face had once more that guarded, rebellious look. "How am I doing?" he asked. "Putting on a pretty good show?"

LINDA wanted to fling back some biting, angry retort. It had become almost instinctive to meet his antagonism with an equal measure of bitterness. But there was only a screen door between them and the back porch; if they were going to have a fight, they would have to postpone it. She said icily, "Shall I bring the chickens out now, or wait?"

Bill stared at her a moment in silence. Finally he said heavily, "It doesn't much matter. I'll take them along now, if you like."

"Chickens!" Beth exclaimed happily.

"On the grill, no less," Sam added, smiling. "Bill always was an ambitious fellow!"

The anchovy hors d'oeuvres were passed around. Bill started the fire, nursing it along by adding one twig at a time.

"You have to get a good bed of coals," he explained, "without too much flame. Otherwise you sear the skin without cooking the meat properly."

"Remember the picnics we used to have?" Beth asked. "Bill always made the fires then too. No one else was allowed to touch them."

Beth had curled up on a cushion on the grass—little-girl fashion, with her feet tucked under her. She was wearing a dainty summer dress, a kind Linda remembered so well. This one was apple green, with a design of white flowers, and a touch of lace on the short sleeves. But somehow the dress hung limp against her wiry body. And her face, in the fading light, had a too-sharp, anxious look.

Linda brought out the salad and the sandwiches. The hydrangeas were in full bloom; with the coming of dusk their scent hung heavy in the air.

Beth said, "This garden is really a gem. What are your plans, you two? Are you taking a vacation this summer?"

Linda hesitated, waiting for Bill to answer that one. When he didn't, she said in a rush, "Bill has a new business of his own now. It's going along splendidly, but he can't get away."

Bill and Sam started to discuss the business, their low voices rumbling pleasantly. Their faces were relaxed in the firelight—Sam's broad, with a hint of heaviness around the jawline, Bill's thinner, almost lean, with a more intense and sensitive structure.

Between talking to Beth, Linda heard snatches of their conversation. And it continued to be about the business, that forerunner of many of their quarrels. Bill's new venture was precarious, and he'd given up a safe, promising position to start it. But whenever she'd pointed that out, they'd begun to wrangle. Bill refused to realize that she had a lot at stake too.

LINDA fought down the familiar resentment, the need to remonstrate and argue with him, even now, when it was all over. She tried to turn her attention to Beth. Beth Fenton had always been a talker. And she had a way of rattling along that made it hard to concentrate. Now she was playing the game of "Remember when ——"

"Remember when we all went sailing at the shore, and got caught in a storm? I've never been so frightened in my life!"

"And then we took refuge in a strange boathouse, and Sam had a pocketful of peanuts to keep us from starving!" Linda laughed, and tried to play the game too. But somehow it seemed to fall flat. You could recall events, and even details. But the important parts—the thoughts and sensations and feelings—had become hopelessly submerged in the present.

Bill threw more wood on the fire. The conversation became more general. They talked about Denver and Saybrook, and about mutual friends, many of whom they'd lost track of. "How about Reid Dunning? Whatever happened to him?" Nobody knew, it seemed. Nobody really cared.

A tiny crescent of moon appeared behind some trees. But it was still hot enough to stay out in the garden.

Beth leaned forward so that her face was etched by the firelight. "Isn't this fun, Sam?" she exclaimed. "Isn't it just like old times, the way I said it would be?"

The remark was natural enough—especially for Beth, who was given to clichés. But something was wrong. Beth's voice, perhaps. It was too high, and overeager—almost as though she was pleading with Sam. Linda felt uneasy. She wondered if the Fentons had guessed the truth about herself and Bill, in spite of all their efforts to cover up.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

A Gayer Hour Will Come

By Meryle Moore Simpson

A gayer hour than this will come again.
  Spring will invite me to her April tea
And after drinking cups of pale champagne
  My heart will throb with magnanimity.
When rubbing elbows with the violets,
  Who still would grieve for one who chose to go?
Or, after watching clouds turn somersets,
  Who would remember winter and the snow?

I will put on my yellow party dress;
  I will skip lightly in my brand-new shoes;
And on that day I know no one will guess
  How difficult I found it, once, to lose.

I will walk slowly home, and on my cuff
I will write boldly, "April is enough!"

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

THEY dry in record time, indoors or out. That's one of their many advantages, which include —

1. Faster drying speeds diaper laundering, indoors or out.

2. Highly absorbent — surgical weave absorbs more thoroughly.

3. Foldline, woven permanently into fabric, makes it easy to adjust the fold to growing babies.

4. Have no hems to irritate baby's tender skin.

5. Easier to wash — open weave speedily cleansed with pure Ivory Flakes.

Mothers, medical authorities, and leading hospitals use and endorse Curity Diapers.

KENDALL MILLS, Division of
The Kendall Company, Walpole, Mass.
A KENDALL PRODUCT

Sam's answer was strained, too, and lacking in conviction. "It sure is!" he exclaimed heartily. "You'd certainly never believe that we'd been away so long."

"Never in the world," Beth echoed eagerly.

Bill nodded uneasily.

"I'm afraid we'll have to be running along," Sam said. "We're catching a nine-o'clock train in the morning."

Beth seemed disappointed. She said, "I'd love to see the house. Could you show it to me, Linda?"

"Of course."

They went upstairs, but Beth wasn't, after all, very interested in the house. Instead she sat at Linda's dressing table, combing her hair, adding powder and lipstick and a faint touch of eye shadow because her lashes were reddish too.

"Eye shadow!" Linda exclaimed. "That's something new, isn't it?"

"Not really," Beth said slowly. "I've been using it for several years."

Then she turned around, and it was almost as though a mask had slipped from her face. Linda glanced hastily away. It wasn't good to see that look on anyone's face—that pinched, almost abject defenselessness.

"Linda, I have to tell you something," Beth said. "I might as well, that is. You'll know pretty soon, anyhow."

Linda wanted to protest. She wanted to say, "Whatever it is, don't tell me. We're not that kind of friends any more. We're strangers, really, playing a sort of game!" But she didn't know how to phrase it. And she realized guiltily that Beth was a creature of loyalties; Beth had bridged the years more wholeheartedly than any of them. It wouldn't do to turn away now. So instead she stood looking down at the top of Bill's bureau—noting the pipe with its sprinkling of ashes, the discarded necktie and the automobile license, which shouldn't be left around that way.

Finally she said uneasily, "If you're sure you want to, Beth."

"I'm afraid I have to!" Beth exclaimed. "Linda, Sam is divorcing me. He's fallen in love with someone else. He doesn't even know I exist any more."

The words fell like flat pebbles into the silence. Linda could almost feel them, echoing over and over in the silent room: "He doesn't know I exist. He doesn't know I exist." But that simply couldn't be, when you thought of Sam, so protective and adoring six years ago! Beth was making it up; or else she had become one of those stuffy, jealous females ——

Linda said awkwardly, "Are you sure, Beth? You may be imagining things."

Beth's laugh was on edge, half hysterical. "I wish I were!" she said. "You see, this girl is a lot younger. She's modern too. She wears blue jeans rolled up above her knees, and long straight hair. But in the city she's sleek enough. She's even got a career in advertising. She's got everything. Sam is like a man possessed. He's mad about her."

"But does he have to marry her?"

"He thinks so." And then Beth said humbly, "I told him, Linda, that I wouldn't object to . . . anything, as long as he didn't leave me."

Linda sat down on the bed. She couldn't take this in yet. There was irony in the fact that the Fentons were breaking up too—just when she and Bill were. But it wasn't, on the whole, too surprising. Ten years was supposed to be a sort of milestone in marriage, and none of them had been able to reach it. It was as simple as that—but with a difference. Because Bill hadn't fallen in love with anyone else; she had never had to face that.

She looked up. She said inadequately, "I'm so sorry, Beth. If there's anything I can do ——"

"But there is!" Beth said in a rush. Her breathless little voice was suddenly eager, her brown eyes almost too bright and hopeful. "That's why I persuaded Sam to stop off here," she explained. "We're on our way to New York to arrange a transfer of Sam's trust fund there. And I thought if we saw you

Carter's new Tyke† pant is droop-proof!

See it and you'll believe it! Here's the secret. The crotch section g–i–v–e is up and down when the body bends. Side sections g–i–v–e around as little folks squat. Result: no tug on waistbands. No more hitching crotch or hiking legs. It's the two-way stretch idea made in Carter's own long-wearing cotton knit fabric. Ask good stores for Carter's new no-droop Tyke pant. It buttons on regular Tyke Tops. Sizes 1 to 8 years. 69¢ to $1 a garment.

BABY DUE? Ask for Carter's layette essentials, too.

Jiffon--Nevaband* shirts. Birth to 3 years, 59¢ to 85¢.
Jiffon--Nevabind* gowns. Open or closed backs. Birth to 1 year, $1.50 to $1.65.
Tie binders. 39¢ to 45¢.
Kimonos. Birth to 1 yr. $1.50.

FREE—DRESS FACTS baby book. Write The William Carter Co., Needham Heights 94, Mass.

P-s-s-t! Carter Makes Fine Underwear for All the Family and Bill, and had some good times together, the way we used to —— Don't you see, Linda? Sam may change. Remembering how he felt then, and how wonderful it was before ——"

"Why, of course!" Linda said. But she couldn't match the hope in Beth's eyes. She couldn't, in fact, understand any of it. Sam had always been such a big, dependable, sterling sort of guy. Unconsciously they'd all looked up to him as the stabilizing member of the group. And to think that it was Sam who had gone off the deep end! Realizing that, Linda felt a little sick. Bill had at least left her her pride. He knew she was alive. He cared enough about her to hurl angry, taunting remarks. But what was it Beth had said? "Sam doesn't even know I exist."

She had to answer that look in Beth's eyes. "If it's simply an infatuation," she said uncertainly, "re-creating the past might help a lot."

"That's just what I thought!" Beth exclaimed. "You and Bill haven't changed a bit. And I could see that Sam was happy being here. He's always been crazy about you."

Linda felt uneasy and worried too. In Beth's present state of mind, it might be very unwise to let her know how wrong she was about their marriage. She wondered, too, how she could ever explain it convincingly. She would say, "Bill and I are simply incompatible. We don't agree about a lot of things. We have one quarrel after another." But would Beth understand anything so elusive and insubstantial, when she was faced with Sam's faithlessness?

Linda did try, though. She said halfheartedly, "Bill and I have our disagreements, too, you know."

"But that's different," Beth protested passionately. "You still love each other. Anyone with half an eye can see that."

LINDA didn't answer. She felt shivery, almost sick. Beth was going to hate her when she learned the truth. And the worst part was that right now she couldn't make it seem real to herself. Something about her perspective had shifted; something else had begun to dissolve.

Beth sat down on the bed abruptly, and covered her face with her hands. And what she said then was dreadful to hear. She said in a whisper, "Linda, I'm afraid Sam got bored with me years ago. He began meeting other people; and you know I've always talked too much and rattled on. I can't seem to stop. But after a while Sam didn't listen any more." She looked up, and her eyes were still dry. She said, "If it hadn't been this girl, it might have been someone else."

LINDA forced a smile. She gave Beth's thin shoulders a quick, hard squeeze. She said too heartily, "I happen to know that you're just inventing all that—making it up out of whole cloth." But in her heart she wasn't at all sure. Because, in spite of her sweetness, Beth was a flat, uninspiring little thing. Sam seemed to have progressed miles beyond her. In an effort to deny that, Linda said earnestly, "Let me know if there's anything at all that Bill and I can do."

Beth said slowly, "The only hope would be if Sam and I could stay on in Saybrook for a while. I'll speak to him about it tonight."

Linda didn't try to face the implications of that. Just now Beth's problems had almost overshadowed her own.

They could hear the men talking in the downstairs hall. Finally Bill called up the stair well, "We don't want to rush those girlish confidences, but the taxi is outside, waiting."

Beth turned back to the mirror for a hasty repair job. And then they hurried downstairs.

The farewells were exuberant replicas of their greetings: "It's been simply wonderful!" . . . "Just like old times!" . . . "You haven't changed a bit!" . . . "We've loved every minute of it!"

Sam helped Beth into the taxi—smiling that grave, confident smile of his. Beth waved from the window—you could see her gay, defiant little patch of handkerchief fluttering pointlessly all the way down the drive.

Bill turned at once and went out to the garden to put out the fire and gather up the debris. Linda followed more slowly. She felt tired and strained, shaken by what had happened. She watched in silence while Bill threw a pitcher of water on the flames.

(Continued on Page 218)

to look well
and feel well...
SLEEP WELL

light but warm blankets mean restful sleep

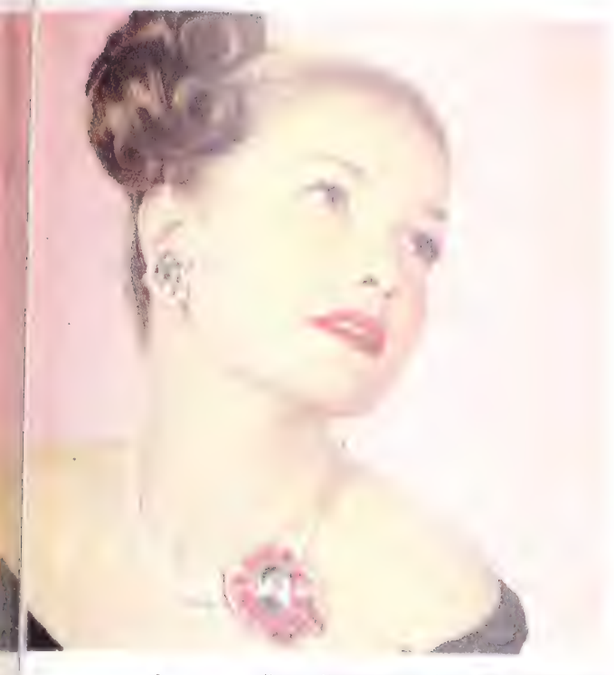
CHATHAM MAKES GOOD BLANKETS

Chatham makes full bed size blankets in luxurious virgin wools and serviceable blends, in lovely flower colors. From about $7 to $35. Baby Chatham Blankets, pink, white or blue, gift-packaged in pretty plastic boxes. From about $6 to $11. At fine stores everywhere.

CHATHAM Blankets

Chatham Manufacturing Company, Elkin, North Carolina

"Makes a feller realize how old he's getting, doesn't it?"



Lovely Mother

Petite Peters Girl June Davis Lamb is a devoted wife and mother in [illegible] Society. Already [illegible]

Lovely Baby

June's baby is a "model", too. June shops for baby with a model's flair for beautiful things—plus a real nurse's sense of value and a mother's insistence on baby safety and comfort.

Lovely Carriage

That's why June [illegible] THAYER ALUMINUM COACH, the most beloved baby vehicle ever built. THAYER is now available in new, flexible synthetic material, which resists cracking and scuffing. It cleans so easily that THAYERS are now made in rich new colors. The gleaming aluminum chassis means light, easy handling. Then there's a patented Feather-Touch 3-Position Back Rest, bicycle-type wheels with semi-pneumatic tires and self-oiling, squeak-proof bearings, safety brakes, adjustable aluminum push handles, and all the famous THAYER features for jolt-proof, sway-proof comfort. See the lovely new THAYERS at your favorite store, or send 10 cents for your "PRIMER FOR PARENTS" to Thayer Company, Dept. LHJ, Gardner, Mass. (In Canada, write to Bruce Stauffer & Co. Ltd., Montreal 25, P.Q.)

YOUR LOVELY BABY DESERVES A Thayer COACH

Makers of the famous THAYER TRIPLE-DUTY HI-CHAIR with THA-LITE TRAY, IMPERIAL and ZEPHYR STROLLERS, THAYER TODDLERS, DOLL CARRIAGES, and fine juvenile furniture.

Cinderella Frocks at Easter—with Bunnies and Egg hunts and all kinds of fun! Just see these sister dresses with their darling Bertha collars. And have fun in them - all Cinderellas wear and wash like magic!

IT'S A DAN RIVER FABRIC

CINDERELLA'S COACH the sign of smart frocks for girls REGIS PATENT

Cinderella Frocks

always look for the Cinderella Coach label

sizes 3 to 14 - about $3 to $4 - at leading stores

(Continued from Page 216)

Finally she said, "I think it went off all right, don't you?"

Bill straightened up. "At least it's over," he said heavily.

Linda sat on the arm of one of the chairs. She said quietly, "Bill, you aren't in love with anyone else, are you?"

That made him angry. "What do you think?" he retorted.

She thought in surprise, His very bitterness is a form of love. It shows that at least he's aware of me.

"Just what caused that particular outburst?" Bill asked caustically.

She knew he was upset, and that he was laying the foundations for one of their fierce, endless quarrels. But tonight she couldn't meet it with the familiar, rising antagonism. Some of her resentment seemed to have evaporated, or to have merged, somehow, with an unexpected gratitude. Bill still cared enough about her to lash out that way. He wasn't entirely indifferent. Not yet.

She said slowly, "Sam and Beth are getting a divorce. Sam has fallen in love with someone else—a younger girl, with a career in advertising."

"Sam?" Bill was frankly astonished. And then he laughed. "You mean all four of us were putting on an act?"

Linda smiled wanly. "We never would have dreamed of it six years ago, would we?"

Bill ran his hand through his thick, dark hair. "Linda, do you have to put us through that kind of slop?" But he sounded utterly miserable. His voice was heavy, and deeply depressed.

After a while she said, "Anyway, I'm glad that it isn't because you fell in love with another girl. I couldn't have stood that."

"I can't see that there's much difference in the over-all picture."

"Oh, but there is," she protested. "This way you've left me my pride, Bill. And my ego, whatever that is. I mean having it mutual and all."

"Mutual incompatibility," Bill said ironically.

"That's right," Linda said. "But it isn't nearly as bad as being discarded for someone else."

Bill didn't answer. He was standing close to the fire, with his hands in his pockets. The flames weren't altogether out, but the water had left them debilitated. In the silence they could hear the hissing steam, and an occasional sharp crack.

"I never would have thought it of Sam," Bill said. "He doesn't seem the type."

"Sam has changed. Beth thinks he's been bored with her for a long time. She's dreadfully unhappy." Linda's voice broke slightly—whether because of Beth's troubles or her own, she didn't know.

Bill turned sharply. "Don't let it get you," he said. "Beth will manage, and so will you. You have all those fine friends, for one thing. The Aikens, and the Winthrops ——"

Here was one of their familiar arguments. Bill resented those friends; he thought them cheap and insincere. But tonight Linda half agreed with him. She said, "I'm not sure they'd be loyal to me, Bill."

"I'm quite certain they wouldn't," he said curtly.

Linda didn't answer. The darkness confused her—and the faint, familiar outline of Bill's face in the dying flames. Vaguely she tried to recall the most pressing of their disagreements.

She said, on a tangent, "I'd much rather have you playing golf late than dating some girl you were crazy about."

He said abruptly, "Don't worry. There isn't anyone around here who interests me that much."

Unconsciously his voice had softened, though. She hadn't met his initial antagonism, she hadn't even wanted to. So there had been nothing for it to feed on. Linda considered this uneasily. Perhaps there was a very narrow margin between loving and hating.

And then she heard the telephone. Ringing, at this time of night, it had a curious, blatant urgency. "I'll go," she said. As she

Cuddle-Nest
NOW
MORE LUXURIOUS

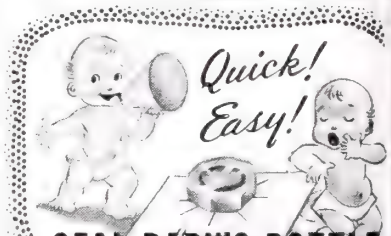
SOFTER, RICHER—AND REALLY 3 GIFTS IN 1

PAD, pillow and quilted coverlet. Kantwet's exquisite new Cuddle-Nest combines all three. In baby blue, pink or white rayon satin. Kantwet's famous wetproof plastic lining keeps baby socially acceptable while sleeping, travelling or riding in the car.

At Better Stores Everywhere

A "KANTWET" PRODUC

*T.M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.—Pat. D.140,917. Other Pats. F



Quick! Easy!

SEAL BABY'S BOTTLE WITH DISPOSABLE
QUICAPS
NURSING BOTTLE CLOSURES

39¢ pkg.

60 Quicap collars, 180 Cellophane covers. Disposable. No sterilizing. FREE samples! Write: The Quicap Co., Inc., Dept. L20, 233 B'way, New York 7, N. Y.

Maternity Slip

ORDER BY MAIL

"Lady in Waiting"

A practical back-wrap slip. Fine quality washable rayon crepe. Easily adjusted . . . ideal for the mother-to-be.

POSTAGE PREPAID

$2.29

Sizes 32 to 4
Tearose or whit
Order your re
ular size. Mon refunded if n satisfactor
Order TODA

CRAWFORD'S

"Maternity Styles Exclusively"

Dept. A 1233 Baltimore Ave Kansas City 6, Missouri

Mail FREE Maternity Style Book of Spring Fashions

Name

Address

Town State

Who says my slip shows?

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

m wearing Royal Archer Waterproof Baby Pants, so any 'ips I make just can't show! here's nothing droopy about rchers — and there's plenty of tion room in their smooth fit. he kids in my crowd go for the ay Archers stay soft and comfy, ter many washings!

clear or opaque Plastic, Nainsook, or lanese Fortisan*. And look for those onderful Archer Waterproof Crib Sheets, ol *REG. U. S. PAT. OFF

ARCHER RUBBER COMPANY
ROYAL ARCHER BABY PANTS
CHER RUBBER CO.
MILFORD, MASS.
LITY RUBBERIZED GOODS SINCE 1907

Expect to hold your baby soon? Start her Right!

Naturally, to nurse your baby is best. But when this is impossible—or when baby goes on the bottle—give her the nipple next best to nature! That's a Davol "Anti-Colic" brand "Sani-Tab" nipple. It develops tiny mouth and jaw muscles through healthful, natural sucking exercise.

"Anti-Colic" DAVOL BRAND NIPPLES

FOR YOU—FREE—The facts about feeding. For free booklet, "Baby Feeding Made Easy," just address Dept. L-3, Davol Rubber Co., Providence 2, Rhode Island.

TRAIN BABY Quickly

aby learns cooperation ... Lil' Tyke rainer ... only a few minutes required for each training lesson. ... enables you to ... habits ... to eliminate rebellion and delay ... used by strapping child ... colors. Recommended by ... doctors. At leading stores.

Lil' Tyke TRAINER

ol. Higginbotham & Co.
DEPARTMENT L
14 MAPLE AVE. DALLAS 4, TEXAS

THANX ADS IN CHURCH BULLETINS, THUMBTACKING AND NAILBITING
A STYLE

Linda's eyes left the garden she saw Bill pick up the pitcher of water and douse the last of the flames.

She hurried into the hall and picked up the receiver. She recognized Beth's voice at once, though it was blurred with tears. "Hello, is that you, Linda?"

"Yes—why, yes, Beth."

"Linda, it isn't any use. I talked to Sam in the taxi about staying on at Saybrook. And Linda, he wants to hurry to New York because that girl is going to be there. He even admitted it to me. He's down in the lobby now, phoning her."

"Oh, Beth, no!"

"I don't think I could bear to go to New York now." Beth's voice was rising dangerously. "I'd know all the time that Sam was meeting her on the sly. I simply couldn't stand that."

"No, of course not," Linda said helplessly.

"This may be too much to ask, but I was wondering if I could stay with you and Bill for a few days. To get my bearings before I have to face the people at home and Reno and all. I need something—I'm afraid I'll go all to pieces otherwise!"

Linda hesitated. She said, "Just a moment, Beth. I'll ask Bill."

She hurried out to the garden. Bill was stacking the plates on a tray.

She said, "Bill, that was Beth. She doesn't want to go to New York, because that girl of Sam's is going to be there. She wants to stay with us for a while. What on earth shall I tell her?"

> I once heard a dignified clergyman say pomposously, "We owe the Jews more than we can ever repay." To which I felt inclined to answer, "I hope, sir, that in your case it is only a temporary embarrassment."
>
> —WILLIAM RALPH INGE:
> Lay Thoughts of a Dean (Putnam & Co.).

Bill shoved the tray to one side, and reached in his pocket for a cigarette. "What do you think?" he asked at last.

"She's—I don't know what to think," Linda said. "Beth's almost beside herself. She feels we can help her get her bearings somehow."

Bill lit a match. But then he held it so long that it burned his fingers before he let it drop to the ground. "You'll be taking most of the rap," he said. "Spending all day trying to cheer her up."

"It won't be easy for either of us," she admitted.

"If you're willing, Linda," Bill told her, "I am."

Linda went back to the phone, reassured Beth, and arranged to drive around to the hotel for her in the morning. When that was over she returned to the garden. Bill had forgotten the tray. He was sitting in the farthest chair in the dark, and he looked lonely.

Linda said, "She was dreadfully grateful. We'll have to try and keep her mind off things."

Bill lighted another cigarette, and the match made an island of light. All she could see of him was his very firm chin, and that he'd loosened his tie and collar. Bill always loosened his tie after the company had left.

He said, "The Aikens and the Winthrops may not be as bad as I think."

"They are, though," Linda said. "They're fun, but they're not the kind of friends you can count on."

"Very few are," he said. "You have a streak of loyalty yourself, Linda, so you're apt to forget that."

"So have you," she said.

It was very quiet after that. The scent of the hydrangeas was still heavy in the garden, but it was cooler now.

Linda said, "It's cooler. Maybe we're going to have a shower." She said that because she couldn't say any of the things in her heart.

Style 3676

The Story of a Lady like You!

There once was a lady (like you!)
Whose youngster wore every shoe through
Till she found out the brand
That most mothers demand . . .
Red Goose—it's the best all-round shoe!

Style 3655-4

TESTED AND COMMENDED by PARENTS' MAGAZINE

EXTRA values—quality construction, extra reinforcements in vital parts, lasts that assure proper fit — make Red Goose Shoes a wise investment in your children's foot protection. See them before you buy any shoes.

WISE MOTHERS CHOOSE . . .

Red Goose ACTION SHOES for Boys and Girls

also Friedman-Shelby Shoes

RED GOOSE SHOES

For name of your nearest Red Goose or Friedman-Shelby dealer, consult your Classified Phone Directory, or write:

Red Goose Division • International Shoe Company • St. Louis 3, Mo.

BACK ACHE?

Get safe, soothing warmth with G-E heating pad!

3-HEAT MODEL
$6.50
plus tax

Select the warmth you want—set General Electric Pad at high, medium, or low. Then relax.

Safe, controlled heat flows evenly through entire pad. Automatically stays at temperature you want.

Wonderfully soft—cushioned for extra comfort. Absorbent outer cover removable for laundering.

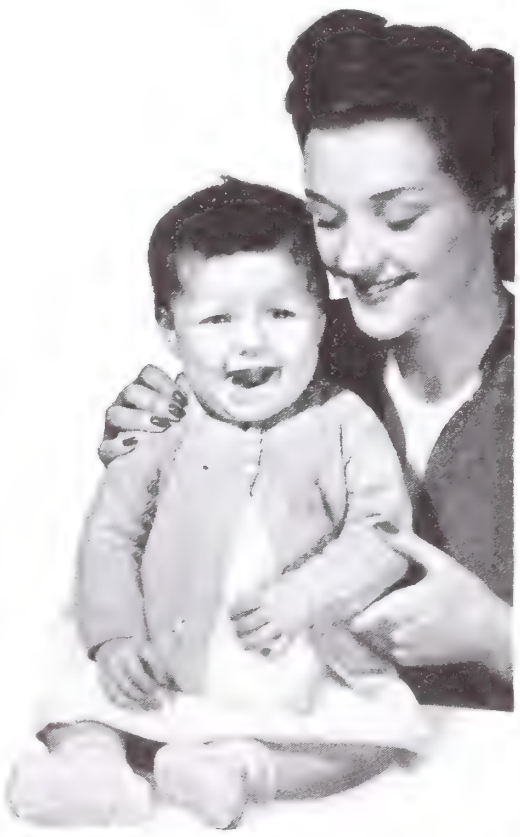
In pink, blue, green—studded with stars. A-C and D-C. General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

Approved by Underwriters' Laboratories, Inc.

Other G-E Heating Pads as low as $5.40 (plus tax).

GENERAL ELECTRIC

"only the best is good enough for my baby!"



I want the loveliest handknits in the world for my baby. I want them warm and soft and I want them to stay caressingly soft, after countless washings and wearings. That's why so many mothers like myself choose Fleisher's yarns for baby's garments. We know Fleisher's yarns spun from the very finest selected wools, hold their shape and texture. And when baby becomes a toddler, we put his things away, knowing that still fresh and new looking, they'll be ready for the next little stranger.

Get instructions for knitting this and many other baby garments. Send 30¢ for Baby Book Vol. 75 to Fleisher Yarns, 230 Fifth Ave., New York 1, N. Y. Dept. JF-37.

Fleisher's Yarn

GOOD WOOL IS THE FOUNDATION OF GOOD KNITTING

The crescent moon had vanished, but the sky was thick with stars.

Bill said, "Right now, I wonder why we ever fight."

"So do I."

"Maybe we won't any more," he said.

She felt as though it was hard to breathe. She felt as she had in those first early years of their marriage, when nothing was ever wrong between them.

She said, "For one thing, we still love each other."

"That's right. We still love each other, come hell or high water. And that's something."

"That's everything," she said. THE END

READ YOUR CHARACTER BY THE STARS

(Continued from Page 77)

most of the others we have listed as well while popular everywhere, are even more popular in the biggest places than in the smaller cities and towns.

Why? Perhaps because they are sophisticated personalities themselves, or because they play citified roles; or generally appear in stories of a type most liked in cities. Whatever the explanation, the fact is clear; and the appearance of those three names on a list of only eight makes it almost certain that the author of the list is a city dweller.

As for the assumption that the list was made up by a person who prides herself on keeping up with the world, Rex Harrison's name was the clue. Most adult movie-goers are loyal to their established favorites; they are not likely to rate a newcomer among their top favorites until they have seen him—or her—in at least three or four pictures. While Rex Harrison is an established "cinema" star in England, he had never starred in an American-made film until Anna and the King of Siam, which ran for weeks at New York City's Music Hall.

So the individual who made our list is the type of person, first, who sees the new pictures people are talking about, and then makes a point of remembering the names of the new players.

Finally, the combination is revealing; Gregory Peck and Jennifer Jones, for instance, would suggest one kind of person; Gregory Peck and Ingrid Bergman somebody else again.

So the more stars you name, the easier it is to "guess" you.

Incidentally, the number you name is itself a clue. The younger you are, the more stars you are likely to name!

Just for fun, let's look at another list:

Lionel Barrymore
Bette Davis
Greer Garson
Fredric March
Margaret O'Brien
Walter Pidgeon
Barbara Stanwyck

Can you visualize the author this time? Again it's a woman, about ten years older than our first hypothetical movie-goer. She's less sophisticated; while she, too, is intelligent and discriminating, she makes less of a point of keeping abreast of smart table talk. She's on the serious side; she's almost certainly a housewife; and as for her home, she may live in a suburb, but probably not in one of the big cities.

Want to Make a Guessing Game of It?

The next time you have six or eight people together, get them all to write down the names of their favorite stars, then see if you can guess who wrote which list. Better make sure it's a pretty mixed group, including husbands as well as wives, and some youngsters too.

Of course, this is really a game for an expert; to be sure you're right, you need detailed knowledge of the "popularity pattern" of the individual stars, as well as insight into the general differences, and considerable familiarity with movies. But there are a few good clues; they may be enough.

HOLD YOUR HAIR WITHOUT A CARE

AT BEAUTY SALONS AND NOTION COUNTERS

GOOD MONEY IN WEAVIN
Earn money at home weaving rugs, carpets, etc. from yarns or new yarn—in your community! No experience necessary. 31,000 doing it with easy running Union Looms costing less than $50.00! Send for our free booklet today
UNION LOOM WORKS, 44 Factory St., BOONVILLE, N.

LEARN
MILLINERY
AT HOME
Design and make exclusive hats under personal direction of one of America's noted designers. Complete materials, blocks, etc., furnished. Every step illustrated. You make exclusive salable hats right from the start. We teach you how to start a profitable business in spare time. Low cost and easy terms. Expert milliners are in demand. Free National Placement Dept. Send for free catalog
LOUIE MILLER SCHOOL OF MILLINERY
225 N. Wabash Ave., Dept. 33, Chicago 1, Ill.

TUMBLE-PROOF for LIVELY BABIES

BABEE-TENDA
SAFETY CHAIR
USED BY 500,000 MOTHERS
Converts to play table, serves dozens of ways
SEND FOR FREE FOLDER
Not Sold IN STORES See phone book for authorized agency or write today for full details
THE BABEE-TENDA CORP.
Dept. J 750 Prospect Ave.
Cleveland 1, Ohio
* Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. © 1947

MATERNITY STYLE BOOK FREE

LANE BRYANT
Maternity clothes enable you to dress stylishly during all stages of your maternity period—and after baby comes as well.
Designed to conceal your condition and to provide ample room for expansion.
Latest styles in Dresses and Corsets. Also apparel for baby. Send the coupon today for your FREE Book.

Lane Bryant
DEPT. 5-C · 752 E. MARKET ST.
INDIANAPOLIS 17, IND.

Mail FREE Maternity Style Book in plain wrapper.
(5-C)
Name .....
Address .....
Town ..... State .....

"I CALL 'EM MY SARONG"

GUARANTEED WATERPROOF and WASHABLE

Rand

BABY PANTS

he baby pants are tighter 'n a tight-fitting ve! But guaranteed Rand Baby Pants the roomiest I've ever worn . . . as se and comfortable as a sarong! I can ggle to my heart's content when I'm wear- roomy, cool, ventilated Rand Baby Pants.

Rand DRESS SHIELDS

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

GUARANTEED PARENTS MAGAZINE

Mom wore Rand Dress Shields before I was born! says they keep her dainty and fresh always!

RUBBER CO. "They Last Longer" BROOKLYN 16, N. Y.

BLESSED RELIEF FROM

loss of sleep

DUE TO

head cold MISERIES

Why torture yourself with that "suffocating" feeling due to head colds? A few drops of Mistol Drops with Ephedrine help clear out your nose . . help you to breathe easier and therefore sleep better.

Caution: Use only as directed

Copr. 1945, Stanco Incorporated

Is yours an Allergic Skin?

In cosmetic tests for special [illegible] your doctor about AR-EX Cosmetics at [illegible] drug stores.

AR-EX Cosmetics FOR SENSITIVE SKINS

FREE BOOKLET: Facts on Sensitive Skin

AR-EX COSMETICS, INC., 1036-CA W. Van Buren St., Chicago 7, Ill.

WARMTH FOR BACKACHES

Backaches, sacro-iliac or lumbago pains all benefit from the comforting heat produced by Allcock's Porous Plaster. Gives relief, supports muscles 25c . . . buy one now.

ALLCOCK'S Porous Plasters

Sex: If more than a third of the stars named are women, the maker of the list is a woman.

If most of the stars named usually play in dramatic roles or stories of love, romance and emotional problems, the maker of the list is a woman.

If there are more than one or two players who are primarily comedians, the maker of the list is a man.

If most of the stars play in action pictures—war, aviation, gangster films—the maker of the list is a man.

If all but one or two of the players named are men, the author of the list is a man.

Age: The longer a star has been on the screen, the more likely to be popular among older movie-goers. Few people over thirty will name more than one star who has not been on the screen at least five years.

In contrast, if there are four or five names of very new players, the list was probably made by someone under twenty. (Names you don't recognize are almost a guaranty that a youngster made the list!)

Watch for "self-identification"—the age of the characters whom the stars generally portray is one of the best indicators. But don't base your guess on any one star—look over the entire list, and then see what kind of story comes into your mind.

And a couple of special hints: Most young boys' lists will include only action and comedy stars. Any feminine names that appear will be those of singing and dancing stars.

A mature woman's list, in contrast, will include stars who appear in stories of romance, sentiment, dramas and sophisticated comedies, with perhaps a character actor or two as well.

> Money is the supreme test of domestic management.
>
> —GAMALIEL BRADFORD
> Wives (Harper & Brothers).

City dweller or villager: The general rules here are harder to formulate—the only real guide is a knowledge of the following of each individual star on the list. But a few hints:

The person who lives in a city is more likely to name new players, foreign stars, sophisticated urbane personalities, and stars of sophisticated urbane stories.

Oddly enough, most musical-comedy stars, except the very newest, are relatively more popular in small towns.

Income: Here, too, the general rules are elusive. However, again it helps to think about the kind of stories the players usually appear in.

Stars who play in the kind of story where money is taken for granted are usually most popular with the upper-income groups.

In addition, the upper-income groups look for pictures based on best sellers, and stars generally acclaimed for acting ability.

The lower-income groups are particularly attracted by comedians and action stars.

Some Favorites of Boys in Their Teens

Abbott and Costello	Jack Benny
Betty Grable	Errol Flynn
Danny Kaye	John Wayne
Bob Hope

Stars Especially Popular With Teen-age Girls

June Allyson	Margaret O'Brien
Dana Andrews	Sonny Tufts
Judy Garland	John Hodiak

They Agree on These

Van Johnson	Alan Ladd
Betty Hutton	Bing Crosby

When the whole family sets out for the movies, do your high-school son and daugh-

When baby's upset because of "Childhood Constipation"

...give Fletcher's Castoria!

"It's the laxative made especially for infants and children."

WHEN your baby isn't his cheerful self...when he's cross and upset just because of "Childhood Constipation"... here's the wise thing to do:

Give him Fletcher's Castoria. It works thoroughly and effectively. Yet it's so gentle, it won't upset his sensitive digestive system.

Why it's right for children

Unlike adult laxatives—which may be too harsh—Fletcher's Castoria is specially made for children. It contains no harsh drugs, and will not cause griping or discomfort.

And Fletcher's Castoria has such a pleasing taste that children really love it. They take it gladly, without any struggle. Caution: Use only as directed.

Get Fletcher's Castoria at your drug store today. Look for the green band on the package. It identifies the original and genuine product.

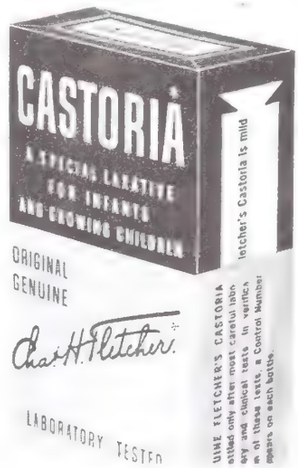
Chas. H. Fletcher CASTORIA

The original and genuine



Pour and compare!

You'll prefer this orange juice with the Tree-Ripe Flavor!

Unless you've tasted REAL GOLD, you don't know how downright delicious orange juice in cans can be. We invite you to pour and compare with juice from anywhere. Only the finest California Valencias are used for REAL GOLD. These are the sweetest oranges grown — richest of all in precious Vitamin C. Buy several cans of REAL GOLD today. Enjoy all the golden color and luscious tree-ripe flavor of freshly squeezed orange juice. So saving in time and money, too!

OTHER MONEY SAVERS! Try Real Gold Pure Lemon Juice, and Real Gold Orange Base.

FREE! "Uses For Juices" a colorful booklet with many exciting new juice recipes. Just write: Southern California Citrus Foods, Redlands, Calif.

PACKED FOR YOU BY THE GROWERS THEMSELVES

ter squabble about what picture to see? No wonder! Father and son agree on Bob Hope, Humphrey Bogart, Gary Cooper; mother and daughter on Greer Garson and Margaret O'Brien.

A Few of the Stars First Spotted by Teen-age Girls

Jennifer Jones	Robert Taylor
Frank Sinatra	Dennis Morgan
Lizabeth Scott

If Your Husband is Past Thirty

Spencer Tracy	Gary Cooper
Clark Gable	Humphrey Bogart

He's likely to suggest taking you to the movies any time there's a picture starring any of these players. Chances are you won't object—some of them are your favorites too. When there's a Bing Crosby–Bob Hope picture, better call off your bridge date—father will want to go to the movies! Among his other likely favorites: James Cagney, Pat O'Brien, Barry Fitzgerald, Edward G. Robinson.

If You're a Young Career Woman

Bergman	Milland
Cotten	McGuire
Fontaine	Peck

You'll find many of your favorite stars above. Most of these stars are most popular in cities, among women, among people under thirty.

If You're Past Thirty-five, a Housewife

Lionel Barrymore	Fredric March
Bette Davis	Walter Pidgeon
Greer Garson	Barbara Stanwyck

Your list of favorites will look more like that above.

Gentlemen Prefer

Dorothy Lamour	Ann Sheridan
Veronica Lake	Jane Russell

Most feminine screen stars are more popular among women movie-goers than among men. A few of the exceptions (actresses more popular among men than among women) are named above. Others are: Betty Grable, Betty Hutton, Judy Canova, Virginia Mayo, Maria Montez.

Young Man's Idol

James Stewart

James Stewart's picturemaking was interrupted when he went into the Air Forces, but his popularity continued. His most enthusiastic followers are found among young men between eighteen and thirty. Other special favorites: Henry Fonda, John Garfield, Cary Grant. THE END

Bringing up Parents

DR. BARBARA BIBER, Consultant
Child Psychologist, Bank Street Schools, New York

You may think you're immune to propaganda—but you're not if you put any faith in that widely accepted line about "carefree childhood." Children can match adults problem for problem. And to a child, his troubles aren't little ones either—they're just as important to him as yours are to you. What's more, sometimes a child's troubles can go quite deep. He can feel as frustrated as a present-day apartment seeker; he can feel guilty and suffer all the tortures of mind of an unhardened criminal. He's in the process of learning right from wrong, but when it comes to deciding which is worse, scribbling in his picture book or tearing up his father's insurance policy, he hasn't had enough experience to know the difference. So, even though you tell him (as you should) that something he has done is not a good idea, you should, at the same time, reassure him that he's not a dyed-in-the-wool gangster, or a juvenile delinquent—or even a bad boy.

"I've come to give myself up—I threw the spitball at Miss Hogan."

Gather 'round, mothers! Here's a great idea in baby feeding...

it's CLAPP'S "MEAL-IN-A-DISH"!

Just think of it, mothers . . .

. . . here in ONE dish is a wonderful balanced combination of meat and carefully selected vegetables. All pressure-cooked and strained . . ready to serve as a nourishing meal for your baby.

That's Clapp's famous "Meal-in-a-Dish"! And Clapp's has five different kinds.

Take Clapp's Vegetables-with-Beef, for instance...There's beef—specially lean and tender, and a whole garden assortment of vegetables... red-ripe tomatoes, carrots, celery, potatoes, cabbage—and even rice and barley.

Remember, there are five "Meal-in-a-Dish" treats brought you by Clapp's . . .

1. Clapp's Vegetables-with-Liver (Liver Soup),
2. Clapp's Vegetables-with-Beef,
3. Clapp's Vegetables-with-Lamb,
4. Clapp's Vegetables-with-Bacon,
5. Clapp's Vegetables-with-Chicken (Chicken Soup).

They're all wonderful in flavor, wonderful in nourishment...made as only Clapp's can make baby foods, as Clapp's has made baby foods for two generations of babies to thrive on.

Get your baby a week's supply of Clapp's "Meal-in-a-Dish" treats at your grocer's today.

Specially featured at your grocer's this month
BUY A WEEK'S SUPPLY TODAY!

Start your baby on CLAPP'S BABY FOODS
the first baby foods

CLAPP'S STRAINED FOODS ★ JUNIOR FOODS ★ BABY CEREALS

PRODUCTS OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS

There was a young woman named Hyde
Whose hands were her joy and her pride
But something was wrong!
Dishes took her so long
She was practically fit to be tied!

OH! OH! Mrs. Hyde used a mild bar soap that was easy on her hands—but what slow-poke suds!

There was a young woman named Pruett
Whose hands were a sight—and she knew it!
"Doing dishes," she said
"With strong soap makes them red."
How strange of Miss Pruett to do it!

OH! OH! Miss Pruett used her regular washday soap for dishes! Granulated for speed—but so strong it was hard on hands.

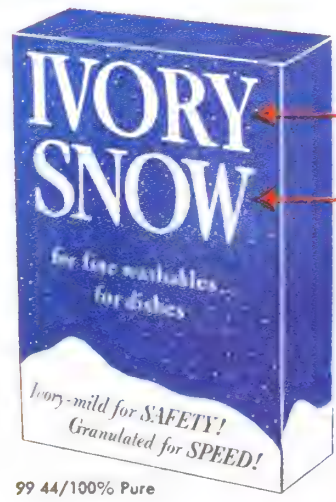
Now here is a lady named Whist
Her dishwashing has a new twist
Ivory Snow gives it speed
And the mildness hands need
If they ever expect to be kissed!

AH! Ivory Snow is the only soap that's both Ivory-mild for snow-white hands—and in granulated "snowdrops" for speedy suds! Tops in safety! Convenient! Leaves dishes sparkling clean—lovely hands smooth and white! No finer soap made!

NO OTHER SOAP LIKE IT!

This one soap gives both

Kindness to Hands!
Speed in the Dishpan!



for Mildness!

for Speed!

HEAR KENNY BAKER on Glamour Manor! New high in daytime radio! All-star cast! Fun! Music! Monday through Friday, 12 noon EST.

Framed in their splintering doorway: Jim and Alice Perkins and their youngest, nine-months-old Alice Faye.

Meet a Soft-Coal Miner's Family

OF HARLAN COUNTY, KENTUCKY

By Betty Hannah Hoffman

PHOTOGRAPHS BY FONS TANNELLI, F. P. G.

THE tar-paper roofs of the miners' shacks gleamed like coal in the early-morning rain. Pigs moved squealing among the houses, searching for garbage tossed out the windows the night before. Everything seemed to smell worse in the dampness: the sixty malodorous privies, the pigs, the chickens, the narrow valley stream choked with rotting refuse. At 4 A.M. the kitchen lights began to go on in the sooty white shacks, sixty of them, all identical, huddled in rows by Clover Fork Creek, in the soft-coal region of Harlan County, Kentucky.

In Jim Perkins' four-room shack the naked bulb in the front bedroom had shone all night. Twice a car had bumped to a stop out front and a man with a small black bag hurried in. At 4 A.M., Jim Perkins' first grandchild was born.

Into this four-room shack (arrow) crowd Jim and Alice, their seven children, their daughter-in-law and their first grandchild.

37% of the nation's families live on incomes of $1500 to $3000 a year.

VALLEY OF SOOT AND SHADOWS

So stoically did the young mother bear her pains that none of the six other children sleeping in the house awoke. Except Franklin Delano. "I was lyin' in bed smokin' a cigarette the whole time," he boasted. Frankie, who is 12, has seen and heard enough to be pretty nonchalant about the facts of life.

The new father, Bill, never went to bed at all that night. He looked gaunt and miserable, as any man expecting his first-born generally looks, as he paced by the bedside of his pretty, adored young wife. But Bill's pallor didn't go away the next day, or the next. It will never go away, because Bill, who is just 20, is wasting with tuberculosis. In the next room, curled up in bed with his two baby daughters, Bill's stepfather, Jim Perkins, slept soundly. Jim claims he has had tuberculosis since the first World War. As this is written, he's still mining, although he's crippled with arthritis, too, and his right side aches viciously from an ancient mine injury and his left leg, cracked up in the Army, occasionally buckles under him.

Jim is a soft-coal loader at Yokum Creek Coal Company's Mine No. 2. He's an inch under six feet and he mines a vein of coal thirty-four inches high. That means he picks and shovels all day on his hands and knees, with his arthritic legs often in a pool of water, and the live wire that runs into the mines to power the pit cars, sometimes hanging ten inches above his backside. "It's brutish work," says Jim. "I been crawlin' in those mines for forty-two years now. I'm all broke up."

Alice, Jim's wife, waited until the doctor left that morning before waking her husband to tell him the news. He peeked excitedly at the steamy red baby boy sleeping in his mother's arms, then hustled out to the kitchen to start the coal stove. With his jerky gait, his deeply lined face and almost toothless grin, Jim looks closer to 70 than his 54 years.

One by one, the family began to roll out of bed. With no sink in the house, they all washed in a small pan of water over by the back door, using the same sooty-black towel, then slipped into their places for a hefty breakfast of fried pork, gravy, eggs, stewed fruit and cocoa. Alice waited on her husband and three oldest boys first: Bill, the new father, sickly white from his all-night vigil, but happy and smiling; Oakles Earl, 16; and Frankie, 12. Then she sat down with the rest of the family:

Mary Frances, 7; John Llewellyn, 5; and Bobby Jean, an unsmiling and peaked girl of 2. The second shift ate from the unwashed tin plates and spoons left on the table by the first. The baby, Alice Faye, nine months, with the bald head and prematurely wise little face of a monkey, toddled underfoot. Whenever she fretted she was put at her mother's breast, where she nursed indifferently for a few moments, then wriggled down to the floor.

Shortly before 6 A.M., Jim left the house. Throughout the settlement, the miners emerged, lunch pails swinging, the lights on their caps marking their slow footsteps toward the mine, a thousand feet up the black face of the mountainside. A cable car, hung precariously against the cliffs, carried them up the last five hundred feet to the coal shaft cut horizontally into the rock.

Mary Frances, a pert and bossy seven-year-old, wanted to leave the house with her father to start waiting for the school bus, due at eight. She was running a fever from bad tonsils, but her mother couldn't keep her home. Nobody could [illegible] Mary knew that since there is only one nu[illegible] Evarts, a school of 1400 students, it was ur[illegible] that she would be caught and sent back.

Frankie, on the other hand, had a doze[illegible] cuses, as he does every morning. The soles [illegible] sneakers were ripped. He'd lost his work[illegible] He didn't have money for a hamburger a[illegible] diner for lunch. Frankie has good reas[illegible] loathe school. He's a big, husky youngste[illegible] his twelve years, with an aggressiveness to r[illegible] his mop of flaming red hair, and he feels misc[illegible] in a classroom of six and seven year olds. Fr[illegible] started school back in 1941 and so far has re[illegible] only the second grade. His brother Oakles E[illegible] or Pood, as they call him—reached third gra[illegible] fourteen and then gave up.

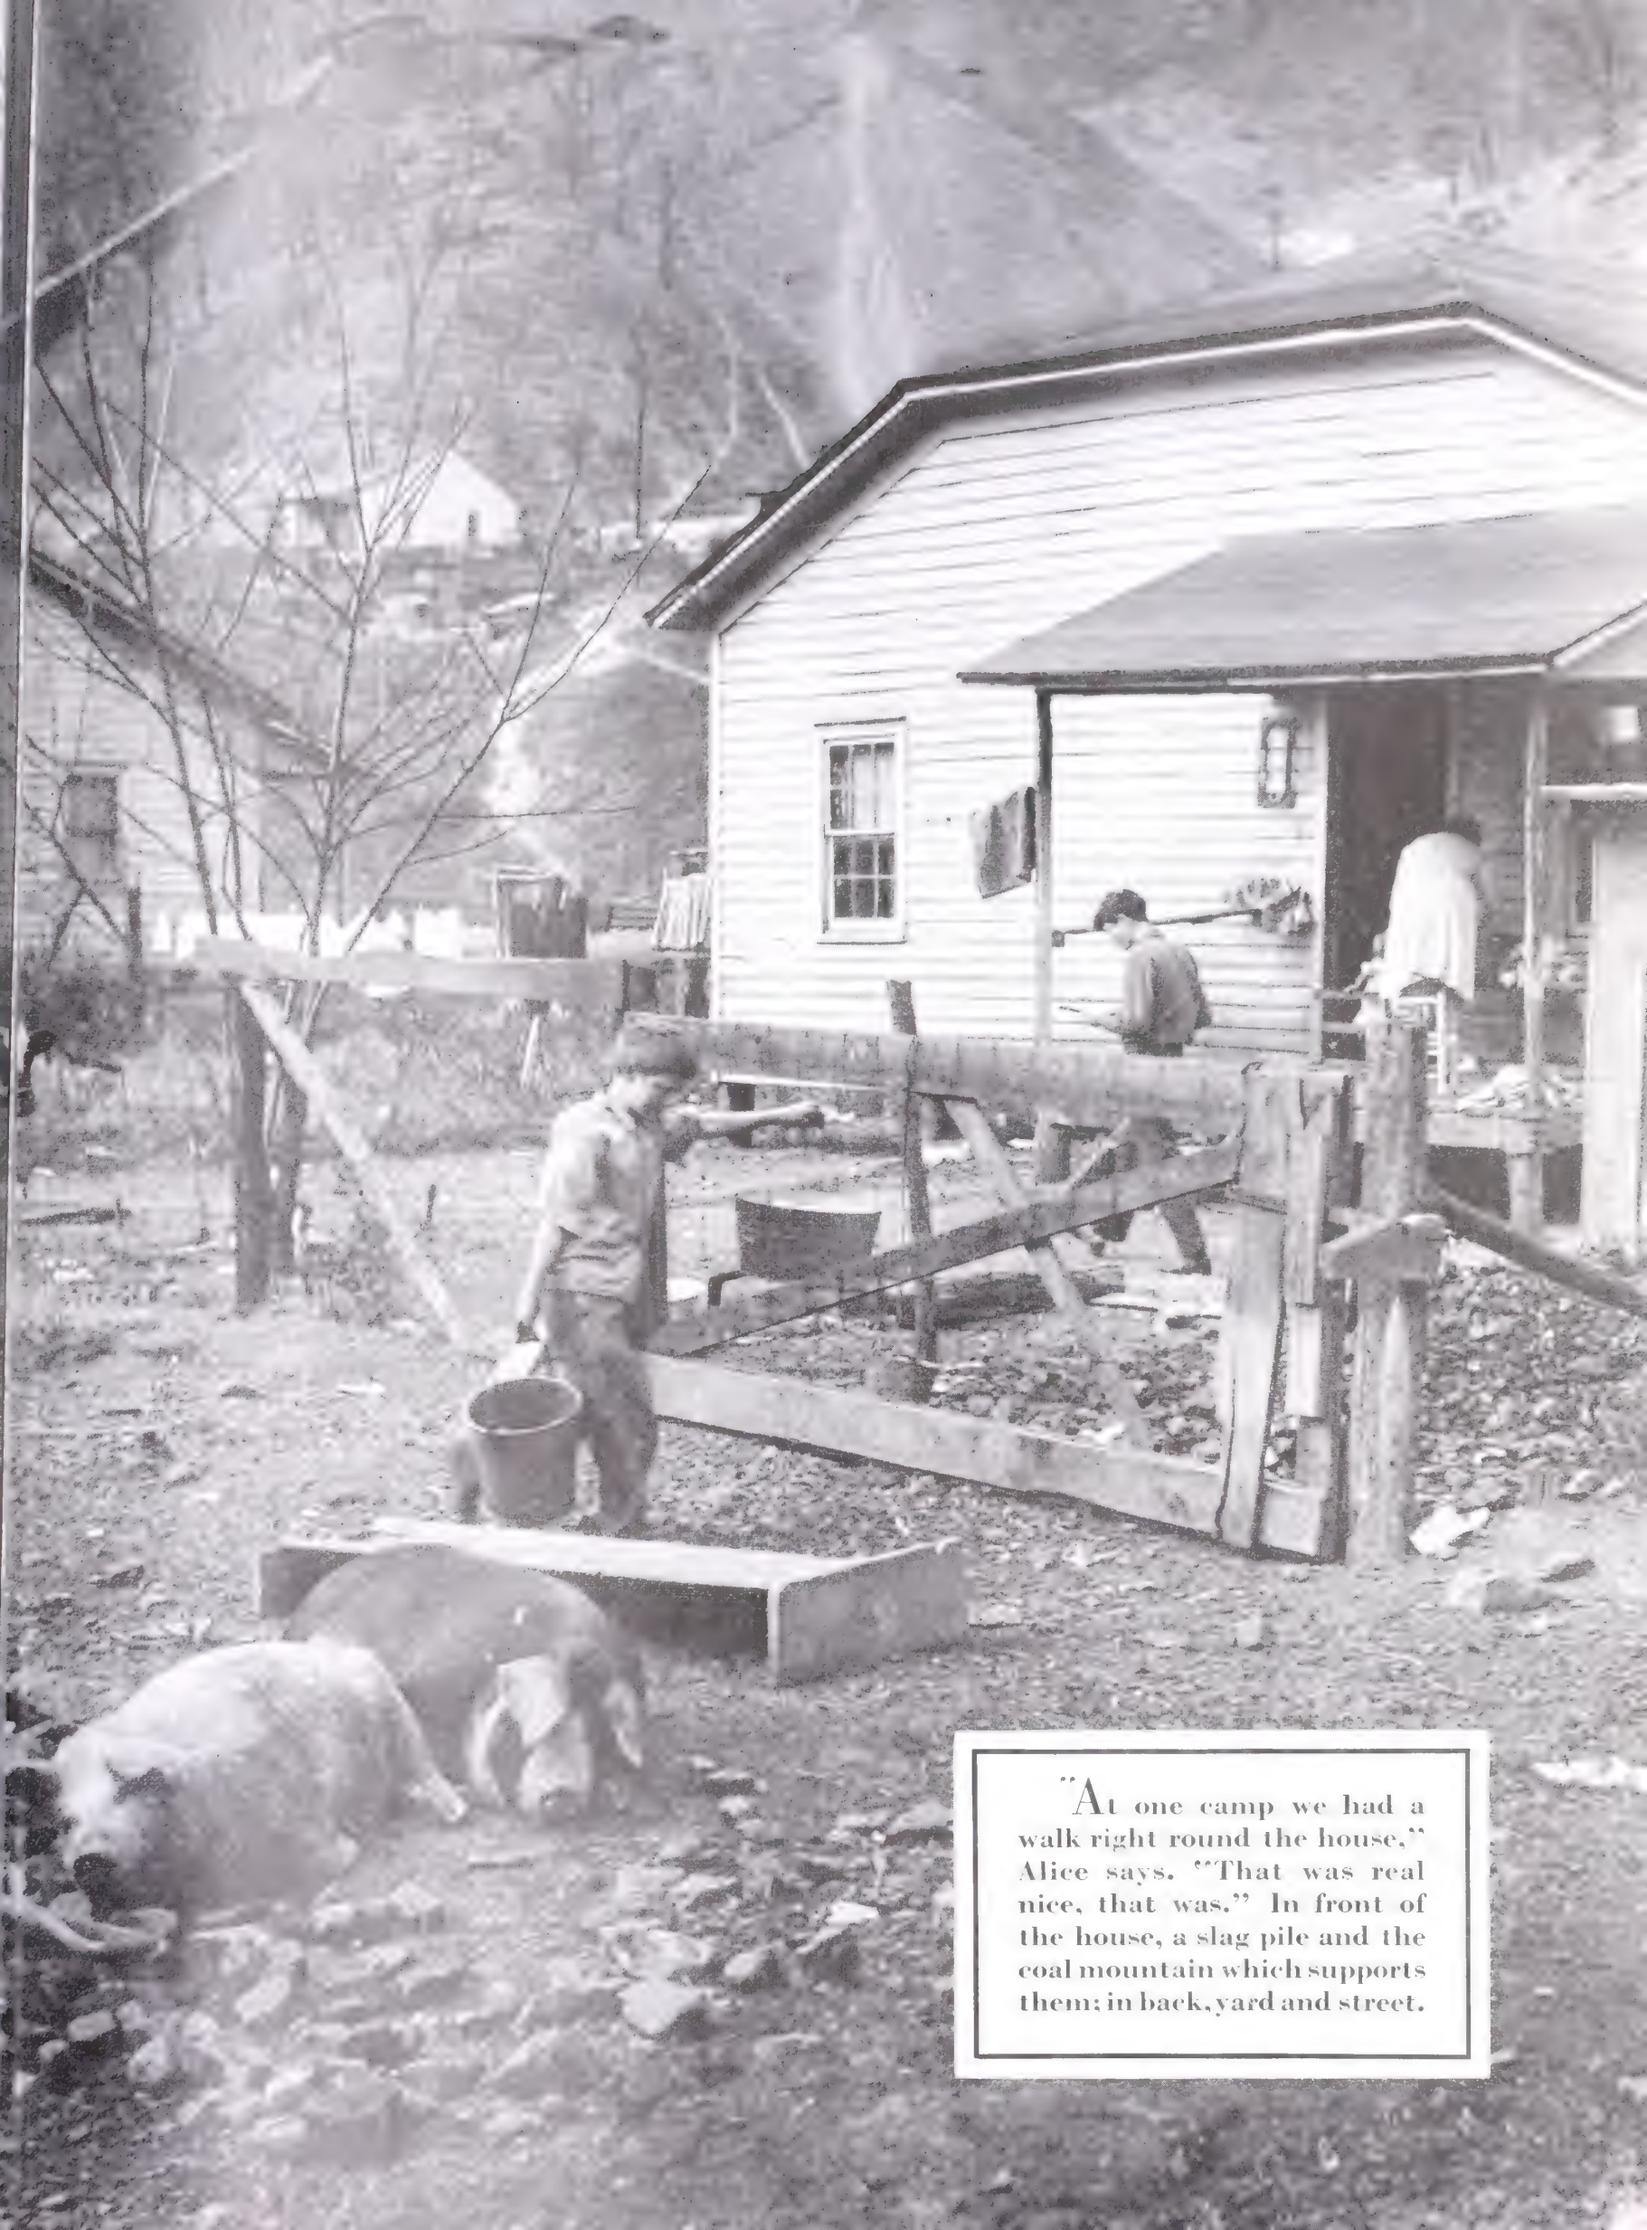
"I jest cain't larn," announces Pood, whos[illegible] marks were A's in art and citizenship, bu[illegible] in reading and writing.

The truth of the matter is that neither boy[illegible] ever gone to school more than two days[illegible] of five, and sometimes never appears [illegible] weeks at a time. By some mir[illegible] Pood picked up enough to follow [illegible] complicated instructions for ma[illegible] model planes, and this is all[illegible] cares about. Frankie, his tea[illegible] says, would be an average [illegible] dent if he would just com[illegible] school. When he does co[illegible] he frequently falls asleep[illegible] class. Frankie likes to gam[illegible] and smoke with his frie[illegible] until midnight, and regula[illegible] gets up at six. Pood, a qu[illegible] dark-eyed, good-looking b[illegible] spends his time making pla[illegible] and sweeping up at the comp[illegible] store.

No truancy officer or teacher h[illegible] ever called at the Perkinses' to [illegible] why the boys weren't in school, [illegible] though they are compelled by law to [illegible] tend until their sixteenth birthday. There [illegible] 19,000 children in Harlan County, of whom 1[illegible] 000 are enrolled in school, and two truan[illegible] officers to handle this situation.

Mary Frances is in the first grade and promis[illegible] to be a good student. Ever since the day [illegible] spanking across her teacher's knees taught h[illegible] not to chatter during lessons, she has been [illegible] model of good behavior. Corporal punishment [illegible] allowed in Kentucky schools. Between classes th[illegible] teachers stand with wooden sticks in their hand[illegible] monitoring the pupils through the halls.

"I'd jest as soon put the kids in jail as take 'em to a city," Jim says. "Here they can do jest as they like." In the picture above (front row, left to right): baby Alice Faye, Alice, Mary Frances, Bobby Jean, Johnny, Frankie; (rear) Jim, Pood. Picture left, Frankie, 12, "smokin' and jest playin'," Alice Faye, in doorway. At right, Bobby Jean, two, digging with young Johnny.



"At one camp we had a walk right round the house," Alice says. "That was real nice, that was." In front of the house, a slag pile and the coal mountain which supports them; in back, yard and street.

Alice mops daily, fighting greasy coal dust; launders the curtains monthly; the boys tote water.

"I'd like a washin' machine better'n 'bout anything in the world," Alice says. She washes daily.

Alice had all her babies at home; deliveri
$20 each, with no prenatal care. She lo

It is doubtful whether any of the Perkinses' children are spanked at home. Alice says she's the one who handles punishments. She moves lackadaisically about the house with sad dark eyes and shoulders sagging with fatigue. It is not surprising, therefore, that discipline of any kind is lacking in this household.

Jim says he would like to see his kids educated, but the problem of getting them to school defeats him. He quit after the third grade himself. Alice stuck through the fifth. Their knowledge of the three R's is so elementary that they are no help at all with homework. The only reading matter in the house is a Sears, Roebuck catalogue and the kids' comics.

The most educated Perkins is the daughter-in-law, Mildred, who was raised in Cincinnati and went through the first year of high. She was a slender, pretty girl who wore rouge and lipstick, and flowers in her hair. She met Bill while he was visiting his grandmother in her city. Ever since he was discharged from the Army in October, 1945, with a total-disability pay of $138 a month, they had been living in Cincinnati. Three months before the baby was due, they moved in with the eight Perkinses in their four-room shack.

The reason for the move was that Mildred didn't want to go to a hospital to have her baby. She was in a ward once for appendicitis, and found it a strange and terrifying place where Bill was allowed to see her only an hour a day. "And then they take your baby away from you and put it down the hall," she explained solemnly.

The Perkinses have the same distrust of hospitals as Mildred. Although Jim pays $1.50 a month hospitalization for the whole family, Frankie is the only one who has ever been inside Harlan Hospital. Pood accidentally chopped off the end of his brother's finger with an ax one day, and they sent Frankie over to get it properly sewed up. In this privately owned, sixty-bed hospital, no venereal-disease or tuberculosis patients are accepted except in the final dying stages. Jim says he is suffering from advanced tuberculosis of the left lung, but even if he wanted to g to a hospital (which he doesn't, with eight people to support), there is no place in Kentucky for him to go. The waiting list at the state's one sanatorium at Louisville has recently become so astronomical that the state has now drawn up plans for five new tuberculosis hospitals.

Mildred knew that she would probably not se to Harlan Hospital to have her baby. No mer a miner's family is admitted there without th pany doctor's O.K., and Dr. Walter H. Step practicing physician at Yokum, says that he no maternity cases unless complications ind difficult delivery. There are only twelve beds maternity floor, and one delivery room. started taking in all the miners' wives, with th rate the way it is around here, the whole place overflow in a week," explained one of the Hospital staff.

Alice Perkins had all her babies at home, del by the coal-company doctor for $20 apiece never had any prenatal care. "I jest didn't pay attention to it," she says of her nine pregn (one infant was stillborn and another died after birth). She did, however, stay in bed for t days after each delivery while her sister or m from Cincinnati took over the household.

Doctor Stepchuck, who attended the Perk daughter-in-law, Mildred, estimates that of th miners' children he delivered last year, about the mothers had prenatal care. Mildred had a W mann test, her internal measurements taken

Eleven in Three Rooms

"The kids jest love to git in bed with me," Jim says fondly. He turns in at 8 or 9 o'clo Frances, Pood and Frankie rarely go to bed before midnight. Jim rises at 4; eve up by 6 A.M. By numbers: 1—Bill, on couch; 2—Mildred with (3) new baby; 4—A alcium, phosphorus, iron and [illegible] the whole pregnancy. Stephine [illegible] atory facilities for testing the Rh factor. l infection among the home-delivered moth- e—the doctor recalls only one case in the , and she was delivered by a midwife.

people are hardy here," he says. "They're ed against their own germs. And then, every ne county gets smallpox, typhoid and diph- nots in school. Venereal disease is bad. So is osis. But they're giving the school kids sts now."

county-wide campaign revealed that two in undred school children in Harlan County ive tuberculosis. Alice doesn't know whether dren were tested or not, or which ones had ions. It is probable that more than two have TB in this household. Although husky, lren are pale, with frequent runny noses and coughs.

eems totally unconcerned with the possible usness of his disease. All the children, at one another, have slept with him. "They jest get in bed with their dad," he says fondly, igh laugh between a whinny and a wheeze. He ely about the house. Bill, on the other hand, Cain if any of the children uses his drinking le carefully destroys each cigarette butt.

of the children in the camp start smoking as they can hold a cigarette. Frankie boasts began at the age of two. Five-year-old Perkins inhales expertly. Alice gave up es herself some years ago, and took to chew- acco. As we sat talking on the sagging front- hammock, she held the baby at her breast t tobacco juice into the bright-red zinnias she l for a spot of color in the eternal black soot surroundings.

's lovely, gentle smile reveals a fine set of lays. She went to a dentist some twenty go—the only Perkins who has ever endured a drill. Most of Jim's teeth are now missing and t blackened with decay. "His teeth hurt him awhile back," recalls Alice, "but he just until the pain went away." Bill brought a rush home from the Army, but gave it up he found Mary Frances using it.

ough she has never owned a toothbrush, spends hours brushing and braiding her ful hip-length brown hair. She tries to keep use looking nice, too, in spite of the greasy coal dust which coats the place inside and out. She got Bill to paper the unplastered walls of her bedroom with pink roses—he hung two of the rolls upside down, but the general effect is cheerful. In this room is a bright new blue rep sofa and chair, bought on time for $219. The blue gauze curtains at the window are laundered regularly every month. On the double bed where she and Jim and the two babies sleep is a heavy blue chenille bedspread which cost $25. It was a heavenly, dazzling white when the salesman brought it to the door, but after the boys had lugged it out to the washtub in the back yard and Alice scrubbed it by hand several times, she gave up the struggle and had it dyed dark blue.

She does all her cooking on a secondhand coal stove, bought for $69 six years ago. It furnishes all the heat in wintertime except for the tiny double fireplace which opens on two of the bedrooms. There are no doors whatsoever between the four rooms, and with no insulation or even plaster on the walls, the cold air circulates freely. It gets so cold that water freezes right in the glasses, says Bill, who complains bitterly of the winters. He and Mildred and the new baby plan to return to Cincinnati soon, where he hopes to get a job at a packing-box factory to eke out his $138-a-month disability pay.

The last time Jim was over in Cincinnati, at a union convention, he was offered a job there in a lice Faye at head, (6) Bonnie Jean Jim, at foot; 8—Frankie and (9) -Johnny with (11) Mary Frances.

brewery. He turned it down. "I'd jest as soon put the kids in jail as take 'em to the city. Why, they cain't even run on the streets there. You have to put 'em on a leash and lead 'em like a doag. Here they kin do jest as they like, kin rattle off to a show or go anywhar they want."

Actually, there is little at Yokum for the kids to do. With no playground, they fool dangerously around an abandoned mine shaft or flock over to the poolrooms or movies at Evarts, a five-minute bus ride away. There is a small empty shack at Yokum which is used for Sunday-school and union meetings, but parties and dances are forbidden, according to Jim. "Too much fightin'."

Saturdays and Sundays (Jim rarely works on week ends), the Perkinses sit on the battered boards of their front porch and gaze across a railroad track at the shacks for colored miners on the other side. On both sides of the valley rise the denuded and bleak Black Mountains, with immense dump piles of slate cascading down from the mines.

"A miner," says Jim, "is a man settin' between two hills with nothin' to see but a tramcar goin' up and down, and no entertainment or nothin'."

In the Perkinses' tiny back yard are a coal pile for the stove, an unused chicken coop and a rickety, one-seat privy. Hundreds of flies swarm from it into the house. When the babies nap, clusters of four or five flies settle on their faces. Garbage is tossed out the windows at Yokum. When the privies overflow, a new hole is dug and a few spadefuls of dirt flung over the old one. Twenty or thirty feet from the privies, the wells are driven for the camp's water five pumps supply the three hundred pers live there.

Two persons bathe regularly at the Perkin baby, Alice Faye, and Jim, who climbs black-f filthy every night into a tin washtub. The built a bathhouse with showers for the r Jim avoids it. He's afraid he'll get athlete's Alice makes an effort to see that the re family bathes Saturday night, but heating t water on the coal stove is a tedious proc lugging it from a pump two hundred feet even more tiresome.

On washdays, she builds a fire in the back heat the water. During the recent shortage, able to get a box of soap only every two months, but somehow, with bleaching flu knuckles, she was able to get some of the greasy coal dirt out.

The Perkinses pay $9 a month rent fo shack, which was built in 1918. Their lease sa any improvements they make become the p of the company. The operator of Yokum Co pany, a former doctor, says that if he put u better houses for his miners they would so like the old ones. If they had running wate would leave the faucets on all day. "In t twenty years they've finally learned to keep t out of the kitchen, but it will be another gen or two before the children can educate their p Miners go where the best coal is—not where are better houses."

ALICE, who suffered from pellagra last su realizes that this comes from "not eatin' right company store, where they buy most of thei carries oranges and a few fresh green vegetabl cabbage and lettuce. The store manager say miners won't eat lamb, veal or any kind of f fish, so he sells only beef and pork. A typical at the Perkinses' consists of fried meat, ple gravy, or beans, mashed potatoes, canned co store cake. Two quarts of milk a day at 24 c quart serves this family of ten. Cold-storag cost them sixty-five cents a dozen. With no ice keep things cold, Alice has to buy in small am every day in the week, which is expensive sometimes shops for food in Evarts, where the are larger and cheaper, but Alice practically leaves the house these days. She used to atte Church of God almost every night before Alice was born, and there is no reason why she could im has a close relationship with his children. lness keeps him home a lot; he has arthritis.

"I like a mine

Jim prefers a washtub to company showers; says the new bathhouse gives the men athlete's foot.

"A miner is a man settin' between two hills with nothin' to see but a tramcar goin' up and down."

ow, with Mildred in the house to mind the babies, it she feels half sick most of the time, and lacks the nergy and heart even to visit among her neighbors. Jim suffers a good deal with his arthritis, but octor Stepchuck, who takes care of the whole mily medically for $4 a month, says there is no use eating him as long as he keeps on working all bent p in a damp mine. When it gets too bad, he gives im vitamin shots. In the Perkinses' kitchen cup-oard are some dysentery medicine, prescribed by tepchuck, and something they keep unlabeled in an ld salad-dressing bottle "for welts." The welts, they xplain, occasionally break out on the children and ay come from the water supply. These are the only edicines in the house.

Jim, who was born in a coal camp a few miles cross the mountains in Virginia, went into the ines when he was twelve. He has kept pretty much n the move, seeking better wages and also because e was known as a union sympathizer during the ears the United Mine Workers were infiltrating into Harlan County in the face of some of the bitterest pposition in union history.

He was 35 when he met Alice, a miner's widow f 21 with her son Bill, a year old. Jim was hoofing it down a railway track over in Letcher County, Kentucky, when he spied her and stopped to ask about work at the mine. Her father, also a miner, liked Jim's turn, helped him get a job and then invited him to board at his house. Three weeks later, Jim and Alice were married. She can't recall what she wore at the justice-of-the-peace ceremony, but remembers Jim was all dandied up in a white shirt.

THEY moved into a four-room shack much like the one they live in now, and continued to live in similar shacks at seven different mines during the nineteen years of their marriage. The Lynch camp, owned by U. S. Steel, was the best, Alice remembers, with a sidewalk running all around the house so you never had to step in the mud. Benita, a notoriously bad camp, was the worst—the water hip-high in the front yard and the only way into the house over a wooden plank stretched to the railway embankment.

Jim liked mining, when he felt fit. Shoveling coal in the black bowels of a mountain may be drudgery, but it also offers variety; a man is his own boss, his own time clock. The temperature of the Yokum mine is 50°, winter and summer, which—if you are doing hard manual labor—is pretty ideal. The hazards of mining are something else again. In the past eight years, three of Jim's coworkers have been killed at this one mine, which usually employs fewer than 200 men.

The company estimates that the average miner there makes about $60 a week. Jim's pay is not typical, as he is sick so much. In 1945, when he was on strike one month and laid up with flu and arthritis another three, he averaged $38 a week for the thirty-six weeks he worked. He loads about ten tons a day at 73 cents a ton, whereas an exceptionally husky loader, say company officials, can handle twenty to twenty-five tons a day and make up to $90 a week.

There is a saying in Harlan County that miners are shrewd about everything but money. Until recent years, they have never had much cash to handle. At Yokum, the miners' rent, food, clothes, furniture, light, all kinds of insurance—even their dry cleaning—is deducted from their pay envelopes by the company. That is, if they live at the camp and use the company store. Half of Yokum's miners live outside the company property.

"Miners don't know what to do with money," explained an official at Yokum. "Most of 'em shoot it on bootleg liquor at six dollars a pint. We tried to get

Jim Says

Harlan County mines are top mines, cut directly into the seam, or vein, of coal. At left, Jim travels to his work area in an empty mine car. As a loader, his task is to load the coal another miner has mined. He is also responsible for "timbering" (second from right), the placement of wood timbers to support the mine roof. Here the seam is 34 inches high; Jim is 5 feet, 11 inches. Jim's pay depends largely on the amount of coal he loads (he gets 73 cents a ton), and his relaxation periods (at right) are thus taken on his own time. "I like a mine," Jim says. "The temperature is jest right the year around." Here it's an even 50 degrees, summer and winter, and ventilated by motor-driven fan.

them to buy War Bonds, but they'd turn right around and cash them in and the whole thing got to be too much of a nuisance. If I were a miner," he went on, "I'd work like blazes for ten years and make enough to buy a little farm. But I'd say only about a third of our miners save anything."

Jim has never been able to salt anything away, not even in his salad days in the early twenties when he was earning big money up at the Lynch mines. He has no idea where his money goes today. Mildred complains that entirely too much is spent on "plain foolishness." Whenever the kids want money for ice cream or a show, they wheedle until they get it. Franklin Delano charges his mother a dime every time he steps a few yards over to the commissary.

In 1945, the Perkinses charged $636 worth of food and dry goods at this company store, and spent another $600 cash in Evarts. Which means they spent, roughly, $100 a month for food, clothes and recreation for the eight Perkinses. Since he was out of work four months with the strike and sickness, Jim had a tough time that year. He collected $9.33-a-week sick benefits for three months, which helped, and the other miners pitched in $23. But to tide him over he was forced to sell his cow and calf and chickens, a dining table, and an ice-cream cooler Alice used as an icebox. (Continued on Page 260)

The Hard Price of Soft Coal

By Joan Younger

COAL is the lifeblood of the industrial world. Its production is vital to our economy, to our way of life. It gives off the energy that runs the plants that bring us our light to see with, our gas to cook with. It fires our furnaces and makes our steel. It powers our trains and fuels our boats. Yet never in its history has our dependency on coal resulted in even average living conditions for the men who pick and shovel it from the bowels of the earth. Today, the growing use of oil and gas and the prospect of atomic energy threaten future prosperity of the coal industry from the outside; from within, rumbling charges from the miners that they are enslaved mingle with cries of the mine operators that they are making no profits. The controversy, and the battle over who is responsible for the miners' low level of living, their high rate of accident and death, rages furiously, threatening to engulf us all in its intensity. We do not know the word of peace. We do know that there is a need to clear away the sound and fury and look at the cause of battle. We are inclined to believe it lies in the men involved and their environment, and only by working with every man and all men will there be surcease. To this end we have collected three points of view on the conditions surrounding one mine—and one mine only. We do not claim this mine is typical; we know conditions are better in some and worse in others. The mine is Yokum No. 2, Harlan County, Kentucky; the views are those of its 175 miners and their union, the United Mine Workers of America, AFL; the county health, sanitation, medical, educational and civic authorities; and the mine's operator, Dr. P. O. Lewis, whose wife owns a half share in the 900 acres on which Yokum No. 2 stands, and who leases that land to the Yokum Creek Coal Company, of which Doctor Lewis is the major stockholder and operator.

I. HOUSING CONDITIONS

The Yokum No. 2 camp is Draper's Camp: 300–400 people crowded into 60 four-roo.i frame-and-tar-paper shacks, each with its privy. There is no insulation; fireplace and stove heating only; no basement, only pile foundations; no doors between any of the rooms;' no garbage collection or sewage disposal—which means the privy is simply moved over a couple of feet when necessary, that pigs are encouraged to eat the garbage, or that garbage is dumped into the camp stream. There is no running water, no reservoir, no water pressure, only five wells for the camp—which means no toilets, no bathtubs, no water pressure with which to defeat a fire or water a lawn, if one existed. No garages; only a bumpy, littered road to the highway a mile away. Rent, including repairs and water, is $2.25 a room ($9 a shack) monthly, electricity is $2 more monthly. No repair or upkeep is guaranteed by the owner, but painting, roof and porch repairs are done every other year by the landlord, the Yokum Creek Coal Company. Any improvements become the owner's property: the leases are invalid if an employee's work stops permanently at Yokum's mines for any reason. Estimates of what the shacks originally cost to build, in 1918, vary between $250 and $700.

What the miners say about housing:

"You're licked before you begin living in a mining camp—and the miner who leaves and builds or rents someplace else is the first man to get laid off when things are slow. If you put up wallpaper, water drips through the roof and peels it off; dig a hole for the garbage, and pretty soon your yard is all holes. Put a geranium in the window, where the pigs won't get it, and it freezes in the winter. And suppose you decide to get out: you can't buy land near a mine; it's all taken by the operators. And where are you going to get money for the down payment? It's only in the last few years we've made any kind of money at all, and the rise in prices eats that up fast, 'specially if you've got four or five kids like most of us have. Miners in these parts were treated like cattle until about ten years ago, when the union moved in—you can't expect us suddenly to know all about living like free men, especially when all we've got is technical freedom. The operators still run this state—and that means us too. They couldn't stomach a tax on coal—even though there should have been one a long time ago, and it should have gone into the welfare of the miners. Now the union's getting a welfare fund through a tax all its own and the operators are yelling. What's the answer to it all? Well, the welfare fund will help, and we're trying to get a Federal housing project to help too."

What the operators say about housing:

"The operators can't be held responsible for housing any more. Take garbage collections: that's a matter of public welfare—and nobody had any garbage collections here until the city of Harlan started collecting twice a week a couple of years ago. As for sewage disposal, there isn't a plant in the county. Sure, the miners ought to have better housing conditions, but if we put in running water or toilets they'd ruin them in ninety days. Besides, we couldn't get the labor or materials, and it wouldn't be profitable. We don't make any money on these houses. We'd like to get away from company ownership ourselves—and if the miners got some sense and moved out, we could. Of course, real-estate operators charge about $15 monthly for the same house—and miles away. And land isn't cheap, but it can be done and it's being done. Only about half the miners live in company camps here. As for operators running the state—the miners blame us for everything. Sure, we protect our interests. But like that road: I couldn't get a road in there because I was a Democrat when the right people were Republicans. Maybe we'll get one next spring. But with the pay the miners are getting these days it seems like they ought to be making their own way now—we don't owe any special favors to them any more than does any other employer."

County health and sanitation authorities:

"We've been operating here only since 1942, after Selective Service doctors found the health of the draftees from this area wasn't good. The city people don't interest themselves in conditions in the mining camps; the miners are used to them, and so are the operators. So that leaves us. And there's no law about garbage collecting or sewage disposal, and when we tried to get the pigs and hogs penned up, the city of Evarts, a mining city down there, voted four to one against the idea. The sanitation department's budget comes out of the health department's budget, and that's only $26,000 this year. We can just afford two sanitation men and a secretary. We can't do too much inspection; so we wait for complaints and, of course, check the water supplies and get the kids inoculated against typhoid—attack trouble at the result even if we can't get at the cause. Could the county afford to do more about sanitation and housing? I guess it could—the land was evaluated last year at $25,000,000, and that's just land. But the county doesn't think of the miners as citizens exactly; they don't pay land taxes, or have bank accounts, though they pay the poll tax and vote. The county got worried about VD when they got scared; maybe they'll get scared sometime that the miners' welfare may affect their own welfare."

II. EDUCATION CONDITIONS

There are 19,000 to 20,000 children in Harlan County, and 15,000 enrolled in the schools. Estimates on how many are complete truants vary from one out of five to one out of ten. Truancy is punishable by fine, but there are only two truant officers, and before any teacher submits the name of an absentee to the truancy department she is required to visit the pupil's home three times and fill out a form. Compulsory education begins at seven years of age and ends on the sixteenth birthday. Most children stop on their birthday. There are 432 teachers in the county (roughly 1 to every 35 pupils); pay is better than in most hill communities, but lower than that of a miner. Base pay is $120 monthly for nine months, plus 50 cents monthly bonus for each hour of college credit, plus $2 monthly bonus for each year of teaching experience. Many of the lower grades are taught in double classes in old buildings; Evarts grade and high school (which services Yokum No. 2) is a new building (built by the PWA in 1937) and houses 1400 students. More than half the teachers stay there only one year. There is a six-hour school day; no lunchroom, no playground but a gymnasium, inadequate toilet facilities. Corporal punishment is permitted, and is frequently used, under the state law. There is a free school bus. Textbooks are free except in high school. There is a $2 annual school tax on county residents.

What the miners say about education:

"Education is better down here than it used to be now the company schools are going out. But the teachers still aren't much good. They haven't any sympathy for what a miner's kid is up against. They won't visit our homes if the kid plays hooky, they get tough with him if he's dirty or tired. They tell the kids they shouldn't go to the movies all the time, or play cards, or smoke so much—but what are they going to do? No playground, no baseball field for miles. The kids get tired of school young and start slipping and pretty soon they're in town playing pool. We can't get 'em interested or help them with their schoolwork—most of them know more about book learning than we do as it is. Seems like there ought to be some way for the school to interest them more. It's just kind of a place where they are supposed to go and sit quiet until they're old enough to go to work, the way things are now. How many miners' kids go to college? Well, I suppose some do; but I just haven't heard of any. Mostly they drop out when they're sixteen, or before."

What the operators say about education:

"Public education is pretty good down here now. Won't do the parents any good, of course, but maybe they'll learn something from the children. The main thing most of these miners need to learn is how to eat and manage their money, but what good would any education do them? Tell them how to eat and five minutes after you've left they're eating and drinking any old thing, and spending their money on bootleg and furniture. They're crazy about fancy furniture down here, but don't ask me why. And they hate budgets. They're independent mountain people, most of them, and don't like to (Continued on Page 252)

MY WASH-DAY'S WORLDS EASIER!

NOW I'M USING THIS REMARKABLE NEW STARCH

"NO COOKING.. NO BOILING.. I GET PERFECTLY SMOOTH STARCH IN SECONDS!"
"AND NO LUMPS TO STICK TO MY IRON AND SPOT OR RUMPLE THE CLOTHES!"
"NO IRONING AIDS NEEDED! THERE'S A SPECIAL INGREDIENT IN CAMEO THAT MAKES IRONING FAR FASTER.. MY IRON FAIRLY FLIES!"
"DOESN'T THIS DRESS LOOK FRESH AS NEW? I STARCHED IT MYSELF.. AND YOU'D THINK IT HAD BEEN DRY CLEANED!"
"MY HUSBAND'S A CHANGED MAN.. NOW HIS COLLARS DON'T CHAFE HIS NECK ANY MORE! IT'S EASY TO STARCH THINGS JUST RIGHT WITH THIS WONDERFUL CAMEO STARCH!"
CAMEO
Starching Powder
NO COOKING · MIX IN A JIFFY
CAMEO

Cameo ... trade mark ... A. E. Staley Mfg. Co., Decatur, Illinois, registered in the U. S. Patent Office.

Giving Housework the Brush-off

BY JUDY BARI

This brush shaped like a question mark really gets at every curve of your glass coffee maker (or your narrow-necked teapot). If you use a percolator, have a long Slim Jim brush that pokes way down into its spout to clear lurking grounds that may hide there stubbornly.

A small brush like th bristled nailbrush will w stubborn patches of so back of garters or finge gloves better than any c hand rubbing. Use it for straps of bras and slips hemlines and inside n

★ ★ ★

A new kind of brush, part of a soap-saving attachment to be slipped over a mixer faucet. Water courses through the small glass container filled with soap scraps. Many housewives feel that a good utility brush washes dishes better and faster than a cloth or mop.

Wool suits and coats, e dark ones, may need fewer the cleaner's if you mak your vacuum cleaner's b tachment to draw out dee dust particles from the their fabrics occasionall good for handbags' in k again, those handsome British b shes with an affinity for fine t eds. No smart woman needs to be r inded that good-quality brushes f hats, shoes and clothes help to keep t n young and beautiful. Because l shes tend to gather and hold dust, t y are equally helpful in keeping f es at the top of their form. The b brushes you can buy are, of c rse, the best buy in the long run. your home's brushes are well c sen, each will do several jobs.

★

narrow medium-soft brush, with a g handle for ease in operation, is thing to rout clinging dust out of indentations of carved furniture ornate silver. Such a brush as this, forked Venetian-blind brush, a ered radiator brush with a long ndle, and a carefully selected soft ush for lamp shades and upholstery, e behind-the-scenes accessories of best-dressed living rooms. For eticulous bedroom grooming, there a special brush for bedsprings.

★

broken glass or ash tray seems to be n inevitable part of every party, erefore it's wise to keep a smart ttle picker-upper, like this brush at clips to its own half-size dustpan, andy for such emergencies. For eavier duty, you'll need a wall brush nd floor brush, long-handled. These hould be plump and fluffy, of natral bristles, since they hold dust etter than the synthetic ones. Synhetic bristles are fine for "water" obs; they shed moisture like a duck.

★

Dust kittens love to gather behind ornices and drapery headings. Here's where the soft-brush attachment of your vacuum cleaner, on its ongest wand, will do a fine job, aided y the suction of the cleaner. . . . All brushes should be washed frequently in warm water and soap, well rinsed and shaken. Matted or crushed brushes may be combed, while wet, with a coarse comb. All brushes should be hung with bristles free when they're not in use.

"I get so darn mad!"

"I'm fed up with 'wash day fairy tales.' How any grown woman can believe some of them is more than I can understand!"

Lady, we don't blame you. But please don't point at Fels-Naptha Soap.

Every word we say about Fels-Naptha has been said before . . . by women who use it. As a matter of fact there are many Fels-Naptha users who make stronger claims for this fine laundry soap than we do.

We say Fels-Naptha is better because it gives you two great cleaners—gentle, active naptha and good mild soap. We say it makes all kinds of washing quicker and easier; that it makes linens and delicate garments so fragrantly clean they're a joy to behold.

If you try Fels-Naptha Soap, we believe you will never even read another 'wash day fairy tale.'

Fels-Naptha Soap

BANISHES "TATTLE-TALE GRAY"

Flavor! Nutrition!
Econom-e-e!
Blue Bonnet Margarine
gives "ALL 3"

Flavor—
delicious flavor!
Fresh, delicate,
country-sweet. And BLUE BONNET keeps its fresh, sweet flavor even half-melted
on piping-hot foods.

LENTEN TREAT!

Fish broiled to perfection with Blue Bonnet melting over it's delicate, golden brown tops . . . garden peas . . . grilled tomato. And Blue Bonnet, of course, to spread on your bread. Its fresh, country-sweet flavor is a real delight.

Nutrition—proved nutrition!
BLUE BONNET
is rich in Food-Energy,
rich in Vitamin A.
Here's a real food for growing youngsters
—everybody!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

BLUE BONNET comes white—color for table use.

Econom-e-e—yes, you save real money with
BLUE BONNET.
And remember,
you couldn't ask for finer, more delicious spread.

FLEISCHMANN'S
BlueBonnet
OLEOMARGARINE

A PRODUCT OF THE MAKERS OF FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Top it Off

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

"TOP with buttered crumbs" is so often the final benison to ovei casserole dishes that I got to thinking about it—seriously. Yo create a sumptuous dish out of last Sunday's chicken that i really inspired in its seasoning, yet when you get to the top— buttered crumbs again! Good—but prosaic. Appearance of a dis counts high with the family. It may be an old stand-by—well liked no matter how oft repeated. But give it a new topper now and then and the dish is even more appreciated. This goes for simple every- day desserts too. A change of make-up gives yesterday's dessert new freshness. It is new.

VARIETY TOPS FOR CASSEROLES

Have you ever tried crushing salted pretzels or cheese crackers, buttering them and using instead of ordinary buttered cracker crumbs?

Look in your cupboard! Do you have any potato chips? They are a crunchy something, just right for tops, particularly if you crush them coarsely and mix with grated cheese. You don't need butter or margarine.

Large cubes of buttered garlic bread add good looks and flavor to a casserole of scalloped tomatoes. Cut French bread in thick slices. Melt butter or margarine. Let a clove of garlic stand in the fat. Brush slices of French bread with the garlic spread. Arrange on tomatoes and bake. It really is something.

Did you have a roast chicken Sunday? Combine a casserole of the leftover scraps of chicken and gravy—you can stretch it with canned chicken soup. Drop spoon- fuls of poultry stuffing on top in lieu of buttered crumbs. Bake until bubbly. M-m-m-m!

Maybe you chose to make chop suey out of the leftover chicken in- stead of the above. Rather than serve the suey on or with Chinese fried noodles (you can buy them in a can or package), put the chicken mixture in a casserole. Sprinkle the noodles over the top as you would buttered crumbs. Save your butter or margarine for a dish in which it's really needed. Bake until hot.

Baked beans belong with brown bread just as much as Boston does with Massachusetts. If you've had baked beans and brown bread for one meal, put the beans in a casse- role with a little water. Slice brown bread. Dip in melted butter or margarine. Arrange over the top. Bake.

Give your cereal shelf a once-over for really ready-made casserole tops. Our favorites are corn flakes and crumbled shredded-wheat bis- cuits tossed with melted butter or margarine.

If your biscuit recipe calls for ¾ cup milk—and I'm pretty sure it does—try substituting 1 teaspoon meat paste dissolved in ¼ cup water for ¼ cup milk in the recipe. Com- bine as usual and the biscuits are just right for the roof of a meat pie.

Mask fish casseroles with a layer of seasoned sour cream. Run under the broiler until tinged with brown. A sour-cream blanket improves many a dish—particularly if it's fish.

DESSERT MAKE-UP

Frost stale cake squares with a meringue. Bake until tinged with brown. Serve with custard sauce. The meringue softens the cake and makes its reappearance more ex- citing.

Even a custard can be Alaskaed. Turn out leftover individual cus- tards on greased baking sheet. Frost with meringue. Bake until light brown. Cool. Serve with garnishes of jelly.

Did you have prunes for break- fast? Pit some, stuff with cream cheese flavored with grated orange rind. Dip in fritter batter. Fry in deep fat. Serve with hot puréed apricots. If prunes are not very ample, use two put together with filling for one large prune.

Top a lamb or beef stew made with the last of the roast and gravy with saucy mashed potatoes. Bake in a moderate oven and you have shepherd's pie. A pinch of dried dill in the mashed potatoes is tops for flavor with lamb.

Chicken-and-biscuit casserole! Cut out the biscuits with the doughnut cutter. Arrange on casserole. Serve with stuffed olives tucked into the biscuit rings. Sunday night dresser for an old-fashioned favorite dish.

Many good things can be baked under a pastry cover. Meat chicken and fish pie combinations are endless. This is a shrimp pie. Make your flakiest pastry if you want your pie bird to sing, your family to praise.

A casserole of creamed eggs and spinach with pin-wheel biscuits on the upper deck. Assemble casserole. Roll out biscuit dough. Spread with deviled ham. Roll up and slice. Arrange pin wheels on top of casserole. Bake until biscuits are browned.

"Easiest-made cookies ever put in your oven!"

So easy you'll be glad to make them whenever the children ask. Or if company's coming and you want to whip up a batch to go with the coffee. Wonderful, moist, crumbly cookies and you'll love them with the mellower flavor of Grandma's Old Fashioned Molasses—the finer table molasses that gives a smoother, more delicate flavor to all your baking.

COOKIES

GRANDMA'S PEANUT BUTTER-MOLASSES COOKIES

½ cup each, peanut butter and shortening
½ cup each, sugar and Grandma's Molasses
½ teaspoon vanilla
1 egg
1 cup sifted all-purpose flour
½ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon baking powder
¼ teaspoon soda
2 tablespoons milk
peanuts

Cream shortening and peanut butter. Add sugar gradually and cream until light and fluffy. Add molasses and vanilla, mixing well. Add egg. Mix and sift dry ingredients together. Add to molasses mixture. Add milk. Mix well. Drop on greased cookie sheet. Flatten with bottom of glass dipped in sugar. Decorate with peanut halves. Bake in moderately hot oven (375°F.) about 10 minutes. Yield: about 50 cookies.

There's just one trick to remember when you make these cookies—and you'll find it easy. Use Grandma's Old Fashioned Molasses . . . for only this molasses has the finer flavor and delicate sweetness (1 cup equals a cup of sugar in sweetness) that successful baking demands. And Grandma's is the only nationally sold brand that does not contain sulphur dioxide—you'll like it better for cooking and table use, too.

GRANDMA'S OLD FASHIONED MOLASSES

NEW COOK BOOK—FREE!

Grandma Molasses Co., Dept. LHH-3
120 Wall Street, New York 5, N. Y.

(Please Print Plainly)

Name_____

Address_____

City_____

"Always looks so bright and spiffy—washes clean in half a jiffy!"

NESCO

porcelain-on-steel

enameled ware

You'll never know how easy washing up after meals can be till you own a set of Nesco enameled ware!

Nesco's slick white surfaces defy food and grease . . . soap is the only washing agent you need. No harsh cleansers, no scrubbing, no drudgery.

You'll marvel at how Nesco's porcelain-on-steel construction endures for years, resists shock and stains, stays beautiful. And you'll save fuel and time, too, because of fast, uniform heating, wide bottoms and snug-fitting covers.

Visit the better stores and insist on the distinctive new enameled ware bearing the famous Nesco label.

Nesco products include electric roasters, oil ranges and heaters, decorated kitchen containers, galvanized ware, enameled ware and tinware. Look for the Nesco label on housewares.

NESCO ENAMELED WARE

NATIONAL ENAMELING AND STAMPING COMPANY

World's Largest Manufacturers of Housewares

111 North 12th Street, Milwaukee 1, Wisconsin

CHEF EXTRAORDINAIRE

By Alice Osborne

ROBERT has been living with us for almost thirteen years now. He is our only son; our only child. It has troubled us no end, knowing that he was to be our only child. With both hands and aching hearts we have tried to push him from us, surrender him to himself, and not indulge the selfish love for him of which we were possessed. I do not know how we are succeeding. We all seem to have great fun together. And at times the more we push him aside, the more he tends to crowd into our happiness.

Once a week I know that the three of us are as close as Robert can possibly draw us together. Once a week he prepares dinner and invites dad and me to the feast. This is called the Dinner of Delicious Delectables. The tradition began about three years ago. Robert instituted it, perhaps with an unconscious feeling that he could wend his way a little closer to our hearts through our stomachs.

It was I who unwittingly named the feast and provided the incentive for it. One evening I had served a dessert concocted a bit rashly from the icebox leftovers. That dessert brought a turning point in the schedule of our home life and happiness.

"What is this, mother?" Robert asked after a second helping.

"Oh, that's a delicious delectable," I told him seriously.

"Gee, how did you make it? You must have found a new recipe."

"No. I just thought it up out of my own head."

This seemed to have struck him as the great inspiration he was waiting for. A week or so later, when I had forgotten all about the delicious delectable dessert, Robert reminded me. "Mother, when are we going to have some more of that dessert made up out of your head?"

"Oh, that was just a hurried-up dessert. I've forgotten how I made it now."

He brooded another week or so on the injustice of stale-recipe cooking. Then he announced his plan at breakfast one morning:

"Mother, will you and dad be my dinner guests tonight?"

We were a bit alarmed about the state of his budget and the propriety of his idea. I asked if I had to dress and would his allowance permit of such extravagance.

"I'm going to feed you on the house budget. I'm going to cook dinner. But you have got to stay out of the kitchen."

We accepted that first invitation. And we have been victims, or honored guests—you can name it—once a week ever since.

OUR first meal consisted of soup. Three courses of it. 1—Cream of tomato soup from a can. 2—A kind of cabbage-and-rice soup with wieners floating about in it (I had never served wieners). 3—A chocolate-pudding soup, cream-whipped-to-butter mixed in.

The menus through the years have varied. At times they have seemed to improve. And again there have been meals when we were frankly puzzled over the state of gastronomic health we might incur. But we have never failed to feed on the rich contentment of being served in this special way. No greater freedom than this has Robert asked of us. And I must confess that during the summer months, when he is off at camp, his dad and I find it too dreary to eat at home on this one evening. We find a restaurant and try to order delicious delectables.

We have protected this one special privilege that he enjoys as if it were a religious ceremony in our home. For the sacredness of loyalty to one another is our fundamental basis for accord, not only at home, but in all associations. However, there have been occasions when a stout defense was needed in our hearts to maintain his position as chef extraordinaire.

"You and dad take a walk."

The first time he gave this unorthodox command, we sat rather stupefied and unwilling to believe it necessary. After all, we had retired to the living room and had given him assurance that we would not snoop.

"You'll smell the cooking and guess what it is."

Reluctantly we left our comfortable seats. It was a pretty gripping experience for me, to be out on the street in this most apparent aimless meandering at an hour when any home-loving mother is indoors serving her loved ones with a proper diet at a proper hour. Dad did more bravely than I did, I am afraid. He talked largely of the weather, its benefits; the need for a coat of paint on the Rollins' house. I wanted to clutch his arm and ask, "What shall we say if anyone asks what we are doing out at this hour?"

HERE ARE A COUPLE OF ROBERT'S MENUS

Ham Steak Stewed in Milk
Buttered Peas
Raw Sliced Potatoes with Salt, Pepper and Vinegar
Glass of Sweetened Orange Juice with Whipped Cream

Grated Cheese
Canned Tomatoes (uncooked)
Hard-cooked Eggs with Lettuce and Mayonnaise, Liberally Garnished with Salted Peanuts
Cinnamon Stew (his own brand of custard) and Cake

I'm over all that now. I find it no more unorthodox to stroll up and down the block at dinnertime than at any other time. In fact, it is more enjoyable when all the street is quiet, and dad and I are living an experience that I regret other parents are not sharing.

The hour of serving is also another regulation we had to become unregulated about. Robert uses no recipes. He reads no ladies' magazines. I imagine that he schemes up his menus at odd times during the week. And now and then his windmills seem to throw him. For we seem to get a scent of one thing switched suddenly to another, mixed now and then with that acrid burned fatality which means another hour or so of waiting. We have come to appreciate the meaning of fasting; of mouth-watering promise and street-carnival appeasement diet. But there is something about the hours of waiting that makes our evening newspaper more exciting and our games of chess all too brief.

One of his specialties is a bowl of carefully selected, well-washed, small, sweet turnips. These we peel and eat as fruit—at the beginning of the meal.

Robert now bakes a fruitcake that is richer than an old English pudding and as consistent as a Waldorf specialty. I would never think of borrowing one of his ideas. He never makes apologies. One rule of etiquette is sufficient to get us over any embarrassment. Robert begins to eat first, then we take up spoon or fork or fingers as the dish demands. He eats his own cooking with gusto. And we do likewise, from an honesty of hunger. He shops all through the week and has a pantry shelf filled with his own needs. His allowance supplements the day's budget if necessary. This is his own idea of sacrifice, or independence—I don't know which.

Guests must fit into the schedule as formally as we do. I shall never forget my nervousness and sense of futility when Robert had his first guests to serve. Dad brought them home unannounced. A business associate and his wife.

"The boy cooks dinner every Thursday for us," dad told them with all the confidence of a parent announcing a genius in the family. "We may have to wait a bit, but it will be worth it."

My heart thumped in an agony of indecision. I popped my head into the kitchen to announce the unexpected guests. "Shall I take over, son? You can have the kitchen tomorrow night."

"Nope. I'll fix them up. Just you keep out of here."

THERE was nothing for me to do but return to my guests and try to smile and answer as best I could in the conversation while we waited for Robert's meal. A sense of suffocation would come over me. I had one ear on the kitchen, both nostrils distended, and a sick loss of appetite that made me want to suggest some magnificent lie: "We have a special diet for Thursday nights." I grew angry with dad and myself over the compromise our indulgence toward Robert had led us into. I fancied the kind of reflection we were unwittingly inflicting on him. A sissy with an apron on. A mother making a girl out of her son in order to tie him to her selfish, indulgent heart.

I learned that evening that a child has important lessons to teach a parent. Robert switched his menu. He served the kind of meal that he supposed I would have served. There was cold ham in the icebox. He made a plain lettuce salad, boiled potatoes, and opened a can of peas. For dessert he sent dad out for ice cream. And for conversation he held his own with his philosophy of cooking.

"This is not the kind of meal I would have served mother and dad. But we have a special understanding about my cooking. It might not agree with everybody."

It was our guests who were disappointed. And they made their disappointment plain to Robert. They have been back many times since—and always on Thursday evening. And Robert no longer betrays them by switching menus. Nor do I sit with icy hands and suffocate over the imagined scent of red pepper mixed with cinnamon. They are in on the understanding. Because they have no son of their own.

Perhaps that is why I have written this article: knowing that there are mothers who never have sons, and if they had, they would accept an invitation to rare dinners with them. Perhaps I am trying to justify the foolish guilt I had at times in not being in all ways an orthodox mother. Also, I have a need to tell of the unfailing diet of gratification this unorthodoxy has fed us.

Robert's dinners have taught us that we do not live by bread alone, nor by fussy, regulated menus. But as well by Delicious Delectables. And as well by being served as by serving.

There is, of course, a catch to the evening's invitation: Dad and I get to wash the dishes, pots, pans, egg beater, kitchen wall—whatever has come under the spell of assisting Robert. As for Robert, he stretches out on the divan in the manner of his dad after a hard day's work, and sleeps off his gastronomic burden.

I would like to head off the psychologists who stand on the side line, sleeves rolled up, ready to label every human experience that extracts a spiritual awareness out of our regimented culture.

I think boys may like to cook as well as they like to eat. The difference is that in cooking and serving a meal they serve a sentiment not altogether sensuous, and thereby learn of the spiritual intangibles which a meal is only a symbol of.

You've never bought coffee packed under a higher vacuum!

thanks to the new Airtight Snap-on Cap!

SHE: Pappy, you're faking! Bad cold, my eye! Any man that can drink 3 cups of coffee . . . !

HE: Bud id dastes zo dard good! Whad's in id?

SHE: It's not what's in it—but what it's in, this time, chum! That flavor is because of the new coffee jar it comes in. Has a flexible cap. And a terrifically high vacuum!

HE: Means it's fresher goffee, huh?

SHE: Yes, and this jar keeps coffee fresher! That snap-on cap REseals, airtight. Keeps air out, fragrance in. Easy as pie to open, too. I just pry it up. To reseal, I just purress 'er down.

Eggspensive?

SHE: Nope. Our coffee doesn't cost any more this way than in any other vacuum container.

Owens-Illinois Glass Company, Toledo 1, Ohio

TO UNSEAL: Pry cap up firmly in several places with bowl-tip of a sturdy kitchen tablespoon.

TO RESEAL: Press cap down firmly with palm of hand. Cap is flexible. REseals [illegible]

Duraglas
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

ULTRA-VAC JAR
WITH THE NEW AIRTIGHT SNAP-ON CAP

Eric
Dry Skin Calls For Coty-care
Dry, sensitive skin tends to fall into tiny lines. It needs special treatment all its own. Use Coty-care—a simple daily ritual that helps counteract skin-dryness...helps give your complexion a look of deep-softness, youthful pliancy!
Cleanse for clarity with Coty Cleansing Cream:
pink mousse to wash skin crystal-clean. $1. $1.50. $2.50.
Freshen for firmness with Coty Skin Freshner:
gentle-as-rain stimulant. $1. $1.50.
Lubricate for softness with Coty Conditioning Cream:
fragrant emollient of delicate oils. $1. $1.75.
(all prices plus tax)
COTY
coty

LET'S BE REALISTIC ABOUT DIVORCE

(Continued from Page 39)

the ones who hear the "real" as distinguished from the good or the official reasons. Regardless of the particular details in any divorce, certain refrains or themes are repeated over and over again as relentlessly as a Greek chorus:

"He doesn't understand me." . . . "I can't stand the monotony." . . . "The children always come first." . . . "She finds fault with everything I do." . . . "She won't let me be free." . . . "He is jealous and suspicious." . . . "He won't even give me an allowance." . . . "She can't cook—she can't even keep the house clean." . . . "He treats me like a child." . . . "He expects to be waited on hand and foot." . . . "She esents my friends." . . . "She bores me." . . . "He can't hold a job." . . . "She refuses to have a child." . . . "He takes no responsibility for the children." . . . "He cares more about his mother than he does about me." . . . "Sex relations are degrading." . . . "He [she] doesn't care anything about me." . . . "He [she] doesn't really love me." And so on and on and on.

There is no man or woman who hasn't thought or said—in moments of anger or hurt feelings—one or many of these same things about wife or husband. All marriages have such moments. One difference between marriages that fail and those that do not lies in the importance attached to the partner's shortcomings, and what these shortcomings seem to mean.

"What shortcomings mean" brings us close to the heart of our problem. In general, marriages fail when either husband or wife finds too great a difference between what was hoped for in marriage, and what is realized. If that difference, or distance, between hope and accomplishment is not changed or accepted, the marriage may be said to have failed even without the finality of a divorce.

Some years ago Lord Halifax was traveling to Bath, and shared a railway compartment with two prim-looking, middle-aged women. Shortly before reaching Bath the train passed through a tunnel, and Lord Halifax noisily kissed his own hand several times. As the train drew into the station he rose, took off his hat, and in his most gallant manner asked, "To which of you two charming ladies am I indebted for the delightful incident in the tunnel?" He then beat a hasty retreat, leaving the two women glaring at each other.

Let's take a few familiar examples. Girls who marry to get away from home, to become independent, are often the wives who say bitterly, "He treats me like a child." . . . "I can't stand the monotony."

Men who marry primarily to be taken care of and made comfortable may complain, "She can't cook—she can't even keep the house clean" or "The children always come first." Their wives may feel resentful because "He expects to be waited on hand and foot." . . . "He takes no responsibility for the children."

In each case the shortcomings of the husband or wife are felt most keenly at the exact points where personal hopes or needs are greatest.

It would seem sensible and logical to avoid disillusionment in marriage by marrying the person who has the traits one needs or admires. A man who wants a good housekeeper should find and marry a good housekeeper. The woman who wants freedom and independence should find a man who will give it to her. But the problem is not so simple. What a person thinks he wants and what he really wants more may be poles apart. The man who needs a good housekeeper may think he wants an attractive hostess, someone to entertain well and to interest him. He marries her—and lo and behold, she fails because "she can't cook—or even keep the house clean," or because "she doesn't want a child." The qualities that first appealed or attracted are not valued in the long pull of day-after-day living together because different qualities are what he took for granted and really expected in a wife. Two people who hoped to find love found disillusionment instead.

Both husband and wife feel caught or b trayed in such a relationship; neither "understood" or feels "valued" and "loved If the marriage breaks up, it is because of t tensions and aloneness that result, not b cause either wants to fail or does not try, r because he is cruel or she is unfaithful. T more high-minded and idealistic the partne are, the greater the loneliness and tensio may become.

What is a Real Marriage?

The key to understanding both t strength and weakness of marriage lies in t word "relationship." Modern marriage not an institution; it is a person-to-pers relationship which makes new kinds of d mands on both husband and wife. One bas change that has gradually taken place in t last century is revealed in the fact that ge ting married is no longer the obvious necessary means of getting housed, fe clothed, mended, cared for or supporte Hotels, clubs, restaurants, laundries ar jobs for women have taken over many the functions that used to be the duty, the achievement, or the pride of the hom

Men and women get married today prim rily for love and companionship, to hav someone to whom to "belong." Even wome who marry so that they "won't have t work" (outside the home) bring to ma riage the daydreams an "ideal lover" as we as a clear-cut pictur of the "good pro vider." Just as me bring to marriage a authentic and origina version of "the drear girl" who is apt to b in 1947 a remarkabl blend of the Petty gir a Conover model an mamma.

The crucial test o marriage comes in th first five years whe the idealized John o Mary is competing fo survival with the rea John or Mary eac happened to marry. I the real John and Mary become known an accepted, if they find the satisfactions, emo tional support and loyalty that men an women need from each other, the marriage i real—and the marriage survives.

The real waste or tragedy of our increasin divorces lies in the fact that so many poten tially sound and fine relationships do no survive the testing period. They could—but they do not, for reasons which are often be yond the control of individual men and women. Our society is in transition. As a people we are still unrealistic and in conflict about how to educate our boys and girls for marriage and parenthood—or for what kind of marriage and parenthood.

The crux of the matter lies in our need for greater emotional and social maturity. We live in an age when marriage requires more stamina, more knowledge and more char acter than ever before. We also live in an age when ideals of easy and comfortable living, doing the least possible work, avoiding pain and sweat and tears, not being bored, not being tied down, not being interfered with, not growing old, not losing freedom, play too large a part in our goal.

It is no wonder that the strains and conflicts of our age are revealed in a high proportion of broken marriages during the first five years, more divorces in the cities than in the country, and a disproportionate number of divorces among men and women who are most gifted, most educated and most creative.

How Can We be Realistic About Divorce?

The surest way to be realistic about divorce is to be more realistic about marriage. And that includes being honest—which is

(Continued on Page 242)

"Ford's out Front from a Woman's Angle"

1. "I don't know synthetic enamel from a box of my children's paints . . . but if synthetic enamel is what it takes to make that beautiful, shiny Ford finish, I'm all for it!

2. "My husband says the brakes are self-centering and hydraulic—whatever that means! All I know is they're so easy that I can taxi the children all day without tiring out!

3. "Peter, he's my teen-age son, tells me that 'Ford is the only car in its price class with a choice of a 100-horsepower V-8 engine or a brilliant new Six.' He says no matter which engine people pick, they're out front with Ford!

4. "The interior of our Ford is strictly my department! It's tailored with the dreamiest broadcloth. Such a perfect fit! Mary Jane says women help design Ford interiors. There's certainly a woman's touch there!

5. "Do you like lovely silver, beautifully simple and chaste looking? That's what I always think of when I touch those smart Ford door handles and window openers.

6. "Now here's another thing women like and that's a blissfully comfortable ride—one that isn't bumpity-bump even on some of our completely forgotten roads."

Listen to the Ford Show starring Dinah Shore on Columbia Network Stations Wednesday Evenings.

There's a Ford in your future

"Show me a beautiful woman and you will see a beautiful complexion"
FRANCES DENNEY

FRANCES DENNEY
brings you an entirely new way to cleanse your skin . . .
with LIQUID! . . in two forms

This new cleanser is like nothing else you've ever tried. It swiftly takes off make-up and surface dirt . . . without soap, without irritation. It contains no wax, no caustics to dry even sensitive skin. New . . . quick . . . dainty, made in two types. It gives your skin a younger, lovelier look.

LIQUID
CREME CLEANSER
Wax free. Smooth as satin. A joy to use because it's so quick . . . so dainty. And so little works such wonders.
1.50 . . . plus tax

LIQUID
AMBER CLEANSER
Clear, golden, so thorough, so refreshing. For all types of skin. Wonderful for adolescent and sensitive skin.
1.50 . . . plus tax

FRANCES DENNEY

(Continued from Page 240)

inherent in being realistic—about sex, about what marriage really requires, about parenthood and about homemaking.

If we want to spare the war-born generation the unnecessary heartaches, sorrow, frustrations and damage which failure in marriage brings, we must learn how to communicate the wisdom and truth about modern marriage which is really ours to share. We must learn how to say in our lives, in our plays and movies, in our stories, in our teaching, in our schools and churches:

Marriage is not an escape or a refuge. Marriage does not guarantee security, being cared for or being loved. Marriage guarantees nothing except experience.

Marriage offers certain opportunities to men and women. Marriage offers an opportunity to know and love another human being different from the self, to know companionship and friendship. Nothing is more important in living.

MARRIAGE offers an opportunity to learn how to meet the sex needs of another person—and to learn to have one's own needs satisfied. Sex adjustment is not easy, not automatic, not the only important part of marriage. Being sexually attracted to someone else after marriage does not necessarily mean that the first love was not "real" or "true." Sex adjustment takes time and can get better and more satisfying as years pass. Changing marriage partners may mean that one has not yet grown up emotionally and sexually.

Marriage offers an opportunity to share in the love and care of children. Marriage is for husbands and wives, yes, but it is also for children. Without children—or without believing that children are important—marriage is incomplete and unfulfilled. Children take time, trouble and more patience than we easily have. They interfere with freedom, good times and luxury. But children are the real purpose and reason behind marriage. If we do not put the proper value on parenthood, we are not emotionally or socially ready for marriage.

Marriage is a relationship that cannot survive selfishness, impatience, domineering, inequality and lack of respect. Marriage is a relationship that thrives on acceptance, equality, sharing, giving, helping, doing one's part, learning together, and humor.

Marriage requires skills and competence which must be learned. Skills about good housekeeping, cooking nutritious meals, caring for children, spending money wisely, being good company—skills which must be developed by both husbands and wives, working together.

Marriage is becoming more important and more challenging as our world becomes smaller, less safe, and the future less certain. Becoming ready for marriage can use all one's skills, abilities and knowledge. Making a success of marriage can use all that one is and all that one can become.

Let's be realistic about divorce. Let's recognize that many breakdowns of modern marriage are really a sign that marriage is coming of age in a democracy. Let's get on with the basic business of growing up emotionally, socially and spiritually, so that our high ideals of democratic marriage, of marriage of true equality, can be realized.

Marriages are getting better. It is our education and our preparation for marriage that are failing.

Americans believe in the family and in marriage. There is no question about "where we want to go." We know that the welfare of our nation depends on the integrity and strength of our homes. Our goal is to have sound, happy, stable and democratic marriages. If we become more clear and more realistic about reasons why so many marriages are falling short, there is no doubt that we can learn how to do better. We can work to change some of the social conditions which threaten family life today. We can learn how to help our boys and girls grow up better prepared for the satisfactions, companionship, responsibilities and equality of modern marriage.

THE END

When headache brings upset stomach and jumpy nerves, all at the same time, take Bromo-Seltzer for quick help. Because Bromo-Seltzer is famous for fighting ordinary headaches these three ways:

1. Relieves pain of headache
2. Relieves discomfort of upset stomach
3. Quiets jumpy nerves

which may team up for trouble.

Simply put teaspoonful in a glass and add water. Bromo-Seltzer effervesces with split-second action . . . ready to go to work at once. Caution: Use only as directed.

Get Bromo-Seltzer at your drugstore fountain or counter today. Compounded in four convenient home sizes by registered pharmacists.

For FAST headache help
BROMO-SELTZER
A PRODUCT OF EMERSON DRUG COMPANY SINCE 1887

Designed for enchantment... easy to crochet with

BEAR BRAND quali-tested
YARNS

Knitting's easy, too, when you use soft, live BEAR BRAND Yarns. You'll love their bewitching colors for glamorous spring enchantment. And you'll love the way hand knits of luxurious Bear Brand Yarns hold their shape through countless washings and wearings. Send 35c for costume blouse directions and other new fashions in Vol. 330 to Bear Brand Yarns, 230 Fifth Avenue. New York 1, N. Y., Dept. JY-37.

OUR SCHOOLS ARE IN DANGER

(Continued from Page 17)

more instead of less education, one wonders why all the teachers didn't just quit the profession.

But there is more to the discontent of schoolteachers than these things. A teacher, naturally anonymous, recently wrote in the Saturday Review of Literature:

"In all the years I have never complained of my modest salary. But what keeps men and women out of the schools? I will tell you. Teaching is not a profession. We teachers have nothing to do with school policy or educational practice. We are robots, told what to do and what not to do. In thirty years of teaching no one has ever asked my opinion about any school program.

"We are overladen with things that have nothing to do with education." (He spoke of school collections for "drives," home-room activities of many kinds, all added to the teaching load.) "Many of us university graduates have principals over us who have never been to college. If a teacher gets a black mark from such a principal, for whatever cause, at the employment office of the state university, he is through. . . .

"Too many principalships, superintendencies, supervisorships come off the assembly line of politics. Not enough come from successful teaching."

Now, this is not an isolated opinion from a grouser. I have heard the same criticism over and over from teachers. They come out of teachers' colleges or normal schools, full of ideas and enthusiasm, regarding themselves as called to a high and noble profession, only to find that they are employed as mere hacks. With accumulated and day-to-day experience of faults in the teaching system, aware of the lack of any thought-out disciplinary system, each class being left to the more or less arbitrary ideas of the individual teacher, they never get a chance to discuss and contribute to reform of the established routine. Under such conditions they become either dull hacks or embittered radicals. If, as is continually accused, subversive radicalism is rampant among teaching faculties, is it remarkable? Rewarded by neither income nor public esteem, overburdened with classes of a size no teacher can competently handle, treated as mere lackeys of school boards and politically appointed dictators, harassed by economic cares and frustrated in all their own most creative ideas, what wonder if educated men and women, charged with the most important function of society, begin to doubt whether the American democratic system is really anything but a whited sepulcher?

Agreeable people are those who agree with you. —RICHARD ARMOUR.

Radical subversive movements seldom come from or are led by organized workers. They come from frustrated intelligentsia, who are not allowed to be either dignified or intelligent, who furnish the brains and leadership for masses in turbulent times. This has been true of every single radical revolution in history. If our young people are having reflected on their impressionable minds the bitter frustrations of their teachers, the only way to improve the situation is to alleviate those frustrations. And though teachers need and should have more money, that is not everything, and not perhaps even the main trouble. They need sympathy and understanding from parents; they need public esteem; and they need outlets for constructive criticism and creative ideas. There are no better citizens in this country than public-school teachers, and none would be more patriotic and devoted to American democracy, if we would but give them the means to live in dignity and work in cooperative freedom. THE END

These young Paradise
Spring fashions put a lilt in your walk,
a song in his heart—
make your ankles
exciting to watch!
Wear them and see.
Paradise Shoes
Sorry, no mail orders—new Spring styles ready for you now at finer stores.
Brauer Bros. Shoe Co., St. Louis 8, Mo.

BLUEPRINT FOR HAPPINESS

Wise wives all agree . . . that nothing starts the breadwinner so cheerfully on his way . . . as a satisfying cup of fresh, clear coffee . . . so too, it adds its soothing solace to relaxing evening hours . . . But whenever you serve it . . . whatever your favorite brand . . . brew coffee this inimitable Silex Coffee Maker Way . . . for Silex Makes Better Coffee.

Quicker and easier to make . . . better flavored coffee . . . our FREE brochure . . . "Head Chef Recipes" brings you newest hors d'oeuvre and sandwich secrets of famous restaurants . . . also the tested recipe for making the world's freshest, most delicious coffee . . . just write Dept. TSG, The Silex Company, Hartford 2, Conn. . . . In Canada: St. Johns, Province of Quebec.

SILEX Coffee Maker

March meals should be robust, since everybody here at Stillmeadow is hungry—especially Windy's daughter and grandson, after a day of chasing the spring wind around the yard.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

BLANKETS on the line are a good sight to see with the wind of March billowing them like sails on a blue sky-sea. I can hardly wait for the first day that is warm enough to get them out, give them a bath in spring air, blow away the winter from them. Limp pillows, too, will fluff out; and when your head goes down on them at night, there is the freshness of the wind still in them.

Carried away by the excitement of sun and wind, I usually find myself washing bedspreads, rugs and curtains. This is fun; but it is no fun to end the day with a back that feels like a broken zigzag rule. The answer is to avoid bending, stooping and lifting. I use Don's old red wagon, put the washbasket in it, and wheel the whole thing merrily across the yard, trailed, of course, by seven or eight cockers and one chatty Siamese.

This is a fine time to dye things too. Jill and I did an old white chenille bedspread in soft gray last winter, and this gave us the idea of renovating a pile of ancient white bath towels which had traveled to school with the children and looked it. It is possible to change the color scheme in the whole bathroom with a fresh colorful batch of towels and washcloths.

Then, like most people who live in an old house, we have no two beds the same size. Antique beds are so variable. And our sheets vary accordingly in length and width. No matter how often we clean out the linen shelves, it is always possible to reach in and grab one pair of three-quarter sheets for the oversize spool bed. So this week we dyed sets of sheets and pillowslips to match the color scheme of the room they should be used in. Cloud-blue for my room, sunny yellow for the maple room, copper for the green room, and so on.

We put a pair of sheets and a pair of pillowslips in the automatic washer, let the water run in until it stopped, poured in the dye dissolved in enough hot water to mak clear, smooth color, and let the washer r With the biggest sheets, I found that one not come out perfectly, being a little streak but we still liked the result.

The amount of dye to use depends on h you wish the color. Half a package of c dinal red made two big sheets and two sl a soft crushed-strawberry color. Eight pa ages did the chenille spread.

People often talk about how dull hou keeping is, but it seems to me that, on contrary, it is a constant adventure. I something new is always turning up. Do over a piece of old furniture is exciting; venting a new dish is fun; painting a roo accessories in bright gay colors gives a to the whole place.

March meals should be robust. For t is the time we clean up the yard and get t garden ready for plowing. Everybody hungry. One of our favorites is Hungari Stuffed Cabbage. There are many ways make this, but the very best is with sau kraut.

I mix ⅓ cup raw rice, ¾ pound grou hamburger, ½ cup chopped onion, 1 crush clove of garlic, 1 beaten egg, 2 teaspoo salt, fresh-ground pepper to taste (we lo it) and a pinch of mixed herbs. Then I ta a medium-large cabbage and cut out t core and put the head in a large kettle rapidly boiling water and cook just until t outer leaves are ready to come off witho breaking. You can tell by the look, for t cabbage begins to change color slight Then I lift out the cabbage with a pair tongs, keeping the leaves undamaged, a take off ten or twelve leaves.

I chop the cabbage heart and mix it wi 1 pound sauerkraut. Half of this mixtu goes in the bottom of the Dutch oven, deep kettle, and on this I put the stuff leaves; I lay a spoonful of the meat mixtu

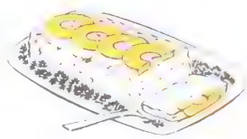
(Continued on Page 246)

It's all done with... Pineapple

Dishes like these aren't "done with mirrors"—though there's something pretty magic about their sun-mellowed flavor, their feast-for-the-eye look. That's Dole's own secret, and yours to share when you serve quick-and-easy pineapple successes from the kitchen of Patricia Collier, Dole Home Economist. For a morning send-off—or an any-time thirst-satisfier—Dole sends pineapple juice, too . . . tropic refreshment, Hawaii to you.

DOLE CRUSHED PINEAPPLE • DOLE SLICED PINEAPPLE • DOLE PINEAPPLE CHUNKS
DOLE PINEAPPLE TIDBITS • DOLE PINEAPPLE JUICE

Upside-Down Meat Loaf. Same principle as your pet ups-a-down cake! Line the bottom of pan with Dole Pineapple Slices, and cover with whatever meat loaf mixture you prefer. (Pictured: a mixture using ground smoked ham). Bake, then turn upside down.



Heavenly Hash. Fit for the gods, or a festive gathering! Fold one part whipped cream and one part Dole Crushed into two parts boiled rice. Garnish with candied cherries and more Crushed Pineapple. Simple? Sure!

Chunks-in-a-ring. Here's a dish that looks like a masterpiece, yet takes only a minute to make. Heap cottage cheese on lettuce as illustrated. Then fill the center with flavorsome Dole Pineapple Chunks.

Dex makes rooms sparkle in minutes!

Just Dip in Water . . . and Apply

- Dex Ready-Pasted Borders add color, add charm to a plain, painted or papered wall—
- Dex Ready-Pasted Borders give rooms and furnishings that sparkling NEW look in no time at all!
- Smart around doors, mirrors, windows, screens, lamps, cabinets, too!
- As little as 20c per 12 ft. roll at hardware, wallpaper, dept., and chain stores everywhere.

Dex TRADE MARK

READY PASTED BORDERS

36 beautiful patterns—washable, fadeproof guaranteed to stick.

Another Product of UNITED WALLPAPER INC. Chicago 54, Ill.

Electric ROTO-ROOTER Razor-Kleens SEWERS AND DRAINS

At the First Sign of Trouble Call YOUR LOCAL ROTO-ROOTER MAN

BETTER, FASTER, SERVICE FOR LESS

FREE Sewer and Drain Handle to show you how Roto-Rooter cleans drains. Write for your free copy today and find the name of your local Roto-Rooter man.

ROTO-ROOTER CORP. Dept. 5 Des Moines 14, Iowa

GET THE RIGHT HANG! for Mirrors and Pictures

MOORE PUSH-LESS PICTURE HANGERS

For light wall decorations and drapes, ask for Moore Push-Pins

At stationery, department and hardware stores

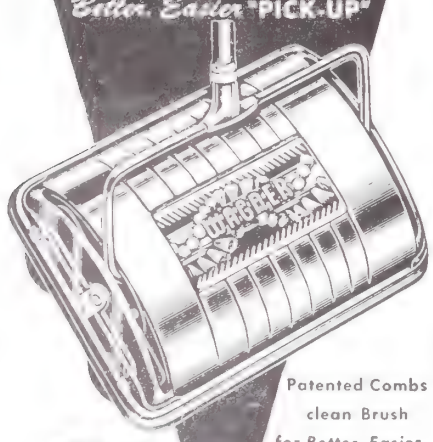
MOORE PUSH-PIN CO., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

AVOID LOSS! MARK EVERYTHING WITH CASH'S WOVEN NAMES

12 doz. $3.50 6 doz. $2.40 9 doz. $3.00 3 doz. $1.50

Ask your Dept. Store, or write us CASH'S 77 Chestnut Street, So. Norwalk, Conn.; 6227 So. Gramercy Pl., Los Angeles 44, Calif.

WAGNER KOMB-KLEANED SWEEPER Better, Easier "PICK-UP"



Patented Combs clean Brush for Better, Easier "PICK-UP"

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

E. R. WAGNER MFG. CO. Dept. J, Milwaukee 9, Wis.

HERE IT IS! THE NEW PIOMAR Iron the automatic iron with the one year GUARANTEE

9 BIG FEATURES

- "Second to None" guarantee with each iron • 5-way automatic control • weighs 4½ pounds—not too heavy, not too light, but just right • even heating over entire ironing surface • tip-up heel plate • modern streamlined design • molded handle stays cool • built-in 7-foot cord • evenly distributed heat ranges up to 1000 watts.

PIONEER PRODUCTS, INC.

MAIN OFFICE 5224 FAIRLAWN AVE., BALTIMORE 15, MD

(Continued from Page 244)

on each leaf, and roll up the leaf and fold the ends under like a well-wrapped bundle.

Over the bundles goes the rest of the sauerkraut and chopped cabbage, and then I pour 2 cups tomato juice over, or enough canned tomatoes to almost cover the cabbage, add more salt and pepper and 3 tablespoons fat, cover and cook very slowly for at least 45 minutes.

This dish is better the second time it is warmed up, if there is any left—but with us, there never is!

Hot crisp corn-bread sticks are the right thing with it, a green salad with a geranium leaf from the window box chopped in it, and a light dessert. For myself, I prefer an extra helping of the stuffed cabbage. But frozen strawberries piled on spongecake suit the young folks, if they happen to be home for a week end.

I always remember in March that this was the month I made my debut as a concert pianist. I don't remember just how old I was, but I had pencil braids just about right for pulling.

I WAS playing one part of a two-piano piece. No matter how much we practiced, I never was able to come out even with my partner. Sometimes I finished half a page ahead, at other times I loped in long after Peggy had stopped, rested her hands on the bench and watched me. The tune sounded a little odd, even to me, for the composer had definitely planned to have some kind of unity between the two artists. My theory was that if we played loud enough, things would turn out all right.

Recitals were held in the biggest parlor available, and extra creaking chairs from the undertaker were set up. They were made with green-carpeting seats and backs and smelled very strong and musty. Every time a mother breathed hard with anxiety, her chair creaked loudly.

Dizzy with excitement and terror, Peggy and I took our number at a clip faster than a railroad train. Neither of us paid the slightest attention to the other; we set our teeth and tore through the runs and chords. We were, it developed, each so much afraid of being the one to finish last that we recked not of time or tide. The result was that we brought up with a last crashing chord, at exactly the same instant, a feat we had never even approximated before. My mother wiped her face with her lace-edged handkerchief and sank back weak with relief. Peggy and I retired behind the brown velvet portieres and looked at each other with glazed eyes.

My mother was a very patient woman. True, she had only one child, but that child was I, and I had energy enough for ten. I was full of projects. Most of them were about as quiet as storming the Bastille. They involved much transporting of furniture, popping of airguns, taking everything out of the attic, hammering and sawing, and always eating whatever there was in the icebox. When everything else failed, I always started a play, and callers were apt to find not a stick of furniture in the living room because it was a stage.

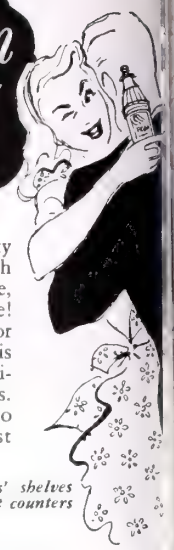
Then I was always bringing animals home—kittens, puppies, rabbits. I had pails of fish from the shallow water of the lake. I yearned for something outstanding like a seal, but in Wisconsin one couldn't pick up seals. Guinea pigs were fine too. Fortunately, mamma's heart was big enough to have room for anything that breathed, except snakes, and I didn't "cotton to" snakes either.

I always hoped my rabbits would have a family, but they never did. A friend of mine, however, had better luck when she was a child. Someone gave Ida two baby bunnies, and she built them a hutch in the back yard. The rest of the summer, Ida was no trouble at all; in fact, she was hardly ever to be seen. But at length her mother began to wonder why the family bills included tons and tons of greens and carrots and cabbage. She called Ida, who came in carrying a hammer.

"Ida," she said, "how many rabbits have you?"

"Only fifty-two," said Ida.

your man can't say NO!



When you serve tasty dishes flavored with Frank's Red Hot Sauce, he'll say yes—and more! For men really go for the zesty tang of this choice blend of Louisiana peppers and spices. Add five to ten drops to meat, fish and most vegetable dishes.

Only 10c on most grocers' shelves and meat counters

NEW! RECIPE FOR BEAN RAREBIT

1 cup cooked, mashed navy beans
2 tablespoons butter 1 teaspoon salt
½ cup hot milk 1 cup grated cheese
2 teaspoons Frank's Red Hot Sauce

Melt butter in pan, add beans. Stir over fire 5 minutes. Add other ingredients. Cook until cheese melts, stirring constantly. Serve on toast. Serves 6.

FREE! 32 Man-favorite recipes in New Booklet, "The Way to Your Man's Heart." Write for copy today. Address The Frank Tea & Spice Co., Dept. J, Cincinnati 2, Ohio.

Other Frank Quality Products Include Frank's Jumbo Peanut Butter • Frank's Dove Brand Olives, Spices, Mustard

Frank's RED HOT SAUCE

Turn Spare Hours into EXTRA MONEY

Sell EVERYDAY CARDS

Make extra dollars daily showing newest Greeting Cards to friends. All amazed at beauty and value of these cards . . . buy quickly!

15 CARD ASSORTMENT SELLS FOR ONLY $1

Charming new folders of ultra quality papers, with smart designs and lovely sentiments for Birthdays, Anniversaries, Births, etc. THEY SELL ON SIGHT. You make up to 50c cash on $1 boxes.

BIG LINE, MORE PROFITS

12 new and different assortments: Everyday, Humorous, Gift Cards, Handi-Notes, Gift Wrappings—sell for 60c to $1.00. Also Personal Stationery. All splendid money makers. Send for Samples on Approval.

ARTISTIC CARD CO. INC., 130 WAY STREET, ELMIRA, N. Y.

WRITE FOR SAMPLES

Muy bueno

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

LIVES WONDERFUL ONES IMPORTED FOR YOU by HAASE

Glorious Spanish Queens and Manzanillas. Superfruit of the tree of peace packed bright and green in sparkling glass jars. Watch for Haase's Olives

ENJOY Brookema's LEMON RASPBERRY GELATIN DESSERT

B. BROOKEMA COCOA CO., OAK PARK, IL

INSTANT
Sweet-Aire®
AN ORIGINAL AIR DEODORANT
ENDS FRESH PAINT AND PAPERING ODORS Faster!

Atomize with fast-acting Sweet-Aire to whisk away disagreeable cleaning season odors that filter into every nook and cranny. In a jiffy makes air fragrant . . fresh . . neutralizes odors from fresh paint, varnish, papering turpentine, etc. Proved by years of home use. At drug, department, hardware stores . . . beauty shops.

Miller Protecto Products Company
Kalamazoo 41, Mich.

Dealers: Write us for the name of jobber in your line who can supply you.

Cedar Pine or Oriental
4-8-16-oz. Bottles

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

NO WICK! NO WAITING!

blitzes bugs!

PESTROY DDT
TRADE MARK REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

KILLS: ROACHES, BEDBUGS, MOTHS, FLEAS, LICE, SILVERFISH, GNATS, TICKS, WASPS, CRICKETS, ANTS, MANY OTHER INSECTS.

LASTS FOR MONTHS!

69¢ PINT 39¢ 3 OZ. SAFE! SURE!

PRODUCTS OF SHERWIN-WILLIAMS RESEARCH

TIGHTEN WOBBLY CHAIRS
with Plastic Wood

EASY! No skill required. Handles like putty . . . and hardens into wood.

IN CANS OR TUBES

EASY TO WORK WITH PLASTIC WOOD
A CELLULOSE FIBRE

KVP Household PAPERS

In March, when the mud finally begins to dry up, it is wonderful to go into the woods and look for the first green things growing. The skunk cabbages send up glossy dark emerald leaves in the swampy land. They look like pointed cornucopias, and they are one of the most vital-appearing plants I know. They seem to be a special defiance to winter, an assertion of spring as clear as a trumpet tone.

From now on each day is a voyage of discovery. The first white tender bell of the bloodroot, the first point of asparagus and the rosy nub of beginning rhubarb—these and a thousand others make the song of spring. And sometimes the crocus will be out with a lacy background of snow.

Another long hard New England winter is over when the March sun blows across a bluer sky. And pussy willows open their soft furry buds. Spring will come, but winter has taken its toll. Clover and Sister and Silver have left us, and heartbreak was our most intimate companion.

My friends sometimes tell me that if you have only one dog and lose it, it is so much worse, but when you have a kennel full it isn't so hard. But they do not know, for every cocker is the one dog in our hearts, and for every one, we know we shall not look upon his like again.

Now we begin to feel, as spring comes again, that they are still with us. It must be so, for we often feel that Rip is here, and he has been gone for more years than I can count. And I often hear Clover's gay high bark on a moonlight night. And Jill, who is far more sensible than I am, says quite casually that Sister was helping her when she was out painting the kennel. Sister simply loved her own bed in the kennel, and always leaped in and bounced wildly in it, then turned and presented a smiling bright gaze to show us that this was her property and very nice, unless she was planning to spend the night in the house. In her later years, Sister snored like a buzz bomb and was not encouraged to sleep in my bed, but she always gave me the impression that I made her nervous anyway, being a jouncy sleeper.

The end of winter and the coming of spring, these affirm every year that immortality is real, a fundamental. I do not believe that those we love are ever lost to us; their presence shines over the dark frozen terrain of death like the spring moon on the still-frozen swamp and meadow.

Honey, with the wind blowing all the way from the far North to lift her golden ears, moves across the spongy lawn, lifting her paws delicately. She lifts her nose and sniffs appreciatively, and turns her dark eyes to me as if to say, "The air smells wonderful today! Spring is coming!"

And the March wind blows. THE END

A TALKING BROWN THRASHER

Marie V. Beals, for years librarian of the National Audubon Society, told us the amazing story of Jerry, her talking brown thrasher.

Jerry came to her almost naked and half dead, a nestling that had fallen to the ground. On a diet of wireworms, meal worms, moistened whole-wheat bread and bits of cherries, he grew and gained his feathers.

One day when he was hopping about, Mrs. Beals called, "What are you doing?" Suddenly Jerry called back, "What are you doing?" Soon, except during the molting season, Jerry talked each day. And in the morning he would fly to Mrs. Beals' bedroom and call; "Lazy bones! How do you do? Wake up!"

So far as I know, the only brown thrasher on record to mimic human words and use them as though in conversation is Jerry.

—Edwin Way Teale.

to reflect treasured moments

every room needs a Living Picture

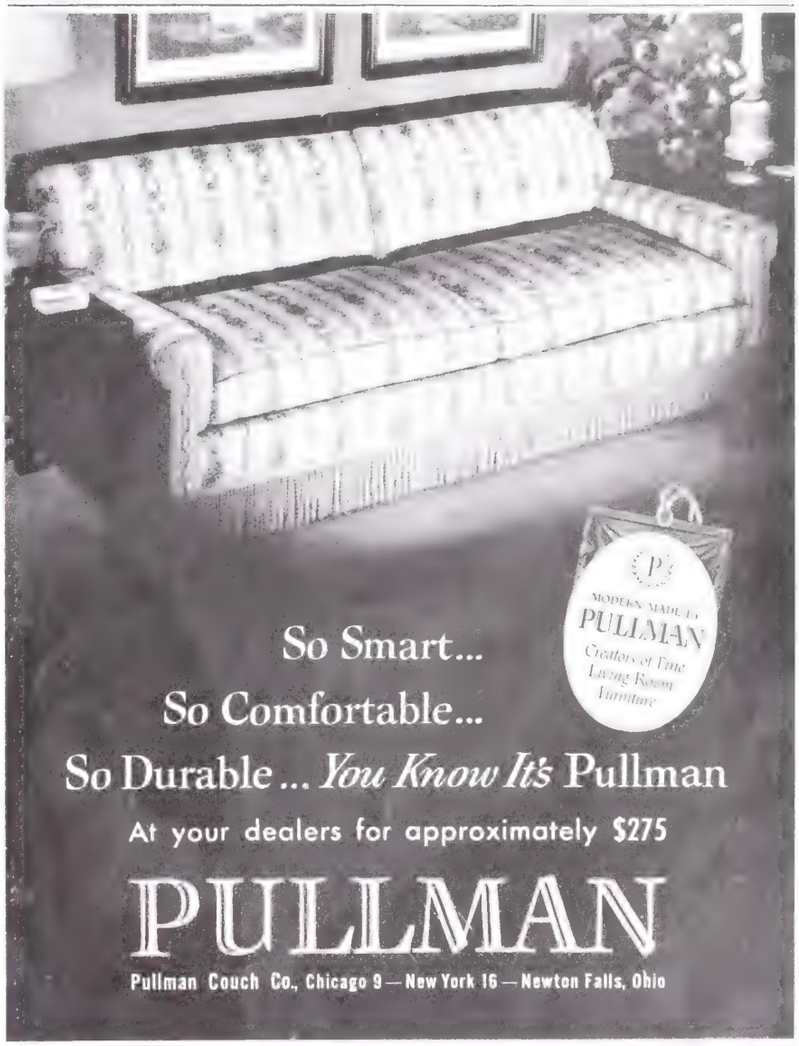
Genuine NURRE Mirrors

For new, lasting beauty, spaciousness, color and light, ask your dealer for genuine Nurre plate glass mirrors.

FREE BOOKLET!

New Edition. "How Famous Decorators Would Use Mirrors in Your Home."

THE NURRE COMPANIES, INC.
Dept. LHJ, Bloomington, Indiana
Please send me FREE mirror book.
Name
Address
City State
PLEASE PRINT



MODERN MADE BY PULLMAN
Creators of Fine Living Room Furniture

So Smart...
So Comfortable...
So Durable... You Know It's Pullman

At your dealers for approximately $275

PULLMAN

Pullman Couch Co., Chicago 9—New York 16—Newton Falls, Ohio

Commercial Pie

BY RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

For an early-spring formal dinner: a special green-turtle soup, chicken or squab casserole with mushrooms, glazed carrot balls, green salad. Dessert: bananas baked in honey.

It looks almost too good to eat, but that won't stop your guests. It's plate-size slices of rye, spread with different hors d'oeuvres and cut into any wedge you wish. It's wonderful.

IN March, spring may be just around the corner, but she's definitely hiding out and the weather doesn't tempt one very far from the fireside; so it's the perfect season for an evening of good talk, "the game," bridge, whatever—and first the mellowing influence of a more or less formal, bang-up dinner.

This time we'll take it for granted that you've been there on the spot during the crucial hours—no coming in or going out just before or after the meal—and while careful planning is necessary, it's not so tricky; you'll be ready, unhurried and serene when the doorbell rings. And we needn't plan our menu with an eye to food that can be prepared, almost completely, far [illegible] time.

First, Appetizer Pin Wheels, a sure-fire number. Plate-size slices of rye bread spread with several hors-d'oeuvre mixtures, brought in whole and cut into wedges. Very fancy. They look too good to eat, but that won't stop anyone.

Soup this time, Boula au Gratin, a most special combination of green-turtle consommé, purée of split peas and other things. Tell you later.

For the main dish—and this really is a pièce de résistance—Poulet Champignon à l'Orange. This dish has a history in my life. Some years ago—nine, to be exact—my husband and (Continued on Page 250)

Ilka Chase

talented actress, author, radio commentator . . . famed as a clever and original hostess, says:

Brach's

Chocolate Party Mix

is the perfect candy for smart entertaining

Whether you're entertaining at bridge . . . or an elaborate dinner party . . . your guests are bound to appreciate Brach's Chocolate Party Mix. Here's an assortment of good-tasting candy that gets an "M-m-m" from everybody! Almost two hundred luscious little taste-appealers to the box! Gay, tempting milk and bittersweet chocolates . . . filled with crisp almonds and nutmeats . . . smooth, chewy caramel . . . exotic orange jelly . . . milk malts . . . raisins! Variety galore! This grand candy assortment is for sale at better stores everywhere. 85¢ PER POUND

The name Brach's means quality candy

E. J. Brach & Sons, Chicago

HERE'S HOW TO

Cook Rice Right

USE THIS SIMPLE, TESTED RECIPE AND ENJOY RICE AS NEVER BEFORE

Saves time and fuss . . . retains nutrients . . . eliminates guesswork

1 cup RIVER BRAND Rice, 1 tsp. salt, 1½ cups cold water. Wash thoroughly in 5 or 6 waters and place in 3 qt. pot with a tight fitting cover. Place over moderate flame and bring to a vigorous boil. This should take 8-10 minutes. When steam and foam begin to escape, turn flame down lower and cook the rice until tender—about 20 minutes. All the water should be absorbed. Keep in warm place until you are ready to serve. Serves 5 to 6.

One of 7 tested recipes on every RIVER BRAND package

NET WEIGHT

RIVER BRAND

White RICE

DISCOVER HOW GOOD RICE CAN BE!

Insist on RIVER BRAND—the pick of the finest rice crops grown in the Sunny South—unsurpassed for delicacy of flavor and tenderness—nutritious and low in cost.

CAROLINA BRAND
EXTRA LONG GRAIN
for special treats

There's nothing really finer. Cooks larger and whiter—each grain separate, fluffy and delicious.

CAROLINA RICE

Extra Long Grain

(Continued from Page 248)

I were motoring from Paris to Verdun. We arrived at the inn in Verdun too late for dinner, but the chef agreed to prepare us a special meal, and what a meal it was! The main course was the before-mentioned poulet, served by a young waiter who hovered anxiously, eager to practice his halting English on us. After his first mushroom my husband looked at me in astonishment. "Delicious!" he exclaimed. "What has been done to these mushrooms?" "Ah," from the waiter, "that is the secret of our chef!" I tasted my first bite and looked up. "He's rubbed the mushrooms with orange peel, and I think there's some grated orange peel in the sauce." "Ah, madame has surprised so easily the secret of our chef!" The waiter tried to look crestfallen, but I'm sure he thought it was fun and so did I, for my husband was frightfully impressed by my knowledge.

Enough of stories. Let's get on to the vegetables, which will be string beans and glazed carrot balls. Mixed green salad, served separately or with the chicken, and we'll give it an extra fillip by adding the chicken livers to the French dressing.

Hot bread we must have, either French bread, heated at the last minute, or my easy homemade bread, hot from the oven. But come on, why not my easy homemade? It's such a cinch, and people are so impressed. Why, I don't know, but they are.

Dessert next, and not a grain of sugar will we use. I don't dare. When I think of those stuffed oranges last summer! But bake bananas in honey to a pink gold color, serve them with a sauce of whipped cream and dates and there'll be no need for sugar.

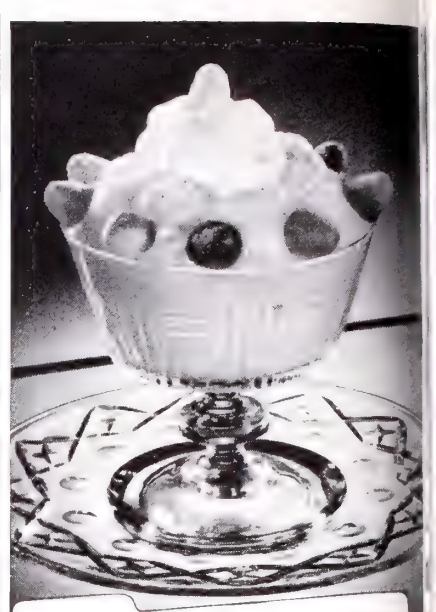
APPETIZER PIN WHEELS

Buy a big round loaf of rye bread, slice off the bottom crust and then cut 3 even slices about ½ inch thick. The slices will be disks about the size of a smallish dinner plate. Stack the slices, wrap in a cloth which has been dampened and wrung very dry and store in refrigerator while you proceed to the next 5 steps:

(1) Season a very small jar or can of black caviar with 1 tablespoon lemon juice and 2 tablespoons grated onion. (2) To 6 ounces cream cheese, worked smooth with a little cream or top milk, add ½ cup chopped nuts and 5 tablespoons chopped chives. (3) Grind about ½ pound lean cooked ham five times through the finest blade of the meat chopper. You'll need a well-packed cup of ham after it's ground. Mix into a smooth paste with 2 tablespoons mayonnaise, 1 tablespoon butter or margarine, ½ teaspoon Bahamian mustard—more if other prepared mustard is used—1 teaspoon catchup, and paprika and cayenne pepper to taste. Add salt if your ham is too mild. (4) Add to a small can of liver pâté, or a piece of liverwurst, a pinch of orégano and enough Worcestershire sauce to make it pretty sharp. (5) Put the yolks of 4 hard-cooked eggs through a sieve and work very smooth with 2 tablespoons butter or margarine, a little mayonnaise, 1 teaspoon lemon juice, a few grains sugar, and salt, pepper and curry powder to taste. The mixture should be the consistency of cake icing. Put it into a pastry tube and onto the ice.

Now remove crusts from bread disks, spread thickly with butter or margarine and proceed as follows. In the center of each bread round make a two-inch disk of caviar. Around that put a band of cream-cheese stuff, next a band of ham and last a band of pâté. The bands should be even in width and should cover the bread to the very edge. Put the mixtures on quite thick, but be neat about it. At the extreme outside edge make a scalloped border of shrimp, very tiny ones or medium, but fairly uniform in size. Now decorate with the egg-yolk mixture. Pipe in a line of yellow where the different colors meet—the seams—and put a good dot in each shrimp. Store in refrigerator or other cold place until ready. Garnish with water cress. Cut in wedges for serving.

There you are, and if this sounds complicated I assure you it isn't as much trouble as making a platter of assorted hors d'oeuvres. More fun too. When my hand is in I always make a few extra and store them in the freezing unit against future dinner parties.



Vanilla Pudding that's My-T-Fine

Easy recipe for Vanilla Party Pudding: Prepare My-T-Fine Vanilla Pudding according to simple directions on the package. Arrange six or more tiny colored gumdrops spoke-fashion around edge of pudding, top with spoonful of marshmallow whip and bright-colored gumdrop. You'll love it!

5 delicious My-T-Fine desserts

Vanilla
Chocolate
Butterscotch
Nut Chocolate
Lemon Pie Filling

MY-T-FINE VANILLA MY-T-FINE VANILLA FLAVOR DESSERT

Delicious Chicken Dinners ready to serve!

Keep a supply on hand

Do COOKING MAGIC on busy days—serve Morton's Quick-Fix Chicken Dinners! Just heat . . . that's all. Morton's brings you tender chicken prepared three delicious ways. Enjoy these famous products. Keep them on your "handy" shelf. At lunch time or any time when minutes count . . . just Heat and Eat.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Morton's NOODLE CHICKEN DINNER

Morton's CHICKEN A LA KING

Morton's NOODLE CHICKEN GIBLET DINNER

Morton's QUICK-FIX DINNERS

KNITTING YARNS
Quality Yarns at LOW Prices
Send for Free Sample Prices and Illustrated Booklet
SUNRAY YARN HOUSE Dept. J3 349 Grand St., New York 2, N. Y.

A·1 *Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
SAUCE

Its flavor makes you WISH for FISH

Write for "Cooking for a Man"

The DASH that makes the DISH

FOR A TASTE THRILL!
Ellis TAMALES SMOTHERED WITH CHILE
THE ROYALTY OF QUALITY
AT YOUR GROCER'S
THE ELLIS CANNING CO. Denver, Colo.

WHIP TOPPING
THE FROZEN PURE SOY CREAM FOR WHIPPING
TESTED AND COMMENDED BY PARENTS' MAGAZINE
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
DELICIOUS AND NUTRITIOUS for Desserts, Salads, etc.
At all fine food stores and grocers

GEE! IT'S Easy TO MAKE BIG MONEY THIS WAY!
Now you're invited to earn splendid, year 'round income. Doehla assorted greeting cards, gift wrappings and other fine lines. 16 new $1 box assortment — you make up to 60¢ a box. Write for samples on approval. Make sales first day, or return at our expense.
HARRY DOEHLA CO. Dept J-3, Fitchburg, Mass.
Doehla Cards for Birthdays Get Well Anniversaries Gifts • Baby Sympathy • Notes

GRAVY MAKING IS A TRICKY TASK
GRAVY MASTER
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
HAS WHAT IT TAKES

WE WILL PAY YOU $25
Great demand for our Birthday and All Occasion Cards. Sell for $1—your profit to 50¢; it costs you nothing to try—write for samples today.
FOR SELLING BOXY $1 ASSORTMENTS
MERIT CARD CO., Dept. B, 70 William St., NEWARK 2, N. J.

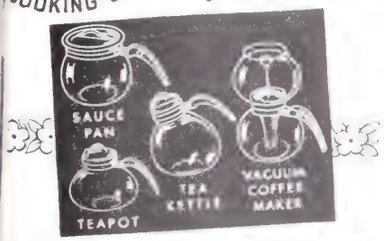
...ith my

DUNBAR GLASS

...y sparkling, spotless Dunbar glass brings ...v beauty to your kitchen—makes cooking ...eal pleasure. Cleans quickly, easily—cooking ...e is reduced because Dunbar glass absorbs radiant heat. Send postcard for my folder of favorite recipes to Jane Dunbar, Dunbar Glass Corp., 303 Payne Ave., Dunbar, W. Va.

FLAME-RESIST DUNBAR COOKING GLASS

Jane Dunbar



It's a DAZEY Can Opener

Holds cans firmly, releases gently without spilling. Irons down rims to prevent jagged edges. Lifts out or folds out of the way when not in use. Buy yours today at your favorite hardware or department store

Dazey Corporation, St. Louis 7, Missouri

The Kant-Slip No-Spill Can Opener

This can opener is just one of the famous Dazey Family of Kitchen Helps that juice fruits, crush ice and sharpen knives—and all fit the Dazey Wall Bracket.

recommended by Good Housekeeping

Guaranteed for 5 years

DAZEY Products

BOULA AU GRATIN

Wash 1 pound split peas and soak overnight in 5 cups cold water. Cover and cook gently until peas are tender and mushy. Stir frequently; and it's a good idea to use an asbestos mat under them, for they're inclined to stick. Pass through a sieve to make a thick purée. Or you may use canned pea soup. Add 2 cans good green-turtle consommé (the cans are usually 12 ounces, which make about 3 cups), 3 teaspoons gourmet powder, or bouillon powder if you can't get gourmet, ⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper, 1 good pinch mace, 1 grated clove garlic and ½ cup cream or top milk. Thin the soup further with ½ cup consommé or milk (or, if you prefer, ½ cup sherry). Add salt to taste.

Whip a small amount of cream, allowing about 1½ tablespoons to each cup soup, and add to it ½ cup grated cheese. Parmesan is best, but any good strong cheese can be substituted.

Shortly before serving, put the hot soup into cups that will stand oven heat. Place a generous spoonful of whipped cream and cheese on top, sprinkle with paprika and set under broiler until golden brown. The soup can be made the day before, but the browning should be done shortly before serving.

POULET CHAMPIGNON À L'ORANGE

This dish can be prepared with squab chickens, broilers or young roasters. Quantity required and cooking time will depend on the size of your birds; but whatever the size, the casserole will stand a fairly long waiting period on an electric hot plate or in a barely turned-on oven. I'll give instructions for two roasters—decrease cooking time if smaller chickens are used.

Happiness is a form of courage.
—HOLBROOK JACKSON.

After the chickens have been washed and dried, cut off the necks and put them to boil with the gizzards. Rub the cavities with orange peel and salt and the outsides with salt, pepper and a little butter or margarine. Put some shortening or salad oil in an iron skillet on top of the range and brown the birds to a delicate golden brown. Remove from heat, then put 1 onion, a little coarsely chopped celery, 1 good sprig sweet basil or 1 teaspoon dried sweet basil, 1 teaspoon chopped parsley and 1 big tablespoon butter or margarine into each chicken and sew up cavity. Tie the legs down securely. I tie the ends of the legs together, then pass the string around the tail a couple of times and knot. If you do this, the legs won't pop up at an unbecoming angle. Put three strips of bacon in the bottom of a large casserole, add a good lump of butter or margarine and heat in a hot oven. When the fat starts to bubble add the chickens, breasts up, turn the oven low—about 325° F. for mine—and put the lid of the casserole on tight. If the lid doesn't fit tightly, cover the chickens with greased paper before you put it on.

Wipe at least 1 pound large mushrooms with wet cheesecloth. More mushrooms won't do a bit of harm—if they aren't too out-of-this-world expensive. Remove the stems and scrape and chop them—the stems. Score several pieces of orange peel with the point of a sharp knife and rub each mushroom cap thoroughly with the peel. Grate 2 tablespoons orange peel and sprinkle a little on the underneath side of each cap. Melt some butter or margarine in a pan, add the mushroom caps and sauté a few minutes, then pour in ½ cup orange juice, let it come to a boil and set aside.

When the chickens have cooked 15 minutes, take them out of the oven, remove thread and let butter and juice in cavities drain into casserole. Add mushroom stems, 1 teaspoon grated orange peel, 2 cups broth from necks and gizzards, 2 envelopes beef bouillon powder and last the orange juice and mushroom caps. (At this time ½ cup port may be added if you like.) Now taste and add more salt and pepper if needed. The orange taste must be faint, not dominant, but it must be there. Oranges differ greatly in flavor and you

When Jim likes 'em slim...Better reduce the Ry-Krisp way!

Surprise the party who counts most by slimming down to youthful curves! Get the Ry-Krisp Plan (for those in normal health). Start choosing meals from long lists of foods (in given portions)...and have Ry-Krisp as bread. So easy, because you feel so well-fed. Delicious Ry-Krisp has a flavor that makes every meal a thrill! Wholegrain bread, crisp, wafer-thin. Has whole-rye minerals and vitamin B_1 to help you feel livelier, better. Only 23 calories per double-square wafer.

REDUCER'S DELIGHT: Broiled veal chop, green limas, braised celery, lettuce with low-calorie dressing, Ry-Krisp, broiled grapefruit, hot tea.

FREE! "DESIGN FOR REDUCING," GIVES COMPLETE REDUCING PLANS FOR MEN AND WOMEN. WRITE RY-KRISP, 200 CHECKERBOARD SQUARE, ST. LOUIS 2, MISSOURI.

Until you see K-M YOU HAVEN'T SEEN THE FINEST!

No matter what appliance you want, see the K-M Genie's new Electrical Servants before you buy! They're so far ahead in features, beauty, and performance...you'll be sorry if you accept a substitute. Check with your K-M Dealer often...and be among the first to get the finest in modern magic.

KNAPP-MONARCH CO. also manufactures Knapp Shavers, Therm-A-Jugs, Magik Mist, Moth Vapor

Heats faster, more uniformly

Perfect weight and balance for easy ironing

Dial sets heat for any fabric

Light tells when it's safe to start ironing

ELECTRICAL K-M KNAPP-MONARCH SERVANTS

Tel-A-Matic Iron

KNAPP-MONARCH CO., St. Louis 16, Missouri

Meatless wonder for Lent...
Chateau Cheese Chops!

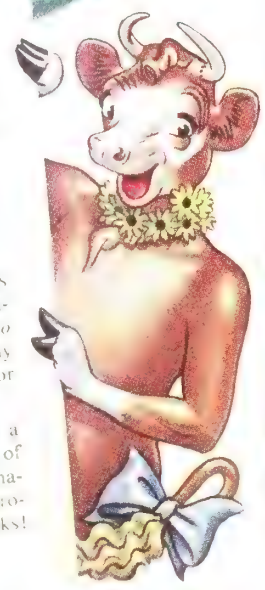
Chateau Cheese Chops!

Wonderful! How Borden's Chateau perks up a meatless meal!

½-lb. pkg. Chateau, diced
4 tablespoons butter, softened
2 teaspoons prepared mustard
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 tablespoon finely chopped parsley or chives
2 eggs, beaten
1½ cups cracker crumbs (about 20 crackers) or 1 cup fine, dry bread crumbs

...e all ingredients—making sure your cheese is Borden's ... (You see, other cheese foods don't give you Cha... zip zesty Cheddar cheese flavor.) Shape mixture to ... meat ... Pan-fry over low heat till lightly ... on both sides. Serve with horse-radish sauce or ... ice (Makes 6 chops.)

These hearty cheese chops made with Chateau have a ... " zip that comes from Borden's special blending of ... d mellow mild American Cheddar cheeses. Cha... s slices melts to perfection. Add a whole-pro... ment to sandwiches, sauces, omelets, snacks! ... ½-lb. package or 2-lb. loaf.



Celery stuffed with Heaven!

Take a crisp, crunchy celery stalk and heap with Borden's Olive Pimento Cocktail Spread.

This creamy smooth spread is chock-full of colorful morsels of pimento and olives. One of seven heavenly kinds of cocktail spreads that Borden's makes.

Keep one or more varieties handy for snacks or sandwiches.

© The Borden Company

Borden's Fine Cheeses

IF IT'S BORDEN'S, IT'S GOT TO BE GOOD!

★ Tune in the Ginny Simms Show! Music! Comedy! CBS, Friday—9 P.M., E.S.T.

may want to add a little more juice or grated rind, but don't overdo it. Garlic? Optional, but I think 1 grated clove garlic improves the flavor of the sauce. Put the lid back on and continue cooking until chickens are tender. Thicken the sauce with cornstarch to the consistency of very thin gravy and keep the chickens hot but not cooking until you are ready to serve them.

STRING BEANS

Cut string beans into long slender strips and cook in boiling salted water to which a little baking soda has been added. Don't overcook. Brown 2 or 3 tablespoons butter or margarine to a dark golden brown, blend in 1 rounded teaspoon flour and add ¾ cup beef consommé, stirring constantly until it boils. Drain beans and pour sauce over them.

GLAZED CARROT BALLS

Boil large carrots in salted water until almost done. Cool and cut into balls with smallest ball cutter. Into a skillet or pan put the juice of ½ large lemon, 2½ tablespoons sugar and 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Boil 3 minutes, add carrots and cook until most of the liquid is gone. Shake the pan and stir occasionally, so that each carrot ball is nicely glazed.

To serve, arrange the two vegetables attractively in a serving dish—preferably one that will stand oven heat, so that last-minute taking up of the vegetables can be avoided.

Honor exists but for the honorable. —COMTESSE DIANE.

BREAD

Here's my easy home-made-bread recipe, second time. I used it last March, but I do want you all to have it. Scald, don't boil, 2⅔ cups milk and ¼ pound butter or margarine. Cool to lukewarm and add 2 beaten eggs and 2 cakes yeast dissolved in ½ cup lukewarm water. Sift together 8 cups flour, 1½ teaspoons salt and 1½ tablespoons sugar. Add liquids to flour and beat like anything for 5 minutes with a wooden spoon. Of course if you have a bread mixer, use it by all means.

Cover mixing bowl with a cloth and set in a warm place to rise. When dough is double in bulk, about 2 hours, transfer to well-greased pans. This recipe makes 2 long or 3 medium loaves. There's no kneading involved. Simply grease your hands, gouge out some dough, stretch it a little and smack it into the pan. Cover the pans with cloth and again let the dough rise to double its bulk. Bake for from 50 minutes to 1 hour at 375° F. If you can't arrange your schedule so that bread is done shortly before serving time, reheat at last minute.

Or—buy a loaf of French bread, cut in thick slices almost through bottom crust and heat before serving.

SALAD

Sauté chicken livers a few minutes in a little butter or margarine, press through sieve and add to French dressing, basic recipe. Get as fine an assortment of salad greens as you can and include a little chopped finochio if you can find it. Italian grocers usually have it. Rub the salad bowl with garlic, but be sure to remove any tiny slivers of garlic that may break off the clove. Toss the salad thoroughly, so that each leaf is coated with dressing.

HONEY BANANAS

Select fine large bananas. Peel, sprinkle with a few drops lemon juice and arrange without crowding, in a shallow baking pan. Pour over them 1 cup honey and ... tablespoons water and bake in a 400° F. oven until the bananas are tender and slightly puffed—about ½ hour. Baste frequently and carefully, so that each banana is well coated with honey. These may be chilled or served warm or hot. My choice is warm.

Whip ½ pint cream and fold in 15 or more dates, cut into pieces, and 1 teaspoon vanilla. (If you like, 2 or 3 tablespoons cognac may be added). To serve, don't cover the bananas with the cream mixture but alternate the two in some attractive pattern.

Service. This meal can be managed without a helper, but it's obvious that a helper would help. Someone who could cook the beans, glaze the carrots and brown the soup while you're enjoying the Appetizer Pin Wheels—and table clearing between courses and dishwashing are worth consideration. Even an inexperienced helper, whom you've told what to do and when, of course, would be a great asset. But there aren't enough helpers to go around these days and you may have to swing it alone. If so, I'd advise having everything ready hot in the serving dishes, before the guests arrive.

With warming oven and electric hot plate this can be managed easily, if planning and timing have been worked out carefully. And, too, remember that food can be kept hot in earthenware dishes on top of the range, if you turn burners low and cover them with two asbestos mats. The browning of the soup is the one essentially eleventh-hour job, but that takes only two or three minutes if the soup is already hot. Have the cups of soup waiting in a low oven and, just before serving time, add the cream and cheese and broil. But don't add the cream until you're ready to broil or it will flatten out like a wet pancake.

However you manage the actual serving of this meal, I do think the birds should be brought to the dining room to be carved, not mangled in the kitchen. And suppose it's squab chickens you have cooked: six or eight plump little birds, nested snugly in the casserole, are a sight that shouldn't be missed. After all, gastronomic pleasure is partly visual—something we should never forget. And in this meal there is plenty of both kinds of gastronomic pleasure. THE END be told what to do. But don't get the idea they're dumb; they're not. They don't know enough arithmetic to put in your finger, but they know how much is coming in their pay check and they wouldn't let you get away with a penny. As for the kids' playing hooky, that's no concern of mine. I don't hire any kids under seventeen—that's the legal age to work. It's up to the parents to send a child to school and the teachers to see that he gets there. My kids? Oh, they went away to school."

THE HARD PRICE OF SOFT COAL

(Continued from Page 233)

County education authorities:

"We're proud of our schools. Pupils from Evarts win lots of the state scholarships. Why, there's more special talent in this school than in any county school in the country. We won the band championship a few years back. Three out of four of the seniors go on to college. It's true that not too many get into the senior class, but there's nothing we can do about that. The law says they can stop at sixteen. Truancy is difficult for the teachers, too; they work a pretty hard day—and they don't want to go wandering around the county in the evenings. We've got a PTA, but it isn't very active; mothers around here have large families—the birth rate is way above average—and plenty to do. As for spankings, well, if you were around here long you'd see that sometimes we give too few, not too many. Some of these kids just don't seem to know what school is for; not that they're dumb, they're smart, but they get a feeling of defeat at home and they get belligerent about it at school. We're trying to arrange some kind of luncheon program so the kids wouldn't eat any old place, but I don't think we'll ask for Federal subsidy; the kids

(Continued on Page 254)

Pancakes Deluxe!

with Hot Buttered Sweetose*

MADE BY STALEY'S

A new patented syrup – made from Corn

IT'S REALLY SWEET!

eetose hot—or Sweetose cold—will delight
ı on pancakes, waffles or French toast.
t—if you want pancakes de luxe—try
! Just blend a tablespoonful of butter ɔ a cupful of hot Sweetose Golden or eetose Waffle Syrup!

There's a grand and glorious new taste nbination that'll send smiles of real enjoy-nt all 'round the table! What's more, it ves at least half the butter usually served!

Try pancakes this de luxe way! Like ndreds of other dishes, they taste far tter when they're sweetened with Sweet-
. For Sweetose is a completely new type sweetener made from corn—so different that it is made under a new basic patent.

Hundreds of women who have tried Sweetose prefer it to sugar for luscious desserts, stewing fruits, and a great many other uses. It mixes very quickly, blends well, and gives a really satisfying sweetness that men and boys really like.

We'd like to send you recipes for eleven delicious new desserts—husky, flavorful desserts that will win instant approval from the whole family. All made from this wonderful new syrup—no sugar needed.

Just mail the coupon to us today. Your copy will be mailed to you. A. E. Staley Mfg. Co., Decatur, Illinois.

A. E. Staley Mfg. Co., Dept. L-3
Box 1091, Decatur, Illinois
Gentlemen:
Please mail me, free, your recipes for eleven delicious desserts made with your patented new-type syrup—Sweetose.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

Zone..... State.....

*"Sweetose" [illegible] Staley Mfg. Co., Decatur, Ill. [illegible] registered in the U. S. Pat. Off.

Pauline Gordon

Suit by Jo Copeland of Pattullo

"Figure-Free"

MIRACLE BRA with NO WIRES

Unprecedented in modern brassiere design. Achieved by pliable, covered stiffening molded under the cups. Busts are separated but held firmly without wires or metal contrivances. For young or mature figures; white or nude nylon in A, B or C. $3.50

At the Better Stores

*Patent Pending

PAULINE GORDON, INC., 112 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

In a minute!...

Cold discomfort begins to change to warm smiles

Rub MINIT-RUB on chest and back.

1 In a minute, Minit-Rub begins to stimulate circulation, begins to bring a sensation of warmth. That quickly helps relieve surface aches and pains.

2 In a minute, Minit-Rub's welcome pain-relieving action begins to soothe that raspy local irritation.

3 In a minute, Minit-Rub's active menthol vapors begin to ease that nasal "stuffiness" feeling.

MINIT-RUB is wonderful for both children and adults. Greaseless! Stainless! Disappears like vanishing cream! Won't harm linens. Get Minit-Rub—today!

MINIT-RUB

The Modern Chest Rub

MODERN CHEST RUB MINIT-RUB

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

(Continued from Page 252)

have enough money and not enough good things to spend it on as it is."

III. HEALTH CONDITIONS

The County Health Commission estimates that 4 out of every 10 persons in Harlan County have or have had a venereal disease. State statistics show that 3 out of every 100 births are stillborn: 7 or 8 babies out of every 100 born alive die before they are a year old. The prevalence of tuberculosis has not been calculated, but physicians say that the number of known cases has doubled within the past five years and county health-patch and X-ray tests of 3000 school children found 2 out of every 100 with active TB.

The five-year-old Federally-started VD program is active; persons named as VD contacts must report for tests and treatment or face arrest. The TB situation is bad: there are no facilities in the county for handling TB patients; the only sanatorium in the state—at Louisville—has a long waiting list. This means scores of active tuberculars are at large. The cornerstones for five state sanatoriums have been laid: the nearest to Harlan will be at London, Kentucky. Typhoid cases are rare. Children are inoculated in the schools for smallpox, typhoid, diphtheria and whooping cough. All teachers must pass a physical which includes a VD examination and a TB examination. Malnutrition diseases are believed common. Cancer is considered the state's leading cause of death, after heart ailments, but there is no cancer clinic in Harlan. There is no maternal or pregnancy education.

What the miners say about health:

"What kind of health do you expect of people who live in places like these? In the summer, the garbage rots fast in the creeks and leaves room for the kids to swim. In the winter it's so cold in these shacks that every drop of water freezes overnight. The health department is fine—what there is of it. There's not too much we miners can do; we try to follow the rules on active TB-ers, but it's a losing battle to boil every plate when you have to fetch and carry all the water and keep the stove going. And you can't keep anyone quarantined around here—you got six or seven people in one house with four rooms and no doors. People talk about catching cold from sitting in a draft—we live in one. Seems like most of the kids have colds most of the time, or they're breaking out with something worse. The Red Cross came around during the war and tried to tell us how we should eat—but we eat what we can get mostly, and how you going to do anything else?"

What the operators say about health:

"Miners are a healthy crew—they're immunized against their own environment. TB isn't as frequent around here as people say. You never find a tubercular miner—that's nonsense. As for the kids, look at their rosy cheeks. They're outdoors in all sorts of weather, and that's more than you can say for city kids. We don't have trouble with illness around here. All this absenteeism is due to drinking mostly and too much money to spend, and not enough to spend it on. A man gets $200 ahead and he can't spend it on a car or an icebox, so what does he do? Blows it on a two-day holiday."

County Health Commission:

"The first public interest in Harlan County health was in 1940, when the Selective Service found TB and VD widespread among the selectees. The first health commissioner—Dr. S. L. Andeliman—came in 1942 and wheedled enough space under the county-courthouse stairs to put in an X-ray machine for free TB examinations. It was the first X ray for the county, but there are about ten around here now. The Federal Government tried to get a trailer going through the mining camps for examinations, but there was opposition. Mining camps are private property, after all, whether they should be or not, and the companies have to pay compensation on silicosis—that's from coal dust and it weakens the respiratory tract—so

Special for DRY SKIN

Miss Camilla Morgan says . . . "Soft, smooth and rich – Pond's Dry Skin Cream helps keep my skin supple."

Rich-cream smooth—like luscious country cream! Pond's Dry Skin Cream has special skin-softening power. It slips on so easily—your dry, tense skin just seems to "drink it up," women say.

3 Special Features

Rich in Lanolin—very like oil of skin
Homogenized—to soak in better
Special Emulsifier—extra softening aid

Work its seepy smoothness well over face, throat. Leave 5 to 15 minutes, or overnight. Use every day. You'll love the way this richest Pond's Cream helps dry skin become softer, smoother again. Ask for Pond's Dry Skin Cream today.

Pond's DRY SKIN Cream

COLD SORE STICK

EASY TO CARRY—HANDY TO U

Check cold sores with COLD SORE-IVO Medicated. Lubricates, protects. Feel relief [illegible]. Made by the makers of famous LIP IVO since 1907. At drug stores 35¢.

IVO, INC., WEST BEND, WIS.

Cold Sore-IVO

IT'S HERE!

A HAND CREAM

THAT HELPS KEEP

HANDS SOFTER,

SMOOTHER...AND

IS NOT STICKY—

NOT GREASY!

Luxor contains Carbamide, the ingredient long familiar to surgeons, which helps relieve the tiny cracks and scratches that make hands look red, feel rough!

Luxor HAND CREAM

there was some feeling about X-raying in general. Still is, but we're moving along, even if we can't hospitalize the active tuberculars yet. It was something to get tests for the teachers; a tubercular teacher can't work here now. And tests for the kids—we figure all told we've tested 10 per cent of the county now and at least told tuberculars what they can do to help themselves and others. We've got VD under control and public interest aroused against TB. We'd like to do something about maternal and child care, and of course malnutrition, but we've only got so much money and so much time and we're doing what we can."

IV. MEDICAL CONDITIONS

There are four hospitals in Harlan County for 75,000 citizens. All are private, three being run by coal companies. The Catholic Church plans to build a new hospital. There is one free clinic for TB examinations, and a fund of $6000 for medical fees for the proved (by the courts) indigent. Harlan Hospital, which services Yokum No. 2, has beds for 60; says it has never turned a patient away, but all patients must be brought in by doctors. There are no beds for tuberculars; no isolation ward; the maternity ward has 12 beds. The Health Department, started in 1942 at the behest of the U. S. Public Health Service, has a budget of $26,000, one third state, one third county, one third Federal money, and supports a staff of 11, including 1 doctor, 4 nurses and 2 sanitation experts. The health commissioner (Doctor Andeliman) is a U. S. Public Health Service employee.

There are also 35 private doctors and 8 dentists in the county. Formerly, miners were serviced by doctors hired by the companies; they have now inherited these doctors and hire them themselves. Payment is made through pay-roll checkoffs of $3 per miner monthly. At Yokum No. 2, the miners are serviced by three doctors, who also service seven other mines, or about 1200 miners and their families. One of the three doctors is Doctor Lewis, who was a company doctor before becoming a coal operator. The three doctors split the medical fund three ways, pay three nurses and operate two offices out of it as well as purchase basic supplies, equipment and medicines. Their taxable income for 1945 (when the doctors' checkoff was $2.50 per miner) is authoritatively es-

ATTENTION, TEENS

SO you're 13 years old. Your hair is brown, your eyes are blue. You know you're friendly—don't other girls tell you their secrets? Yet, inside, you think of yourself as being strictly in the sad-sack department because you've got the shape of a barrel when you really want the contour of H. Lamarr. So then what?

One day it just gets too much for you and you come home crying. Like Lois Sutton, for instance. With her chatter, she wowed 'em; but even her 21-year-old ever-loving brother allowed as how her shape could detour into some curves. So with her very hep mother's approval and help, Lois learned the ABC's of getting and staying this side of the chubby cherub. It took a lot of lettuce and exercise, but today she's able to check in on the scale minus 25 pounds.

If you've got a yen to turn from duckling into swan, read

Growing Pains

By Emily Kimbrough

★ HOW AMERICA LIVES ★
In the April JOURNAL

WINDFLOWER
One of many smart La Mode Buttons at fine stores everywhere

La Mode
BUTTONS
I & Co., Inc., 1372-82 Broadway, N.Y.18, N.Y.
Button Specialists Since 1877

SCALP ODOR IS OFFENSIVE!

The Scalp Perspires . . . your hair collects and holds odors and dirt. Don't risk offending either in public, or personal "close-ups."

Remove Scalp Odors by using Fitch's Saponified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo. This efficient cleanser "suds-up" into "mountains" of lather that float away dirt and scalp odors. Leaves your hair with a light, fresh scent, radiantly clean, soft and easy to arrange into your personal hair style.

Patented Rinsing Agent contained right in this shampoo eliminates need for special after rinses. No dull film remains on your hair. At drug counters or have professional applications at beauty shops.

Fitch's
SAPONIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

FEET HURT? IT MAY BE WEAK ARCHES!

Tired, aching feet, rheumatic-like foot and leg pains, fatigue, sore heels and callouses often are traceable to weak arches. Dr. Scholl's Arch Supports and exercise help relieve pain caused by strain of the muscles and ligaments. Give firm, gentle uplift. Feel as if molded to your feet. Adjustable as condition of arches improves. Expertly fitted at Shoe and Department Stores. For FREE foot booklet, write Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Chicago 10, Ill.

Dr Scholl's ARCH SUPPORTS

There is a Dr. Scholl Foot Comfort Appliance or Remedy for Every Common Foot Trouble

Scoldy Lox BOB and HAIR PINS

FALSE TEETH
KLUTCH holds them tighter

KLUTCH forms a comfort cushion, holds dental plates so much firmer and snugger that one can eat and talk with greater comfort and security; in many cases almost as well as with natural teeth. Klutch lessens the constant fear of a dropping, rocking, chafing plate. 25c and 50c at druggists. . . If your druggist hasn't it, don't waste money on substitutes, but send us 10c and we will mail you a generous trial box. © L. C. Co.

KLUTCH CO., Box 4721-C, ELMIRA, N. Y.

For Quick Earnings SELL Everyday Cards

Fast profit-maker for you! Every body buys these smart Everyday folders for Birthdays, "Get-Well", etc. 14 beauties $1. You make fine profit. Other big value assorts. Write NOW for FREE sample Stationery
Southern Greeting Card Co., Dept. K-13
McCall Building, Memphis 3, Tenn.

VETO Colgate's Amazing New Antiseptic Deodorant, Checks Perspiration, Stops Odor—Yet is Doubly Safe!

Only VETO Contains DURATEX, exclusive new safety ingredient! Veto is different from any other deodorant . . . Does not rot clothes. Safe for any normal skin. Stays moist in jar, never gritty, rubs in easily. Use doubly safe Veto regularly to guard daintiness and to check perspiration, stop underarm odor safely.

Veto COLGATE'S NEW DEODORANT

TESTED by BETTER FABRICS BUREAU

DOUBLY PREFERRED! Registered Nurses who have tried Veto prefer it almost 2 to 1 over any other deodorant, according to a nation-wide survey.

APPROVED SAFE FOR FABRICS—Better Fabrics Bureau

timated to have been between $9000 and $11,000 yearly each. The miners also contribute $1.50 apiece to a hospitalization fund, which they also administer. Delivery of a baby is extra and not included in any payments; the doctor's fee is $35 for a home delivery.

The miners say about medical facilities:

"The doctors are making money out of us—but how else are you going to get them to come down here? They're organized now themselves—and last October they sent us an ultimatum saying they wanted a 50-cent raise a month from each miner. We were paying them $2.50 each before then. We gave it to them. We couldn't afford to let them quit on us and leave us with nobody. They didn't answer calls until we said okay, and it was a tough thing to say, but if we tried getting some strange new guy down here how do we know he'd take any interest in us at all? It's bad enough the way things are; you send out a kid to the nearest telephone and then wait. We can't afford to make ourselves guinea pigs for new guys—and maybe some of them no good, like the dope addict we had down here. Doc Lewis hired the men we have at Yokum and we trust him. Now we've got the running of the medical fund in the contract, we're going to stick to what we know and make the best of it. Maybe the International will have some ideas that will help on the subject too. We miners have just begun to take our own welfare in our own hands."

The operators say about medical facilities:

"A coal-company doctor works hard, and I should know; I was one myself and still am, for that matter. How did I get to be an operator? Good business sense. When I came here from Vanderbilt University nessee) twenty-eight years ago I dreamed I'd own that mountain an one. I lived in a little shack and rc Clover Fork on my horse. Saved my and put it into land—coal-producing I don't practice much any more—a surgery, maybe, but I'm not on call. take my cut of the medical fund—the want me to. They know I'm still tal responsibility for their health; they they can count on me in an emergenc reason I don't take regular patients I'm away a good bit—say three or months every year. If the miners are they'll stick to the doctors who are trie true. How many doctors will come here and stick here?"

County health authorities:

"Two groups of people make mon this county: doctors and landowners. the doctors have their own obstacles. money is checked off the miners' pay and now the miners are their bosses, was the company who hired them an like the doctors have two masters. It's to serve the patient when to serve properly you may cut into the profits guy who hired you. Or, say a man gets in the mines; it's the doctor who testifi how great his disability is—and how the insurance company should pay hi the insurance company has to pay off lot of accidents, the price of insurance up and the company pays that. The tors here are caught trying to serve masters, in the worst kind of condition course they don't stick. Young ones co here, make enough money to go buy a tice in a better community and move o they buy coal companies. Conditions are trying on the most public-spirited.

NOW! A Delicious NEW Hot Breakfast Cereal!
CREAM OF RICE
SO NUTRITIOUS!
CREAM OF RICE adds three important Vitamins—plus iron—for rich, red blood and better growth!
SO DIGESTIBLE!
MANY DOCTORS recommend Cream of Rice as baby's first cereal food. Cooks to delicate perfection!
SO RICH IN ENERGY!
YES, DELICIOUS Cream of Rice actually gives children more energy than hot wheat or oat cereals!
Specially Designed for children under 12
• Here's a new hot cereal that youngsters love to eat! It's a delicious rice cereal—different from the usual wheat and oat cereals. Has Vitamins B1, B2 and Niacin added - plus iron—for better growth! Easily digestible! Brimful of quick energy! Exciting new flavor! Get Cream of Rice today!
CREAM OF RICE
CHILDREN LOVE IT! READY IN ONLY 5 MINUTES!
ONE OF THE QUALITY FOODS OF GROCERY STORE PRODUCTS CO.

MY CONSCIENCE A

I DO not know whether consciences in general are male or female, but I am positive that mine is a lady, an outsize creature with a strong voice, one who won't take "no" for an answer. She leads me a merry chase at times.

For instance, when I was looking at a picture magazine last winter, Europe's children stared at me from the pages, stark misery in black and white. Then my fat little John Paul crawled across the floor to me. Standing behind him, arms akimbo, aggressive as usual, was My Conscience.

"Well!" she barked. "Quite a contrast there, wouldn't you say?"

I could only nod dumbly.

"Yes, your baby—and their babies. You know how a hungry baby can cry too. You always have the bottle for John Paul. But what would you do if you couldn't get the warm milk to put in his mouth?"

I hung my head.

"What are you going to do about it?" she persisted unmercifully. "Just sit there comfortably and watch your baby get fatter?"

"But what can I do about it?" I wailed. "I don't have any extra money. I'm only one person and there's millions of them. What good would my puny efforts be?"

My Conscience withdrew without a word, giving me, however, a significant look that spoke volumes. So began my project.

In a short time I found an article in the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL giving the names and addresses of many of the foreign-relief agencies. I wrote to several, "May I have the name of a needy family to adopt by mail?"

The Greek War Relief Association in New York assured me that they had many names of individual needy families. I was amazed to find I could sen forty pounds of food and clothing special gift boxes, for the sum of being delivered by their own tr Greece.

My Conscience kept a straig when I asked for and received th of not one, but fifty Greek famili church took five and sent generou of food and clothing. Two womer and the local PTA rallied to th other churches, friends and relat sponded to my plea, and I found had given about thirty names.

Since there were no families li having small children, I picked a at random from the list. I sent letter immediately, and asked, i tally if I might have all their sho Within what seemed a short tim an airmail letter back from Gre big lump formed in my throat as "We knew God would not forsake your letter was absolute proof of

Enclosed in this letter were si fully traced feet on thin paper. Th longed to the six members of th tellis family. There is the father, Ge former major in the Greek in crippled, but active in the Greek tance. The family barely manages on his tiny pension. Then Mothe tellis, who thanked God for my exist her prayers were answered. C please send them a few pieces of wear, since theirs would hardly h gether after all these years of me Marina, 22, the English interpre the family, is an archaeology stud the University of Athens; Michel a law student; George is 18, and Christopher is 12.

It was a distinct pleasure to b shoes, knowing that they would dical conditions used to be a lot worse e and, slow but sure, they're getting ter."

V. MONEY CONDITIONS

Company records for October, 1946, owed that the miners made an average of weekly at Yokum No. 2 (about the same the national average). The 175 miners at kum No. 2 mined 19,000 tons of coal, h no strikes, but a shortage of mine cars, d therefore some layoffs. Few miners bor- ved from the company; none bought War nds through the company.

During that same month, Doctor Lewis eived $333.33 in salary for operating kum No. 2 for the Yokum Creek Coal mpany. (He receives $1000 monthly for erating its three mines.) As a doctor, he ew $262 from the Yokum No. 2 medical nd, although he did no work that month cause he was vacationing in South akota. (From the other miners' medical nds he drew approximately another $1200.) is wife, meanwhile, as half owner of the nd on which Yokum No. 2 stands, drew 50 in royalties, or 5 cents a ton (and about 500 on production at the other two mines which she is part landowner). As chief ockholder in the Yokum Creek Coal Com- ny, Doctor Lewis drew no profits on coal oduction that month: company records owed it cost $2.87 to produce each ton of okum No. 2 coal mined (of this $2.03 went r labor), and net price received at the tipple fter sales commission, but before executive laries were taken out) was $2.93. (Dis- arity between this and current retail prices caused by freight, storage and distribution osts and profits; Yokum sells wholesale and oes not share in these.) A small net profit as made on the company-owned Draper's amp commissary—$90; it represented a gross profit of 10 cents on the dollar, a net of 6 cents. No profits were made on rents: repairs, water-supply costs (two of the five wells were found to be polluted and had to be redrilled) and road upkeep ate up the $540 taken in in rents. Yokum No. 2 is considered a small mine inasmuch as it mines less than 1000 tons daily; its taxable net profit for 1945 was slightly over $7000.

The miners say about money:

"Everybody thinks we make so much money in the mines. Sure, you can make money mining if you're young and healthy, and haven't a lot of kids, and the wife is well, and the company has enough equipment to work you overtime and you haven't been banged up in the mines recently. They say we know how to handle everything but money. I guess we could save a little on food if we took the bus to Harlan—that's seven miles away—and bought at one of the chain stores and lugged enough stuff back for a week. But who's going to do that hard labor? The wife? With all the kids? And what would we save anyhow, with the cost of living the way it is everywhere? It hits us just as hard as it does everyone else. Can you feed and clothe a family of six or seven on $60, $70 a week and save anything? We're not asking the operators any favors when we ask for raises and better conditions and an even break—we just want to live decently. Why don't they open up the land around here and let someone come in that can make a little profit off us in a nice way if they can't do it themselves without ruining us in the bargain?"

The operators say about money:

"Nobody—that goes for the miners too—is making any real profits in the mines these days. Especially the operators. The best

HE GREEKS

By Hylda Mignon Pike

ly. We realized, too, that these prob- were the first they had had in years. I heard the true story of an American ek who scraped together $200 and it to his relatives in Greece, receiving reply: "Thank you so much. We were to buy one pair of shoes with it!"

My Conscience, bless her generous old rt, loved to go to the grocery store me. She pointed out items that were ritious and dehydrated, and would k well. One time I found her standing the cheese counter, looking intently at ve-pound loaf of rich yellow American ese, well paraffined.

"Get that," she ordered. "I'll wager Agritellis family hasn't tasted cheese that for five years!"

"But the price!" I demurred. "I'd itate spending that right now for my n family."

"So what?" she snapped back rudely. Nothing's too good for those folks, and know it. What have you suffered and rificed in this war?"

Completely cowed, I grasped the loaf cheese.

In the second letter from our family was photograph of three tiny dark-eyed bies. Triplets! Michel wrote that they re born in 1942 to a poor Greek work- gman and his wife, "in the time of our eatest hunger." These little waifs are w four, and one of them is sick from lnutrition. Michel pleaded that I do mething for them.

My Conscience patted my shoulder and id, "See here—hungry babies can't ait. It will have to come out of your vn pocket, if necessary, but you must something for those triplets right way." I don't argue with My Con- ience at such times. It isn't worth the fort.

The Greek War Relief Association has food packages in an Athens warehouse which will be delivered immediately anyplace in Greece for $12.75 paid to the New York office (with no profit to the association). These boxes contain thirty-five pounds of the most nourishing kinds of food, including dried milk, and would be just what I would try to send to the triplets. We sent the money immediately. After a week, My Conscience and I breathed easier, knowing that by that time the little triplets and their family had at least a temporary supply of dried milk and other food.

Several letters from Greece came to me recently after I had begun to slow down a bit, as our new baby is due in a few weeks, and we are moving as well. My Conscience silently handed me the letters, and I thought I detected an accusing look.

So amidst packing our belongings, I gathered together two boxes of coats and clothing for a burned-out village and shipped them by freight to New York. My Conscience, of course, was very much in evidence, taking charge in her own positive way, for I had a little struggle about giving up some of the items. Without a word she took them out of my hands and placed them in the boxes.

However, soon I shall be going to the hospital. I am hoping that before I go, I can lure My Conscience aside and let her know, as tactfully and firmly as possible, that I am handing in my resignation as a one-woman relief agency. But I can see her now, sniffing, "That's what you think, dearie. I'll hand it right back to you. You'll get some more letters from Greece, and read them to the ladies in the maternity ward—and then you'll be getting them to send boxes when they get home!"

Slave driver!

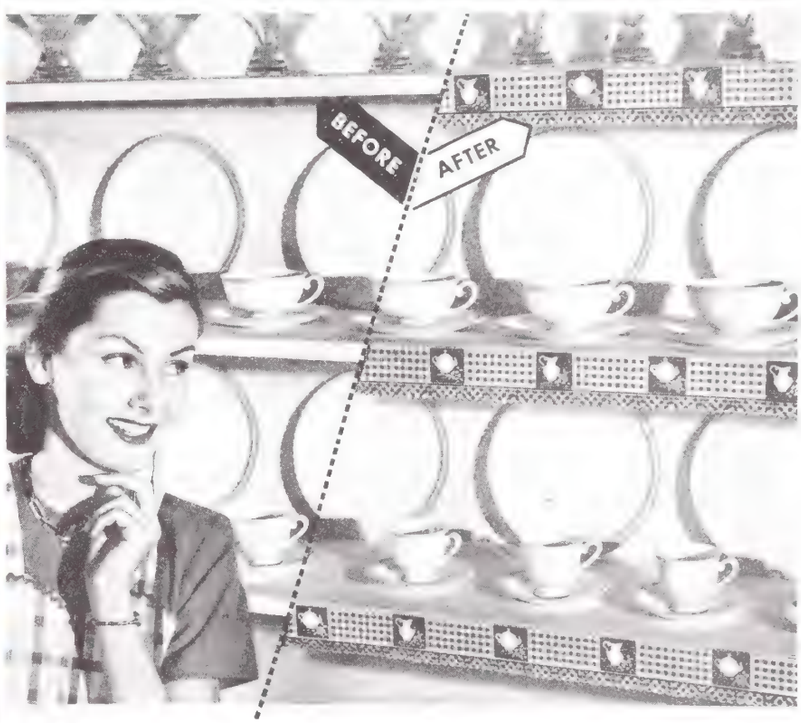
"Guess where I got my idea for this Easter Buffet?"

...from the gay, festive Daisy Garland pattern of my newest Bucilla linen cotton set. Of course. Nothing but Easter table decorations most expressive table linens.

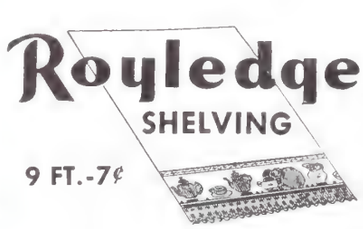
And what more could a girl ask for than luxurious quality, pure linen handprinted in sparkling daisy yellow, primrose gold or green, blue and a soft shade grey besides.

Daisy Garland is just one of Bucilla's exquisite table linens of cotton and linen, ready to make, or made and ready to use. Bucilla linens are guaranteed to make the lightful pleasure. Ask for Bucilla at the linen counter of your favorite store.

OTHER FAMOUS BUCILLA PRODUCTS: Embroidery Flosses, Knitting Yarns, Stamped Goods, Crochet Cottons



Kitchen Transformed in 5 minutes!



That drab, bare-shelf look vanishes, you put a colorful "smile" on your kitchen instantly—with Royledge. It is edging and paper shelving all-in-one—simply fold down edge. Only Royledge has durable double-edge; such wide choice of colors, patterns. Less than a penny a day to change pattern monthly! Ask for Royledge at 5-and-10, naborhood, hardware, dept. stores.

I'll send you NEW COMFORT today!

Tired of "monthly" bother? Had enough of old-fashioned belts and pads? Been disappointed in other methods? You will certainly welcome Meds perfected internal protection —invisible in use!

- Meds have the famous "Safety-Well" for your extra protection.
- Meds are made of fine cotton—soft and absorbent for extra comfort.
- Meds expand gently, mostly side to side, adjusting to individual needs without back pressure.
- Meds applicators are dainty and efficient, firm, smooth, completely disposable.

Meds are made in two sizes: De Luxe with super absorbency; and Slender—the new, easy-to-insert size that brings you undreamed-of comfort with the REGULAR absorbency most mature women need.

Do send today for your introductory package of these new Slender Meds—so "next time" you, too, can enjoy this wonderful new comfort!

De Luxe MEDS with SUPER absorbency for greater need

Slender MEDS with REGULAR absorbency and extra ease-of-use (in light blue box)

29¢ for 10 in applicators

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Meds are made by [illegible] Products [illegible] of Modess) and [illegible] for [illegible] by the [illegible] American [illegible] Association and in Good Housekeeping.

Martha Steele LHJ-3
Personal Products Corporation
Milltown New Jersey

Dear Martha Steele: I want to try the new Slender Meds. Please send me, in plain wrapper, the introductory package of 3 for which I enclose 10¢ (stamps or coin) to cover mailing cost.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

money is in the land ownership; coal landowners get 10 cents a ton for each ton of coal mined on their land, rain or shine, good business or bad. Steel companies that operate their own coal mines make out better than mines like mine, that produce for domestic use. A steel plant takes the loss in coal profits out in the price of steel. They can afford better machinery, a better operation all round that way. I made my money on my brains. They thought this mine was worked out back in 1938 when it wasn't producing industrial coal, and I bought it. I bought it because I knew there was good stoker coal here—I knew it because I'd used it and had it tested. Can't remember what I paid for these mines. Bought 'em a little here, a little there. That's brains—and a man has got a right to make a profit on his brains. I get a comfortable living off these mines now, but not much more. I got two race horses, a nice house, a car or two, a swimming pool and three grown kids and some grandchildren. I don't know what the answer is to the mix-up the coal industry is in. Except a depression. A depression would bring wages down and the price of coal down—it's too high, competitively speaking, right now. I don't believe the coal industry is a wasting, sick industry like my superintendent says it is; Yokum No. 2 is good for 40 years' more production and the country is always going to need coal. The Government would think a long time before ruining the coal industry with atomic energy or anything else. What am I worth? I don't know—but there's $1,000,000 tied up in those three mines of mine."

The civic leaders talk about money:

"There's a lot of money in Harlan County, but little of it stays here. It's the second richest county in the state—and one of the ten greatest coal-producing counties in the country. In Kentucky, Jefferson County is the richest county. That's the horse country. And, I swear, the horses see more of the local money than most of the miners do here. Take our Community Chest goal—it was $500,000. And we've got probably six or seven millionaires here—not to mention the absentee landowners who take money out of the county without ever setting foot on the land they own. Lack of civic pride here, I guess, or interest. The Salvation Army does a good job here; but by and large, there aren't many working organizations. Mountain people stick to themselves a lot; and then, too, we're Southern here, you know, and we don't get that whoopdedo feeling about making every little old place the best little place in the U.S.A. like you get up North. We kind of like to live and let live here."

My experience has been that the time to test a true gentleman is to observe him when he is in contact with individuals of a race that is less fortunate than his own.

—BOOKER T. WASHINGTON: Up From Slavery. (Doubleday & Company, Inc.)

VI. SAFETY CONDITIONS

In October, 1946, according to Bureau of Mine statistics, accidents in soft-coal mines killed 75 men. This meant that for every million tons of soft coal mined, 1.3 men died. Fourteen of the men killed were killed in Kentucky, but none were at Yokum No. 2. All told, from January through October, 641 men were killed throughout the nation in soft-coal-mine accidents, and another 786 in hard-coal mines: a total of 1409. The principal cause of accidents was falling mine walls and mine roofs. The number of men injured during 1945 was 47,750 miners—or one out of every eight.

A national safety code was included in coal-mine contracts for the first time in 1945, dealing largely with basic provisions. Each mine is required to have a safety committee composed of three miners, who report to the foreman or superintendent who is responsible for safety conditions; complaints can be carried directly from the miners to the Government now; but it was not until 1940 that Bureau of Mines inspectors were allowed in any mine without the consent of the operator. In 1941, Congress made periodic inspections mandatory; but because there were only 157 inspectors for the country b March 1945, only 2500 of the country's ap proximately 7000 mines had been inspected It is estimated that only 500 to 700 of th 2200 mines in Kentucky were inspected b the state during 1945.

Workmen's compensation is not require for miners by national law; it is required b Kentucky state law. Minimum compensa tion for death is $7500; for total disability $9000. Many veteran-miners now hol Government-life-insurance policies of $10, 000; previously death rates on miners mad private insurance premiums too expensive.

No safety complaints have been mad against Yokum No. 2 recently; its compensa tion-coverage fee—based on its acciden rate—is one of the lowest in Harlan County Three men have been killed there in the pas eight years: two were electrocuted by liv wires; one killed in a hauling operation.

What the miners say about safety:

"A mine's a pretty safe place and a miner just likes to get killed—that's what the operators say. Why, the law just provides minimum protection, and half the mines don't comply with the law. Like live wires: the law says they should either be six feet above car tracks, or guarded adequately. Inside a mine where the coal seam runs thirty-four inches high, you don't drill a special slot for the live wire—you stick it up as far out of the way as it can get. That's about a foot above you when you're on your hands and knees. Got to keep your head down, Fritzy boy. Sure, you get used to it, if you don't get killed. Or take the roofs falling: first you dig out the space, then you put the timber prop in to hold it up. A roof doesn't wait until you get the timber if it has a mind to fall. And sometimes the timber isn't too strong—the law says it must be of good quality. What's that? Only an inspector knows. Sure, we could call in the inspectors a lot more times than we do—but we get kind of defeated. Some of these mines haven't been inspected around here in years. And when they are inspected, what happens? The Government asks them if they'll make some improvements. Like at Four Mile—the inspectors said it had too much gas in it eleven months before it blew up and killed twenty-one men. What we need is a safety law with teeth in it—but we'll never get it so long as these dollar-crazy operators run this state. We're not the only ones who worry about money—and our worry is to try to get some, not to hang on to a fat bank roll at someone else's expense. And as for compensation: suppose you could never work again and you had to support your family the rest of your life on $9000. Work out a budget for that, will you?"

What the operators say about safety:

"Everybody blames the coal operators for all the accidents in the mines. But the miners have a responsibility too. In the first place, they run the mine safety committee; if they don't think a mine is safe, they can demand a change. Second, a lot of miners make their own accidents. I'm not going to defend Four Mile, but I just want to ask one question; sure that mine was gaseous, but who set off the explosion? A miner who tamped in an explosive; and any miner with any sense knows you don't tamp in an explosive unless you want it to explode on you. Then take the hauling accident we had here: the miner just walked off the top of the coal cars and fell under the wheels. Maybe did it on purpose. Nobody pushed him, that's sure. Nothing hit him. And take these roof accidents—half the time a miner doesn't take the trouble to put up the proper timbers to keep the place from caving in while he's shoveling out the coal. He's in a hurry. Wants to make more money. So he takes some risks. Just like the compensation law: they get good compensation, but they're al-

(Continued on Page 260)

BY THE MAKERS OF STARDUST FASHION-WEAR

CHANCE FOR FAME . . . Pictured is lovely Smith, winner of the last Stardust ty Contest, now a Walter Thornton Pin- irl. Enter our 1947 Contest now, YOU be the lucky winner of $500 first prize or ther awards! Just send recent non-re- able photo, with height, weight, bust, t and hip measurements before May 31, 1947. Decisions of famous ity judges are final. Mail entry to P. O. Box 65, Station F, N. Y.

Friends PAY YOU for Calling on Them

Sell EVERYDAY GREETING CARDS

AKE MONEY FAST

ke easy orders from friends, others— gorgeous new greeting cards. Year nder-sellers. Smart designs, entwer- upanese & ribbon—other boxes. Some 1 ear 1s for $1. Make up to 100% profit end for Samples NOW

t started making money quick. Lat or are time. Easy to get samples. Write day for FREE details of MONEY- AKING Sample Offer. ACT NOW!

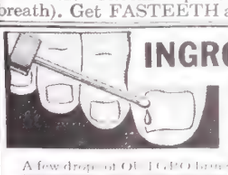
ETMORE & SUGDEN, INC., Dept. 21-Y 49 Monroe Ave., Rochester 2, N. Y.

ALL BIG MONEY-MAKERS FOR YOU

FALSE TEETH

That Loosen Need Not Embarrass

Many wearers of false teeth have suffered eal embarrassment because their plate dropped, slipped or wabbled at just the wrong time. Do not live in fear of this happening to you. Just sprinkle a little FASTEETH, the alkaline (non-acid) powder, on your plates. Holds false teeth more firmly, so they feel more comfortable. Does not sour. Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH at any drug store.



INGROWN NAIL Hurting You?

Immediate Relief!

A few drops of OUTGRO [illegible] tormenting part of nail [illegible] to loosen and [illegible] comfort. OUTGRO is available at all drug counters.

Whitehall Pharmacal Company, New York 16, N.Y.

WOMEN OVER 35— MAKE BIG MONEY!

BLUEBIRD CARDS for Birthdays, Get Well, Anniversaries, Gifts, Baby, Sympathy, Notes

NO EXPERIENCE NEEDED

[illegible] Cards, Stationery, Gift [illegible] ples on approval. If friends don't [illegible] up, return at our expense. BLUEBIRD STUDIOS, Dept. J-23, Fitchburg, Mass.

"I kin raise every vegetable goin'. Used to work on my dad's farm after he quit the mines. How'd you like thet?" he asked Alice. "I don't want any of my kids murdered up in the mines," he continued vehemently.

"I hate the mines," volunteered Pood.

"It's nasty here," said little Mary Frances.

Alice's customary expression of gentle resignation didn't change. She gazed out the back door at the pigs and the rutted dirt road heaped with garbage. The wind was blowing straight from the privies.

"Mebbe," she answered quietly. "I never lived anywhar 'ceptin' near a mine."

THE END

AFTERMATH

(Continued from Page 11)

necessary implements in the utility room, I noticed that the open bowl into which waste is emptied needed flushing, and pressed the lever. To my horror it quickly overflowed and a rapidly growing pool formed on the floor. I rushed for help, found one of the PW's who, rather superfluously, said, "Kaputt," and saved the situation.

Slightly shaken by this inauspicious beginning, I approached my patient, who was withdrawn far into his own world of misery. He had a recent amputation, above the knee, oozing matter, and absolutely refused to be touched in any way. Later in the morning, with a little cajoling, he became more cheerful, shaved himself and let me bathe him, though every move seemed agony. I believe they considered him neurotic, which perhaps he was, but he was a type I often met later—men whose wounds were grave, who seemed to have come to the end of their nervous endurance. They stood out in sharp relief from most boys, whose patience and cheerfulness were incredible.

Lunchtime came around 11:30. There were a few boys who had to be fed. One Negro soldier was blind, but he ate with appetite, and I thought the meal was going along pleasantly and conversationally when the radio came out with that old song, "You must have been a beautiful baby, but, baby, look at you now." I felt myself getting scarlet.

In the center division of the ward, with empty beds on either side of him, one of the biggest boys I have ever seen was lying face downward. He was encased up to his armpits and to his toes in a plaster cast, legs wide apart and connected by a piece of wood. All you could see of his body was a huge, bare, muscled pair of shoulders and a blond head, with an unusually handsome, wide-eyed face. I stopped to chat and to do little things for him during the day. He came from Georgia and was a most likable fellow to talk to. We got on the subject of bird shooting in his part of the country.

"Do you like huntin'? You and me ought to get together someday."

Later I was aghast, on suggesting that I get someone to help me turn him, to have him laugh and say, "You can't hurt me. Just pick me up and turn me over." I had never had anything to do with casts, and he must have weighed 200 pounds but, to my surprise, by taking hold of the piece of wood which held his legs apart, making a stupendous effort, and by his doing superhuman things with his arms and shoulders which left him gasping, we did manage it.

He was in the tanks, had been through the campaign since D Day, and was wounded almost at the end of it, deep in German territory. He was dying to talk about the progress of the tanks and details of the battles, and had an illustrated book about his division which he wanted to show me, but I hadn't time to sit and talk. At the end of the afternoon I was really tired and there was some reason to get home which I have now forgotten. But I have not forgotten the disappointment in that boy's face when he said, "Oh, don't run off!" A nurse in the room said kindly, "I'll be around," and I did go—but we had established a mutually sympathetic,

(Continued on Page 263)

BUTTONS WING IN FOR SPRING!

B.G.E. Originales give wings to your imagination and lend enchantment to your new spring clothes! In these seven beauties, splendor is interpreted in lustrous metals; elegance in hand-twisted plastics; gaiety in debonair fruits and floral patterns. Glorious colors in an array of sizes. Designed with originality and crafted with care. See the entire B.G.E. spring button pageant at your favorite fine store.

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

B·G·E Originales

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

"Buttons, buckles and clips in original designs"

Look what they're wearing in Florida (POOR THINGS!)

The Wrapped-and-Bound Look comes not from Paris, but from shrinkage... an evil that's practically medieval nowadays. Never happens with dresses tagged "Sanforized." No wonder they're the only cotton dresses a smart girl ever buys.

SOME skirts are short—on washing, not on purpose! Such a shrinkage outrage shouldn't happen to anybody nowadays. Hey, young lady, write 100 times: "I'll demand a 'Sanforized' label on every—but every—cotton dress!"

The Straight-and-Narrow. That's how the dress turned out after washing. Not like our friend inside it—who's kept her curves. Which adds up to a sorry way to spend a vacation. Better remember to spend your vacation in dresses tagged "Sanforized"—that fit in the first place, and the second, and the third!

The style will never shrink away if your dress has a "Sanforized" label.

•SANFORIZED•

REG U.S. PAT. OFF.

Fabric Shrinkage less than 1% by the Government's Standard Test

"Sanforized": Checked standard of shrinkage. The "Sanforized" trade-mark is used on compressive pre-shrunk fabrics only when tests for residual shrinkage are regularly checked, through the service of the owners of the trade-mark, to insure maintenance of its established standard by users of the mark. Cluett, Peabody & Co., Inc.

(Continued from Page 261)

oken contact. It still bothers me that I 't stay. The next day he was gone.

eutenant B. was one of the pleasantest hardest-working Army nurses, but I s she might have warned me by a glance n she said, "Good morning. Will you se go in and bathe the patient in the bed ween the two windows?"

stood in the door holding a basin, and ed. A mosquito netting hung from the ng, covering the head and shoulders of— od! Could it be a man? When I said to elf firmly, "It is a man. Think of him minute as a person—find out his first ne and use it," the panic subsided and I ked across the ward to him.

lis head and face were entirely covered by hite, jersey-knit fabric which looked solid lerneath and followed no familiar con- rs. (The technical name, I think, is a ssure bandage.) The effect was more that in eggplant shape resting on the pillows, top of a body in a sitting position. There s a small opening ere the nose would ve been, and a nar- v slit below it. The es, obviously, were nexistent. Both nds were spread t on the sheet, ndaged like box- g gloves, as were s feet. Everything rrounding him was ean and white, but es were thick on the tting and a sickly, veetish smell was l-pervading. His ms and legs were ke matchsticks, and s body, bandaged bout the waist, was naciated.

His first name was Will. He was twenty ears old. He had een burned by tar. a doctor who hanged the dressings he day before said hat he had cared for he victims of the Cocoanut Grove fire n Boston, but this was worse than any case he saw there.

If you put your ear close to his head, his words could be distinguished, but he was weak and spoke only when necessary. He could drink liquids through a straw when it was inserted in the slit. At the end of three minutes at the side of this man you realized that he was brave, courteous, co-operative and likable.

About this time in the morning, Mrs. Brown appeared. She was a nurse's aide, a jaunty, upholstered little lady. Her talk flowed freely with something of Ed Wynn's lisp and intonation; its content good sense, love for her fellow man, expressed in terms of great sentimentality, and boundless animal spirits. Mrs. Brown had cared for Will on a previous day, and she made the space around his bed like a mother's serene and ordered domain.

As we walked to the mess hall for lunch, we talked about Will. It seemed apparent that he would not live long, but Mrs. Brown's chief concern was that he had not communicated with his mother, whose only son he was, nor did he plan to. This was the reaction of many badly wounded soldiers.

"If it was my son, I'd certainly want to know!" declared Mrs. Brown indignantly and stoutly. "I said to Will, 'Why, land's sakes, what's a mother for? A mother feels'"

After lunch she suggested reading aloud, and settled down on the little iron chair by his bed, spreading her starched skirts about her. I could hear her animated, kind voice rising and falling, pronouncing the words with verve and decision.

A little later, Will made a slight motion with a bandaged hand and said, as she bent over him:

"Mrs. Brown, I want to send word to my mother."

MANY planes were arriving from overseas that afternoon. I waited on the steps outside the ward until the khaki-colored ambulances, with big red crosses painted on sides, backs and tops, many driven by Motor Corps women, rolled by and came to a stop. The ward to which I had been assigned was an enormous one, just one long room with a normal capacity of forty or fifty men. Cots had also been arranged in a line down the center aisle.

The boys began to stream in. It was an extraordinary scene of confusion and gaiety, in spite of the somber note of its occasion. Even the boys on stretchers, who would later lie back exhausted, were excited and lighthearted, recognizing friends, calling out greetings as they were carried by: "Hi, Smitty!"... "Hi, boy! Maybe you came on the same plane I did, last week—little blond nurse?" The radio played Rum and Coca-Cola. The ward rang with voices. They all seemed so happy to be home, except one boy who had been run over by a truck and was despondent and in pain. Fresh milk was the biggest treat.

As I bathed a handsome young man from Chicago, he described landing in Newfoundland, where they broke the trip, and the thrill it was to him to see a young girl on the field waving:

"It was just wonderful to see her there—the first one. And what she had on—blue jeans, a sweater and sneakers. She looked nice, and so—so American!"

The simplicity of the relationship with patients was an appealing part of working as a nurse's aide. The men were amazingly considerate and responsive and, in retrospect, their self-mastery appears even more admirable than at the time. Particularly in Ward 5 was this noticeable. The patients often were not sick in the accepted sense of the term. The effects of orthopedic injuries, and their remedies are usually of long duration, and crucial moments, such as when casts are finally removed, are heavy with suspense and possible disappointment. Physical privacy couldn't be, for beds were scarcely separated by the width of small, folding tables. There may have existed between their occupants dislike, indifference or, what is almost worse in moments of emotional stress, deep intimacy. Every man, in varying degree, was a human being in a really tough spot. With no physical screen to veil even a change in mood, you could not help but see him in and out of high spirits, rising to an occasion, or sinking after it was over.

In spite of this, to an extraordinary degree, these people made emotional privacy possible for one another. When it was needed, a man s

For an Old Family Servant

By Joseph Auslander

Once, in a voice that trembled with emotion,
Speaking of love, you talked of
your old nurse,
The glory of whose long and deep devotion
Deserves a nobler homage than this verse.
Let Mary win the poet's April
praise;
I sing of Martha's dear autumnal
beauty,
The good and faithful servant all
her days,
Whose whole life was a selfless hymn to duty.

You told how, when this grand old lady died,
As she lay white and quiet in her coffin,
Your father said—and here you broke and cried—
"Lift her up, son; she carried you so often!"
Proudly you bore upon your back that day
The weight of love that passes not away.

GET THAT Sealy FEELING

"LIKE SLEEPING ON A CLOUD"

SLEEP ON A Sealy MATTRESS

Gently . . . easily . . . slip off to sleep on a Sealy mattress. Enjoy healthful, refreshing sleep on a

Sealy Air-Woven Tuftless Mattress
Sealy Innerspring Mattress

Choose either of these fine mattresses for that supremely soothing Sealy feeling.

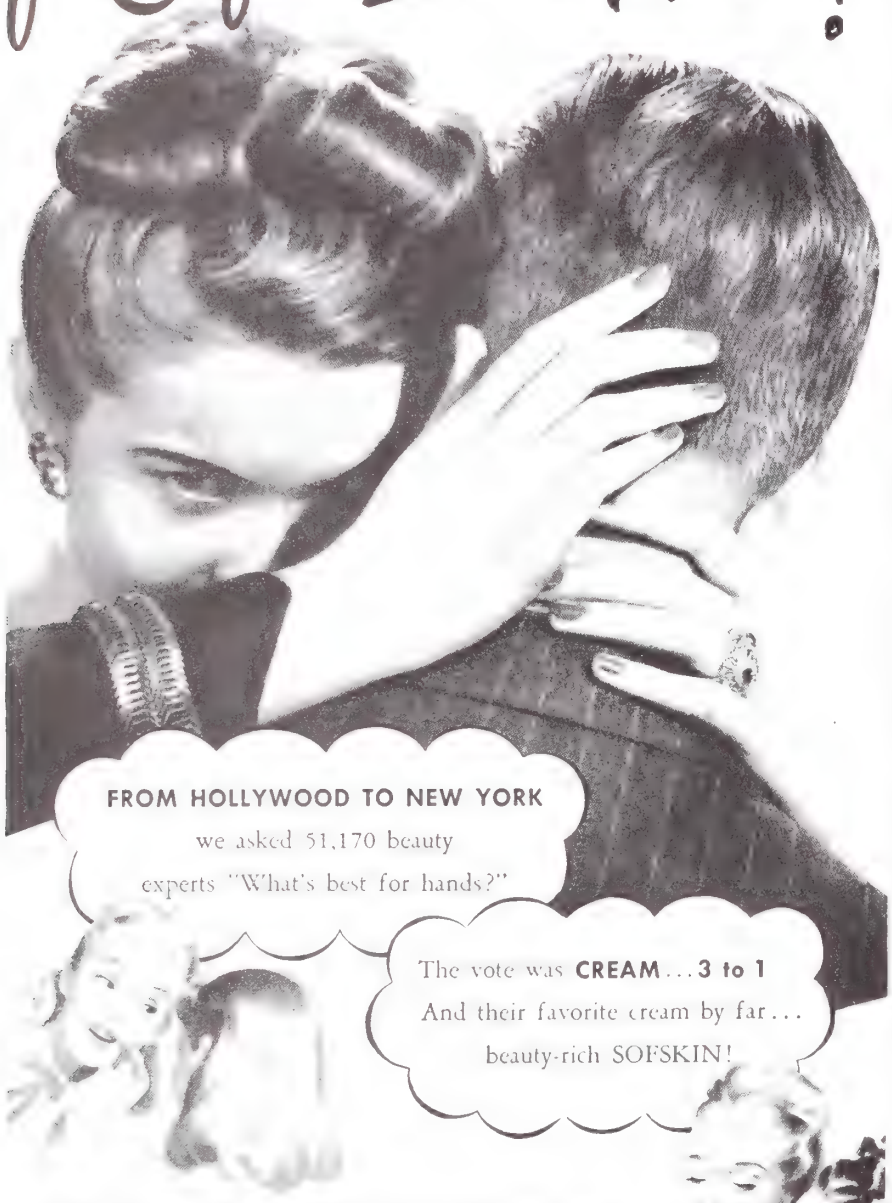
Sealy Innerspring and Sealy Tuftless Mattresses are now available at your dealer's.

Sealy INC.

666 Lake Shore Drive Chicago 11, Illinois

Beauty Experts Tell Secret

for Softer, Lovelier Hands!



FROM HOLLYWOOD TO NEW YORK
we asked 51,170 beauty
experts "What's best for hands?"

The vote was CREAM...3 to 1
And their favorite cream by far...
beauty-rich SOFSKIN!

Take This Beauty Tip from the Experts

For extra loveliness...for more romantic appeal...give your hands this care that beauty experts recommend: Massage with SOFSKIN!

You'll thrill to the wonderful improvement that comes after your very first Sofskin beauty treatment.

SEE how much whiter, younger your hands look!

FEEL how much softer, smoother they are. Not greasy...not sticky!

HERE'S THE SECRET: Sofskin's special Mollescent Action works right into surface skin where it conditions and beautifies. Try it! Get Sofskin today at drug and cosmetic counters.

No matter what hand cream or lotion you've ever tried, just wait until you use Sofskin!

CREME

for lovelier hands and skin

neighbors seemed tacitly to understand and so to absent themselves from him in spirit that he was almost literally not in the next bed. It was hard to say how they accomplished this—certainly not by lowering their voices or modifying their occupations—but, however they did it, it was deliberately and skillfully done.

Johnny Papasideros, a lightly built, charming boy of twenty, with dark eyes in a mobile, humorous face, occupied the second bed on the left, as you entered the ward. He was nearing the end of his two-months period in a cast reaching to his chest and covering one leg, which was also in traction. He could not turn or change his position, but could raise his shoulders by means of a trapeze hung over his head.

Two beds away from him dwelt Pfc. Land, a kindly sparrow of a man. For weeks his thin leg, pierced at the ankle by a pin, elevated to a forty-degree angle, had also been in traction. The two had a protective feeling about each other. Land's pin was removed, the traction released, but he had pain and a setback a night or two later. Next morning, while bathing Johnny, I missed the usual chat between them. In fact, Land lay still, face averted.

JOHNNY whispered, "Don't talk to him now. He's discouraged. It's awful hard for him. You see—he's old."

The day came when Johnny was carried out of the ward to have his cast removed, a physical ordeal in itself. When they brought him back, his face was radiant and he lay back on the pillows, quietly happy. "There's a swelling up here, but it doesn't hurt," he said, pointing to a large lump high up on his thigh. Two doctors came, felt it, looked at it appraisingly and left, but his beatific smile remained.

On my next day in Ward 5, a week later, Johnny was getting about in a wheel chair, his face still illuminated as if a candle were lighted behind his eyes. He beamed when I congratulated him on the end of two months in one position. "It wasn't long," he said.

The ward came to life that morning in a particularly happy mood. The hour stands out in memory as an example of daily routine transformed into something spontaneous and lighthearted.

Everyone had got out of bed on the right side. Any remark sounded funny and was greeted with giggles, the easy, resilient laughter of youth.

The boy I was bathing looked ruefully at his feet and said, "I got such great big mudmashers!"

"I'm in your way," I apologized to a soldier named Tex who was emptying paper bags and cleaning the tables.

"Well, being as you're helpin', reckon you can stand where you've a mind to," he replied graciously.

Johnny Papasideros, for some reason draped only in a sheet, manipulated his wheel chair down the aisle into a graceful, sweeping waltz. As the music changed to a quick march, he made a perfect landing at his bed, swinging nimbly onto it with the support of arms and one leg, and triumphantly singing the last line of the chorus, "I'm nuts about the good old U.S.A."

In midafternoon, returning from an errand in another ward, I was immediately struck with a sense of something amiss, though all was quiet and a number of men were taking their usual siestas. I had not far to look—no farther than the second bed on the left, with its overhead wooden frame. Little Papasideros lay there, so still, so flat he scarcely raised the sheet, dark eyes enormous in a face from which the incandescent light had been extinguished. The doctor had been talking to him, I gleaned from Land. It was one of those times when a man was allowed seclusion, unbroken until he himself emerged from it. Half an hour later he was again in his wheel chair, subdued but composed.

"I'm going to be moved from here," he told me, "to a hospital farther south, for more treatment on account of this swelling in my leg."

with the patented
INNER-CONTROL
Skillful designing and quality fabrics combine to enhance your figure and give you the heavenly feeling of freedom from restraint. There is a Starlight Bra for every figure type including long line and teen age. Also wired bras with detachable strap.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
SATISFACTORY OR REFUND OF MONEY
IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

At leading stores everywhere

L. & W. BRASSIERE CO., NEW YORK 10

EASY MONEY FOR You!

YOU'LL earn money . . . yes, even if you've never tried it before . . .

Because people want to buy! Never has there been a greater demand for good reading . . . never have folks been so eager to subscribe for magazines. They have the money . . . they want to buy! All you need to do is make the calls.

Join our Subscription Staff now! We'll give the help you need . . . furnish supplies without cost. Spend a penny for a postal giving your name and address and we'll do the rest. Mail that card TODAY to

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
Box 672, Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

MAKE EXTRA MONEY EASY WITH GORGEOUS Everyday GREETING CARDS

WOMEN! Turn your spare time into cash—easy—visiting friends and neighbors and taking orders for thrilling new Wallace Brown Everyday Greeting Cards! Magnificent Assortment of 16 large gorgeous Cards for All Occasions — Birthday, Get-Well, Baby-Birth, Friendship, Sympathy, Anniversary—only $1.00. Your profit up to 50¢! Sells on sight everywhere! Your earnings soar with 9 other wonder-value Assortments—Gift-Wrapping, Easter, Humorous, Floral Stationery, Personal Notes—all fast-sellers, big profit-makers. Also Name-Imprinted Stationery. Start making money now—Write today for samples on approval.

SEND FOR SAMPLES

WALLACE BROWN, INC.
225 Fifth Ave., Dept. M-9, New York 10, N.Y.

SELL FAMOUS SUNSHINE "EVERYDAY" CARDS

1947 CREATIONS NOW READY
Take orders for them from friends, neighbors, for AMERICA'S MOST BEAUTIFUL EVERYDAY ASSORTMENT, 14 folders. Costs 50¢. Sells for $1.

SUNSHINE 21 NOTES—A LEADER
Exclusive! Lucky! Appealing! The fastest selling note box in the U.S.A. Costs 50¢. Sell for $1

21 Sunshine Folders for Birthdays, Get-Wells
Entirely new idea. Never before offered. Charming, cute folders. Very popular. Costs 50¢. Sell for $1. Also BIRTHDAYS, CONVALESCENT, GIFT WRAPS, ECONOMY NOTES. SAMPLES ON APPROVAL. WRITE TODAY.

SUNSHINE ART STUDIOS, DEPT. LE-3, 115 FULTON ST., NEW YORK 8, N. Y.

EARN MONEY EASILY

Start your own profitable BUSINESS

MAKE AND SELL Costume Jewelry

Send today for our Free Book "How to Make Costume Jewelry." Includes complete instructions, colorful pictures and all information to start your own profitable business—at home. Write Today—It's FREE.

FREE BOOK VALUE 50¢

ZANONE'S, 434 S. Dearborn St., Dept. 31 Chicago 5, Ill.

Embroider 7 Pc. BEDROOM SET PILLOWCASES
2 SCARFS
3 pc. VANITY
7 PCS. ALL FOR
$2.98 POST PAID
EMBROIDERY THREAD 35c EXTRA

Real Bargains

you've been waiting for! A ely addition to your bedroom! ickly embroider the lazy daisy al design of this exquisite, 7 piece, tching Bedroom Set. Consists of 42 in. Pillowcases, 1 Scarf 16x40 , 1 Scarf 16x32 in. and a 3 pc. Vanity t, flat stamped on white, fine ality sheeting. All 7 pieces just .98 postpaid. Embroidery thread for t 35c. Be sure to order by No. 873.

REDERICK HERRSCHNER CO.
33 S. WABASH AVE., CHICAGO 3, ILL.

MIGHTY FAST RELIEF for coughs of
TIGHT ACHING CHEST COLDS
And so long-lasting, too!

At the first sign of a chest cold—rub on good old reliable Musterole. It instantly starts to relieve coughs and tight soreness in chest muscles. You can actually feel it work!

Then Musterole helps break up the painful surface congestion and actually checks the irritation.

Musterole offers ALL the advantages of a warming, stimulating mustard plaster yet is so much easier to apply. Just rub it on. In 3 Strengths.

MUSTEROLE

SOFT CORNS Between Toes

INSTANTLY Relieved, QUICKLY Removed

Soft Corns occur only between the toes. To instantly relieve and speedily remove them, use Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads in the special size and shape for Soft Corns (Soft Corn Size). Be sure to ask for them by that name. Sold everywhere.

Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

Amazing New Plan!
DRESS for YOU
FOR ORDERING 3 !

FREE SAMPLES! Write for big Style Presentation, showing over 100 of latest fashions, actual cloth samples, etc. No money needed. Don't miss this opportunity to get your own dress and make money besides. Write today. Harford Frocks, Inc., Dept. S-9012, Cincinnati 25, Ohio

EARN MONEY with Everyday Cards

Easy to Sell $1.00 Assortments

Your friends will be thrilled by these lovely greetings for Birthdays, Anniversaries, etc. 11 gorgeous folders in each box. YOU MAKE BIG CASH PROFIT! Gift Wrappings, tablets, many other best sellers. Write today for 14-card Sample sent on approval.

CHAS. C. SCHWER CO., 165 Elm, Dept. C-16, Westfield, Mass.

YARN BUY DIRECT SAVE MONEY

Knitting

BARTLETT YARN MILLS, Box R, Harmony, Maine.

It was easy to be enthusiastic about this hospital, where many of the best Army medical brains are gathered, and by evening he himself appeared pleased at the move. I wonder, now, just what it was that the doctor said.

Again a week passed before I returned to Ward 5. Johnny had left, knowing as he did so that the purpose of his journey was an amputation.

I stepped past the four tousled, sleeping figures on the porch, and entered the main body of the ward with its two parallel rows of beds. Some patients were eating breakfast from trays, to the tune of the ever-present radio, others were sound asleep. Sue Dykman, always the earliest nurses' aide on duty, might be in full swing of bathing a patient. As far as the men in Ward 1 were concerned, she was the presiding deity. They called her Aunt Sue, and reacted with spontaneous affection to her touch of genius in dealing with people.

Nothing in our training remotely suggested some of the duties in this ward, and after watching her for a day I felt as if I had lived a decade during those hours. This morning she had started on the sickest patient. As this requires one or two helpers, I faced her across the bed, unable to believe the sickening reality of a fragile boy who lay between us. He was a typical cord-bladder case, or paraplegic, in which Ward 1 specialized. These patients have suffered an injury which has damaged or severed the spinal cord, resulting in paralysis below where the injury occurred.

Every bone in this boy's body seemed visible. A wound where a bullet had entered drained on his side; a long scar on his spine showed the mark of stitches; any motion of his left arm and shoulder was painful, and he was paralyzed from the waist down. The dressings had been removed from his abdomen, revealing a small, round incision from which protruded a length of rubber tubing which drained the contents of his bladder into a bottle attached to the side of the bed. The bladder is irrigated several times a day by pumping in and drawing out an antiseptic solution through the tubing. There is no control over the bowels. A bath towel, pinned around his loins, held in place the dressings on lower spine and hips. The final indignity of what lay beneath these dressings was so frightful that, though it became a common sight, one never became used to it. On each hip and at the base of the spine were bedsores, larger in circumference than both your hands could span, festering open ulcers, and deep, deep. Actually the spinal cord could be clearly seen. These sores seemed to cover every bit of flesh which was not otherwise injured. On a slight frame, wasted almost to a skeleton, this area produced an even more ghastly effect than on a larger, fleshier man.

Statuesque and serene, Sue stood at the bedside, her right hand holding tweezers, selecting, with easy skill, materials from a dressing cart loaded with bottles and sterile supplies.

Nothing written on the wide, unclouded brow or in her quips with a boy of nineteen who lay in the next bed betrayed the urgency of her occupation or her concentration upon it. She gave the impression that here was a situation fully in hand, being dealt with methodically and cheerfully. This was important for the well-being of the other patients, who almost took part in

Tea in the East is not the simple unadorned drink the West knows. In Korea it is served to the guest with raw eggs. The eggs are sucked between sips of tea. In Burma they dote on pickled tea—prepared as a salad by being soaked in oil, with garlic and sometimes dried fish added. Moroccans prefer tea steeped with mint leaves, while the Tibetans add to the brew a big spoonful of yak butter.
—L. SIAN-TEK.

Are you in the know?

If you're higher than your squire, should you—

☐ Wait for a taller date
☐ Come down to earth
☐ Play stooper-woman

What if he isn't tall and terrific? A short beau in tow is worth ten highboys on the loose. Come down to earth: avoid towering hats . . . swap spike heels for new, smart flats! No need to stoop. Even at "those" times, your bearing can be poised and proud, because with the help of Kotex, no telltale outlines show. Those flat pressed ends of Kotex prevent revealing outlines . . . send your confidence soaring!

Could she look trim as a bellhop, by—

☐ Steaming in a Turkish bath
☐ Dusk-to-dawn jitterbugging
☐ Wearing a girdle

Now there's the "bellhop look" she'd like! A girdle will help. The kind that belittles her waist, straightens that slump. Girdles are made so cleverly nowadays, you scarcely know you're wearing them. Like Kotex . . . and Kotex belts. For Kotex is made with lasting softness . . . made to stay soft while you wear it. And that adjustable Kotex Wonderform Belt fits so comfortably, smoothly (it's elastic) . . . lets you bend freely without binding.

When he admires your dress, do you say

☐ "Really? This old sack?"
☐ "Are you kidding?"
☐ "Thank you"

Some gals imagine they must shrug off a compliment. Why embarrass a fellow? When he tosses a bouquet your way—sweetly say, "Thank you." Giving out with the right answers is a mark of poise. It's smooth, too (at certain times) to know the right answer to your sanitary protection needs. Kotex—naturally! Because you get extra protection with that exclusive safety center of Kotex. And remember, every Kotex napkin contains a deodorant.

More women choose KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins

*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

A DEODORANT IN EVERY KOTEX NAPKIN AT NO EXTRA COST

"Soaping" dulls hair—
Halo glorifies it!

Yes, even finest soaps and soap shampoos hide the natural lustre of your hair with dulling soap film

- Halo contains no soap. Made with a new patented ingredient it cannot leave dulling soap film!
- Halo reveals the true natural beauty of your hair the very first time you use it, leaves it shimmering with glorious highlights.
- Needs no lemon or vinegar after-rinse. Halo rinses away, quickly and completely!
- Makes oceans of rich, fragrant lather, even in hardest water. Leaves hair sweet, clean, naturally radiant!
- Carries away unsightly loose dandruff like magic!
- Lets hair dry soft and manageable, easy to curl!

HALO REVEALS THE HIDDEN BEAUTY OF YOUR HAIR!

whatever was going on, as screens were rarely used.

Sterile technique had to be carefully followed in these dressings, and it sometimes took upwards of an hour to bathe and dress one man. Each wound had to be kept clean and dry, and as many of them drained copiously, the whole process might have to be repeated several times a day. Fortunately, the actual dressing was not always painful, as few of these men had much, if any, feeling below the waist. They were subject to terrible, burning sensations in legs and feet, but could not feel a touch. The arduous and painful part of the care was moving the dead weight of hips and legs from one position to another. This hurt the man above the paralysis, particularly if there was a head or shoulder injury. A proportion of them had been shot through the lung. Sometimes it took three people to move a man onto one side, and he had usually to be held in this position while the dressing was done. Many had full use of their arms and could help themselves considerably by use of a trapeze hung from a framework above the bed. Often a large body cast was added to other discomforts. This was occasionally put on to withstand the jars involved in traveling and removed on arrival at the general hospital.

These were the men who had top priority on returning planes from overseas, the men who usually did not live to come home in other wars, before the days of sulpha and penicillin. I was told that the prognosis for their recovery was poor, as medical science cannot mend a severed spinal cord. Of course there were varying degrees of injury. Those who live and have enough normal muscle left above the waist will eventually be able to stand and walk, with the aid of extensive braces. Many of the men were very ill, running temperatures of 103 degrees and more; others looked and felt reasonably well.

In the old days of Porfirio Diaz, Mexico knew what dictatorship meant. There is a story—probably legendary, but nevertheless true to the temper and methods of Diaz—that Diaz once went into a town to quiet a revolt. He assembled all the men in the public square and made an address to them explaining his policy. At the close he asked if all agreed with him. All except two men gave the sign of approval. Whereupon Diaz shot the two discontented peons and remarked, "Now we are all of one mind." Bishop F. J. McConnell in Church Management: Quoted in Religion—A Digest.

A wardful of these cases, even seven or eight at one time, was a fearsome, chilling sight. At first they were largely the work of snipers, or other battle casualties, but increasingly, as time went on, they were the results of accidents. We took care of three men, at intervals of a week or more, from the same jeep which "went off a cliff." Sometimes the jeep "dove off a bridge," leaving the impression that these unique-looking vehicles had a malevolent personality all their own.

There were swimming accidents from diving into shallow water; the shooting accidents were distressingly numerous and often had been caused by the victim's best friend.

A LIEUTENANT, returning from Germany, was packing his things with the aid of a "Kraut" servant who kept house for a group of officers. Among the trophies was a pair of German pistols. As he laid one on a bureau and leaned over to pack the other, the servant shot him in the back. The lieutenant had no opinion as to whether it had been an accident. He was hustled to a hospital within half an hour paralyzed from the waist down, and never heard how the situation was dealt with. Of course, one couldn't ask why the pistol was loaded.

I remember only one cord-bladder case who was hurt in a brawl. He was an older man, a tough character, who said he had been thrown out of a second-story window, but that "the other guy is worse off." He is still furious as on the day it happened. We hoped "the other guy" might be brought in, so that we could hear both sides.

One day five of these patients were carried in together. Some were exhausted, but one boy of nineteen, with a broad, snub-nosed face, called in an excited, happy voice, as h was borne down the aisle, "Anyone her from South Dakota?" He could hardly wai to telephone home. Later he told me, "The had to send for my father. He was workin in the field. He broke down at first, so I go to talk to the whole family while we waite for him."

A boy who had completed his junior yea in college arrived in the same sad plight. H surmised much of what was in store for him and was already searching for a philosophy In this connection he remembered the work of Spengler, and the first item on his progran the first hour he arrived was to start readin this author.

IT was hard to tell how much realizatior these patients had of their desperate situa tion. The older men, the more educated, on felt, were fully cognizant of it; but th nineteen-year-old with whom Sue chatted or my first morning talked constantly of his future. Quite possibly he had not long tc live, but he felt the world was his oyster because the Army had made available such a range of free education.

The nurse was notified if patients were to be evacuated, but there was no way of knowing when they would come in. Nothing therefore, cushioned the impact of solemnity and drama when the double doors of the porch opened on new arrivals. The careful entrance was made at any hour of day or night—a tense moment for tired men placed on the floor in litters, apprehensive of the slightest jar as, one by one, they were transferred to beds.

The new arrival was offered something to eat or drink and allowed to rest. Then the Wacs or nurses' aides went to work on him in earnest. The quickest way was for two people to tackle a patient—one bathing, one doing the dressings. Often he arrived very dirty. You literally untied him like a package, taking off layers of dressings, going over his body carefully, in the interest of cleanliness and so as not to overlook incipient sores or new pockets of infection.

The next step was the advent of the telephone girl with her portable instrument. Every returning soldier was entitled to a free three-minute call, but I never heard of anyone's being charged overtime. Most were eager to call home, but usually one of a group refused. From our point of view, there was a technique to be observed. One's instinct was to get out of earshot, but occasionally a man broke down and was unable to continue. It was safer to busy oneself at a distance until he seemed happily embarked on his conversation.

In spite of tragic things which went on every day in Ward 1, I am anxious to remember that it was also a cheerful place, full of laughter, certainly full of music. Instead of driving you crazy, the radio made a buoyant accompaniment to many drab tasks.

"If I loved you,
Words wouldn't come in an easy way——"
swept through the ward like a breeze.

"Oh, I feel so gay, in a melancholy way," sang Technical Sergeant McCarthy, swinging himself onto his bed, "That it mi-ight as we-ell be spring."

"Kiss me once, and kiss me twice, and kiss me once again," Private Cavell crooned, as he carried out the garbage pails.

"Come here, quick! I've found it," called Sergeant Glass to the ward boy. Together they listened to their favorite:

"No, no, no, no, no, it couldn't be true
That anyone else could love you like I do!"

(Continued on Page 268)

STUBBORN FILM ROBS YOUR SKIN OF half its Beauty!

JUST ONE TREATMENT with unique Lady Esther

You can't see or feel this stubborn film . . . and ordinary cleansing fails to remove it.

BUT

Once you try this treatment you will instantly see and feel the difference!

Every woman's skin has this insidious enemy . . . a stubborn film, which is a combination of your natural skin oils and cosmetics and dirt. Ordinary cleansing methods don't remove this stubborn film. Massage or rubbing only forces it deeper into the mouths of the pores.

This stubborn film dulls the natural freshness and beauty of your skin . . . makes even young skin look older.

Here's the safe and sure way to get rid of this insidious film that dulls the true freshness of your skin.

See for yourself—tonight

Tonight, smooth on Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream . . . then wipe it off. Look at your cleansing tissue. See how surface dirt and cosmetics have been removed. But your skin itself is not yet free of that dulling film.

Now comes the important part! Apply my unique Lady Esther cream again . . . and wipe it off. This second cleansing really rids your skin of that stubborn film which improper methods fail to remove!

My cream does not need to be rubbed in, massaged in . . . because its unique texture is so soft, so effective. Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream itself does the work—not your fingers! And it needs no help from any other cream or lotion!

A Complete Beauty Treatment

Each time you use my unique cream, it does four of the things your skin needs most for beauty. 1) thoroughly cleans your skin; 2) softens your skin; 3) helps Nature refine your pores; 4) leaves a perfect base for face powder.

Difference is amazing!

Immediately after your first Lady Esther treatment, you see the big difference in your skin. Your skin looks so much fresher, clearer . . . actually looks younger! And instantly you feel the new softness and smoothness!

Get Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream today! Let this unique cream work its beauty wonders on your skin!

Lady Esther

4-PURPOSE FACE CREAM

Needs No Help From Any Other Cream

There is so much you want that only a Charis Corsetiere can give you

No, it's not done with magic! Your Charis Corsetiere can give you the sleek figure you want to see when you look in your own mirror!

SLIP INTO PERFECT FIT

Your trained Charis Corsetiere matchmates comfort and loveliness through perfect fit.

She measures your figure, expertly analyzes it, and fits you with the right garment, in the style you like . . . from 77 different Charis garment variations in your size alone! Your Charis can't ride up, or pinch, or buckle, because it is designed and professionally fitted with every one of your figure requirements in mind.

You Must Enjoy Complete Satisfaction! If for any reason you are not fully satisfied, within 30 days after delivery, your purchase price will be immediately and cheerfully refunded. Charis is the ONLY foundation garment sold with this liberal guarantee.

YET CHARIS COSTS NO MORE!

Prices Are Moderate, comparable to average retail prices! Your Charis Corsetiere offers you the right garment at the right price, PLUS professional corsetiere service in your own home.

It's so Convenient to call your Charis Corsetiere, so why not telephone her today? She will come to you, at any time you choose. She saves your time and effort!

CHARIS

Don't Shop . . . Call For The Right Fit!

Call the Charis Distributor or Corsetiere listed in your local telephone book—or write to Dept. L-21, Charis Corporation, Allentown, Pa. In Canada: Charis Ltd., Toronto 14, Canada.

Elastic Control Garments • Lacer Control Garments • One-piece Foundations • Girdles • Brassieres • Bandeaux

(Continued from Page 266)

Two boys detailed to KP hung their pajama tops on a hook in the kitchen. The browned backs bent over sink and mop. The room rang with what sounded like Bing Crosby singing a duet with himself.

Visiting hours were in the afternoon and early evening. In the evening hours various types of entertainment took place. Groups of women from different villages brought cookies and soft drinks. There was a weekly "Date Night" when ten or twelve young and pretty girls, obviously hand-picked, circulated through the wards in the most attractive way.

Newly arrived boys often expressed delight and surprise at the amount of outside civilian interest.

Once in a while New York theatrical companies gave afternoon performances, stretcher cases occupying the first rows. Ambulances drew up in back of the wards, and ambulatory and litter patients who were well enough were driven to the auditorium. It made a pleasant buzz of excitement.

I REMEMBER, particularly, one late afternoon, a boy who had just seen Carousel coming back in a flush of enthusiasm to share his pleasure with those who had not been able to go. He sat down beside a bed patient, next to where I was bathing and dressing a newly arrived cord-bladder case. The patients who could walk gathered around, and the raconteur raised his voice so that those in other beds could hear. It was a masterly performance he gave, glowing and articulate, going through the play scene by scene. His listeners paid the tribute of rapt attention. The man I was working on, a six-foot-two Negro from Louisiana, had a body cast and could turn only his head but, enthralled, he never took his eyes off the speaker.

"Then they get married. That's when June is Bustin' Out All Over comes in." Detailed description of scene and ballet. "After they're married, he doesn't treat her so good."

A sigh burst simultaneously from the parted lips of the audience and one boy asked, as though he feared the answer, "Beat her up, eh?"

"Yeah, he was tough with her," said the boy who had seen the play.

There was shaking of heads along the line, and a pause before the narrative continued.

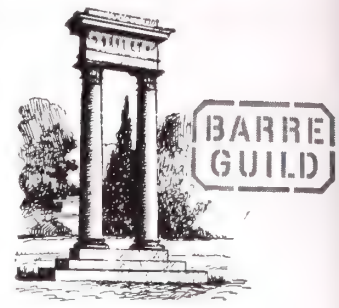
A cord-bladder case arrived about noon one day, after an unusually rough trip across the Atlantic, during which he had been very ill. He was terribly tired, but anxious to see his family, who lived within easy reach. They came in the afternoon, five strong. It was always a tense moment but, as usual, all bore themselves with heroism. However, they stayed the full two hours, and after they had left the boy's fever rose. By evening he was no longer rational—back in the plane, back to an unhappy somewhere.

"Get me out of this! I tell you I can't stand it. Get me out!"

Sue sat holding his hand, her vibrant voice soothing, willing him into peace. "You're not on the plane any more. That's all over. You're home, honey, you're home!"

His rambling voice quieted, faded into silence. The radio was turned off; lights near his bed were extinguished. I never heard the ward so still.

Sergeant Glass was sinking. All morning I had been detailed to sit beside him in the tiny room, checking on pulse and labored breathing. Early in the afternoon, his color becoming much worse, oxygen was ordered. Livid, but conscious, he lay under the tent with its isinglass windows, one wrist extended beyond it to receive an intravenous infusion. His parents were summoned from the city, allowed to spend several nights in the ward. As Mrs. Glass entered the room I rose to give her my place. She stood looking at her son through the isinglass.



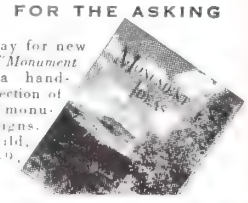
An industry backs them —

UP in Barre, Vt., where more granite is produced than in any other section of the world, only those monuments which meet the highest standards of quality and craftsmanship receive the coveted approval of the Barre Guild.

So there is one sure way to identify a monument of superior quality, design and workmanship, and the dealer who sells it: look for the Barre Guild Seal etched inconspicuously in the monument itself and displayed always by Barre Guild dealers. This Seal and the Certificate that goes with it are a binding guarantee of highest quality backed by the entire monument industry in Barre Vt., home of the famous Select Barre Granite, and "Granite Center of the World".

YOURS FOR THE ASKING

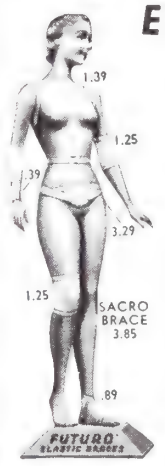
Send today for new booklet, "Monument Ideas"—a hand-picked selection of inspiring monument designs. Barre Guild, Desk L-9, Barre, Vt.



FUTURO

Elastic Braces for

PAINS—SPRAINS WEAKNESS



If you are troubled with weak or painful ankles, knees, elbows or wrists; shoulder-slump; abdominal strain at work or sports; or back-aches due to sacro-iliac strain, you will appreciate the better support and extra comfort found only in Futuro Elastic Braces. New, different, improved, with patented features of design that assure greater satisfaction, they cost less because they are mass-produced; made for the millions who need good elastic braces. See them today and judge for yourself.

At All Better Drug Stores

If your druggist can't supply you, write for free booklet.

JUNG ARCH BRACE CO., 337 Jung Bldg., CINCINNATI, O.

"TOP-SUDS" WASHING Gets Clothes Cleaner

WORLD'S SAFEST WRINGER

Voss Floating Agitator washes clothes in top suds — gets them cleaner. Voss "Electro-Safe" Wringer . . . The World's Safest. Electric and gas engine models.

VOSS WASHERS

Time Tested Since 1876

VOSS BROS. MFG. CO., DAVENPORT, IOWA

$ Sell EVERYDAY CARDS

EARN Spare Time CASH

IT'S EASY. Just show friends these lovely assortments for Birthdays, "Get-Well," all other occasions. Thrilling values sell on sight. Box of 14 assorted cards sells for $1.00—pays you up to 50c cash. Also Gift Wrapping, Relative Cards, other money-makers. START EARNING NOW. Write TODAY for SAMPLES sent on approval.

MIDWEST CARD CO., 415 N. 8th, Dept. 5-A, St. Louis 1, Mo.

KNITTING YARNS Prompt Mail Service

Send for FREE Samples

COLONIAL YARN HOUSE, 1231-R Cherry St., Phila. 7, Pa.

ew beauty short cut

The Penetray Infra-red Heat Lamp saves time in drying hair, finger nail polish, leg make up . . . helps face creams and oils to penetrate too, without hot towels.

Penetray

(INFRA-RED HEAT LAMP)

with PYREX bulb!

• Penetray Infra-red Heat Lamps come in five different types priced from $1.25 to $3.60.

PENETRAY CORP., TOLEDO 5, OHIO

E PAY YOU $25
SELLING FIFTY $1 ASSORTMENTS
Birthday, All-Occasion cards. Tremendously demand. Sell for $1.00 your customers. Profits mount fast. Write today for FREE SAMPLES. erfulCardCo., Dept G-1, White Plains, N.Y.

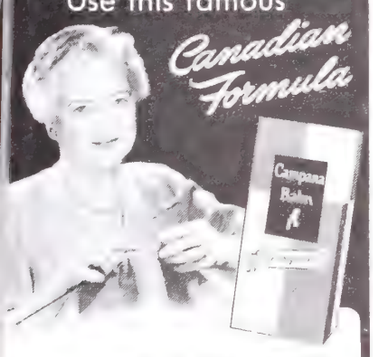
WRITE FOR SAMPLES

Use this famous Canadian Formula



for CHAPPED DRY HANDS

1. Quicker results. Softens roughest, driest skin over night.

2. Proved effectiveness for 65 years in cold Canada.

3. A pure, rich concentrated emollient. Aids healing. Choice of countless doctors, nurses, housewives, mothers.

4. Economical—spreads widely —single drop serves both hands.

At cosmetic counters—10c, 25c, 50c and $1.00 a bottle.

Campana Balm

THE SKIN SOFTENER

The faint voice whispered, "Hello, mamma, how are you?"

"You should feel as well, my dear!" the mother said.

Scarcely twenty years old, what had brought him to this pass? A congenital weakness? Some aftermath of bailing out over Germany, his parachute pierced by enemy fire, or of six months as a prisoner on starvation diet? One kidney functioned not at all; the other was in wretched shape.

An operation took place the next day and the little sergeant did not die. That morning, as I adjusted his bedclothes, my eye was caught by several greeting cards pasted in geometrical design on a wall of the tiny crowded room. The focal point of the arrangement was a photograph of a pretty girl. In the blank space of the folder on which the picture was mounted, written large enough to be readable from the bed, was a message.

"Hurry up and get well, dear. We are all waiting. I love you, Len, with all my heart. Your Sis."

Much has been said, and justly, about the amazing resiliency and fortitude of the wounded. It does not detract from their beautifully consistent performance to dwell, for a moment, on those no-less-brave men who, perhaps temporarily, felt themselves defeated.

It would seem that, naturally enough, there comes an end to endurance. I don't believe it has, necessarily, to do with courage or philosophy. Simply, there is a breaking point. Every so often, the doors at the end of Ward 1 opened, and a man who had reached this point was carried in. Partly the despair came from excessive fatigue of the journey, which aggravated pain. Sedatives, given to combat this, contributed to a breakdown in control.

For a time men will endure scenes of anger and jealousy from the women they deeply love. Some prefer agitated love affairs as they prefer rough seas to calm ones; but most of them are definitely peace-loving. They are easily won by good temper, simplicity and gentleness, especially if some mad woman has previously cured them of their taste for violence.

—ANDRÉ MAUROIS The Art of Living (Harper & Brothers).

There were those who, at intervals, lay quietly weeping. There was a man who seldom spoke or made his wants known, but who repeated all day, "Jesus! Jesus!"

There were individual cries from the depths, somehow more heartbreaking for being couched in back-country accents: "Oh, mah tailbone! Mah tailbone!" . . . "Gawd! Gawd! Ah cain't take hit, Gawd!"

A boy, shot by accident, put forth his question and argument over and over: "I didn't do nothin', God. Why did it have to happen? I tell you, God, I didn't do nothin'! Why did it happen?"

One Sunday morning I assisted Irene with the dressings of a wasted uncomplaining man, a former railroad clerk. His frightful sores were exposed; a wound drained in his side. He was not very young, or handsome, but quiet and sad and suffering. Standing beside him, feeling for him, released a compassion which embraced all simple, anonymous men.

The accustomed undercurrent of the radio suddenly became a splendidly full choir singing clearly the words:

"O loving Father of mankind!"

The man on the bed fingered a scapular about his neck and murmured, "I wish I could go to church!"

Tenderly and relentlessly the voices rose and fell, changing their burden:

"E'en though it be a cross ——"

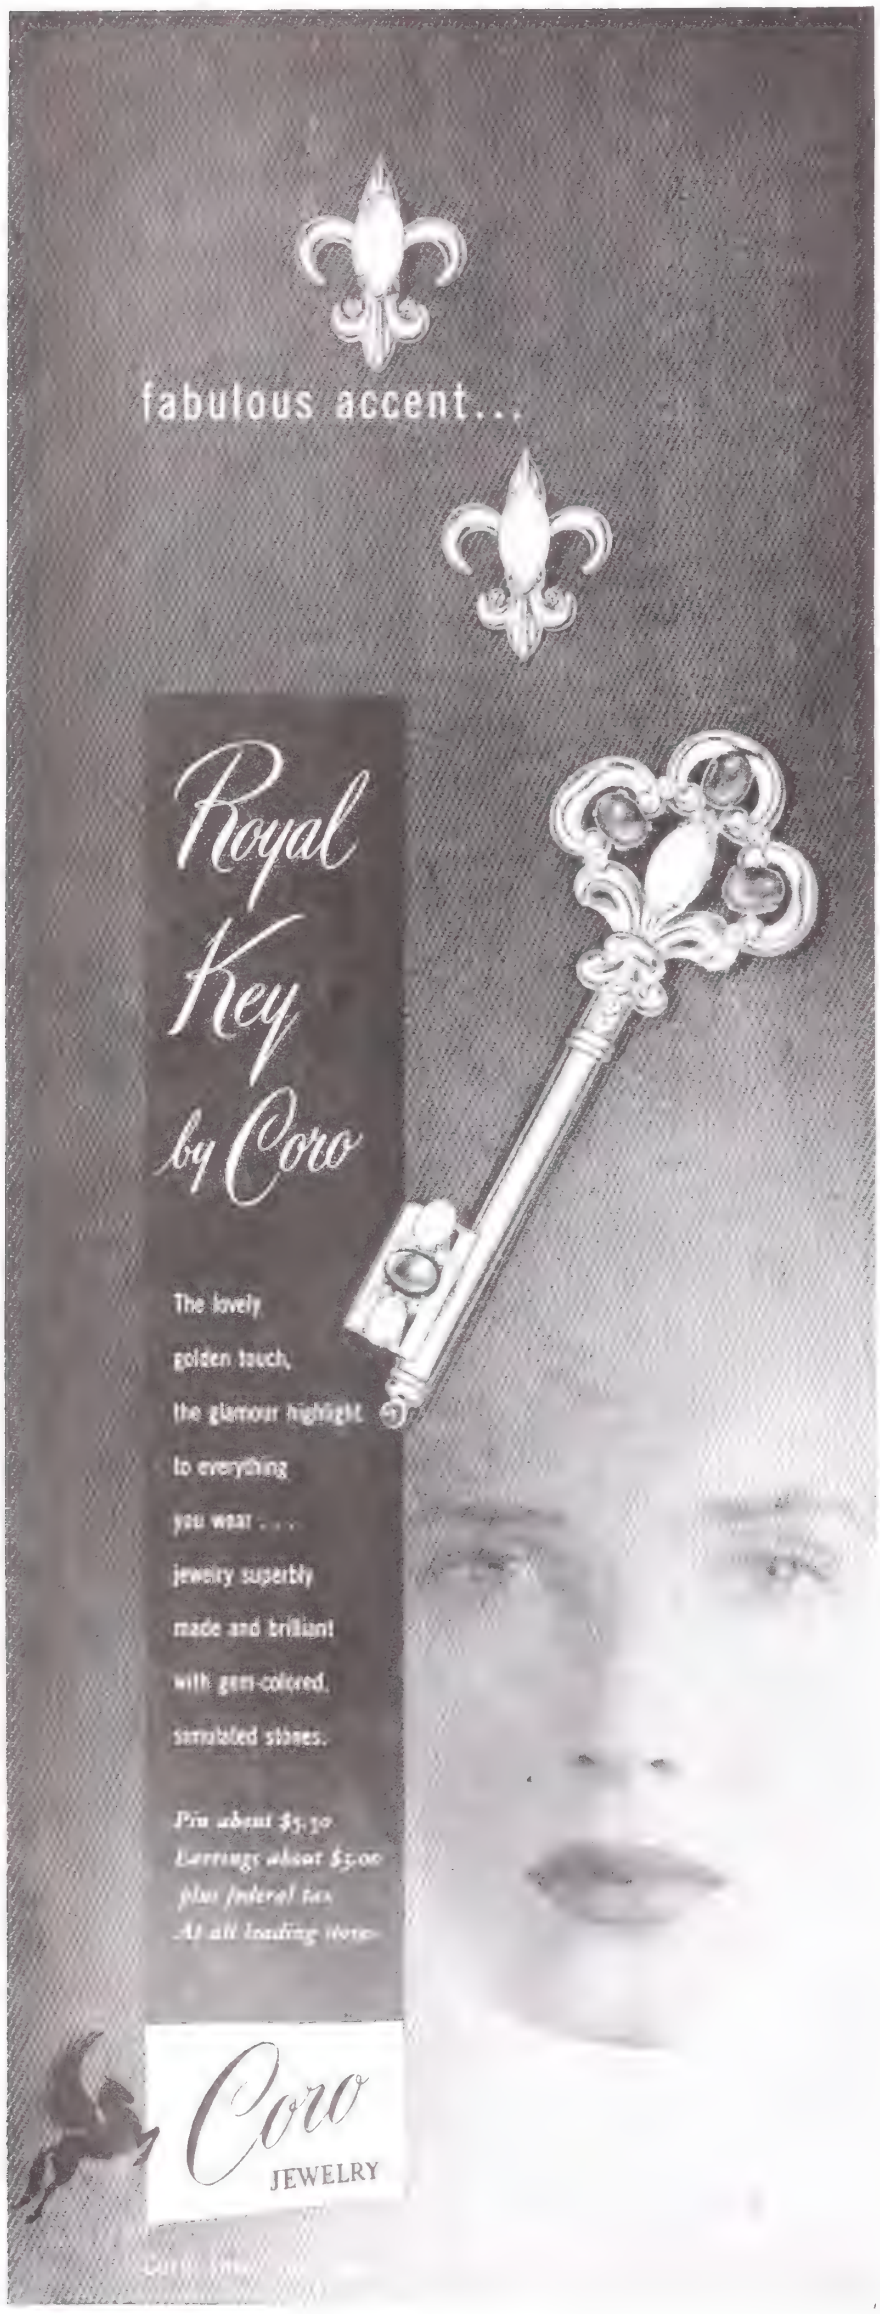
THE END

• Hearts and doors fly open . . . it's a lush, green Spring! So walk out now in the fragrant air. Swing along, alive in step and spirit, part of the awakening world . . . swing along in these new boot-maker square-toes — flexible, easy and free.

Walk-Over easi-gaits*

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off

Geo. E. Keith Company, Brockton 63, Mass.



fabulous accent...
Royal Key by Coro
The lovely golden touch, the glamour highlight to everything you wear . . . jewelry superbly made and brilliant with gem-colored, simulated stones.
Pin about $5.50
Earrings about $5.00
plus federal tax
At all leading stores
Coro JEWELRY

ROMANCE IN TEEN TIME

By Gladys Denny Shultz

"LET'S ask Sue and Edith to go to the movie with us Saturday afternoon." The idea just popped into Johnny's head as he and Buell were walking down the hall at junior high. Why Sue and Edith? No particular reason—perhaps it was seeing them ahead in the lunch line.

Puell was surprised but game. "O. K. Why not?"

There was, of course, the money angle to be considered. A quick calculation showed that, since allowances were due on Saturday, they'd be able to swing it. The boys lengthened their stride to catch up with the girls.

Sue looked at Edith. Edith looked at Sue. "I don't care if you don't," Edith said finally. "Well, I'll go if you will," Sue assented. They all went into the lunch room together, laughing quite a lot, feeling self-conscious but deliciously happy.

Johnny astonished his mother by appearing at breakfast the next morning in his best suit and necktie. Heretofore he had shown a predilection for the oldest and most ravaged garments in his wardrobe and had assumed a necktie only on state occasions, and then under duress.

That evening he got his older brother off and negotiated a loan. For Buell, in an expansive moment, had suggested they drop in at the ice-cream parlor after the movie, and Johnny feared his funds would not be equal to the strain. Brother Bill, who was in senior high and vastly experienced, agreed that it was well to be prepared for any contingency. The girls might order Cokes, but on the other hand they were just as likely to go for banana splits. When you took a woman on a date, you never knew.

"Look," Johnny questioned him further, "I go up to Sue's house and ring the bell. Sue comes to the door. Then what do I do?"

"I usually begin by apologizing for being so late," offered Bill. Johnny hoped, but doubted, that he might some day achieve as much nonchalance.

Then the whole thing blew up in Johnny's face. Sue phoned, tears in her voice. "We can't go with you Saturday afternoon. Our folks say we are too young to date. Sometimes I wish I was dead!"

Worst of all, and final ignominy, Sue's mother accompanied her daughter to the movie Saturday afternoon, as though to make sure she didn't slip off and join Johnny anyway.

These parents undoubtedly felt they were doing the right thing—but were they?

The writer once heard a well-known authority—unmarried—on adolescent girls burst forth, "A lot of us are old maids today because we behaved the way our mothers told us we should; not realizing until it was too late that if our mothers had behaved that way themselves, they would never have got married and wouldn't have had any daughters to tell how to behave!"

OF the sources of conflict and unhappiness that can arise in the adolescent years, dating and its attendant problems lead all the rest. Many parents dread the appearance of the romantic urge and take elaborate precautions to circumvent it. Girls are warned and protected against those ravening monsters, boys. Boys are teased and ridiculed when they show an interest in the fairer sex. Yet if all the parental worrying that has been done on this subject could be laid end to end, the great bulk of it would be found to be not only unnecessary, but injurious to the youngster involved as well.

> The triumph of women is not to wear out and conquer their persecutors, but to soften them and make them lay down their arms.
>
> —JOSEPH JOUBERT.

This is not to say that young adolesce should be turned loose, without supervisi and with no heed paid to their comings a goings. But if parents could understa more clearly the function served by roma in a teen-ager's life, they would view matter very differently. And a main caus home conflict and of adolescent unhappin alike would be removed.

First let us realize that getting to kr and to feel at ease with members of the op site sex is one of the three main jobs adolescent has to accomplish. (Attain heterosexuality, this is labeled by psych gists. Preparing for a vocation and bec ing weaned from parental domination the other two.)

FOR the end of adolescence is maturi when one is supposedly ready to earn living, to stand on one's own feet and to lect a lifetime mate. The boy or girl who been deprived of opportunities to mix happily and naturally with the opposite is as much handicapped in this last essen as the boy or girl who must earn a liv without any education or training in a tra

The overstrict parents of a son and th daughters prided themselves on the fact t their youngsters in adolescence displayed signs of being "girl struc or boy struck." (The tr was, all four had b made so self-conscious parental admonition t they couldn't express interest they felt.)

Not one of the girls e broke through her ar of sex timidity enough marry, or even to hav beau. The boy married the first girl he thrown with after he left home. Now parents can't understand why Fate sho have saddled him with a sloven, unequa her role either as wife or mother.

They didn't figure sufficiently on the f that the human heart hungers for love, that the person who has never known i likely to seize upon whatever offers, whet it is good enough or not.

The romances and dating of the ado cent years are a youngster's schooling fo wise marriage choice, which after all lies very far ahead. Not how to keep your dau ter from going with boys until a certain a or your boy from getting involved with gi but how to get both started as auspiciou as possible upon this important side of th development, should be the approach. Fo isn't always as easy, really, as it appe Nature, seemingly in playful mood, has p aced adolescence with a period during wh each sex apparently has no use whatever the other. Boys herd with boys and g with girls. Each notices the other only tease, chase, or taunt with insults. For occasional "sport" who departs from pattern, the scorn and derision of his k are boundless.

At its height around the age of 12, the g age, as this is called, serves an undoub purpose in a youngster's life by teach loyalty to one's group, and the submerg of selfish interests in devotion to the comm cause. But it requires some courage for m boys and girls to take the first steps out toward the more mature pattern of hete sexuality.

Gradually after 12, however, sex anta nism gives place to covert interest. To ev normal early teen-ager there comes a t when he or she is ready to break through barriers which have held the sexes ap But different ones are ready at different a Usually the impulse shows itself around

(Continued on Page 272)

Now! Keep your hands as kissable as your lips

How wonderful!

Woodbury Beauty-Blended Lotion is actually 2-lotions-in-1

PROTECTS AS IT SOFTENS • RICH IN LUXURY LANOLIN

h for it joyously, expectantly. For Woodbury Lotion is new, new, new! Perfected Woodbury skin scientists, this lovely, luscious lotion is a beauty blend of both soft- g and protective ingredients—actually 2-lotions-in-1:

1 A softening lotion that helps bring hands endearing natural softness. (Its luxury anolin is the softening, smoothing "fir-t usin" of your skin's own natural moisture.)

2 A protective lotion that helps "glove" your hands against roughness, redness, drying, chapping from winter cold, daily dish-washings and soap and water cleansing.

ay, discover this wonderful new 2-lotions-in-1 hand care. You'll love Woodbury's iisite fragrance, its rich, creamy consistency. Woodbury Lotion disappears quickly, ever sticky or greasy. Use it for soft, smooth elbows, shoulders, legs, too. Get a e at your drug or cosmetic counter. 25c and 50c. Or try Woodbury Lotion for a week at our expense—that's how sure we are you'll fall in love with it.

Free! MAIL COUPON for purse-size gift bottle. Let the lovely things Woodbury Lotion does for your hands convince you there has never before been a lotion like it.

Box 15, Cincinnati 14, Ohio, Dept. 510

Woodbury Beauty-Blended Lotion sounds exciting. I'd love to try it. Please send me a FREE purse-size gift bottle.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

(Print name and address plainly . . . Sorry, offer good in U.S.A. only.) Paste on penny postcard if you wish.

DE BY THE MAKERS OF FAMOUS WOODBURY FACIAL SOAP AND OTHER WOODBURY AIDS TO LOVELINESS

GINGIVITIS

may be attacking YOUR gums at this very moment!

4 OUT OF 5 may get it. Neglect Often Leads to Pyorrhea with its loosening teeth and shrinking gums, which only your dentist can help . . .

Handsome healthy teeth need firm gums!

If your gums are tender to touch, or bleed when you brush your teeth—watch out! These may be some of the first signs of Gingivitis—a mild gum inflammation but a wicked enemy of handsome teeth and firm gums.

The best safeguard against Gingivitis is to see your dentist every 3 months. Then at home massage your gums and brush your teeth twice daily with Forhan's Toothpaste.

Famous To Help Gums Be Firmer—Teeth Naturally Bright

Forhan's Toothpaste—that marvelous formula of Dr. R. J. Forhan—is made especially for BOTH massaging gums to be firmer and to keep teeth glistening with their natural bright lustre.

Notice how refreshed and stimulated your gums feel—how your teeth sparkle with radiant cleanliness.

95% Gingivitis Cases Improved in 30 days

Clinical investigation showed 95% cases of Gingivitis improved in 30 days after brushing their teeth and massaging their gums twice daily with Forhan's.

So don't neglect bleeding gums. See your dentist and buy a tube of Forhan's today at any drug, department or 10¢ store. Let your whole family enjoy its tangy, refreshing taste.

NO HARSH ABRASIVES IN FORHAN'S

use Forhan's with massage

FOR FIRMER GUMS—CLEANER TEETH

(Continued from Page 270)

but with some it may be earlier, with others later.

The important thing is that the time when the youngster himself first feels the desire to date is the time when he can most easily and naturally take this important step forward in his social and personality development. The longer it is delayed, the harder for him it is likely to become.

If it is squelched or put off by well-meaning but shortsighted parents, there is danger that the terrible self-consciousness of adolescence proper may arise to complicate the picture. The boy who has never dated tends then to draw into his shell. Deviled by the inferiority complexes of adolescence, he fears he hasn't the qualities which would make a girl like him.

Nice, well-brought-up little girls freeze in the presence of boys, making it impossible for them to invite the attentions they are in reality dying to receive. They are likely to resent and repulse attempts to help them, and stay away from occasions where they might come in contact with the opposite sex, lest they be rejected.

If your boy or girl has got well along into adolescence without being "girl struck" or "boy struck," don't pat yourself on the back about it. He or she is being deprived of an experience which not only lends fun and enjoyment to the high-school years, but has valuable features in personality development as well.

When interest in the opposite sex proceeds as Nature intended it to do, what a blossoming out is seen! Almost the moment that the thought of a Girl impinges itself upon the consciousness of a near adolescent, as differentiated from the genus girls—weak, annoying, silly creatures—he undergoes a miraculous transformation.

Overnight he may drop the roughneck behavior which was as natural and proper to the gang age as romantic urges are to this one. He goes in for hair oil and polished shoes, he bathes without being told to, he washes his neck and cleans his fingernails. He becomes interested in etiquette, particularly those parts which have to do with the squiring of dames. A junior miss can accomplish more in one heartbeat than parents in years of lecturing.

The little tomboy gentles down, acquires feminine graces and the techniques for using them. In many instances, indeed, she becomes a more accomplished eyelash flutterer and heart disturber than her more ladylike sisters.

But what about the high schoolers who carry things too far and get into trouble, you may ask. For of course it's that Ol' Debbil Sex which lurks behind the fears and taboos with which many parents surround high-school romance.

It isn't learning how to get along and to be at ease with the opposite sex which leads to infractions of the moral code. There are deeper reasons when such things happen.

THE girl who goes wrong is the girl who is seeking love, which she has not found in her home, a leading sociologist tells us. Youngsters who are turned loose because no adult wants to bother about them, youngsters who feel unsure of their powers of attraction, are the ones who get into trouble. The best way to guard boys and girls against it is to permit them to mingle freely and naturally, doing wholesome things together, against a background of parental sympathy and approval. And while it's true that, by the law of averages, a certain number of these gangly youths with rebellious cowlicks will grow up to be wolves, in these beginning stages they are harmless as puppies, and as well intentioned.

For instance, what possible harm could have resulted from the innocent proposal of Buell and Johnny to escort two girls to the matinee at the neighborhood movie? Wh difference did it make whether the youn sters were 13 or 16?

Perhaps the mothers of Sue and Edi feared that, once their daughters had e barked on dating careers, they would caught up in a stream of experiences beyo their years.

Not so. First dating is usually qui sporadic—the boys' pocketbooks at this a aren't equal to much splurging, for ol thing. And besides, the impulse might r hit them again for months. That is the usu pattern in early teen-age. But in the mea time, all four youngsters would have gain the confidence of a big hurdle behind the Next time they would know better how act and what to say. They would have tak an important first step toward a matur for which they should be preparing the selves.

As a matter of fact, "crushes" and for ing into couples generally play little part the first experiences in mixed social life. I just a bunch who know one another, and w get together for a good time. One 15-ye old was reproved by his father, because had permitted a girl he had taken to dance—by request of the hostess—to home from the corner with another g instead of seeing them to the door.

"Oh, we don't have to bother with th stuff yet," the young swain replied airi "We just take the girls so that we'll ha somebody to dance with. The escort b iness doesn't come till next year!"

Alliances that do fo are likely to be of sh duration, and there is lit need to fear that early te agers with plenty of int esting activities will n dating into the ground.

The third and fou years of high school the romancing years, w so-called puppy lo which in reality is a be tiful phenomenon, n enter the picture. It is ficult for parents to their youngsters emb on the age-old course wh holds as much hurt heartache as ecstasy. there is the added fear that the ecstasy it may prove the undoing of an inexperien boy and girl.

The answer is that the closer parents h kept to their boy or girl through intellig acceptance of the romantic urges, the be able they are to guide when the real cr arise. Again, sympathetic interest and und standing, rather than anxiety or opposit is the way to keep adolescent love aff within bounds.

And the heartaches and misunderst ings are educational too. It may grieve to see Young Daughter lose her poise dignity when she first encounters the fal or egotism of the male. Sometimes you help, sometimes you can't. But along co another male—and next time see if doesn't play her cards better.

The parents of one high-school lad watc their son pay court to a succession of "glam pusses," "slick chicks" and "smoothie "Sonny's just like I was," his dad confes in a candid moment. "Crazy about one after another from the time I was fourt My folks thought that I never would se down."

But sonny did, when the time came his father had done before him. And sidering how widely both men had played field, their final choices were strikingly ilar—women of brains, character and abil and all the other qualities needed for cr ing gracious, happy homes and rearing children.

If you've an adolescent, don't look alarm upon dating and the other manife tions of the romantic urge. Regard it sign that your youngster has entered up more mature stage, and be as pleasa interested and encouraging as with any o sign of normal development.

WITH THE CHILDREN

She is afraid of worms, but she loves to eat macaroni. It must be just colors that scare her.

After Kate's temperature was taken she asked, "Am I pilly?"

When you're old you can do things without permission. Why don't old people have more fun than they do?

—KATHRYN COFFEY GLENNON.

Glamour Legs
MOJUD

get legs,
e hit with n so kintores
rywhere.

MOJUD nylon STOCKINGS

TRADE MARK REG.
©1947 MOJUD HOSIERY CO., INC., N.Y.C.

Attractive
FOR ITS SMART STYLING
AND FIRM CONTROL!

Bellaire
THE FOOT STIMULATING SHOE

Whether it's a well bred oxford or a pump, Bellaire shoes are designed to flatter your foot! Coddles it, too, because Bellaire's special custom-type construction gives you a vitalizing foundation and perfect balance. About $8.00

source nearest you write to
HOLMES STICKNEY & WALKER
Portland, Maine

If you have a near adolescent, it won't be amiss to take a few measures toward smoothing the road to heterosexual relationships. Not obvious ones—heaven forbid! Parental urging is as likely to be fatal in this delicate matter as parental interference. But you can set the stage unobtrusively, and then wait for Nature to do the rest.

An excellent beginning is a mixed dancing class, in late junior high—the great majority even of males are ready for this experience by ninth grade. Both sexes learn a social skill which gives them confidence, at the same time that they become accustomed to treating one another like ladies and gentlemen, instead of like an inferior and hostile race.

Homes should be hospitable to the informal parties which will probably develop of themselves on Friday and Saturday nights, as a next step. If they do not, it's the parents' job to get the sexes together in activities they will enjoy.

And when your Johnny or Buell summons courage to ask a girl for a regular date, strictly on his own; or when your Edith or Sue is singled out for such attention, the thing to look at is not their age but whether or not the activity proposed is within the bounds of reason and good sense. If it isn't, some changes may be suggested, but keep the romantic urge intact as much as you can.

Let me say again that sympathy and understanding for high-school romances does not mean removal of parental supervision. But it can be exerted in a way the youngsters won't resent, and that runs the least possible chance of nipping the first frail tendrils of interest in the opposite sex.

It's proper for dad to call for a very young daughter after a party—but as transportation home, not as a grim guardian of her virtue. General hours should be set for ending a date or party. But if daughter and escort miss the deadline by fifteen minutes the heavens won't fall, and the hours for getting in may be altered now and then by special circumstances. Admonitions should be imparted in private—don't make your youngster lose face among his or her friends.

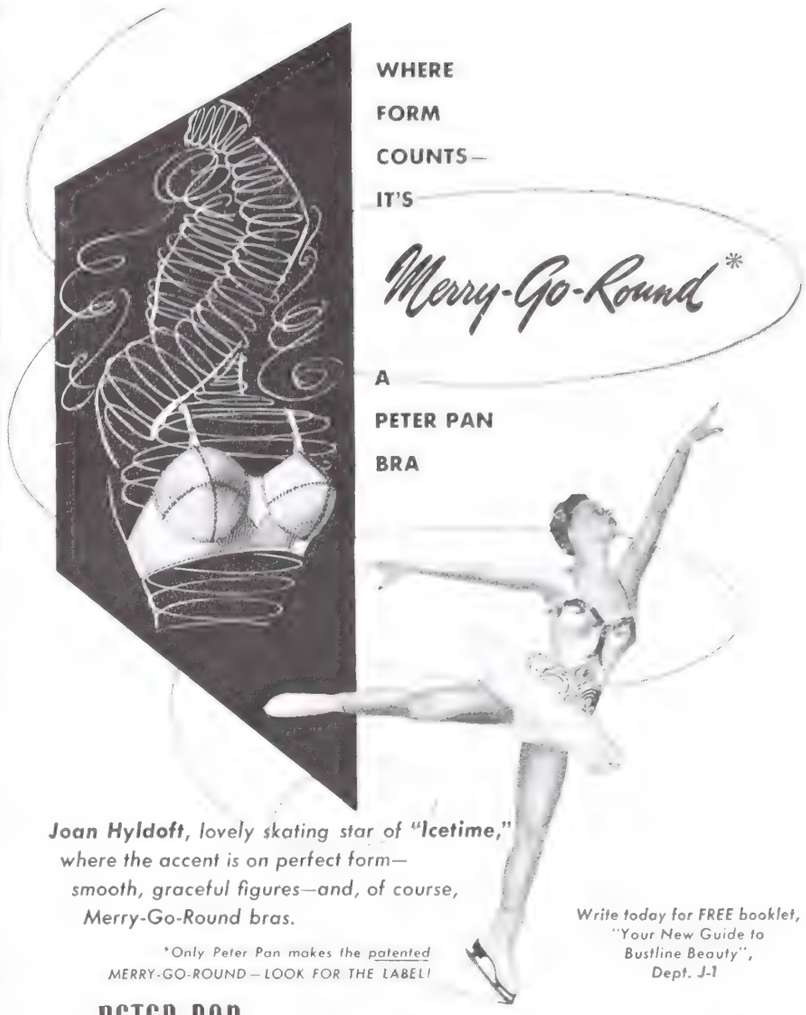
Some adult should be on the premises when mixed activities are in progress, but not in the guise of a policeman, on the alert for the first suspicious move. Dad and mother may ensconce themselves comfortably in the den while the party goes on in living room or whoopee room. Then everyone will have a good time and the needs of chaperonage will be amply taken care of.

And while it's proper to ask that they should come straight home once the group breaks up, don't imply that something dreadful will happen if one moment is left unguarded. You and I don't like to have our virtuous intentions impugned, and adolescents are especially sensitive on this point.

After son starts dating on his own, why not increase his allowance a bit, if you can afford it, in order to enable him to play his role successfully? Or if he is making his own money, don't frown if he wants to spend some of it on girls. It's an encouraging sign when a boy is willing to divert part of his small income for this purpose. Reasonable use of the family car, after he is old enough to have a license and to be responsible, adds to his confidence and to his value as a beau. Parents should be sympathetic with both these needs.

When daughter spends hours before her mirror, trying the effect of this hair-do and that; when she and her friends spend other hours on the phone passing on data as to what he said and she said, take it as evidence that she is accepting her new role and is doing her best to play it well. Save your concern for the teen-age girl who makes no effort to be attractive, and who shrinks from contacts with the opposite sex.

Above all, when your boy first becomes aware of the long-curled lass in study hall and she of him, don't start worrying lest they are headed for trouble. They are headed for a precious and valuable experience—and one that may save them from real trouble later on. THE END



WHERE
FORM COUNTS—IT'S
*Merry-Go-Round
A
PETER PAN
BRA

Joan Hyldoft, lovely skating star of "Icetime," where the accent is on perfect form—smooth, graceful figures—and, of course, Merry-Go-Round bras.

Only Peter Pan makes the patented MERRY-GO-ROUND—LOOK FOR THE LABEL!

Write today for FREE booklet, "Your New Guide to Bustline Beauty", Dept. J-1

PETER PAN BRASSIERES—GIRDLES • 116 EAST 27 ST., NEW YORK 16

Prove to yourself...Chapped Hands heal FASTER with this famous cream

• Give your chapped hands quick relief as so many doctors and nurses do! Use Noxzema, the greaseless cream with the medicated formula.

Baltimore nurses were among the first to discover that Noxzema gives double aid to hands—brings quick, soothing relief—softens, helps whiten red, rough skin. Actual clinical tests prove it helps heal tiny cuts and skin irritations quickly—often overnight!

Millions of women rely on Noxzema as a skin aid to lovelier hands. 20,000,000 jars bought yearly! Get your jar today. Let Noxzema help nurse your chapped skin back to beauty!

So softly does Tussy face powder touch your skin... light as swansdown...illuminating your beauty like an admiring glance.
So lovely in the Rosy Rachel shade and other Tussy complexion colors. And you'll love the way it stays velvet-smooth!
and all Tussy beauty preparations at smart cosmetic counters. $1 plus tax
TUSSY face powder

tells me that. And your father says your arithmetic is almost hopeless. I think Hilltop was wonderful for you, darling, when you were younger. I thought it would be good for you to be in small classes and play with boys, since you are an only child. But today," she concluded with finality, "I went over to St. Catharine's and talked with Miss Dimmitt."

"Oh, mother, how could you."

"I think you'd like it, darling, once you got used to it and ——"

"Don't!" Elaine cried sharply.

All at once any further conversation seemed intolerable. There was such a tearing aching inside her that it seemed nothing would ever be the same again. She felt desperately lonely and, worse than that, betrayed.

"Does daddy agree with you?" Elaine faltered. Suddenly that seemed very important to know.

Her mother might just as well have said aloud, "He'll leave it up to me," judging by the look she gave her. Elaine knew that look only too well. She bent over to the floor, gathering up her books awkwardly, for everything swam in front of her.

"Elaine!"

She sensed that her mother was going to put her arm around her. "Don't, mother," she said, putting up her hand to stop her. "Don't touch me or say anything, please. Let me go upstairs to my room. I think—I think I'm going to be sick."

She wasn't sick, as she had fully expected to be, only empty inside and shaky. She lay on the bed in the oncoming dusk and tried to imagine what help or quarter she could expect from her father. But experience had taught her that in all such important matters as school, when she could use her radio, and if her allowance might be raised, he deferred to her mother. Her world seemed shattered and comfortless. Only one little ray of hope pierced her mounting unhappiness. She remembered how she had asked for adult poetry books for her birthday and how amazed her mother had been and had suggested ice skates or a new tennis racket. But unexpectedly her father had firmly upheld her. Now could she ever make him understand about Hilltop? Could she ever?

At dinner she had an unexpected reprieve. Her father brought an old college friend, Mr. Shuford, home to dinner. At the table he kept calling her mother "Kitten," a name which Elaine could never imagine her mother once possessing. But it seemed that he had known mother a long time ago, too, when he used to go with daddy from Yale to call on mother and her roommate, Janie, at Vassar.

Elaine was glad to sit at the table silently, eating almost nothing. A funny lump was in her stomach, and then in her throat, which kept bobbing up and pushing away the thought of food. Once she caught daddy looking at her in bewilderment over Mr. Shuford's head and then signaling with his eyebrows to mother, as he did when he wanted to ask, with company present, if there was any more food in the kitchen. But mother smiled, though Elaine thought not very gaily, and nodded her head reassuringly, and kept right on talking to Mr. Shuford. However, she looked at Elaine anxiously when it came time for dessert, which was coconut cake, and Elaine refused it.

"I'd like to be excused, please, if you don't mind, mother," she said quietly. "I don't care for any dessert, thank you. Besides, I have homework to do. Good night, Mr. Shuford," she finished politely, wondering, as she folded her napkin, if her mother would notice that not all her manners had vanished as a result of going to Hilltop.

In the hall, stopping to pick up Dodo, she overheard Mr. Shuford say. "Lovely daughter you have there, Margaret."

And going upstairs, Elaine thought bitterly, Oh, Mr. Shuford, if you only knew.

Nothing is more pathetic than the "someday" talk. Someday is never. Youth is the time of possibilities. If you start living when you are young you do not arrive at middle age. You remain young till you are old.

—STEPHEN GRAHAM: The Death of Yesterday (Ernest Benn, Ltd.)

She brushed her teeth thoroughl went to bed without anyone remin that it was time, she didn't even tur radio. She just crawled in between th and lay in the dark feeling very, ver late. She couldn't sleep. Later, dow much later, she could hear the low s voices and an occasional burst of mer

Little you both care, she thoug pityingly as she bounced violently bed.

Then she was almost ashamed thought, but not completely, for moments later her mother opened t gently, took a few steps toward the b whispered, "Elaine, are you asleep?"

But Elaine didn't answer. She ju still, trying not to breathe, hoping t mother wouldn't come nearer, but go For she felt angry and hurt all in feeling she wasn't used to. Then afte minutes her mother went out, closi door softly behind her. There was n left but the bewilderment and ache heart.

Over and over she thought of Hillt all it meant, which she couldn't artic express, for it was deep inside her, like p All the usual complaint about hom vanished, leaving in her heart an overf assortment of things she belonged to had she ever taken them so for gra How could she ever bear to be sep from them forever? All the hectic, hap spiring, lovely moments.

There was the library with its apple walls, deep window white fireplace, wher had "poetry" three noons a week; the stained-glass window hung in the gym at C mastime, year after always the same always satisfying. thought of Nancy Sally, who had been her since kinderga the Town Hall, where met to discuss s problems; Autumn Leaf, the magazine her class edited; the nature walks Miss Wilson along the river; hockey wit Harrison; unexpected, rare moments Mr. Brooks, who always teased and tended they were nuisances, yet who al could be counted on to help with any no matter how unimportant, such as a kite in shop.

Then the bitterest thought of all sh the galaxy of memories right out of her h

How disappointed they would be with Mr. Brooks, who consulted them about books and the Town Hall, whose quiet s when you did something properly, went inside you. And Miss Wilson, who l learning, who made even French verbs English kings exciting. She felt torn in a miserable failure to her family and school. It was deeper even than tears! she lay in the dark, hot and exhausted, she fell into a restless sleep.

She came down late for breakfast bec her mother did not call her until the moment. She was conscious that her br curls hadn't been brushed free from t tangles. Nothing overt was said when took her place at the table. But it was t in everyone's mind.

Only once her mother referred to it. may drive over to get you this afterno

That was actually all she said, but in mind Elaine finished it, and talk to Wilson and Mr. Brooks. The suspense even worse than a lecture.

Her father drove her to school so that wouldn't have to gulp her breakfast. As got out of the car he patted her arm, as i that gesture he could set her world ari

"Your mother isn't unreasonable, Elai he tried to reassure her. "She only w what is best for you. She always has y interests first in her heart."

Once she got to school, Elaine had ho that life would seem better, that being b would crowd a little of the misery away.

(Continued on Page 278)

High school girls could tell mothers a thing or two!

Test new napkin— 88 out of 108 report no chafing with new Free-Stride Modess

The teen-age crowd in high schools across the country recently made a discovery that will be smooth news to girls everywhere.

It all started when interviewers asked school girls who had been bothered by chafing with their regular napkin to try a new, improved napkin—Free-Stride Modess.

The girls weren't told the name or brand . . . just that it was a new napkin . . . would they see if it gave them freedom from chafe?

The answer? 88 out of 108 reports said: No chafing with Free-Stride Modess!

The secret of chafe-free comfort so many girls found in Free-Stride Modess lies in the clever fashioning of the napkin edges.

Free-Stride Modess has extra cotton on its edges—extra softness—right where the cause of chafe begins.

The extra cotton also acts to direct and retain moisture inside the napkin, keeping the edges dry and smooth longer And dry, smooth edges just don't chafe!

So safe, too! Every Free-Stride Modess has a triple safety shield to help keep you confident—to chase away those accident fears. Modess' fine, sealed-in deodorant guards your daintiness, too! And no telltale outlines—Modess is silhouette-proof!

Free-Stride Modess—so luxury-comfortable, so luxury-safe—is on sale everywhere now! Get a package today. Product of Personal Products Corporation.

Walk with comfort!
Move with freedom!
Try the new Free-stride Modess!

Avon presents

pink tinge

. . . BECOMING AS A BLUSH —

. . . romantic as Spring itself—Avon's newest, most flattering color-coordinated make-up! Pink Tinge rouge to touch your cheeks with a delicate flush . . . Pink Tinge lipstick to make a pretty mouth more provocative . . . Pink Tinge nail polish to glamour-light each dainty finger tip. It's a tender, petal-fresh hue . . . color-keyed to Spring wardrobes . . . color-perfect for feminine skin tones. Welcome the Avon Representative when she calls to show you this exciting new shade . . . be a hostess to loveliness.

Avon cosmetics

IN RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

(Continued from Page 276)

she was mistaken. It was no fun pretending everything was all right, and she couldn't keep her mind on her work. At the blackboard in French her mind was a blank. She couldn't remember which verb was conjugated with être and which with avoir, so that her assignment was in such a snarl that Miss Wilson looked at her anxiously when she sat down. She became so confused in arithmetic that Mr. Harrison, who ordinarily would have kept her in at recess to redo her workbook drill, sensed that something was the matter and scolded her gently. "You can't expect to get the right answer with your own multiplication table." At other times she would have laughed with the rest of the class, for she didn't mind pleasant teasing. That was part of what was right at Hilltop: teachers were fun!

At recess time she told Sally and Nancy. Nancy's blue eyes in her gentle, round face looked puzzled as if she couldn't ever imagine mothers being so drastic. She shook her pigtails a little and said, "Maybe she is just upset and will change her mind. Mine often does."

"It is more than being angry this time," Elaine said honestly. "It is bigger and she means it."

Sally was more practical. She didn't waste time getting excited or saying that "mothers are mean"; Elaine knew she wouldn't. For Sally was what the teachers called "dependable." They were always asking her to do things that were responsible. Sally's merry, hazel eyes looked as if she were doing a great deal of important thinking. Then she said calmly, "Maybe it might help if my mother went over to see yours. And anyway, if you can't spell here, what makes her think you could at St. Catharine's?"

It didn't solve anything, really, telling them, Elaine thought, but it helped lessen the pain a little.

After lunch she walked arm in arm with them to the library. By all rights it should have been the perfect afternoon, for poetry was her favorite subject. It was "significant," as her mother would have put it. She felt a bond between herself and Miss Wilson, as if they knew a special world no one else completely shared.

It was beginning to snow thickly; the school seemed wrapped up in a gray, soundless cocoon. It was dim in the library, even at two in the afternoon, and quiet. Then Miss Wilson came in the doorway, hurrying, a little breathless, her arms full of books, and snow tangling in her hair. She flipped on the light and the snowdrops, still caught in the soft wool of her cherry sweater, glistened like dew. "Hello," she said, smiling at everyone a little mysteriously. Then she waved her hand, indicating that they should draw up their chairs into a wide semicircle in front of the fireplace. She sat down on a low bench in front of them. She didn't open any books or call the class to order. She just sat, looking thoughtful, as she did when she wanted them to become very quiet because she had something important to say.

"We're not going to have poetry today," she said finally, when everyone had become settled. "I have the nicest surprise for you. I was going to wait until Monday to tell you. Then the more I thought of it, the more I thought you might like to have the week end to think about it too."

Everyone looked wide-awake and interested.

"After Christmas vacation we're going to start working on our class play, which we always give in April. And this year it is going to be The Princess in the Tower, by Ellen Vincent Gerard.

"Oh, Miss Wilson," someone exclaimed happily.

"And"—Miss Wilson held up her hand in a way that said "the best is yet to come"—"Mr. Brooks has just made the most perfect suggestion: that now, since we have gas, we take the school station wagon and go barnstorming. I understand they used to at Hilltop before the war."

Then everyone began talking with a delighted chattering. Someone suggested a place to go. Sally, as usual, had a wonderful idea about scenery. No one noticed that Elaine was quiet, unusually quiet, that she just sat remote and awkward, knowing that she had nothing to say.

The Princess in the Tower, she thought incredulously; that lovely fantasy that Miss Wilson had read them at the opening of school which reminded her of silver and music and twilight. Curiously, she felt as if a door had closed on her face, shutting her out of Hilltop, as if she had already gone away. Even now the school was going on, expectant, excited, and she was standing still, looking regretfully after them. Somehow it didn't seem fair, fair at all, that everything had to conspire to make it so hard for her to leave.

She looked hastily out the window, trying to concentrate on the snow filling up the branches and hollows of the large sycamore outside the library window. For everything inside was getting blurry. And in the windowpane she had caught a glimpse of Miss Wilson's face, Miss Wilson looking at her intently yet puzzled.

Then Elaine turned her head. She knew she had to say something. "I think it's lovely." That was the best she could say at the moment, although she could tell that Miss Wilson was completely taken aback by her lack of enthusiasm. "I think Nancy will make a lovely princess," she then added, hoping to make it sound better.

There are two kinds of people in the world: the thinkers who never do anything, and the doers who never think. Due to the efforts of the rare intermediate type, civilization has survived.

Instantly she was aware that the class was completely silent. Everyone was staring at her.

"Didn't you understand me, Elaine?" Miss Wilson asked.

"You are to be the princess," Sally added. "Didn't you hear Miss Wilson say you had just the voice to do it? Nancy will be the page, and I'm to be ——" All at once Sally stopped. And Elaine could see that Sally had remembered. For she looked confused and funny and then Sally said in such an odd voice for Sally, "Oh, Elaine!"

All the tears which she had been trying to keep back welled up uncontrollably in her eyes. She heard Miss Wilson say insistently but gently, "Elaine, what's wrong? Don't you feel well?"

Then Miss Wilson didn't even wait for her answer. She jumped up from where she was sitting and started toward her. Elaine had the funniest impression that Miss Wilson and the class looked grotesque and out of focus. She got up uncertainly and backed away from the group, shoving all her unhappiness and torment back down inside her. She clutched for support at her books that she had stacked on the corner of the library table.

"I'm all right," she said, and her voice sounded even to her queer and faint. "I'm just sort of dizzy. I want to get some fresh air. No—no!" The last two words she shouted in sudden terror. "Don't come with me," she pleaded, "please; I'll be all right. I'll be much better alone."

She didn't even bother to gather up her books, even though they were right beside her. She couldn't, as a matter of fact, see very well. It was all she could do to find the door and close it behind her.

Once inside her room, she put her head down on her desk. Now that she was alone, the tears didn't come. Presently she sat up and looked out the window. The snow was coming down faster in thick, white, silent swirls. She thought, I'll just sit here and wait for mother to come. And, almost at the same moment, she saw her mother's blue convertible come slowly through the gateway and stop in front of the main building. It had happened. She had come to take her away. Elaine stood with her forehead pressed against the cool windowpane, feeling herself shaking with a kind of mute terror.

(Continued from Page 279)

didn't answer immediately. He just an l against the blackboard, his hands in the ockets of his sports jacket, and Elaine no ht he looked very preoccupied, as if ve dn't really been listening. No doubt he wa erribly upset with her at what mother au been saying. Then he pulled up a chair an at down opposite her.

Iiss Wilson."

e nodded, pleased.

'ou wrote it." He stressed each word a ully.

e nodded again.

hen he smiled. "Well, well, Elaine," he sa

or the moment her mother, her careless-ne , St. Catharine's seemed unimportant, al ost forgotten.

hen Mr. Brooks tipped his chair forward di began twirling an amber paperweight ol er desk before him.

Your mother was here," he said at last.

I know."

Do you know what it is about?" he estioned.

"Yes," she said slowly. "Is mother waiting the car for me?"

"No," Mr. Brooks said. "I asked her to go home. I wanted to talk to you alone. I ven't even talked with Miss Wilson or Mr. arrison yet. You come first."

"I do?" She didn't quite know what to y.

"Yes, Elaine, for I felt that such an imrtant decision about leaving Hilltop rested
th you."

"With me?" She looked up incredulously.
ot for one moment had it ever occurred to r that she had anything to do about it.

"I know you love Hilltop. Why, you beng here. You know, I've been looking for-ard, Elaine, to the day when you would be the eighth grade, counting on you to be ne of the leaders of the school. You've been ith us ever since the five-year-old kinder-arten. Do you know something?" He bent ver and lowered his voice, as if he were going to share with her the most precious ecret. "You and I came to Hilltop the same ear. I bet you don't remember that. I taught the fifth grade then. So you see you can't leave me. We've grown up here together. You have got as much to contribute to Hilltop as it has to you. Now it is up to you whether you go or stay."

"Up to me!" Elaine gasped.

"Yes." Mr. Brooks put down the paper-weight; his voice was grave, but his dark eyes were gentle. "I don't care so much whether you learn to spell or multiply—though you'll have a rough road ahead of you in high school if you can't—as much as I care, Elaine, that you face this responsibility and discover what to do about it. If you can learn to spell and do arithmetic and keep your notebook in order at St. Catharine's, of course, you can here."

Why, that's what Sally tried to say, Elaine thought suddenly.

"I told your mother I was going to talk it over with you. But I also told her I didn't intend to ask you for any answer or decision. I asked her not to push you for one, either. For if you think we are pushing you for an answer, expecting an answer from you, you'll give one just to please us. I don't want that. I want one that you have thought through, that will satisfy yourself."

He got up as quickly as he had come and swung his chair back to its proper place.

"O.K.," he said cheerfully.

Then he leaned over her desk and looked, for a moment, at the piece of paper describing Miss Wilson.

"What a girl!" he said softly.

She just sat there after he had left the room, her head awhirl. He hadn't scolded, or lectured, or raised his voice, or asked for a promise with a lot of strings tied to it. He hadn't even looked disappointed because she had let him down. It had just been like a pleasant conversation, the kind she had often had with him about books or plans for the Town Hall.

She hadn't been prepared for this, and all at once she found it far more bewildering. She didn't quite know what to do.

She knew that they expected her to do something, but she wasn't quite certain what. She only knew that they had put it up to her with complete confidence that she would work out the right thing to do. Sudden panic struck her. Even if she did find a solution that satisfied Mr. Brooks and Miss Wilson, how could she know that her mother would be content? Mr. Brooks and Miss Wilson were one thing, but her mother was quite a different matter. Suddenly the little hope that had been growing inside her oozed away. And the more she thought about it the more frightening it seemed. It was like jumping from one difficult problem in her arithmetic workbook to another. Pinetree Road and her mother and father still seemed very real and very frightening and St. Catharine's not at all far away.

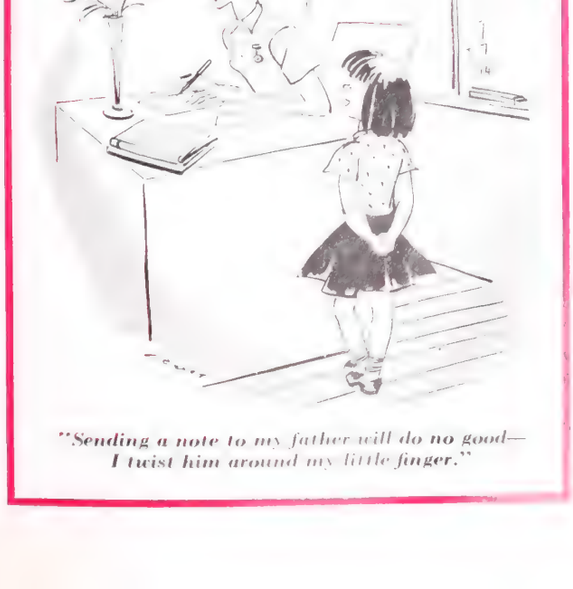
Miss Wilson came into the room and gave her a lingering hug and helped her into her snow jacket and started her out the door. "Darling, Mr. Brooks told me. You'll know what to do, for it is there inside you." She smiled as if it were settled already.

It was quite dark outside in the street. She scuffed along in the snow, kicking clods of packed ice with her boots. She was halfway home when she remembered that she had stuffed her offering to Miss Wilson in the pocket of her blue jeans. She had wanted Miss Wilson to read it alone. She stopped under a street light uncertainly. It was cold and dark and she was tired. Yet in a way going back would put off for a little while the finality of going home.

She turned and practically ran the whole way. She was just going to slip upstairs without turning on the light, for she knew every nook and cranny of the old building. But there were voices in the library as she went by, and the bright flicker of the fire. She might not have stopped outside the door, for the hall was gloomy and scary. Yet she heard her name.

"I'm so proud of you, the way you talked to Elaine."

Why, that's Miss Wilson's voice, Elaine thought, standing motionless and listening.



"Sending a note to my father will do no good—I twist him around my little finger."

"BOTANY"

white becomes you (12 months a year!)

White knows no season in "Botany" Brand Marchan. For this creamy textured smooth-complexioned gabardine has qualities that make it lastingly lovely the whole year 'round. Sizes 10 to 18. At one fine store in most cities. Suit around $45.00.

DAN GERTSMAN OF CALIFORNIA CREATED IT! This top-ranking California designer has a knowing hand with classics . . . has tailored them into National fame.

LOOK FOR THE CHECKERBOARD LABEL. The "Botany" Brand verifies the quality of the fabric—the manufacturer's name assures style correctness.

"BOTANY" BRAND FABRIC CREATED BY Dan Gertsman CALIFORNIA

This checkerboard label will be found in Fashions for the whole family—in styles for every occasion.

Write for store featuring this Dan Gertsman Suit . . . also for Free booklet of Fashions in "Botany" Brand Fabrics. Address Dept. S-79, P. O. Box #538.

the fabric comes first

BOTANY WORSTED MILLS, Passaic, N. J. • Worsteds and Woolens for Women's, Children's and Men's We
No-Dye-Lot Knitting Yarns • †Certified Fabrics for Home Sewing • The "Botany" Brand Tie, Robe, "500" S
Men's Sportswear • Lanolin Cosmetics

†Certified by Botany Laboratories Copyright 1947 by Botany Worsted Mills ®"BOTANY" is a trade mark of Botany Worsted Mills, registered in the U S Patent Offic

Yours for a Glorified Lifeline
...with Life's magic fit above and below!
One look tells you: No other bra and girdle could fashion your figure line to such perfection all the way. Because only Life-Bra and Life-Girdle are so cleverly designed to work together—above the waist and below. They fit because they're tailored-to-fit. See the proof today, at any of the better stores and shops. Look for the Formfit label, your assurance of quality—in fit, fabric, long life.
INSIST ON formfit CREATIONS
Life-Bra Above—the bra with the magic-fitting quilted cushions . . . Lifts, Molds, Corrects and Holds—all at once. $1.25 to $3.50.
Life-Girdle Below—the girdle with quilt-stitched front panel . . . fits you to perfection with elastic comfort and tailored-in material control. $7.50 and up.
THE FORMFIT COMPANY, CHICAGO, NEW YORK

"Mark, I wonder if you realize how much you do for children. Especially for Elaine. Hilltop has been her world. You've given her a kind of spiritual security."

Elaine didn't know what the last meant, but she stood, her back pressing into the wall and her insides watery and shaky. She knew she ought not to be there listening; yet no force within her could make her go.

"What about you?" Mr. Brooks was speaking. "Look what beauty you've let loose in her soul."

"But it was so easy." Elaine could just tell Miss Wilson was smiling in the dark. "You see, I was like Elaine once, a little fat, a little alien at home, and wanting desperately to find something beautiful and outside myself to cling to."

"It's hard to believe," Mr. Brooks said softly.

No, you couldn't have been, you just couldn't have been, Elaine protested silently with all she had in her, for the thought was wicked.

After a bit she screwed up her courage and peeked around the corner of the library door, because the room had become so silent. And she saw them, caught up by the reflection of the fire. They were sitting on the little settee. Miss Wilson was in Mr. Brooks' arms.

"I love you, Ann," he said. Then Mr. Brooks sounded so surprised—Elaine thought, Like daddy when he finds someone has put a present for him under the tree—for Mr. Brooks spoke so softly that Elaine had to concentrate to hear his words: "Why, I believe I have loved you forever, and I didn't know it until today."

There was a breathless hush like Christmas Eve just before the lights are turned on the tree. Then Miss Wilson laughed—not a laugh exactly, but a kind of low, tender murmur the way Miss Wilson had sounded the day Elaine was hit with a hockey stick and Miss Wilson had cradled her up in her arms.

Good manners spring from well-wishing: they are fundamental as truth and much more useful.

—From Lanterns on the Levee, Recollections of a Planter's Son, by William Alexander Percy (Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.).

"I know, Mark, I know what you mean," Miss Wilson said. "It has been forever. Today is just our discovery of it."

Why, it is like poetry, Elaine thought. Then she didn't feel ashamed of hiding in the dark any more where she knew she shouldn't be. For she was strangely grateful. It wasn't any new beauty. Although she didn't understand all of it, it was the lovely feeling that poetry gave her, intimate and satisfying. Just as the world of poetry had always promised. Only it was actually happening today. She stood entranced with her own discovery. Suddenly she realized Miss Wilson was reading. Only she couldn't be reading, for there wasn't any light, save the firelight of the hearth.

"I have been here before,
But when or how I cannot tell:
I know the grass beyond the door,
The sweet keen smell,
The sighing sounds, the lights around the shore.

"You have been mine before,
How long ago I may not know:
But just when at that swallow's soar
Your neck turned so,
Some veil did fall. I knew it all of yore."

It's the poem, the poem, Elaine thought, the one she read me yesterday.

And Miss Wilson's voice went on hauntingly sweet, but Elaine didn't hear her. For with a rare discernment, far beyond her childhood years, she had come face to face with her first glimpse of absolute beauty, the knowledge that real beauty was neither a temporal nor a material thing. Quietly she felt her way along the hall until she reached the outside door.

She felt exhilarated, on tiptoe, alive with wonder and understanding. She felt lifted out of herself and her world of Hilltop School and Pinetree Road. All the lovely, lovely secrets of the world that she had yearned to know were magically hers. She didn't mind any more that her name was Elaine, a name she had secretly felt to be ridiculous for one her size; she didn't mind that her mother would still continue to say to her, "Elaine, you home? What did you do at school today?" She didn't feel as if she would ever mind anything again.

She burst into her house eagerly, forgetting that she had ever felt on the defensive.

"Hello, mother." She rushed into the den. "I know I am late. I'm sorry, but Mr. Brooks talked to me and then I stayed late at school. But I'm going upstairs to put my books away and I'll be right down."

Once inside her room, she did close the door softly, out of habit. She put her books neatly on her desk, took off her blue jeans and hung them up properly, put on a fresh blouse and the red jersey jumper her mother had made. She even brushed her hair carefully. Then she remembered to turn out the light above her bureau. But before going down, she lingered in the dark, holding on to the beauty she had seen and felt for a few more precious moments. For she knew, a little regretfully, that once she went downstairs, life would never be quite the same.

Her father had come home and was in the den reading the evening paper. She sat down on the topmost step of the three little odd ones leading down to the study. Just for a moment she sat back and looked at her parents, for she realized that they were a little baffled by her neatness and good humor. She felt toward them so adult, protective and tender.

"I realize I have been careless about my spelling and arithmetic and neatness," she began without any effort. "I wouldn't admit it last night because I was mad and hurt. I heard you come in my room, too, mother, but I wouldn't say anything. I'll go to St. Catharine's if I have to. But you know I don't want to go. I'd much prefer to stay at Hilltop. I've thought of all the ways I can improve. I can give up going to poetry class three afternoons a week and I know Mr. Harrison, who is free then, will help me with my workbook. I won't go to my room and read when I come home and I'll give up the radio. Then maybe you'll help me, mother, with my spelling. I'll copy my messy notebook, all the pages Miss Wilson says are bad. And"—she paused and swallowed, for this was a bit difficult—"I won't be the princess in the fantasy, which will take extra time that I can put on my schoolwork—though aren't you pleased, mother, they asked me?" There, she had known what to say.

Her father had put down his paper and was looking first at her and then at her mother proudly. He said to her mother, "I don't think we need all manner of self-sacrifice, do you, Margaret? Just signs of co-operation and application were all we asked for." Then he reached over and patted her knee and looked at mother. "Maybe it won't be necessary to give up the play; what do you think, Kitten?"

And Elaine looked at her mother. She was wearing something rose in her hair that put soft pink lights in her cheeks and eyes. Mother was smiling with both relief and pleasure; and though it was for Elaine, she felt it was beyond her, something quite special for father, and intimate.

Kitten, Elaine thought. Why, the name does suit her. And she looked again at mother with pride and a new discovery.

"Of course, you know, darling," her mother said gently, "we are willing to have you remain at Hilltop and get all you can out of it, if you'll just do what is expected of you with your lessons. Mr. Brooks assured me today that you were perfectly capable."

"You know," Elaine said slowly, "I am not going to mind about the poetry, about missing the class as much as I thought I would. For you see, mother"—and the smile that gave such a promise of wisdom deepened again about her mouth—"I know now what the poem means." THE END

"Sure it's new, darling—three years ago!
The glamour changes are from the Singer Sewing Center!"

Many a weary dress has been refurbished into head-turning new charm by smooth, inexpensive Singer services!

We make smart buttons and belts in your own materials. We do pleating—hemstitching—buttonholing—all the professional touches that make a dress look expensive.

You'll find, too, an exciting collection of dainty jabots, fresh dickies, gay scarfs, novelty buttons, attractive trims, and notions that give you bright notions!

Ask about those wonderful courses in dressmaking or home decorating at your Singer Sewing Center today!

• Handsome belts, buckles, and buttons add professional finish to a dress! Singer experts will make them for you promptly—also tailored buttonholes.

• Smart novelty buttons and costume flowers are wonderful for perking up a plain dress. They're here—in every color of the rainbow and then some!

• Let frilly collars, cuffs, jabots, or crisp dickies give you that all-occasion fresh feeling. (See our glamorous scarfs, too—some sparkle with jewels!)

• Useful notions, smart trims are handily collected and displayed at your Singer Sewing Center. Peasant braid, thread, slide fasteners—all your sewing needs.

• Your stand-in! Famous Singer Form can be molded to any figure in 30 minutes. Assures perfect fit—saves try-ons. Wonderful substitute in sewing for absent daughter.

• Dainty hemstitching and picoting spell elegance and distinction! Yet for these expert services, Singer prices are pleasantly low. Service is mighty prompt, too!

• Triple blessing! It's a lovely piece of furniture—it's a cabinet Singer Electric—it's a handy portable. (Machine comes out in a jiffy, into its handy carrying case.)

FOR YOUR PROTECTION!

Singer sells its machines only through Singer Sewing Centers identified by the Red "S" on the window, and never through department stores or other outlets.

Check address of your local Singer Shop in phonebook. Singer Sewing Machine Company.

Here's the Singer Sewing Center at 149 South Main Street, Salt Lake City, Utah. Hundreds more from coast to coast. There's one near you!

SINGER SEWING CENTERS

THERE'S ONE NEAR YOU TO SERVE YOU

Beauty FOR YOUR BOSS ...YOUR BEAU

Medium-length hair is in place with gold barrettes; starched collar hides dressy neckline; relieved of severity with pins.

Long hair is tailored with invisible hair net. Shirt and scarf take place of dressy jacket to be worn for five-thirty date.

Do a neat and thorough grooming job before you leave your home instead of "finishing up" on office time.

Do smile at your boss and say "Good morning" first. Pleasant morning moods brighten the day's humor.

Do emphasize an immaculate look, instead of a "made-up" look. Cleanliness is your first and best beauty aid.

Do repairs on ripped seams, slip straps, broken nails, shiny nose away from the boss' condemning eyes.

Do include deodorants and breath fresheners for regular use. Fastidiousness is the first step toward attractiveness.

Don't let jangling jewelry act as irritating proof of your bad taste! Discretion is your most valuable asset.

Don't wear heavy perfumes! A light cologne or skin freshener will give a pleasing, not suffocating, fragrance.

Don't use the office as an experimental laboratory for novelty make-up. Artificiality is distasteful to men.

Don't let your "tailored look" imply a "masculine look." Neat feminine accessories will make the difference.

Don't wear dark polishes on long nails. Choose a soft, pretty polish to accentuate your immaculate, trim hands.

Just because a girl puts her heart into her work, she doesn't have to bring her heart interest into her office. Her feminine intuition, plus her understanding of male psychology, tells her that while frills, fragrance and tinkling bracelets might be a dream in the eyes of her beau, they are likely to be a nightmare in the eyes of her boss. She knows there is a time to impress a man with trim efficiency and a time to be sweetly beguiling. She knows, too, how to make this change swiftly and subtly at the end of a working day. No matter how hard she has worked at being self-sufficient from nine to five, she has no desire to appear self-supporting on a dance floor. She knows when to use conservatism instead of cosmetics to look "right"; that it takes more time to repair the damage of disorderliness than it does to maintain consistently an immaculate, well-groomed look. She's consulted her good sense and discovered the difference in being pleasant and being personal. If she's a beginner in the working world, she's found that cheerful anonymity works more wonders than a flagrant show. She has enough pride in her personal life to keep it from becoming an office conversation piece; and she has enough common sense not to bore her beau with her "workday worries." If she balances the effort she puts forth for each side of her dual personality, she'll be a star performer for her boss—and a leading lady for her beau! ★ BY DAWN CROWELL
Beauty Editor of the Journal

Office girl turned glamour girl. Hair is brushed to almost shoulder-length smoothness; bright jewels, flowers, softer neckline.

Cinderella change. Minus net, hair is tied with wi ribbon. Evening make-up, pearls, fresh violet

Do keep a beauty kit with ideas for an after-five glow! Shimmering lipstick; eye shadow, a pink-cast powder.

Do add a bandbox-fresh touch: a real flower; immaculate gloves; bright yarn or clips for a changed hair-do.

Do brighten up his life with your best smile, your most engaging manner. Show interest in the things he says.

Do use your femininity as a foil to his manliness. Daytime business girls can convert to date-time dream girls!

Do remember the things he likes: a certain way you wear your hair; a favorite flower; a special perfume.

Do carry fresh powder puffs; scented handkerchiefs;

Don't meet your date in apologetic disarray. Asking fo giveness for your appearance is embarrassing to him to

Don't let your office manners show. Let him mana the evening. Remember, you're his girl, not his guid

Don't dampen his mood by complaining about workd fatigue. Half the sparkle of the evening is up to yo

Don't embarrass him by any excessive display. You're better half for the evening; he wants to be proud of

Don't set up a dressing table on the dinner table. Re your make-up in moderation; too much is disillusionin

Don't forget your thank you's at the end of the da Yours isn't the only phone number he can memori

An English Complexion with Holly-Red lips by YARDLEY

To brighten your smile . . . a merry lipstick shade that's alive with the wonderful red of the berries that gladden English thickets . . . aglow with the young, fresh look that's the essence of an "English Complexion." With it, you'll want an undertone of Yardley Make-up Base to "Color-light" your skin, and a touch of matching Cream Rouge in Holly Red. And to perfect your look of dewy freshness there are eight flattering shades of soft, silken "English Complexion" Powder lastingly perfumed with "Bond Street." Lipstick comes in a distinctive case. Cream Rouge in a cunning little jar, 85c. All others $1 each, plus tax.

Yardley products sold in the Americas are created in England and finished in the U. S. A. from the original English formulae, combining imported and domestic ingredients. Yardley of London, Inc., 620 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C.

There's Magic in a Goal

BY DONALD A. LAIRD, Ph. D.

Blessed are the dissatisfied—if they have a goal

"WHAT were you working for on your last job?" prospective employers ask job applicants. Ninety-nine out of a hundred applicants give their last ·y as an answer. The hundredth says he orking for some specific goal—he wants earn the business, buy a house, get ried, lay by for independence by the e he is fifty.

'his hundredth person, the one who is king for a goal, is the one who gets things ıe.

Everyone in little Burslem, England, med to be working for a wage, rather than oal. It was a pittance of a wage too. And rslem was one of the most disreputable ıces in the world. It offended the eye and elled like a zoo. It was a pottery town—nost every back yard had its own small ttery beside the out-use, when there was outhouse. Waking ours were devoted to aking cheap stone-are pottery, and rinking and fighting. n Sundays a few folk ttended church, ıostly for the fun of ıterrupting the travel-ng preachers.

Thomas Wedgwood ıad a little pottery in ıis back yard, and thir-teen children. But even with the labor of all thirteen children he could not pay off the mortgage. When Thomas died his old-est son inherited the place, including the dur-able mortgage—so the children all worked for their oldest brother, except those who at-tained the age of independence.

The youngest, Josiah, was nine when his brother took over the back-yard establish-ment. For ten years Josiah worked for his brother in the mud of the pottery. Josiah had a painful limp—his right knee had been crippled by smallpox; later he was to have the leg amputated, but that is getting ahead of the story.

Squire Wedgwood, a cousin of the Burslem family, drove over from Cheshire one day, with his motherless daughter Sarah, to in-spect his poor relations. Josiah was then nineteen, and no longer indentured to his brother. The squire owned three times as many horses as the whole town of Burslem. Sarah was a traveled young lady, but she felt sorry for her nineteen-year-old cousin who sat with his lame leg in front of him, his face yellow from the years of child labor in the pottery shed. She gave him the book she had been reading.

JOSIAH could read, but most of his brothers and sisters could not. He memorized the book before returning it to Sarah, with a grateful letter. She sent him another book. He could not send her books, but he made a porcelain box in a beautiful new shade of green which he had developed. The ugly, pock-marked potter and the tall, slender girl who played the harpsichord were in love—and Wedgwood now had a goal for which to work.

The goal seemed impossible. A rich attor-ney had already spoken to Sarah's father about marriage. The squire harrumphed to his lame cousin: no Burslem potter could marry his daughter; she would have a dowry of several thousand pounds, and the man who married her would have to match it, shilling for shilling. They must not see each other for a year, the squire commanded.

"I'm sorry it is so much," Sarah told Josiah as he left. "But you can do it, I know you can!"

THE timid lad went to Sheffield, where he made pottery ornaments for knife handles. He was no longer an ordinary potter. His ornaments were beautiful, and were fired to be harder and more durable than others.

After working toward his goal for five years, he had laid away a thousand pounds. So back to dirty Burslem he went to start his own business.

He wrote Sarah: "Burslem shall yet be a symbol of all that is beautiful, honest and true; and I'll be the best potter England has ever seen." More goals for him: he was now not only going to marry Sarah, but also remove the odium from the expression "a common Burslem potter."

He started a flower garden, something new in dingy Burslem. He bought a horse so he could ride the forty miles to visit Sarah - the squire grumpily chaperoned every minute they were together.

Burslem potters had worked four days a week, stayed drunk for two, and hectored the preacher on the seventh. They had been satisfied with their low condition and miser-able living. That is the pathetic aspect about poverty: people get used to low conditions and are satisfied.

The young man with the limp and a goal gradually changed that. His flower garden was the opening wedge. He interested some of the townsfolk in new kinds of pottery, though many remained more interested in the two-day drunk. He hired a young artist to teach color and design. He changed Bur-slem. Instead of the old coarse brown pickle jars, the potters were now making vases and dinner sets of exquisite lightness and glaze, which the nobility bought at fancy prices.

At thirty, Josiah invited the squire to Bur-slem, to take another look at the potters' town which his lame cousin had improved. The squire harrumphed, and wiped his brow. He inventoried Josiah's property, and re-gretted it did not quite match his daughter's dowry—the squire's investments had in-creased the dowry.

So Josiah worked toward his goal for four more years, when the inventory more than matched the dowry. They were married. One goal had been reached. But Josiah had other goals now. He was determined to remove the village and the potter's trade from the disrespect which had always been their lot.

Sarah and Josiah labored together toward these goals. Burslem became an art center and was recognized the world over as the home of queen's ware, for Wedgwood had

(Continued on Page 389)

> Self-government with tender-ness—here you have the con-dition of all authority over children. The child must discover in us no passion, no weakness of which he can make use: he must feel himself powerless to deceive or to trouble us: then he will recognize in us his natural superiors, and he will at-tach a special value to our kindness, because he will respect it. The child who can rouse in us anger, or impa-tience, or excitement, feels himself stronger than we, and a child only respects strength. . . . The child sees what we are, behind what we wish to be. He is a magnifying mir-ror. This is why the first principle of education is: train yourself; and the first rule to follow if you wish to pos-sess yourself of a child's will is: master your own.
>
> —AMIEL.

To make a superb toilet tissue—firm and really practical—is one thing. But to give it cleansing-tissue softness, too—that's really remarkable! No wonder my whole family likes Scott's Soft-Weve!

Soft-Weve White-Facial Quality

A SCOTT TISSUE

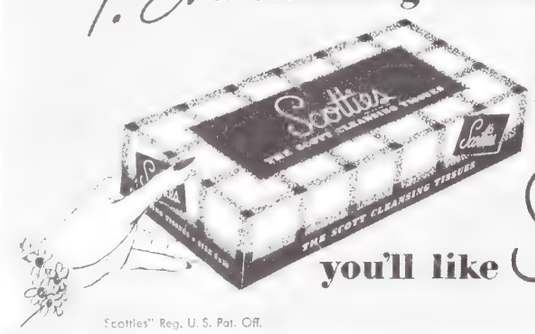
Soft-Weve

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

White-Facial Quality

Cleansing tissue soft ...toilet tissue firm

P.S. a cleansing tissue by Scott



...so soft ...so firm you'll like Scotties

Scotties" Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Hughes

All-a-round hair brush*

GEMS BY JOHN RUBEL

Deep-down excitement for your hair

● Sweep that soft light of satin into your locks . . . the new deep-action way . . . with the Hughes All-a-round. It's the brush with long, nylon bristles going completely around a sparkling Lucite handle. Wait till you feel it sink in your hair, tingle that tired scalp! Sweep it up or down . . . swirl it from side to side . . . you just can't help deep-brushing your hair. Ask for the Hughes All-a-round at fine drug and department stores.

Hughes Brushes, Inc., 500 Fifth Avenue, New York

*REG. PAT. APP. FOR.

(Continued from Page 287)

inted potter to the queen. He ex-s goals as he continued doing more ecame the richest man of his time.
e goals to others too. He awoke the satisfied town by making the peo-tisfied and then showing them how ve their products and themselves.
became a show place.
ed people do not get things done.
sfied person has reached his goal, if l works only for necessary wages.
issatisfied person has the urge to get lone. That is why many apparently y people do extraordinary things.

tisfaction over the lot of others has nany folk a goal too. Jane Addams' died when she was two; then came l fever, and she had scarcely recovefore the physicians discovered tuberwhich left her with a crooked back r head drawn to one side. One Sunday on her father took the frail, crippled irl for a ride through Freeport, Illinois.
ey passed through the slum section sympathies were aroused; it was her iew of how the other half lives.
tugged at her father's sleeve, pulled to him. "When I'm grown up, I want e right next door to poor people, and hildren can play in my yard." A goal, Jane Addams never forgot.
til she was thirty she spent many hs in hospitals, in a plaster cast or steel-ed canvas jacket. Then, with a friend, started Hull House in Chicago's slums, for nearly a half century worked toward goal. The momentum for getting things won her a Nobel prize, and a place at head of America's greatest women.

he Carver boy found his goal earlier in and on a more personal basis. He did know his family, so picked the name of rge Washington Carver for himself. As a d, while wandering about the South, he seen a mob beat out a Negro's brains and burn the body in the public square. He had no permanent home just slept in barns about the countryside until a laundress in Joplin, Missouri, took him in. He taught himself between schools, and was finally accepted at Highland University he had sent his high-school grades there but when the president saw him after he arrived for matriculation, he abruptly remarked, "We don't take niggers."

At Simpson College he lived in a shack on the edge of town, did the washing for other students. Scholastically, he was at the top, this tall Negro with the falsetto voice and the meek manner. His paintings of flowers won prizes at the World's Columbian Exposition, his musical skill won him a scholarship in the Boston Conservatory of Music — but he went to graduate school instead to specialize in agricultural chemistry.

"I can be of more service to my race in agriculture," he said. "I want to help the man farthest down—the Negro by teaching him how to help himself."

Iowa State College offered him a job teaching, but Doctor Carver packed his battered suitcases and went to Tuskegee Institute, where he gave his people new goals by making them dissatisfied with the primitive ways they were growing thin crops.

He worked long hours in his ramshackle laboratory, found how to make plastics from soybeans, rubber from peanuts, flour from sweet potatoes. Edison offered him a salary in six figures, a rubber company and a chemical firm offered him a blank-check salary to work with them. But he stuck by his goal, remained at Tuskegee with his $1500 a year.

George Washington Carver could have been a millionaire, but he never deviated from his goal. He got things done, made himself the wizard of farm chemistry, this son of slave parents who was one of the few Americans ever chosen to a fellowship by the Royal Society. He inspired his people to do things themselves by showing them ways which made them dissatisfied with the old.

THE END

★ ★

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

EVERY man desires the kind of wife who, though standing on her own feet, appears to be supported by him.

"He's a dear!" has helped more children than "He's a problem!"

No wife should try to get revenge by making her future catch up with her husband's past.

Small boy's comment upon seeing an enormous balloon: "Well, I guess that took all the air out of somebody."

Whatsoever a man seweth that shall he rip.

A child's will does not thrive on what he is prevented from doing, but on what he actually does.

One family has an infallible rule: the first person who raises his voice automatically loses the argument.

Our grandmothers believed enough in the proverb "The Lord will provide" to work hard that it would come true.

Three things that should never be oversqueezed: money, garlic and a woman.

"We often wonder," says one mother, "what we laughed at before the children came."

She was so afraid her listener would get in the talker's seat that she skipped periods as if they were rocks in the road.

From a freshman's autobiography: "At the age of two my father left my mother with five children and a truck garden."

The wife of a former salesman says, "My husband was much more interesting when he was on the road than since going into business for himself; he always had more interest in people, and more stories to tell."

A married couple should decide which one is to handle the money; sometimes a husband has holes in his pockets, sometimes a woman has holes in her fingers.

A young man must gradually fall out of love with his mother before he can successfully fall in love with a girl.

Some women want to keep the living out of the living room.

If we have to punish our children and what normal parent of a normal child does not?—what is better than a spanking which at once terminates all unpleasantness!

"To talk like a woman" means, to the average man, to jump at conclusions.

It takes real character to be a parent; child psychology only makes it more pleasant.

The longest way home is the quickest way to get married.

Tip to teen-agers: The owl gets its reputation for being wise from an ability to roll its eyes and utter an occasional "Who?"

★ ★

MAKE YOUR HAIR A 'VISION OF LOVELINESS' like Powers Models!

Let this amazingly beautifying shampoo uncover the natural glossy highlights in your hair

When you have an important date and want your hair to look a 'vision of loveliness' glamour-bathe it with Kreml Shampoo!

Even after your first Kreml Shampoo—just notice how your hair shines with natural glossy brilliance—how much softer and silkier it is.

You see Kreml Shampoo has been especially developed so that its rich active foam actually 'glamour-bathes' each tiny strand of hair and keeps it gleaming-bright for days.

Works like magic even in the hardest water

This famous hard-water shampoo works wonderfully in every type of water. It penetrates right to the scalp and removes all loose dandruff as well as the dirt. It NEVER leaves any excess dull soapy film. Kreml Shampoo even has a beneficial OIL base which helps keep hair from becoming dry.

Buy a bottle at any drug, dept. or 10¢ store. Make your hair a 'vision of loveliness' TONIGHT!

Wonderful for shampooing kiddies' hair

Kreml Shampoo positively contains no harsh caustics or chemicals. It never dries the hair. Mothers are simply delighted with Kreml Shampoo because it rinses out so easily and is so mild and gentle for children's hair.

KREML Shampoo

A product of R. B. Semler, Inc.

FOR SILKEN-SHEEN HAIR—EASIER TO ARRANGE MADE BY THE MAKERS OF THE FAMOUS KREML HAIR TONIC

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

It's the Dainty thing to do...

DIANA

Daintiness Panty Girdle with the Detachable, Washable Crotch

This ingenious panty girdle solves a bothersome personal problem . . . the detachable crotch whisks out easily for a daily rinsing. A dip in the suds when you do your stockings —and you've a flower fresh girdle, ready to mold you gently into that goddess-like DIANA figure that today's fashion dictates. For the matchless comfort of a panty girdle, for those smooth young lines plus the assurance of complete personal daintiness . . . wear a DIANA.

There's a DIANA for every figure type, regular girdle or panty girdle. From $5.95 to $10. Extra crotches for 59c. Diana bandeaux & brassieres $1.50 up.

Illustrated: DIANA detachable crotch panty girdle of gleaming rayon satin with satin lastex panels. Up and down stretch back. $8.50.

At these and other fine stores:

Boston — WM. FILENES SONS CO.
Brooklyn — ABRAHAM & STRAUS
Cincinnati — JOHN SHILLITO CO.
Cleveland — HIGBEE CO.
Columbus, Ohio — F & R LAZARUS CO.
Dayton — RIKE-KUMLER CO.
Detroit — J. L. HUDSON CO.
Houston — FOLEY BROS.
Los Angeles — BULLOCK'S
Miami — BURDINE'S
Milwaukee — BOSTON STORE
New York City — BLOOMINGDALE'S
Oakland, Calif. — H. C. CAPWELL'S
Pittsburgh — JOSEPH HORNE CO.
San Francisco — THE EMPORIUM

For free illustrated booklet L-3 write

THE DIANA CORSET CO., Inc.
1 East 33rd Street, N. Y. 16, N. Y.

THE VOLUNTEER WORKER—1947 STYLE

(Continued from Page 57)

2. RECRUIT VOLUNTEERS, REGISTERING AND CLASSIFYING THEM IN ACCORDANCE WITH THEIR INTERESTS, SKILLS AND TALENTS. Denver's recruiting job is weak, but the October register boasts 562 tried-and-true volunteers; they range in service from envelope stuffing, typing, mimeographing to doll-making, child care and recreational-group leadership. Most Denver women would rather work with children or babies.

3. GIVE AN ORIENTATION COURSE FOR VOLUNTEERS. Denver once insisted on attendance at an annual three-week orientation course, and by this time should be doing so again. Meanwhile, it watchdogs the agency to see that it provides on-the-job training and supervision. Volunteers retire in defeat if they feel they are not doing a job well.

4. MATCH JOBS WITH SKILLS AND REFER THE VOLUNTEERS. A cross-referenced file is the backbone of the volunteers' office; Denver can boast two trained retired librarians, a score of trained social workers, dozens of typists and many other specialists for special jobs—as well as "graduate" volunteers who have got their work training in the school of experience. Fledgling volunteers are carefully interviewed before placement; "the right job for the right volunteer" is the watchword.

5. FOLLOW UP BOTH THE AGENCIES USING VOLUNTEERS AND THE VOLUNTEERS SERVING THE AGENCIES. Miss Gallaher runs a private complaint clinic, and both volunteers and agencies are encouraged to present their difficulties. If two volunteers report lack of work, lack of interest in the volunteer or a non-businesslike approach on the part of an agency, the agency is ruled off the list of those serviced, with the reminder that if and when its attitude changes, the agency can call again. Volunteers who are irresponsible about their work are similarly struck off, but the volunteer who is unhappy, though dutiful, in her job is redirected to another job.

> There is one Mrs. Macaulay in this town. One day I said to her, "Madam, I am now become a convert to your way of thinking. I desire that your footman may be allowed to sit down and dine with us." She has never liked me since. Your levelers wish to level down as far as themselves; but they cannot bear leveling up to themselves. They would all have some people under them; why not then have some people above them?
>
> —SAMUEL JOHNSON.

6. PROVIDE, IN THE NAME OF THE COMMUNITY, RECOGNITION OF VOLUNTEERS. So closely knit and personally integrated is the Denver volunteers' office that recognition in terms of public praise and identification has not been needed. There is also a hang-over of distaste for wholesale distributions of wartime buttons and badges. However, the office plans shortly to adopt the V with the acorn (great oaks, you know) which is the national award for 100 hours of volunteer service. The Denver Community Chest this year, for the first time, awarded dependable workers a red-feather emblem.

7. STEP OUT OF THE PICTURE WHEN THE VOLUNTEER HAS PROVED HIS LOYALTY AND ABILITY TO THE SATISFACTION OF THE AGENCY HE SERVES. So truly does Denver's volunteer office serve, but not meddle in, the agencies' business that the agencies now, by and large, are registering their member workers with the office. This means the American Association of University Women, for example, can be called upon as a group, or individually, for needed work; it also means that users of volunteers, such as the clinics, can rely on the continuing use of the women they have trained.

BECAUSE of the personal, friend-to-friend feeling of the Denver volunteer office, the tasks of recruiting and recognition have been neglected for more pressing administrative work. To date, the best volunteers have been interested through friends, and, similarly, have received their sense of achievement from their coworkers or their jobs. It is usually true, however, that active campaigns are needed to gather in the what-can-I-do women and the nobody-ever-asked-me girls, and thus enlarge the scope of the bureau's work.

Organizations with the greatest past successes in the field of private welfare also have proved the value of some reward other than "psychic income." For example, the Junior League—an organization fast becoming better known for its community work than for its social standing—withdraws membership from any member who does not fulfill a hard program of civic service. Two warning cards, red and blue, are sent any girl failing in her responsibilities. Then comes the third card, a yellow one, and she's out.

DENVER'S specialty, however, is its invention of the "at-home volunteer." Recognizing the need of the young mother who does not want to lose touch with her community but who cannot leave her home, Miss Gallaher arranged that such volunteers receive assignments which could be completed at home. Now, like so many bees at work on a single honeycomb, all over Denver mothers of infants and toddlers are daily conducting surveys, making patterns, checking lists by telephone, creating toys and the like—from their own hearthsides. One young mother keeps her hand in the musical world by teaching a crippled boy to play the piano; another accompanies a blind boy who could not otherwise afford to practice his singing. Mrs. Bowen, who gets out to take the orphans to the park, also stays home two evenings a week to let the Girl Scouts in. A number of graduate "at-homers" now work in agencies; several have become board members. The tapping of this reservoir of youthful and eager talent is a real contribution.

Denver is also doing valiant and special service in another new field: that of finding and checking board members. Time was when the work of a board member was largely limited to prinking before the monthly meeting, and preening at the annual banquet. No more. A wasteful or haphazard budget gets short shrift from the Community Chest; and the thoughtful chairman, board member or president is likely to see his own time wasted through the inefficiency of others. Thus the well-run organization is now looking to its board members. An example is the Florence Crittenden Home in Denver. When new trustees were needed recently, the home's veteran president, Mrs. A. L. Oswald, sought recruits who were interested in "doing" as well as "being." She turned to Miss Gallaher for advice and counsel. Miss Gallaher, checking her files, helped her rebuild her board. Today six of the home's twelve board members are trained civic workers with a knowledge of the community and of welfare work, as well as special interest in the home's ancient and honorable service to unmarried mothers. The office is now making a file of all the city's board and committee members to eliminate overwork and overlapping even in this top-flight group of volunteer workers.

Denver's boys and girls are volunteers too. Girl Scouts are registered toymakers, envelope stuffers and addressers. Several youngsters in the community center in Denver's poorest neighborhood, across the tracks, sew dolls for the city-wide Santa Claus Workshop, where yearly supplies of food, clothing, toys and jewelry are "bought" by stamps given those on relief. Students from Loretta Heights College work in the community centers. Boys and girls from the Aaron Gove Junior High School social-science class redecorated a room in the Children's Aid Society recently. Eventually it is expected that academic encouragement will spread: in St. Louis, where volunteer work is an

(Continued on Page 292)

pulent—even in a season marked by exceptional elegance—is beautiful handbag features gold bullion embroidery on elvet, pure silk satin bow and lining, a Talon slide fastener.

The bag that's super with sables . . . Everything about it is rare — chosen with care. Even the slide fastener that guards your precious paraphernalia is the finest to be found. Yet this same Talon slide fastener, a quality feature in this $200 handbag, is so inexpensive you can bank on finding it in a purse at $2.95. Actually, it adds extra value to each.

Talon
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
THE QUALITY SLIDE FASTENER

TALON INC. MEADVILLE PA

Slip your foot into Hi-tide

and you'll slip into cross-stitched

Oomphies so blissfully comfortable you'll never want to take them off! Black gabardine is capriciously embroidered in seashore colors flecked with gold, for both your plain and party hours at home. $6.

OOMPHIES, INC. NEW YORK

Sorry, no mail orders.
Slightly higher in the Far West.

(Continued from Page 290)

established beat in the living rhythm of the town, Dr. Stuart Queen, dean of Washington University's Liberal Arts College, suggests a program of volunteer work as a substitute for the sociology term paper, and Stowe Teachers College demands fifty hours' work in a recreational agency before graduation.

Few men are registered with Denver's volunteer office, although Community Chest work is taken for granted among businessmen. Three couples, however, are listed; veterans of USO work, they are now serving as chaperons at community-center dances. But many who found work to do at night during the war are now idle, though willing, and it is hoped that work will soon be found for them. There will be—there is no lack of ingenuity: recently a stenographer volunteer wanted to work at an all-day health meeting but could not find someone to stay with her little girl until another volunteer was found to baby-sit; a group of women have established a lending service for formals for high-school girls who otherwise could not take part in school dances, recitals or graduation ceremonies; and when an old pilot-friend of our typical Mrs. Bowen was in town, Mrs. Bowen took a group of boys through the airport hangars.

Work—and pleasure—is also found for the elderly. One woman of seventy-one arrived one morning before the office was open in a defiant mood. She said she was mad because she knew there was so much to be done and "everyone wants to put me on the shelf." Miss Gallaher put her to work instead. A retired schoolteacher, she has since given several hours a week service for more than three years, filing, alphabetizing, and addressing envelopes. "It does something for me to work," she says.

Other cities, as well as giving thousands of man-hours (or should we say woman-hours?) of solid welfare work, also have their specialties.

Peoria's (Illinois) 400-strong Central Volunteer Bureau boasts one wheel-chair volunteer. Crippled by arthritis, she volunteered by phone, and has since started a clipping file for the bureau, and edited the manual. Boston has had great success with an "Are you a theory tester?" recruiting campaign. Married, nonworking women who were educated to become sociologists, psychologists or other specialists are encouraged to put their skills to work.

The effect on volunteer workers of their work is as valuable to the workers as the work they give is to the community. have volunteered because they felt of obligation. "Democracy isn't God- one woman said. "You have to work t it work." But to a woman, volunteers how they felt after several years of s said that while they had started with of duty, they continued now with a s real pleasure. "I get so much more working than I ever put in," was a frec heard comment. Several women sai fected and warmed the family too: c and husbands enjoyed hearing abo participating in what was going on said they had "given up" anything i to do volunteer work; most of fr sociable Denver belongs to book cl well as bridge clubs, and so do i unteer workers.

"It takes organization," Mrs. C Ashcroft said. "But I think the best of what community work means to families is proved by this: we in the Club hold our meetings on Saturday noons when our husbands are home t care of the children."

Wife (apologetically): "I took the recipe for this cake out of the cookbook."
Husband: "You did quite right, dear. It never should have been put in."

The attitude of th nessman toward vo work was stated by Bernet, president o ver's Community "Anyone who find self belittling it ou ask himself, 'Where we be without it?'" "And this year, wi rising cost of ever and the neglect of ou munity services due to the war, th given by volunteers is really needec really appreciated."

The attitude of the professional toward the new volunteer is also ap tive.

Kenneth W. Miller, executive secre the chest in Denver, said he believe it was a basic responsibility of the sional to be imaginative and resourc using volunteers, and to give prior volunteer training and encouragemen as it was the volunteer's obligation to the standards of the professional in th he undertakes to do.

"The volunteer of today wants standards and good supervision," Mr. said. "It costs Denver only fifty-tw dred dollars yearly to operate the Vol Community Services—and the retur immeasurable in terms of dollars. Ge rosity is beyond price. Volunteer activi participation is the foundation upon private social work stands. Without would crumble."

IS THIS LOVE?

(Continued from Page 31)

If your escort starts to go overboard, don't hesitate to say, "Look, fella, this water is getting too deep. We're going back." Perhaps you can convey the idea by your actions, rather than by words, which is better yet. It's no kindness to let a man get excited when you've no intention of gratifying him. Yet to yield because she has allowed such a situation to develop is the worst mistake a girl can make. So just break it up hereafter. Don't let it get started. Incidentally, all of this is easier to handle if you don't stay out too late or park too long, and if you keep to places where it won't be possible to break over. If you permit yourself to be steered into dubious situations, a great many fellows will take it as an invitation to undue familiarities. Even though you may be able to fight these off, you let yourself in for an undignified and unpleasant experience which you can avoid entirely by insisting that your escort take you straight home in the first place. All this is a part of the managing a girl has to do.

Never consent to do something against your own inclination and good judgment to please a boy friend. Be pleasant, friendly, interested, thoughtful—and within reasonable limits, affectionately responsive. But the more independent you are about your person and your emotions, the bette you will get along with the male sex, and the more attractive you'll be to men in the lon run.

I'd like to add one thing more. A you know, I'm not rabid on the subject of nking, but any honest person will tell yo hat complicating sex with alcohol is never ood, and is especially bad for girls who hav had no great experience with either one. at's one danger girls of my generation didn' ave to cope with, and I'm very glad we c n't. It's a good plan for young and inexperi ced girls to lay off one or the other; the two ken together often add up to an illegit ate child. You need all your wits about y as you find your way in this new medium and you shouldn't fuddle them with alcoho

Well, darling, I so appreciate your l ing me in on this, and if I haven't hit the ing you need, tell me what it is and I'll try ain. As a matter of fact, I am delighted tha you are beginning to realize your potenti ties as a woman. It's about time! And no eed to fear that you'll overstep, with that ear intelligence of yours to keep your em ons in hand.

Your always loving, if sometimes c use
MOTHER

Ladies' Home — The Magazine Women Believe In • April, 1917 • 25c

JOURNAL

Vase of Flowers, by Paul Cézanne

FRIENDS AND LOVERS . . . A NEW SERIAL . . . BY HELEN MacINNES

RED ROPE MAGAZINE BINDER
Manufactured by
GAYLORD BROS. Inc.
Syracuse, N. Y.
Stockton, Calif

HELEN MacINNES

"If it weren't for my own good marriage, Friends and Lovers might never have been written," says Miss MacInnes. "My husband and I were married fourteen years ago in England and have lived in America ever since he became a professor at Columbia University. Before the war my chief interests were my young son and my home. But when my husband joined the British army, I took to writing novels—five of them so far. Now the old team is together again, with only one complaint: too little time for the many things we'd like to do."

RONALD MITCHELL

"Despite the fact that I'm a college professor and expected, by legend, to be mild and absent-minded, I have lots of definite opinions which I'll defend at the drop of a hat," says the author of Design for November. "I don't like people who pay visits without warning, I hate the telephone, and I dislike most of what I know I would hear on the radio if I turned it on. I'm interested in directing and writing plays at the University of Wisconsin, where I teach drama and speech, and need only two things to make me perfectly happy: more time for writing, and a play on Broadway."

WINIFRED HALSTED

"I'm strictly a standard model when it comes to biographical material," says the author of Love is a Bargain. "After college I fiddled around with various jobs before starting to write because I thought that writing for a living would involve lots of trouble and toil. Eventually, strengthened by a typewriter and a good sense of humor, I did publish a number of short stories and four novels. During the war I joined the OSS, and now am busy again at writing—and very glad to be so."

JOURNAL CONTENTS

APRIL, 1947

Vol. LXIV, No. 4

NOTE: CONDENSATION COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE — PAGE

DESIGN FOR NOVEMBER — Ronald Mitchell — 12

FICTION

FRIENDS AND LOVERS (First part of five) — Helen MacInnes — 34
CANDY'S SECOND HUSBAND — Elizabeth Dunn — 36
DEAR COMPANY — Alec Rackouw — 38
THE LATCHKEY — Gertrude Schweitzer — 54
IS GRAN'PA REALLY DEAD? — Marie Read Smith — 56
LOVE IS A BARGAIN — Winifred Halsted — 61
ONCE AND FOR ALL — Dorothy Canfield — 70

SPECIAL FEATURES

LOOK HOMEWARD, ANGEL! — Dorothy Thompson — 11
YOU NEED PUBLIC HEALTH NURSES — 11
$37 A WEEK FOR TEACHERS — 12
A HOUSEWIFE LOOKS AT SOAP OPERA — Aloise Buckley Heath — 23
IF YOU ASK ME — Eleanor Roosevelt — 26
WHY RELIGION HELPS MESS UP THE WORLD — Harry Emerson Fosdick — 40
AMERICAN ART — John Walker — 41
I WANTED A BABY NOW! — Helene Wanderman Lefco — 44
WE DON'T WANT A BABY NOW! — Jeanne Lenton Tracey — 45
HOW TO THINK A THOUGHT — Gretta Palmer — 52
LET'S MAKE IT "THE PEOPLE'S RED CROSS" — Margaret Hickey — 66
THE RED CROSS: MEMPHIS, TENN. — Joan Younger — 67
IN YOUTH PREPARE FOR OLD AGE — George Lawton, Ph.D. — 192
READING THAT MADE HISTORY — Donald A. Laird, Ph.D., Sc.D. — 218
HOW AMERICA LIVES: GROWING PAINS — Emily Kimbrough — 227
DON'T CALL THEM SILLY — Louise Paine Benjamin — 238
DO YOU CRAVE PRESTIGE AND POWER? — Marguerite Barze — 245
HOW TO BECOME A FARMER — Esther Valck Georgns — 251
HOMEMADE OUT OF JUNK — Martha Brunk — 260
BABIES BY OUR BEDSIDES — Rosalind Bacon Hall — 284

GENERAL FEATURES

OUR READERS WRITE US — 5
UNDER-COVER STUFF — Bernardine Kielty — 14
REFERENCE LIBRARY — 24
SISTER ACT (The Sub-Deb) — Edited by Maureen Daly — 28
LETTERS TO JOAN — Gladys Denny Shultz — 31
FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL . JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN — 33
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY — Gladys Taber — 220
ASK ANY WOMAN — Marcelene Cox — 225
IMMUNIZATIONS IN CHILDHOOD — Dr. Herman N. Bundesen — 287
THIS IS A BUY-ME-THAT — Munro Leaf — 289
BRINGING UP PARENTS — Dr. Barbara Biber — 299
THE NOTION COUNTER — Elizabeth Metcalf — 304

FASHIONS AND BEAUTY

YOU CAN MAKE — Wilhela Cushman — 58
POPULARITY PLUS — Ruth Mary Packard — 60
ONE MORE SPRING — Nora O'Leary — 62
"I'M TIRED OF BEING CALLED FATTY!" — Dawn Crowell — 234
TICKTACKTOE . . . AROUND I GO — Josette Daly Lutz — 241

INTERIOR DECORATION AND ARCHITECTURE

SALEM, MASSACHUSETTS — Richard Pratt — 46
ROOM IN RED AND WHITE — H. T. Williams — 115
CHARM ROOM FOR GIRLS — Henrietta Murdock — 242

HOME MAKING

EARLY VARIETIES — Ann Batchelder — 68
ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT — Gladys Taber — 72
LINE A DAY — Ann Batchelder — 74
NEVER A DULL MEAL — Mary Lasswell — 208
QUICK AND EASYS FOR TWO — Louella G. Shouer — 222
REPORT TO THE HOUSEWIFE — Judy Barry — 252
CONVERSATION PIECE — Ruth Mills Teague — 255
A WEEK'S DINNERS FOR FOUR—$10.50 — Louella G. Shouer — 300

POETRY

UTTER LONELINESS, Grace Milburn 79 • SPRING—1947, Anobel Armour 84
BABY SITTER, Ethel Jacobson 94 • TEARS, Isabelle Bryans Longfellow 106
PORTRAIT, E. V. Griffith 113 • I KNOW IT'S SPRING, Mae Winkler Goodman 118
HOME, WHERE THE TREES WERE, Kingsley Tufts 134 • WINDFLOWER AND BOULDER, Ethel Romig Fuller 155 • SONG FOR A FOUR-YEAR-OLD, Eunice Mildred LonCoske 181 • MONA LISA, Patricia McDonald 200
WHEN YOU HAVE GONE, Eugene T. Maleska 213 • SPRING IS NO STRANGER, Catherine Haydon Jacobs 249 • HOW LATE THE WILLOW, Hortense Flexner 256 • THE CIRCUS IS COMING, Myrtle Chance 270 • SPRING ENSEMBLE, Bernard D. N. Grebanier 276 • APRIL NIGHT, Robert P. Tristram Coffin 282 • WISH IN THE ATOMIC AGE, Elizabeth-Ellen Long 291
PARLEZ-MOI D'AMOUR—BUT LOUDER, Mary Norton Gordon 297

Cover: Painting by Paul Cézanne

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, copyright 1947 by The Curtis Publishing Company in U. S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U. S. Patent Office and foreign countries.

Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second Class Matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia under the Act of March 3, 1879. Entered as Second Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

Subscription Prices: U. S. and Possessions, Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador, Costa Rica, Cuba, Nicaragua, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America except the Guianas, 1 yr., $3; 2 yrs., $5; 3 yrs., $7; 4 yrs., $9. Other countries, 1 year, $4. Remit by money order or draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. funds. All prices subject to change without notice. All subscriptions must be paid for in advance.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTY. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company, Walter D. Fuller, President; Fred A. Healy, Vice-President and Advertising Director; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Vice-President; Cary W. Bok, Vice-President and Treasurer; Lewis W. Trayser, Vice-President and Director of Manufacturing; Benjamin Allen, Vice-President and Director of Circulation; Robert E. MacNeal, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Manager of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Country Gentleman, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS: Send change of address (naming magazine) to

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

at least 30 days before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Send old address with the new, enclosing if possible your address label. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide extra postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S

LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

"The Sea of Grass", by Conrad Richter, aroused a storm of comment when the serial first appeared in The Saturday Evening Post.

★ ★ ★ ★

Everyone talked about the audacity of this dramatic adventure of a strange marriage.

★ ★ ★ ★

Then, when Hollywood heard that M-G-M had purchased it for the screen, they wondered: Could M-G-M handle the story's daring theme? Could the actors chosen for the roles measure up to its romantic and tempestuous characters?

★ ★ ★ ★

The answers: M-G-M could, and the actors did.

★ ★ ★ ★

Spencer Tracy plays Jim Brandon, rugged ruler of the great ranchlands, locked in a titanic struggle for power—and demanding from his beautiful wife more than any man has a right to.

★ ★ ★ ★

Katharine Hepburn plays Lutie, Jim's wife, who battles courageously for her man's love—and then is unfaithful to him when she discovers that he values other things more highly.

★ ★ ★ ★

Robert Walker is Brock, the wild, reckless kid who was born under an evil sign and destined to be a killer.

★ ★ ★ ★

Melvyn Douglas is Brice, a fighter and schemer, who loves well but unwisely.

★ ★ ★ ★

Phyllis Thaxter, Edgar Buchanan, Harry Carey, Ruth Nelson and Robert Armstrong are in the supporting roles.

★ ★ ★ ★

This wealth of talent, this stirring story, are dramatically set off by the daring direction of Elia Kazan. Pandro S. Berman will get long and ringing acclaim for his stunning and startling production of the screen play by Marguerite Roberts and Vincent Lawrence.

★ ★ ★ ★

See if you don't think "The Sea of Grass" one of the most exciting motion pictures you've ever seen.

—Leo

P.S.—GOOD BOOKS! GOOD NEWS! M-G-M has the three big best-sellers! Watch for news about the screen productions of "The Hucksters", "B. F.'s Daughter", and "East River".

The Countess of Carnarvon

Famous in both European and American society for her electric beauty . . . for her superb artistry as a ballerina

Exotic

The Countess of Carnarvon heightens the rare, exotic beauty of her own coloring with exquisite new make-up colors styled by Pond's—

POND'S MAKE-UP PAT AND DREAMFLOWER POWDER both in a new, richer, petal-smooth "Rachel."

POND'S "LIPS" in shot-with-blue crimson—"Heart Throb."

"I'm particularly devoted to a Pond's make-up because it stays on so beautifully," the Countess says. "And I've never chosen from a more satisfying range of really new-looking shades!"

Perfect make-up ensemble—Pond's cake make-up . . . powder . . . lipstick

a Pond's make-up stays on... and on... and on!

Our Readers Write Us

iner's Wife Sees Red

Gilb[illegible]

Dear Editor: When I read about the mily you are writing about in your arch issue of LADIES HOME JOURNAL saw red.

I am the wife of a coal miner. My father nd his father were coal miners. We don't ave pigs, and I don't chew tobacco. I on't even smoke.

We live in a five-room white cottage hat is nice, by anyone's standards. Our itchen is pretty enough to use as a magazine picture. Our bathroom is neat and tiled. Our lawn is kept neatly cut all summer, as is the hedge around it.

"Typical miner's" family.

My husband spends all of his spare time with us and in making our home more convenient. He is making an electric blower for our furnace at present. You should see the lovely iron fence he designed and made for our front porch.

We have two very nice girls. Our fourteen year old is in the [illegible] high school. She plays classical music on the piano (she has taken lessons for years, even though we had to do without things to pay for them). Our ten-year-old is a lovely blonde. She limps slightly because of polio at five. She, too, plays the piano.

I spend my spare time working as president of our P.T.A. and treasurer of Women's Club. I make most of our clothes.

My seventy-seven-year-old mother lives with us. We have known the ups and downs of miners' strikes and no pay envelope and come up smiling. We have known the heartbreak of polio. We are a real typical miner's family.

Sincerely,
MRS. ADOLPH C. MYERS.

And She's Disgusted

Penn[illegible]

Dear Sirs: Why is it that every time a coal miner's family is pictured it is of the most disgusting nature? The family you described can be found but rarely. The younger miners of today don't always have such large families. I never saw a miner's wife chew tobacco. I've also never seen pigs rooting for garbage under their houses.

The coal miner is not of the underprivileged class. In the modern mechanical mine, men enjoy their work and each has his own skill. They live and act the same as men in any industry. You find all types of families and homes in any industry. Give the coal miner a break.

Sincerely,
MRS. J. L.

The miner we presented [illegible] and in the article about him, is not typical. ED.

Drinking Again

[illegible]

Dear Sir: I have often wondered if writers are paid by the liquor interests to project this propaganda (drinking) into their writings. If that is not so, then the writers have a lot to answer for in giving the younger generation the impression that it (drinking) is so common.

In this country we spend more money for liquor than we do for education, and that is dangerous.

Sincerely,
MRS. L. F. BURRIS.

If Americans spend all that money on liquor, drinking must be common. Writers don't make it any more so. Mrs. Burris noticed, as do many of our readers, that the JOURNAL does not accept liquor advertising. ED.

Others Get the Breaks

Union City, New Jersey.

Dear Editors: After reading your How America Lives, I want to voice my opinion. These poor struggling families that start from scratch and within a few years have a bank account, car and own a home must get help from somewhere.

I come from a family of nine children. My father made just enough to keep a roof over our heads and just enough to eat. I prayed every night to God to help us and stop my father from drinking and quarreling, but I guess little girls' prayers are never answered. Things went on until I was married at 18. I had two children the first two years. But I never gave up hope of getting ahead. Finally we had four children. As years went on my husband started to go out and stay in the taverns with his friends. Now things are so bad that I do not care if I live or die.

So when I read about these families with their dreams materialized, I begin to wonder if God just has special ones He wants to help. They must get help from somewhere to get their breaks.

Sincerely,
Name withheld by request.

The Constitution merely guarantees us "the pursuit of happiness"—some few catch up with it. Most of us hope our children will do better. ED.

Let the Teacher Teach

Mount Vernon, Ohio.

Dear Editor: As a teacher who is about to close a career of twenty-seven years spent in the public-school, private-school and university fields, I wish to commend the JOURNAL'S crusade. Professor Schorling's Bill of Rights for Teachers is the most constructive bit of thinking so far on the subject.

Give the elementary teacher a higher salary, smaller classes; give her an opportunity to show what she is capable of doing in a proper environment and you will solve many of our educational problems.

Sincerely yours,
EDITH CAMPBELL.

Grand Thanks—Almost

San Antonio, Texas.

Dear Sir and Madam: The 999 members of our organization wish to thank you for the publicity your magazine has given to the necessity for raising teachers' salaries.

Sincerely yours,
J. H. HELLER
President, San Antonio Teachers' Council.

Couldn't you make it an even thousand? ED.

And Again Thanks

Des Moines, Iowa.

Gentlemen: I wish to add my word of commendation to the others you have undoubtedly received for your intelligent interpretation of the crisis which faces the public schools today. Your help in bringing facts to the public is appreciated by those of us who are endeavoring to keep the schools staffed with adequately trained, genuinely interested, forward-looking teachers.

Sincerely yours,
WALTER TROTT
Director, Des Moines Public Schools.

The Hairbrush Technique

Newark, New Jersey.

Our Readers Write Us Editor: I am pleased that Mrs. Koegel has broken the taboo on discussion of spanking in this

What puts the go in the gals they go for?

● Those gals aren't always pretty. But they're always pretty smart—specially about their clothes. They know the knack of keeping everything they put on fresh, feminine and appealing.

Get the inside story on a popular gal. See some of the little things that make her a big hit.

beguiling freshness

She knows how to keep her undies dainty and attractive. Hers always get bathed in Ivory Flakes suds. That helps guard against fraying and fading. Everybody knows no soap gives clothes or colors gentler care.

streamlined curves

She counts on her girdle to control 'em! And she counts on safe Ivory Flakes to help keep her girdle on the job. See how much longer your girdle keeps its fit and stretch with baby's pure Ivory.

fun-loving clothes

She keeps 'em ready for fun! That eye-catching dress of Lanaset*-treated wool jersey gets sudsed in Ivory Flakes. It's one soap fashion designers and fabric experts recommend to help keep her washables looking bright, fitting right. So take their tip and skip strong soaps—rough handling. Head for twice the wear with Ivory Flakes care.

eye-filling legs

Does she worry about needless runs in those flattering chiffons? No, ma'am! Her stockings get daily dunkings in baby-mild Ivory Flakes. No strong soaps for her. Not when strain tests prove regular, gentle Ivory Flakes care slows down runs up to 50%.

LANASET* Resin. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

if it's lovely to wear
it's worth Ivory Flakes care

Craftspun Curtains

...ready to hang, without cutting or sewing!

YES, YOU CAN HAVE curtains with that "custom" look, for a fraction of what you'd expect to pay. Craftspun* lace net curtains are full-cut, and so sheer and soft they adjust instantly to any window width. Just buy them and hang them. They're ready-hemmed and many styles come in 6 standard window lengths.

You'll love the stunning new 1947 designs that filter the sunlight, protect your privacy. Craftspuns are still made to our exacting pre-war standards of fine 2- and 3-ply cotton yarn for added strength, and with that famous Craftspun tied-in-place weave which prevents fabric slipping. They'll keep their fit and beauty through washing after washing.

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

SCRANTON

CRAFTSPUN Curtains

THE NET OF THEM ALL

column. Child psychology is a desirable means of managing 2 per cent of the children. The disastrous effect of disarming 98 per cent of the mothers of the hairbrush is the harvest of delinquency. Bad effects of spanking have been exaggerated by highlighting abuses by unstable parents. Children many times daily take bumps more painful and potentially dangerous than a judicious spanking without any great alarm. My four children are punished when necessary by a slap or a formal whipping without detracting from their personalities.

The time has come to re-examine the need for corporal punishment, allowing as much discussion as has been given to child psychology.

Sincerely,
(Name withheld by request).

Also it is more fun to spank children than to reason with them—and to bring them up to be amenable to reason. Except for occasional "devils," children are about what parents make them—reasonable facsimiles of parents. Why not spank yourself every time you spank your child? Then you could truly say, "This hurts me" . . . etc. ED.

Never Underestimate . . . etc.

Santa Barbara, California.

Dear Sirs: I have been collecting your delightful Never Underestimate the Power of a Woman advertisements for the last three years. They are the cleverest and most amusing drawings I know. I have twenty-seven different ones pasted in a scrapbook and I'm wondering how many of them you have published in all. Did you use them before about February 1, 1944? My favorite one is the picture of the General—first his triumphant entrance into the city, and then his domestic surrender. Perhaps because my husband is a general and he often helps me wash the dishes.

Gratefully yours,
EVELYN McKINSTRY.

We began in February, 1941. ED.

The Not-Impossible She

Ontario, Canada.

Dear Madam: "Never underestimate the power of a woman"—now really! Surely it must be obvious to anyone with the mentality of a five-year-old that it is impossible to use a verb such as "underestimate" sensibly except in a past tense. A person may engage himself in the task of estimating, using every means at his command to insure the highest possible degree of accuracy, until he is purple in the face, but not until his estimates have been put to the test of actuality, and considered in the light of the facts, can he determine whether he has erred in the direction of overestimation or underestimation.

Yours very sincerely,
R. L. HEPBURN.

Oh, to be in England?

The Duke's Cottage,
Rudgwick, England.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: The other day, for some paper over here that is running a thing I did about an Edwardian childhood, press photographers visited me in my home. This has not happened to me over here before. Since the day I lay nude in a shell on a sheepskin rug, I have always been photographed fully clad, safe in a studio or office. Green as I was, I thought when they took your picture at home, they just photographed the sort of life you led, and how you looked doing it. Maybe reading by the fire, or stirring something in a bowl, or brushing the dog.

Far from it. A young man with long hair who seemed to have mislaid his hairbrush for quite a while appeared with so much apparatus it looked like he was going to build a trapeze or experiment with the atom. He screwed things onto other things, wrecked the whole sitting room, posed me seated in a curious crouching position inside the fireplace with an arc lamp in back of me, which must have given the impression my posterior had burst into flames. I now await, with beating heart, the result.

Later. News having got around that Mary may be going abroad shortly to join her husband in some distant spot, either India, Austria or Trieste (it seems to alter day by day), long queues are ganging up even heavy smokers dislike the smell of

(Continued on Page 8)

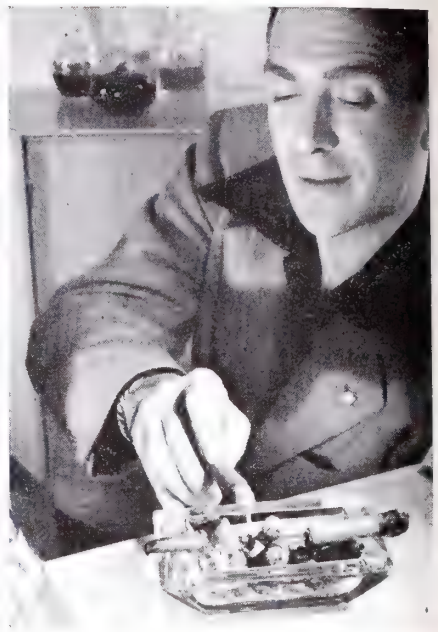
stale smoke



keep air-wick in your living-room always

There's no longer any excuse for a living-room that reeks of stale tobacco smoke. Use air-wick* in your living-room for an hour or two each day...longer if there has been unusually heavy smoking. air-wick is just as effective in the kitchen to kill the odor of cooking cabbage, onions, fish. It freshens the air in bedrooms and nurseries and keeps bathrooms fresh at all times. All you do is uncap the bottle and pull up the wick. There's nothing to light... nothing to burn . . . nothing to mix . . . nothing to spray. Ask for air-wick at any of the better retail stores.

*air-wick deodorizer and household freshener is fully protected by U.S. Patent...a trademark of Seeman Brothers, Inc., New York 13, N. Y.

Tune in "Monday Morning Headlines". Sunday, entire ABC network, following Drew Pearson.

why risk offending?

air-wick kills all household odors

costs only a penny or so a day

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

© 1947 SEEMAN BROS., INC. PAT. NO 2,326,672

Conversation at MAIN & LOCUST

...about these

"...why Nell, you didn't!"

"...but darling, I did. When they told me in the store about the silverplate with those two blocks of sterling silver, what was I to do?"

"...But, Nell! You didn't really?"

"Well, I wasn't going to stand there and take any other kind. I want my silverplate to stay beautiful!"

"So what did you do?"

"I did what any other girl would do. I picked out the Danish Princess pattern because I adore it, and because it's that wonderful Holmes & Edwards Sterling Inlaid silverplate!"

"I knew it! You picked the same pattern!"

TO BE SPECIFIC The most used spoons and forks are INLAID with two blocks of sterling silver at backs of bowls and handles like this!

. . . not reinforced . . . not extraplated, but Sterling Inlaid silverplate to stay lovelier longer.

HOLMES & EDWARDS
STERLING INLAID° SILVERPLATE

HERE AND HERE
It's Sterling Inlaid

Danish Princess Youth Lovely Lady

IMPORTANT: Here is one of the few products in America that has not raised its price since the war! Fifty two piece service, eight place settings . . . only $68.50 with chest. (Tax Free). At jewelers and silver departments choose from three favorite patterns—left to right: Danish Princess, Youth and Lovely Lady—all made in the U. S. A.

Copyright 1947, The International Silver Co., Holmes & Edwards Div., Meriden, Conn. Sold in Canada by: The T. Eaton Co., Ltd., °Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Glamorous foundations for every make-up mood on your calendar

Lights Up—a liquid color-cover
Finisheen—a color cream less opaque
Elation Make-up Film—transparent film
Elation Make-up Balm—liquid, sheer powder base

The day is off to a good start when your skin glows a "thank you" for consistent skin care . . . care that begins with the perfect cleansing creams made especially for your skin type. Daylight continues flattering when your skin enjoys a completely personalized foundation from on her after her house. It is the sort of devil-may-care furnished house everyone wants, because it's all planned for children, with transfers and chalk drawings and pencil drawings on most of the walls already, and a lot of child-sized furniture in the nursery. One of the tragedies of these times is the innumerable advertisements for rooms and houses, stipulating "No Children or Dogs."

(Continued from Page 6)

Ida Wylie and I are trying to hatch the most wonderful plan to exchange houses for a month or so next summer! She warned me, as if it were rather a disadvantage, that it would be hot over there then!

Later. Bruce, how young you are! I am lost in admiration for the way in which you have kept your boyish illusions. Love is grand, but like cooking, it is more sport when it is at the experimental stage. Presently, when it settles down to, as you might say, daily drudgery, it isn't really so good, though the films, and light fiction, and nice men like you do your best to keep the flame all glowing for us. Personally I await the coming of a film setting forth the beauties of being out of love. The marvelous feeling of not giving a damn, but pleasing yourself. There was much to be said for the miller who lived on the Dee and said, "I care for nobody, and nobody cares for me." I suppose I have popped in and out of this glorious state as frequently as most girls (though, looking back on it all, I am often amazed at how good my generation was; in a tropical climate, too, where the female was in a minority of something like twenty to one). And speaking as an honest woman, I am honestly not sure that the most wonderful words in the world are, "Darling, I love you!" I think they are, "It's a boy!"—or, "It's a girl!"

My love to all of you, everywhere!
DOROTHY BLACK.

Our impression is that a woman seldom says either unless she has first been told "I love you" not once but several times. ED.

A Just Cause

New York 22, New York.

Dear Miss Brookman: There is a basic American concept that this land of ours is bountiful and that the opportunity for self-development and achievement it yields is available to all.

With spotty exceptions, however, Negro Americans have not always found this concept sound. This segment of our population has striven against great odds to overcome handicaps to its attainment of even the modest essentials of the good American life, not the least of which is education.

Today, we who believe in the justness of this cause are working through the United Negro College Fund to make the going a little easier for the nearly 30,000 Negro students who crowd the 33 Negro private colleges sharing in the fund.

It is my hope that other women who feel the way I do will come forward with their gifts. Each and every contribution will redound to the good of America itself and to all Americans.

Very sincerely,
JEAN ELLIS POLETTI.

The Reader's Right

Plainview, Texas.

Editor, "Our Readers Write Us": I want to tell you what a terrific bang I get out of your positively brilliant retorts to the readers' letters. They are so to the point and always so right; most interesting person in the whole magazine, I'd say!

Sincerely yours,
DAPHNE HAYWARD.

Daphne, you are so right! ED.

No Cash—Three Kids

Fresno, California.

Dear Editor: May I go on record as being burned to a crisp by a letter headed, No Cash, No Kids, in which a woman advises married people to "Have no more children than you can afford" and thus find a simple solution to the high cost of living? I wonder if American womanhood hasn't lowered herself by trying so hard to escape child rearing.

I have three children, none of whom were planned. We really couldn't afford

(Continued on Page 239)

Why I don't use Tampax

I was born in 1910 and that da is the best and only reason I can gi for being so stubborn about a n method like Tampax for monthl sanitary protection. I'm the same w about harlequin glasses and sho with open toes. I guess I'm just too to follow the modern ideas.

* * *

Do you ever make a confession to yo self like the above? Are you still ho ing back from Tampax and all its vantages? Think how tiny and inc spicuous Tampax is in your pur And you are not even aware of it wh in use. No belts, pins or external pa No odor and no disposal proble Think how Tampax helps your po and frees you from self-conscious e barrassment.

Perfected by a doctor, Tampax is m of pure absorbent cotton compres into patented applicators for qui easy insertion. So dainty your ha needn't touch the Tampax. You wear it in tub or shower . . . Sold drug or notion counters in 3 siz Regular, Super, Junior. Tampax corporated, Palmer, Mass.

Accepted for Advertising by the Journal of the American Medical Associa

TAMPAX INCORPORATED LH
Palmer, Mass.

Please send me in plain wrapper a trial packa of Tampax. I enclose 10¢ (stamps or silver) to cover st of mailing. Size is checked below.

( ) REGULAR ( ) SUPER ( ) JU

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State____

Pityrosporum ovale, the strange "bottle bacillus" regarded by many leading authorities as a causative agent of infectious dandruff.

When children are going to school—

Look out for Infectious Dandruff!

; TROUBLESOME. It's common. It's catching. :'s often hard to get rid of. And, for some ɔn, school children seem to be right in line for type of trouble.

ɔ, at the first sign of flakes, scales, itching, get ed at once with Listerine Antiseptic and mas- . Better yet—use Listerine Antiseptic as a aution every time you wash the children's hair.

ıfectious dandruff is nothing to fool with. It s for prompt treatment . . . positive treatment antiseptic treatment.

Kills "Bottle Bacillus"

isterine Antiseptic gives scalp and hair a won- ul, cooling antiseptic bath . . . kills millions of very germs that many dermatologists say is a causative agent of the trouble . . . the stubborn "bottle bacillus" (Pityrosporum ovale).

You will be amazed to see how quickly nasty flakes and scales begin to disappear. You will be delighted to find how wonderfully healthy and fresh the scalp and hair begin to look. In clinical tests, twice-a-day Listerine Antiseptic treatment brought marked improvement within a month to 76% of dandruff sufferers.

As a Precaution

Don't wait until infectious dandruff gets a head start. Do as countless mothers do: make Listerine Antiseptic a part of the children's regular hair-washing. Incidentally, many of them follow the same routine with their own hair.

Listerine Antiseptic is the same good Listerine Antiseptic you've known so long . . . a trustworthy first-aid in the home where germ-killing action with complete safety is a prime requirement.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY, St. Louis, Mo.

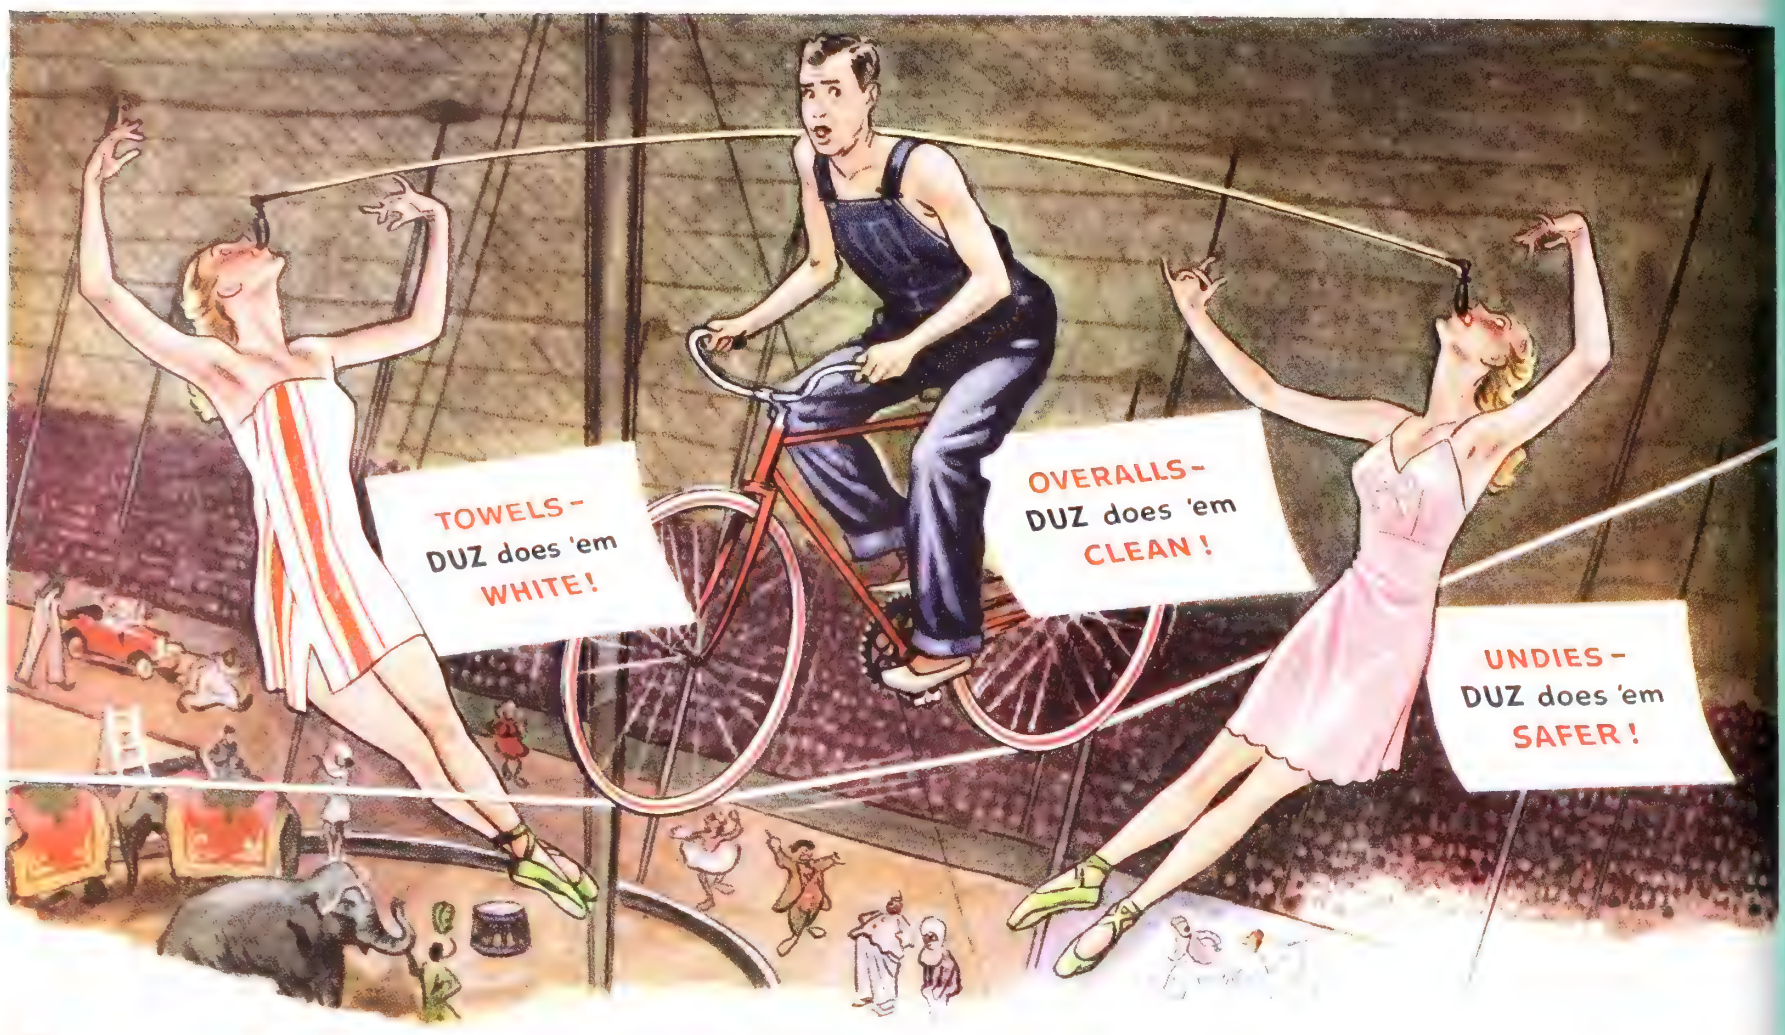
At the first symptom of trouble...

LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC

Quick!



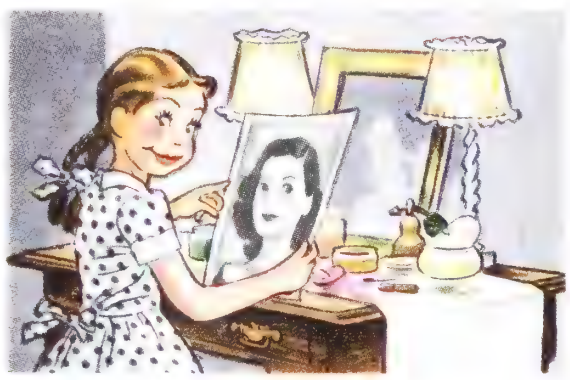
"Swell, DUZ-but the audience is way ahead of you!"

WRITES MRS. JEFF HORN OF SHREVEPORT, LA.

"Why tie yourself down to just towels, overalls and undies in your ads? I'm sure every Duz fan knows that towels are fleecy white after a good Duz-zing. That Duz makes dirty work clothes come clean in a hurry. And they know Duz is safer for pretty colored undies than any other 'big-name' package soap you use for washday. Now, why not let some other Duz-zables join the act?

"Why not give kids' clothes a break?

"When my youngsters come in from playing, their clothes are a sight to see! But I just drop those clothes in good Duz suds and the dirt rolls out lightning-fast!



"Don't dresser scarfs go over big?

"I'll say they do! Specially colored embroidered ones. And when they're soiled with dust and make-up, Duz does 'em up gently. It eases out the dirt and handles dainty colors carefully.

"Isn't DUZ 'hep' to bobby socks?

"The tiniest girls are fussy about how theirs look. I not only Duz my youngsters' socks but I actually Duz-zed their balloons when they got muddy!

"So, why not put on a bigger and better show about everything Duz does? After all, Duz just can't be beat by any other leading washday soap for cleaning quick and washing safe!"

DUZ does Everything

—and I mean Everything!

LADIES' HOME

Journal

BRUCE GOULD

AND BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD, Editors

MARY BASS, Executive Editor

LAURA LOU BROOKMAN, Managing Editor

Associate Editors: HUGH MAC NAIR KAHLER, BERNARDINE KIELTY, ANN BATCHELDER, WILHELA CUSHMAN, FRANK ELTONHEAD, ALICE BLINN, RICHARD PRATT, HENRIETTA MURDOCK, LOUELLA G. SHOUER, MARY LEA PAGE, MAUREEN DALY, DAWN CROWELL, JOHN MORRIS.

Contributing Editors: GLADYS TABER, LOUISE PAINE BENJAMIN, GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ, BARBARA BENSON, MARGARET HICKEY.

Assistant Editors: JOHN WERNER, CHARLOTTE JOHNSON, ROBERT ATHERTON, DONALD STUART, RUTH MARY PACKARD, RUTH MATTHEWS, NORA O'LEARY, ALICE CONKLING, MILDRED ARNOLD, JUDY BARRY, JUNE TORREY, MARJORIE LEDERER LEE, EVELYN G. SAGER, LILY GLENDINNING, DOROTHY COUNSELMAN SELBY, JOAN YOUNGER.

Editorial Assistants: BETTY NILES GRAY, KATHERINE WEST MILIER, SELMA RUTHERFORD BURGESS, ALICE KASTBERG, ANNE EINSELEN, DOROTHY VOORHEES, FRANCES RODMAN, JAN WEYL, EMILY ELMORE MACY, JOSEPH DI PIETRO, MARGARET WINSLOW O'NEILL, JOSETTE DALY LUTZ, IRIS WILKEN.

You Need Public Health Nurses

SIX million Americans daily cannot complete their work because of illness. This amazing number could be cut down if more of us knew of disease prevention as taught by the Public Health Nursing Services. For this reason, April 20 to 26 has been set aside as Public Health Nursing Week.

The services are community programs, state health departments and Red Cross agencies. Your child's school nurse who gives vaccinations is a Public Health girl. The Visiting Nurse who helped your neighbor before her baby arrived is another. The uniformed girl who worked at the factory with your brother and insisted that he get an X ray for TB tests is another. They form an army of 20,672 women who have saved lives as well as thousands of dollars in tax funds yearly. They serve rich and poor alike.

These nurses answer every call, but they can continue to work only in conjunction with a doctor's (or clinic's) orders. Public Health nurses are listed as Visiting Nurses, Red Cross Nurses, and under state and city health departments. If you don't have a nurse in your community, get one. The National Organization for Public Health Nursing at 1790 Broadway, New York City, will tell you how. Supporting their services is an investment that pays dividends in lives saved and suffering diminished.

Look Homeward, Angel!

BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

AS I read the newspapers I am impressed by the fact that the leading news, at least in the great metropolitan dailies, concerns foreign affairs. Every day, also, my mail brings me letters soliciting my support for this or that good cause at the far ends of the earth. I am adjured to save the Poles and the Hungarians from domination by the Russians; to help save the Palestinian Jews from the British (or the British from the Palestinian Jews). I am warned that the Soviets are out to dominate Europe and/or Asia. I am asked to join in overthrowing Franco in Spain, and fighting fascism and/or communism in Latin America. I am petitioned to contribute to defend the freedom of India, Indo China and the Dutch East Indies. I am told that everything that happens anywhere on earth is the direct concern of the United States, that this is One World and that the United States must lead it in the direction of "global permanent peace."

It is time, I think, for a little sober stocktaking regarding the slogans of our times—and our actual capacities.

Clearly we do not live in "One World." As far as Europe is concerned, it has far less unity than it had in 1914. There is not a spot on the globe where interests and ideologies are not contending with each other with rabid animosity, both within and between great and small nations. The lack of any common standards of morality, law, tradition is revealed in every debate before the United Nations, and in every issue our own population tends to divide and take sides. Thus, Mr. Byrnes pursued one policy while Mr. Wallace, in the same cabinet, pursued another, and it is impossible to write today about a single issue of foreign affairs without inducing a flood of mail, praising or condemning according to the convictions or prejudices of the particular correspondents—and many convictions are arrived at from misleading propaganda. For that is another characteristic of our age: the mass-influencing of public opinion by weighted special pleadings. It is impossible for even the most industrious and disinterested students to judge the true state of affairs in most countries, for most countries make no pretense even of issuing disinterested reports. Yet every foreign issue becomes a domestic issue tending to disunite our people, all this made more acute by the racial composition of our country, which makes it so easily possible for this or that national group to seek to align the United States with the countries of their origin.

I THINK it is therefore high time that we began to realize the bleak fact that there are limits to the possibilities of even the strongest nation, and that the United States cannot save the whole world. Indeed, the greatest contribution we can make toward saving any part of civilization is to save our own. It is true that a large part of the world, and all that is left of western civilization, look to the United States for leadership, but their concern is, in the first line, that we should maintain a strong and stable political and economic system here at home. A breakdown of American domestic unity, a runaway inflation, or a severe economic depression in America would kick the last prop from under many other nations and economies besides our own. Thus, how we, as a people, behave here is actually more important for the world that looks to us than what policies our statesmen may pursue or attempt to pursue abroad.

Human civilization, in any case, is not a streamlined unity—and it never will be unless the world is brought by force or chicanery under a single despotic system.

American ideas of democracy have grown out of our own peculiar geographical position and historical development. They cannot be applied everywhere except by force, and nothing applied by force is American democracy. In fact, the attempt to spread our faith abroad, by anything except example, is likely to bring us into conflicts which will end democracy at home, while the urge to "co-operate" and have "unity" among all the great powers has already in many cases meant

THE BEST Defense AGAINST SPRING FEVER

Drowsy-y Ho-hums! Chase 'em away. Spark up with sparkling Dr. Pepper . . . an original creation . . . not a copy . . . a distinctive blend that never tires the taste. Be efficient for work. Be bright and eager for fun. Drink a bite to eat daily at 10, 2 and 4 or anytime you're hungry, thirsty or tired.

Listen . . . laugh . . . enjoy "DARTS FOR DOUGH"
ABC network . . . every Sunday Afternoon!

the deliberate sacrifice of our ideals abroad and the delivery of whole peoples over to systems abhorrent to them and to ourselves. We are presently, for instance, distressed at the turn affairs have taken in Poland. But it was precisely our desire to achieve great power units which led us to co-operate in creating the conditions which made such a turn of affairs inevitable.

There is a growing disparity between American words and deeds. It is no disgrace to admit the limitations of one's possibilities to defend the liberties of others. Collusion for the destruction of the liberties of others is, however, a different matter, and in the end such collusions come home to roost.

What the United States should strive for, it seems to me, within her diplomatic means, is not universal agreement on one single socio-economic-political system, but the revival of the more ancient and better-tested doctrine of nonintervention in critical areas and the extension of greater areas of neutrality between the great powers. Intervention everywhere is not likely to bring us peace but war, and another war will not establish American democracy throughout the world even if we win it, but will all but certainly result in a military dictatorship in the United States.

At the present moment it is quite impossible for any human mind to foresee the future development of human civilization—but one thing is certain; namely, that most of the world will continue to pass through a period of unparalleled chaos. Forces l been let loose which are not easily ta and cannot be tamed by the United St And we should be warned that all atter to establish universal heavens on ear the great crusades of the past—have destroyers, not creators, of human cultu

Our primary business in a world of cl is to make common cause with one ano in the United States; to preserve for selves and our posterity a civiliza founded on law; to seek ways and me to prevent the cleavage of our land class and racial struggles; to design poli which, if they do not save the rest of world, do not, at least, contribute to disintegration; and to remember alw that 142,000,000 people inhabiting a tinent rich in all natural resources, are rich in skills, in techniques and in ability to create new raw materials ou the transmutation of elements, can alw maintain their civilization and defen against any foe, if they but live and w together in justice and in domestic pe

If America is ever destroyed, it will from within, not from without.

And the last country to survive on reeling planet will not, I think, be the which sets out to missionize the globe, the one that remains most faithful to own character and tradition.

To recognize the limits of national po and to know that no tree can grow hig or wider than the capacities of its roots not to be an isolationist, but a realist.

$37 a Week for Teachers

HOW true are charges that the public schools of the United Stat have deteriorated since the beginning of the war? What are the fac about the teacher shortage, low pay, children locked out of schools becau the buildings are closed and idle? Benjamin Fine, education editor of T New York Times, made a six months' study of the national education sy tem, interviewing teachers, public officials and parents in large and sm cities, summing up the entire deplorable picture in a series of articles. H conclusions are reprinted here through the courtesy of The New York Time

1. Three hundred and fifty thousand teachers have left the American public schools since 1940.

2. One hundred and twenty-five thousand teachers, or one out of every seven in the profession, are serving on an emergency or sub-standard certificate.

3. Seventy thousand teaching positions are unfilled because of the inability of communities to get necessary teachers.

4. Sixty thousand teachers in the United States have a high-school education or less.

5. Twenty per cent of all teachers, or 175,000, are new to their jobs each year—twice the turnover that existed before the war.

6. Classroom teachers get an average of $37 a week today. Two hundred thousand get less than $25 weekly.

7. Fewer students are entering the teaching profession than in the past. Twenty-two per cent of all college students attended teachers' colleges in 1920; today 7 per cent attend.

8. Veterans do not want to prepare to teach. Only 20,000 of the 1,000,000 veterans in American colleges and universities are in teachers' colleges.

9. Six thousand schools will be closed because of lack of teachers; 75,000 children will have no schooling during the year.

10. Two million children will suffer a major impairment in their schooling because of poor teachers.

11. Five million children will receive inferior education this year because the inadequate teacher supply.

12. Only 50 per cent of the teachers e ployed in 1940–41 are still teaching t day.

13. The average teacher in the Unit States today has had one year less ed cation than she had in 1939.

14. Fifty thousand men have left t teaching profession since 1940, and a not coming back. Only 15 per cent of a elementary and high school teachers a men.

15. Twelve major school strikes hav taken place since September—and man more are being threatened.

16. The morale of the teachers ha dropped to a new low.

17. Fifty-six per cent of the teachers o this country do not have tenure protec tion.

18. The United States spends 1.5 pe cent of its national income for its schools Great Britain spends an estimated 3 pe cent; the Soviet Union spends 7.5 pe cent.

19. Appalling educational inequalitie exist throughout the nation. Top school spend $6000 per classroom unit, botto ones spend $100. The national average i $1600.

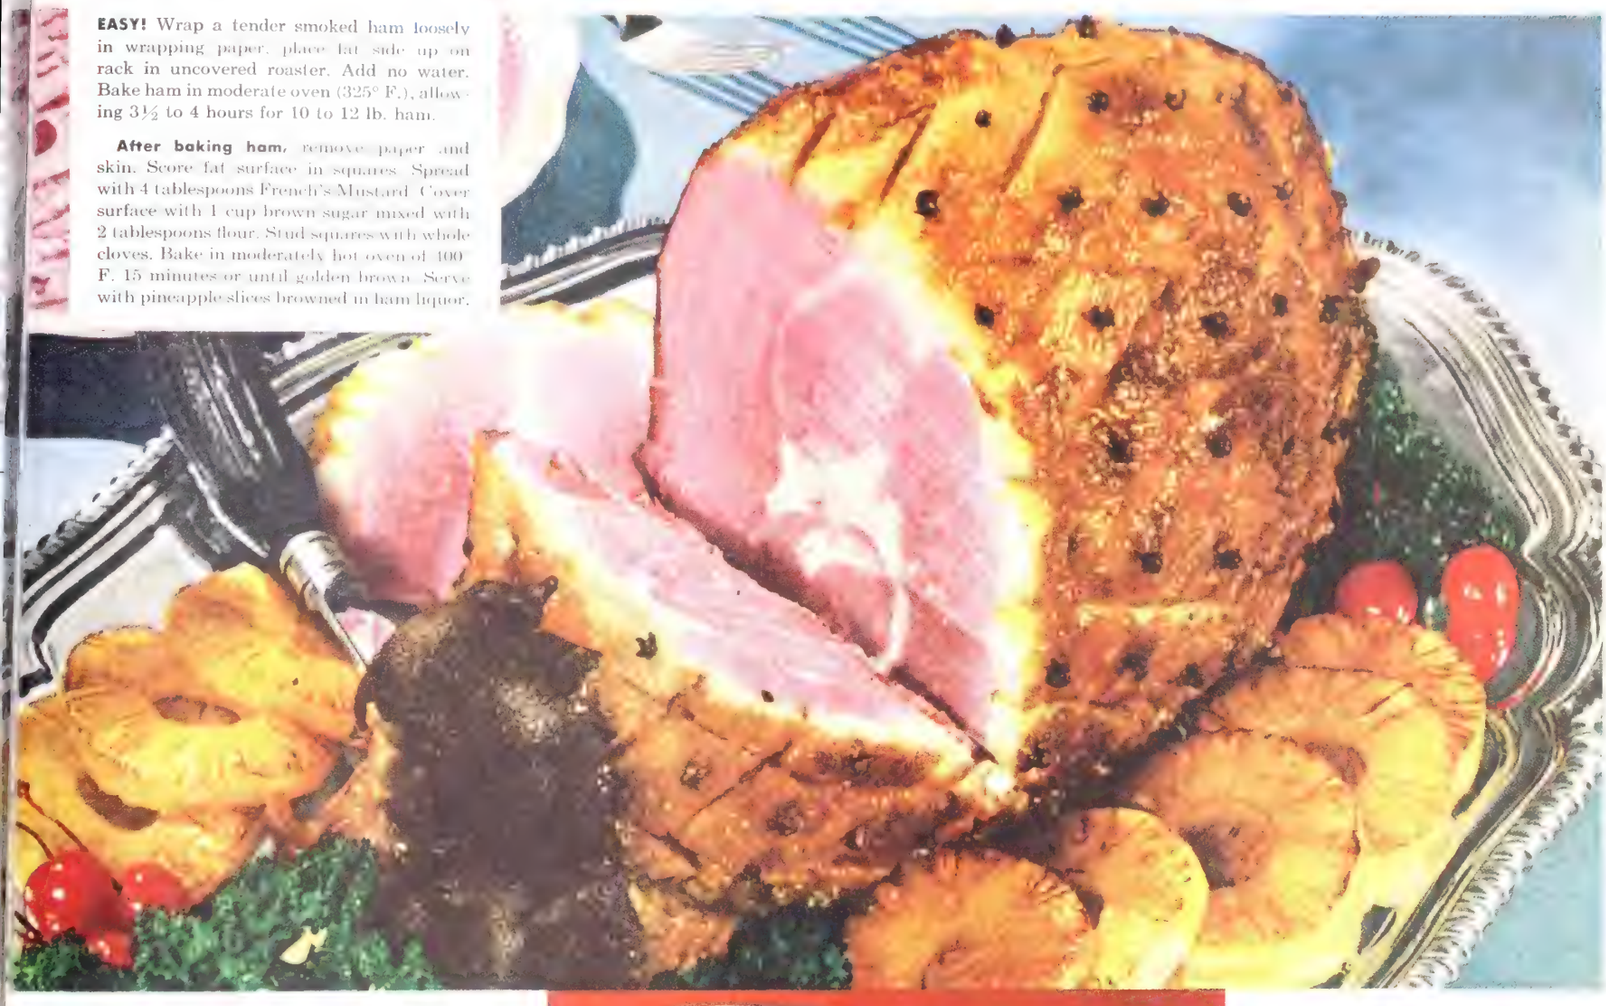
20. School buildings are in a deplorable state all over the nation. Nearly five billion dollars will be needed to bring the educational plants into good condition.

M-m-m-mm COMPANY HAM

WITH THAT FRENCH'S FLAVOR!

EASY! Wrap a tender smoked ham loosely in wrapping paper, place fat side up on rack in uncovered roaster. Add no water. Bake ham in moderate oven (325° F.), allowing 3½ to 4 hours for 10 to 12 lb. ham.

After baking ham, remove paper and skin. Score fat surface in squares. Spread with 4 tablespoons French's Mustard. Cover surface with 1 cup brown sugar mixed with 2 tablespoons flour. Stud squares with whole cloves. Bake in moderately hot oven of 400° F. 15 minutes or until golden brown. Serve with pineapple slices browned in ham liquor.



SMOOTHER CREAMIER

A blend of the finest spices and mustard seed money can buy

No wonder French's is the nation's favorite prepared mustard—it has just the right combination of zesty flavor and smoothness. It brings out all the good meat flavor—doesn't cover it up as cheap harsh mustards do. Serve French's Mustard with cold meats, too—use it in salad dressings and sandwich fillings. French's is so creamy it blends perfectly.

Largest selling prepared mustard in U. S. A. today
Also made in Canada

Ham Patties . . .
Chop leftover ham, combine with equal amount cold chopped boiled potatoes and shape into patties. Brown over low flame in 2 tablespoons of melted fat mixed with 1½ teaspoons of French's Mustard.

FREE!
NEW RECIPE BOOK

Send for new recipe booklet in full color, "Mealtime Magic"... Twenty-four pages of practical suggestions to make food go further, meals taste more delicious!

Write to The R. T. French Company, 1369 Mustard St., Rochester 9, N. Y., and booklet will be sent you FREE.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

"CROSS COUNTRY" $15.00*

IT'S THE BERMUDA CLIPPER...

It's the

DOBBS

Flying to meet the sun...you in Dobbs hats that would lift your spirits even if you should decide to stay home!

"Cross Country" with the carefree brim and the crown that can be shaped different ways.

"Sew 'n' Sew", with softly draped height, the belting ribbon breton that folds away in next-to-no space.

Two that typify the DOBBS talent for hats you wear happily wherever you go.

DOBBS-styled and DOBBS-sized to fit

"SEW 'N' SEW" $12.95

*Light colors in felt slightly higher

DOBBS HATS AT FINE STORES EVERYWHERE
PARK AVENUE AT 53RD ST. NEW YORK 22, N.Y.

UNDER-COVER STUFF

ORIGINALLY PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROS.

Jacket drawing by James Thurber, from The Thurber Carnival.

By Bernardine Kielty

ALL nearsighted people—in fact, all people who need glasses to see clearly across the street—should read Thurber's The Admiral on the Wheel. It's a short piece in THE THURBER CARNIVAL. Ordinarily when his glasses were broken, Mr. Thurber took to his bed and stayed there until they were fixed. One time, however—when the maid had stepped on his glasses because he hadn't put them far enough under the bed—he decided to try living without them for the necessary period. And he had the time of his life doing it, because of the many remarkable things he saw. "I saw the Cuban flag flying over a national bank, I saw a gay old lady with a gray parasol walk right through the side of a truck, I saw a cat roll across a street in a small striped barrel, I saw bridges rise lazily into the air, like balloons." And, of course the very best thing he saw was the admiral on the wheel. Those with poor eyesight will understand, even if the rest do not. . . . Joseph Szigeti, in his book, WITH STRINGS ATTACHED, has another nice story about the nearsighted. It is about Frau Einstein, who was sitting at the head table at a banquet in honor of her illustrious husband. The preliminaries were endless and she was getting hungry. She began nibbling. "It's not very good salad," she told her neighbor, who answered, "That's not salad. It's an orchid you're eating."

Szigeti's book—memoirs of one of the greatest living violinists—though it abounds in good stories, is primarily about music. He is particularly concerned with modern aesthetics, and the effect on art of the temperament of today—the obviousness of pictures, the oversimplification, the brightness, the quickness, the loudness, the "overbowing, the overblowing" in our orchestras, the "slick, excellent, luscious-toned youngsters who each play (the violin) faster and more smoothly than the preceding one . . . the comparative sameness of our players that is engendered by the ever-persistent vibrato." It is a provocative book which musicians will read with purpose and laymen with quite as much enjoyment.

• • •

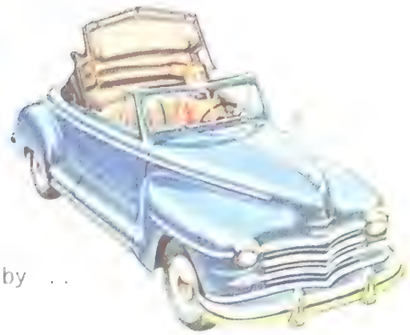
The human face might at first glance seem a pretty limited subject for a book, but THE HUMAN FACE, by Englishman John Brophy, turns out to be a mine of ideas and information. Of course there is the face in art, with some fascinating illustrations, from Botticelli's Venus to Edzard's Vivien

(Continued on Page 16)

REPRINTED COURTESY COLLIER'S

"He certainly has a peculiar way of showing his affection for her!"

April's ours!



Sun overhead, hinted scent of apple blossoms in the breeze—
these are yours and mine, Plymouth, now that April's here!

We'll take the high road to the farthest green hill—your surging power to span the miles, your engine humming softly as the fields skim by . .

Comes a sudden storm-cloud, I should care! A touch of the dashboard-button brings me an "umbrella." For the top's vacuum-pressured—swings up, snug and tight, before a rain-drop spatters down!

Comes nightfall, we'll find an inn—traveling alone is fun!
My bags tucked away in the trunk compartment—with a wonderful counterbalanced lid that holds fast, tumble-proof, when I take them out!

There's so much of springtime to investigate. And you're my idea of a dream-companion—devil-may-care lines, a look that says, "Let's go!"
That's the way it should be. That's why, Plymouth—you're for me!

PLYMOUTH

MOST LIKE THE HIGH-PRICED CARS

There is so much you want that only a Charis Corsetiere can give you

No, it's not done with magic! Your Charis Corsetiere can give you the sleek figure you want to see when you look in your own mirror!

SLIP INTO PERFECT FIT

Your trained Charis Corsetiere matchmates comfort and loveliness through perfect fit.

She measures your figure, expertly analyzes it, and fits you with the right garment, in the style you like . . . from 77 different Charis garment variations in your size alone! No riding up, no pinching, no buckling when you wear a properly fitted Charis.

You Must Enjoy Complete Satisfaction! If for any reason you are not fully satisfied, within 30 days after delivery, your purchase price will be immediately and cheerfully refunded. Charis is the ONLY foundation garment sold with this liberal guarantee.

YET CHARIS COSTS NO MORE!

Prices Are Moderate, comparable to average retail prices! Your Charis Corsetiere offers you the right garment at the right price. PLUS professional corsetiere service in your own home.

It's so Convenient to call your Charis Corsetiere, so why not telephone her today? She will come to you, at any time you choose. She saves your time and effort!

CHARIS

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Don't Shop . . . Call For The Right Fit!

Call the Charis Distributor or Corsetiere listed in your local telephone book, or write to Dept. L-24, Charis Corporation, Allentown, Pa.
In Canada: Charis Limited, Toronto 14, Canada

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Elastic Control Garments • Lacer Control Garments • One-piece Foundations • Girdles • Brassieres • Bandeaux

(Continued from Page 14)

Leigh: there's the good and the evil we see in faces—and why: the marks of time, the faces remembered, the actual structure of the face. It is a book to dip into, rather than to read straight through.

Mr. Brophy quotes Cesare Lombroso, who once classified the physical attributes of thousands of convicted criminals: "The born criminal is likely to have sharp, prominent incisor teeth, very little beard growth among males, premature wrinkling. He rarely goes bald or even gray. Among murderers dark hair is more common than blond, while swindlers run to curly hair." . . . On the subject of the mouth, Mr. Brophy has considerable to say about kissing, one of its no doubt most important uses. He does not, however, mention a custom now prevalent in many social gatherings. We speak of the institution "kissin' cousins." For years women have dutifully kissed other women, while men on these social occasions have confined themselves to kissing only female relatives. But in the last few years families have grown all out of hand, and the number of kissin' cousins today is so large that the pecks among women have all but disappeared and the more heartfelt kiss from man to woman has taken its place.

Delighted with the reception of The Human Face, the publishers claim that one of their forthcoming books is to be called THE TOOTH.

• • •

Those two girls who drew cartoons of the Vassar student and how she dresses ought to know about a certain Ohio high school. Out there the matter of how the girls dressed reached such a pitch that one day the boys all came to school wearing skirts as a protest against the girls' wearing blue jeans. Billy Rose, who ought to know, once said that fashion is 10 per cent protection from the cold and 90 per cent sex. But we wonder.

"She dresses for the weather—if it's windy, she wears a skirt."

• • •

MR. BREMBLE'S BUTTONS, by Dorothy Langley, is one of those rare books that go on a very special shelf. On our shelf it is beside FATHER MALACHI'S MIRACLE and MR. MOLE and MR. FORTUNE'S MAGGOT and half a dozen others. Not everyone likes a bit of fantasy with his books; but for those who do, this is it. Mr. Bremble's wife drove him to buttons. She was one of those firm, well-corseted females, president of many committees and concerned in "good works"—emphasis on favors, tallies and paper napkins, on gatherings of the "ladies" and social competition. But try to get a slum child into the Sunday school, or help out an unmarried mother or welcome a stranger, and in Mrs. Bremble you were up against a stone wall. She spoke with authority and only in clichés. She looked down on her gentle husband, way, way down. But he had his way of managing. And that, of course, is the

(Continued on Page 18)

ON A PEDESTAL

NYLON

GOTHAM GOLD STRIPE
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
BEAUTIFUL STOCKINGS

AT LEADING STORES EVERYWHERE

GOTHAM HOSIERY COMPANY, INC.

200 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

ALSO MANUFACTURED BY

GOTHAM HOSIERY CO. OF CANADA, LTD.

ou're right Red Majesty

the New Queen of the Reds!"

—says MRS. CORNEL WILDE...

radiant wife of the screen star.

"BECAUSE," enthuses lovely Mrs. Wilde, "there is something really wonderful about Red Majesty! It gives you confidence that your lips are looking their best. So I think you were perfectly right when you named it the queen of your glamourous family of Tangee lipstick shades."

CONSTANCE LUFT HUHN

Head of the House of Tangee and creator of Tangee Red Majesty Lipstick and Petal Finish Cake Make-Up.

Five Famous Glamourous Shades by TANGEE

Red Majesty NEW HIT SHADE BY Tangee

"I can dream can't I?"

Especially when I know that soon I'll be getting a PROCTOR NEVER-LIFT

Joe Smith is making my dream come true. I saw a Proctor Never-Lift iron at his store today.

"Try it," he said. I did. It was a revelation.

I simply touched a button and the iron lifted itself and stood there, steady as a rock on its sturdy legs.

Then I took hold of it to start ironing. Instantly the legs snapped completely out of the way.

It's so easy . . . actually saves up to 2½ tons of lifting in an average ironing day. It's so light, too, and dials the proper heat for all fabrics.

Joe took my order and I'm getting my Never-Lift soon. If you want a Never-Lift, do what I did. See your Proctor Dealer now.

No lift No tilt No twist

Proctor Roast-or-Grille
Broils. Roasts. Grills. Efficient. Easy to clean. Ideal for small families or as a second oven.

PROCTOR
AUTOMATIC ELECTRICAL APPLIANCES
PROCTOR ELECTRIC COMPANY, PHILA. 40, PA.

For efficient repairs, 160 factory-supervised Proctor service stations, coast to coast. . . see local classified telephone directory.

(Continued from Page 16)

book—a lovely book, and we'd sound silly if we said how very much we enjoyed it.

And speaking of wives, a psychologist has gone on record as saying that high blood pressure and early baldness in men

© 1940, BY ESQUIRE, INC.

"We were divinely happy 20 years—then one day he contradicted me."

are due to their wives. The doctor, a woman herself, calls these wives barracudas: they devour their husbands with their material demands, and the husbands in turn come down with nervous breakdowns, fluttering stomachs, and falling hair. "Modern women," she says, "are responsible for 60 per cent of all divorces, and 80 per cent of all nervous ailments."

• • •

Laura Hobson's new novel,* GENTLEMAN'S AGREEMENT, is an eye-opener. It has to do with antisemitism; not with the antisemitism of gang boys who stone synagogues, or with pulpit and platform preachers who sling verbal stones, or with Hitler and the Nazis, but with antisemitism among liberals, among decent thoughtful people who think they have the good of man at heart but who nevertheless subscribe to the "restricted" neighborhood, club, school and resort. . . . Another noteworthy point of view about the attitude toward Jews is that of Dr. James Parkes, author of AN ENEMY OF THE PEOPLE: ANTISEMITISM. Doctor Parkes is an Anglican clergyman, British subject, and profound student of Jewish history and affairs. He has recently spent three months in Palestine and has come away with an eminently sane, unbiased view of Zionism.

• • •

That lovely story of sixteen-year-old girlhood, INVITATION TO THE WALTZ, by Rosamond Lehmann, is being reissued. But not its sequel, THE WEATHER IN THE STREETS, which is the story of that same girl ten years later, when she is twenty-six, and when the romantic ideal of yesterday becomes the tragic love of today. In combination those two books are exquisitely touching—though surprisingly far removed from the world of today.

• • •

THE HELLER, by William Henning— which ran in last month's JOURNAL—concerns another kind of girlhood and is pre-eminently of this day and age. Here are girls growing up, one in the tough hard life of an American city, the other in the gentle countryside of an English village. But at twenty-six, Rosamond Lehmann's girl is far less successful in managing her life than Anne Karlan will be at that age, or we miss our guess. The Heller, to our way of thinking, is an outstanding novel—not reporting, not preaching, not one of those all too frequent synthetic portraits based on social statistics, but the portrait of a girl in the midst of her contemporaries, completely conceived in the mind of the artist, and brought to us alive and vital. Cheap and vulgar she is, a somewhat ignoble specimen of her time, but a girl of character nonetheless. Mr. Henning can be congratulated on a rare literary achievement.

(Continued on Page 21)

FREE

Plicote

TRANSPAREN

The New Type Finish

ELIMINATE WAXING

Put away waxing rags applicators! Plicote TRA PARENT does away c pletely with unnecessary b breaking labor. This amaz new finish is now availa for general use.

NON-SKID

You're safe from slips and f with TRANSPARENT coa floors. This great new prod approved for safety by Underwriters' Laborator

EASY to CLEA

Plicote TRANSPAREN smooth, glossy surface ma it impossible for dirt to imb itself in your floors or fur ture. Just wipe it off with so and water.

APPROVE

By Underwriters' Laborato

At Your Dealer

$1.95 PER QUART

Free FOLDER Free

Plicote, Inc.
Clark Bldg., Pittsburgh, Pa.
Please send me Transparent Finish Folder No. 10

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ STATE____

Welch's

For PURE Enjoyment

...d for free copy of Welch's Mother ...ughter Cook Book, Dept. 7, The Welch Grape Juice Company, Westfield, New York

Copyright 1947, The Welch Grape Juice Company

It's like getting married all over again!

THE MODERN WAY to start sterling is to buy in units of place-settings, each consisting of six pieces, as shown above in the charming Gorham Sovereign pattern. With a few place-settings, you can begin using your sterling silver immediately.

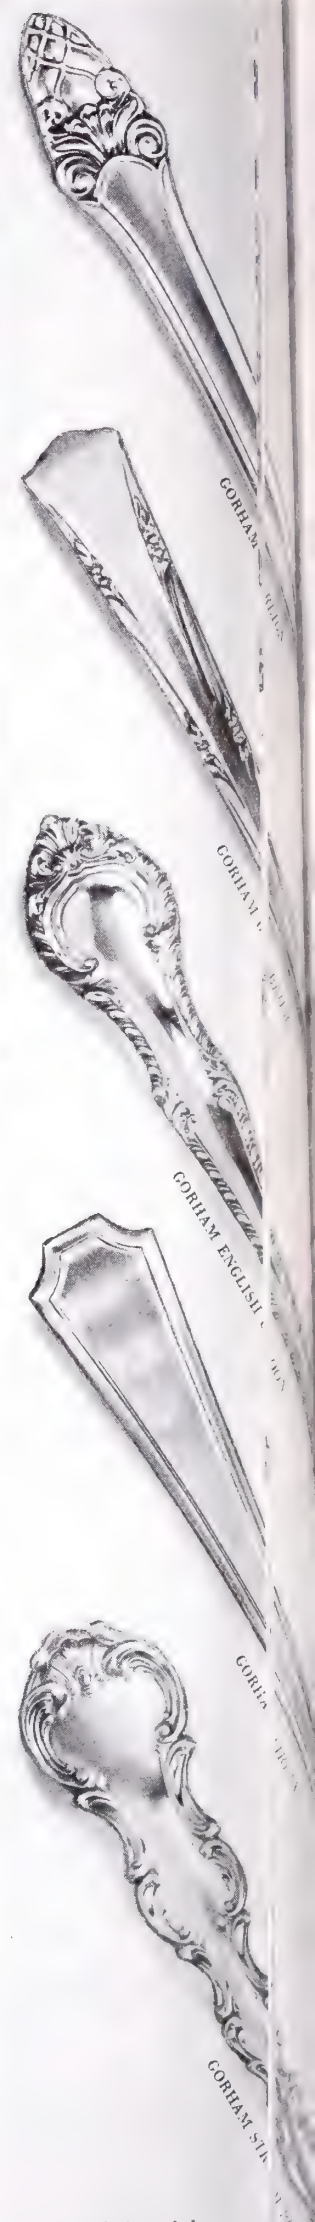
"Getting the Gorham Sovereign we've always wanted is like getting married all over again. Today, you can easily afford solid silver right from the start. You can choose any of the lovely Gorham patterns and buy your first place-settings ...whatever your budget. Then match and add as your marriage grows. Think of having the solid satisfaction of Gorham workmanship and quality that have been famous for more than a century." To help you enjoy your sterling, send for illustrated book, "Entertaining—the Sterling Way." 10¢ (outside U.S.A. 40¢). Address The Gorham Company, LHJ-414, Providence 7, Rhode Island.

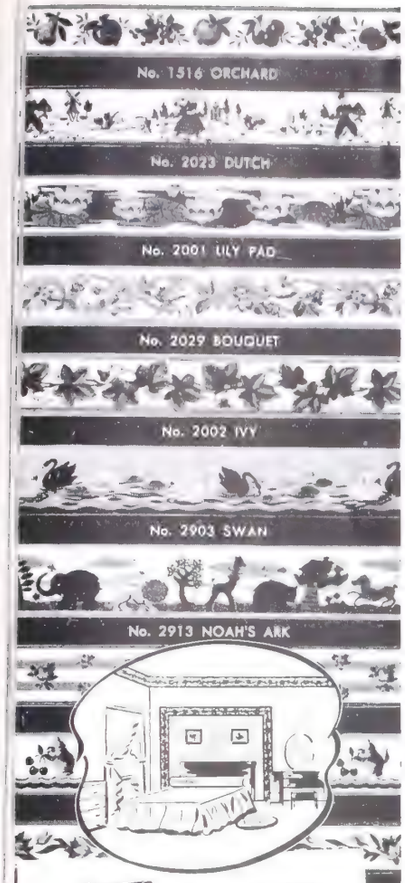
Gorham
STERLING

AMERICA'S LEADING SILVERSMITHS SINCE 1831

Listen to the Bride and Groom program, ABC, 2:30 p.m. Eastern Standard Time, Monday through Friday.



Illustrated: five of the twelve Gorham patterns



TRIMZ
READY PASTED BORDERS

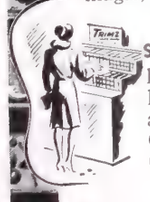
"DO IT YOURSELF"
HOME DECORATIONS

Gay charm at your finger tips for every room! Trimz Ready-Pasted Borders are so easy to apply. No paste, muss or fuss. Simply dip sun-fast, washable Trimz Borders in water and apply to surface.

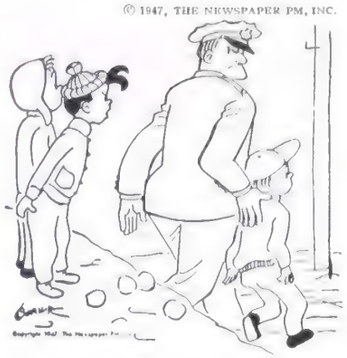
DOZENS OF DESIGNS!
Perk up plain or painted walls. Harmonizing patterns for furniture . . . odd pieces, around doors and windows. Everywhere you want color-magic, design and beauty!



See your dealer...Now!
Buy inexpensive Trimz Ready-Pasted Borders at 5&10, Dept., Hdw., Chain, Paint Stores. Only 20c, 25c and 35c.

THE Meyercord CO.
SOLE DISTRIBUTOR-CHICAGO 44, ILL.

© 1947, THE NEWSPAPER PM, INC.



"A really bad boy would have put rocks in them."

(Continued from Page 18)

The Heller is not about a juvenile delinquent, but it does make one wonder what goes on—especially in cities where parents are too busy, or too careless to pay much attention.

• • •

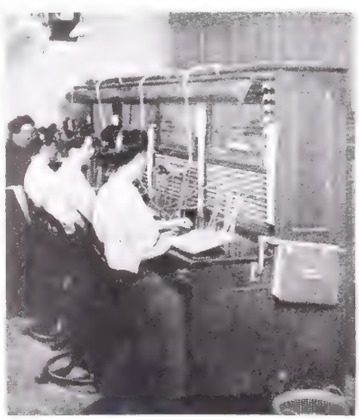
THE CHILDREN, by Howard Fast, a most unpleasant but undoubtedly true picture, shows where juvenile delinquency gets its start—at the dawn of school age. . . . THE AMBOY DUKES, by Irving Schulman, indicates where it leads: the story of a gang in Brooklyn that ended in murder.

• • •

J. Edgar Hoover says that the nation is facing a "potential army of 6,000,000 criminals," and he puts the greatest blame on the parents, for "a lack of interest in the fundamentals of matrimony and in the proper rearing of children." That the responsibility rests squarely upon the parents is becoming the verdict of most social critics. In New York in December one of the most disastrous fires in the city's history was started by four boys. The fire commissioner, the police commissioner, the park commissioner all spoke over the radio and each blamed the parents. On the morning after the fire the parents of one of the boys were still too intoxicated to give adequate statements. Later, and in line with a new policy born of the tragedy, a thirty-three-year-old mother was convicted in court on a charge of contributing to the delinquency of her fourteen-year-old son. He had been arrested for sniper shootings in which three persons were wounded. He'd been playing hooky from school, and sleeping in cellars and hallways. The mother was charged with frequenting bars and neglecting her children.

• • •

One mark of how business has grown is a look at the "Hello Girls" at the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.'s switchboard in 1908. Marquis James' THE METROPOLITAN LIFE is a history of that business from Civil War days to the present—of special interest to students of business methods and techniques for public welfare.



When they were called the "Hello Girls."

EKCO presents

PRESSURE COOKERS
to meet your every cooking need!

EKCO HOSTESS

You'll cook AND serve in this famous Ekco Pressure Cooker . . bless its many special features. The Fingertip Seal makes opening and closing easy, easy . . . the wonderful "Safety Bridge" makes the Ekco splatter-proof (extra safe!). And just a change of covers makes this pressure cooker model a sparkling serving dish!

Patents Pending
T. M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

EKCO CHEF

You'll use this new Ekco Pressure Cooker for ALL top-stove cooking. It's a saucepan style pressure-cooker with an extra saucepan cover for reheating foods, making gravies, and creaming vegetables. And it has all the special features that make the Ekco such a special pressure cooker . . . including the "Safety Bridge" on the pressure cover.

EKCO HOSTESS
(2½ QT. CAPACITY)

Here's a smaller edition of the Ekco "Hostess" . . . grand for small families and the perfect companion cooker in all homes. You can cook THEN serve vegetables for eight in this companion Ekco . . . cook up wonderful main dishes for just two.

EKCO

THE BIGGEST NAME IN HOUSEWARES

EKCO PRODUCTS COMPANY • CHICAGO
Sold in Canada by Ekco Products Company (Canada) Ltd., Montreal

Makers of PAINT CUTLERY, KITCHEN TOOLS, CAN OPENERS, EGG BEATER

MAY: Heavens, Ann — wish I could clean up quick as that!

"You could too! Just use a cleanser that doesn't leave ugly scratches

Bon Ami

THE SPEEDY CLEANSER that "hasn't scratched yet."

A HOUSEWIFE LOOKS AT SOAP OPERA

By Alsise Buckley Heath

I

entertainment possible during the pursuit of a career which gives one more mental leisure than any other career in the world—housework.

When I was six and a rather backward pupil at the Sacred Heart Convent in New York, Sister Felicity used to reprove me for beginning sentences with: "I don't think." This was an error not so much of grammar, she maintained, as of logic. One can think not; one cannot not think.

Twenty years later, still backward, perhaps, but no longer at the convent, I found myself missing a great deal of Sister Felicity's thesis, principally in an effort to prove her wrong. Of course I was unsuccessful; it is impossible not to think. But how heavenly it it were possible. How heavenly to be able to turn off one's mind like the proverbial faucet and go blankly about the many daily activities of a woman which require utter mindlessness.

The intellectual side of the housewife's day consists of innumerable such decisions as: there is, or is not, enough soap in the dishwater; the cake is, or mind must be kept fixed for roughly fourteen hours every day.

woman has more intuition, a surer hazard and standards immeasurably thirty is occupied with feeding and managing the baby, cooking and eating forces of our intellect to bear: that we first: 1. wash the diapers so that they can dry in the sunny part of the day, 2. make the baby's formula while we're be it only the laundryman, should drop in and notice its laissez faire, not to

1. our diapers are still damp when we take them off the line at five o'clock and we spend our evening at the ironing board, and 2. not only the laundry-reputation as a housewife, shaky at its best, becomes a cherished memory.

When the bottles are sterilized and the formula made, it is a quarter past twelve. When the diapers and other baby clothes are washed it is one-forty-five. The baby's next meal is due at two, so with a sandwich or an apple in two o'clock in the afternoon. We have worked an eight-hour day. All there is

Women Feel Strongly About Soap Operas

Soap operas, or daytime radio serials—whatever they are called, women are likely to feel fairly strongly about them, either pro or anti.

"The available [radio] daytime audience is fairly evenly divided into those who do and those who do not listen to serial stories," says Dr. Paul Lazarsfeld in a book, *The People Look at Radio. "If they do, they are likely to be fans and listen to an average of about four a day; if they don't they are frequently violent opponents." ("Available feminine daytime audience" simply means people who have time and opportunity to listen to weekday daytime radio programs.)

Habits, preferences and opinions of listeners to daytime serials have been thoroughly studied in repeated surveys. Doctor Lazarsfeld explains, in an effort to find out what other differences there are between women who do and who don't listen. Between the groups of women who have such opposite listening tastes, two major differences have been found.

One is educational. The higher a woman is on the educational scale, the more likely she is to criticize the daytime serials, the less likely to say she likes to listen to them.

The other might be called "radio-mindedness." The woman who listens to several radio serials during the day is also more inclined to listen to the radio during the evening than other women, and to depend on the radio as her main source of news.

But neither of these differences is great; the main distinction is that you either like them, or you don't. Apparently there aren't many women who [illegible] soap operas, or leave them alone—they do one or the other.

* The People Look at Radio. By P. Lazarsfeld and Hazel Field. University of North Carolina Press. [illegible]

YOU'RE Twice as Smart

WITH VITALITY SHOES

Smart for JENNY WREN YOU

PALM

SHREVE

Smart for NIGHTINGALE YOU

JAMAICA

EMERALD

Take Vitality for luxurious, hard-to-find quality. For superb materials, beautifully handled . . . for restful, easeful fit . . . for your money's worth and more. Take Vitality tailoreds to give wings to your busy feet. Take Vitality dress-ups to put a song in your heart. Be smart twice. At finer stores throughout America.

Vitality SHOES

Complete Range of Sizes and Widths

Vitality Open Road Shoes for Outdoor and Campus Wear

VITALITY SHOE COMPANY, Division of International Shoe Company, ST. LOUIS 3, MO.

REFERENCE LIBRARY

Booklets

1348. SPOTS AND STAINS. All the information on what removes what. Make housecleaning easy! 5c.

1810. DIRECTIONS FOR BLEACHING FURNITURE WOODS. Complete instructions are given. 5c.

1502. HANDBOOK OF SLIP COVERS. Directions and diagrams for cutting and fitting your material. Brighten up your furniture for summer! 10c.

1330. FIRST PRINCIPLES OF KITCHEN PLANNING. A helpful guide for remodeling your kitchen. 5c.

1753. A PLAN FOR HOUSEWORK. Schedules to help you find extra time in a busy day. 5c.

1747. CARPENTER BUILT-INS. Directions for making a bedding chest, a corner table with open shelves and a cabinet table with drop top. 5c.

1543. A PLACE FOR EVERYTHING. Diagrams and plans for extra closets. Construction methods explained. 5c.

1692. WORKING DRAWINGS FOR TRESTLE TABLES. Includes directions for antiquing and finishing. 5c.

Spring Fashion

2259. BASQUE BLOUSE. 5c.
Sash tie, simple pattern.

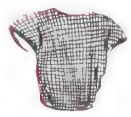
2217. BOLERO BLOUSE. 5c.
Surplice front, cap sleeves.

2238. DRAWSTRING BLOUSE. 5c.

2218. CAP-SLEEVE BLOUSE. 5c.

2196. KNITTED PULL-OVER. 5c.
Wide shoulders, roll neck.

2167. PEPLUM BLOUSE. 5c.
Easy-to-make pattern.



2217. KNITTED SWEATER. 5c.

2210. KNITTED SWEATER. 5c.

2121. CROCHETED SWEATER. 5c.
Trim with sequins if you wish.

2261. HALTER-TOP PATTERN. 5c.
Ideal for suits or summer skirts.

2219. SLIP-OVER BLOUSE. 5c.

2130. KNITTED SWEATER. 5c.

2224. CAP-SLEEVE BLOUSE. 5c.

2155. DICKEY-CUFF SET. 5c.

2223. GLOVES TO MATCH 2258. 5c.

2186. ENVELOPE BAG PATTERN. 5c.

Other Features

Lists are sent free on request. They give the title, number and price of all our booklets and patterns.

2008. LIST OF DEPARTMENTAL BOOKLETS. About the home, the garden, child care and training, beauty, entertaining.

1695. SUB-DEB BOOKLET LIBRARY.

1660. LIST OF JOURNAL HAT AND BAG PATTERNS.

2076. THINGS TO WEAR.

1571. CHECK LIST OF PATTERNS FOR JOURNAL KNITTED AND CROCHETED ARTICLES.

1752. MAKE-IT-YOURSELF PATTERNS. Handicraft for your home, your children, yourself.

We will gladly send any of these booklets and patterns if you'll order by name and number. They will be mailed anywhere in the United States and Canada upon receipt of stamps, cash, check or money order. Do not send stamped, addressed envelopes or Savings Stamps. Readers in all foreign countries should send International Reply Coupons, purchased at their post office. Please address all requests to the Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

New lustrous lovelights will bloom

in your hair

• Beautifully burnished locks, by "deep-action" magic. Hughes All-a-round hair brush sinks deep, deep into your hair...polishing as it massages your scalp. Long, nylon bristles go all around a lovely Lucite handle. And, like two brushes swirling at once, it takes in every inch of your head. At fine drug and department stores everywhere. $5.00 and $7.50

Hughes Brushes, Inc., 500 Fifth Avenue, New York.

*REG. PAT. APP. FOR

IF YOU ASK ME

By

Eleanor Roosevelt

I have heard psychiatrists say that the Bible does not have adequate answers for man's problems today, and that it should be rewritten to eliminate confusion arising from outmoded theories. Do you think the Bible is out-of-date?

No, I do not think the Bible is out-of-date. It still seems to me a remarkably wise book and very satisfying to read both as to form and content.

At least two potential "third parties" have suddenly appeared. Do you think any third party—liberal or whatever you want to call it—has any chance to be a real force in the next national election?

I do not think any third party has appeared of late. There are, of course, in New York State the American Labor Party and the Liberal Party, but neither of them showed great independent force in the recent elections. The two groups, the Political Citizens Association and the Americans for Democratic Action, which are groups of progressive citizens, do not aspire to be political parties, but they do aspire to represent thinking voters who may look at certain questions in a different way and who may organize differently and have different programs on which each of them will work very hard. They can, however, work together when their objectives coincide if they decide to do so.

We have been wondering where you were married and what type of wedding you had. That is, were you dressed as a bride and did you have many attendants?

I was married in New York City on St. Patrick's Day, 1905, in a double house which was owned by Mr. and Mrs. Edward Ludlow and their daughter, Mrs. Henry Parish, who was my mother's double first cousin and my godmother. I had the conventional wedding with a white satin wedding dress, old point lace veil which belonged to my grandmother, and I had bridesmaids and my husband had ushers. In fact, it was a completely old-fashioned wedding.

Do you think the United States Government will allow the recently enacted laws in Georgia, preventing Negroes from voting in the Democratic primaries, to stand? If so, how can you, as chairman of the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations, feel that you have the backing of our own supposedly democratic Government?

I have no idea what the rights of the United States Government are when they touch domestic affairs in a sovereign state. I imagine we will all know within a short time, as someone in Georgia is sure to appeal to the national Government. As chairman of the Human Rights Commission I represent the Government of the United States, and I take orders from the State Department and the President. I do not feel that Georgia represents the feeling of the majority of the people of the United States.

On a recent train trip I got into conversation with a group of young soldiers. They discussed the attitude of people in the small town near their camp. Some restaurants posted notices that servicemen's trade was unsolicited. Others that did serve them doubled prices. They said, "People don't want to be reminded of war. When they see us they have to think about it." None of the boys were over 20. All felt bewilderment mixed with sullen anger for a world that made them feel outcasts. One boy's father had been wounded in Iwo and will never walk again. This boy had been refused the privilege of buying a dinner two nights before. The OPA was established to prevent un-American practices. Could there be some organization now to investigate this sort of un-Americanism?

I am afraid you are wrong. OPA was established to keep prices down and to see that we get as much as we can in as fair a manner as possible for everyone concerned and to prevent inflation. I think the organization that you are really thinking about is the FEPC, which is supposed to see that no un-American discrimination takes place in employment. What you describe is the kind of thing that went on before the war. I think it goes on largely because certain people are afraid the civilian customers will not like to see soldiers about, and also some of the very young soldiers do not always behave as inconspicuously as they might. The only thing that would help in the type of special case you cite is for citizens to rise up and leave when they see such signs as you describe, and if they find a restaurant which will not serve a serviceman they should refuse to go there.

REPRINTED COURTESY THE NEW YORKER
© THE F-R PUBLISHING CORPORATION

"Miss Osborne poses for subway posters."

Don't you think that wars, for the purpose of grabbing territory, are caused mainly by overpopulation? Could women's organizations in various countries get together on a program of "No population race for military purposes," in your opinion?

No. I do not think women could get together and have any such foolish program succeed. Neither do I think that wars are caused mainly because of overpopulation. Take a look at Russia, for instance—she certainly is not crowded; and there is plenty of untenanted land right in our own country, and yet we are tempted to take land for protective purposes or for trade development.

What has become of Fala, President Roosevelt's dog?

Fala is lying not far from me as I write. I am afraid we all spoil him, but he is the pet of the household. He tries to be reconciled with me as his mistress, but I am sure Scotties are one-man dogs.

The Women's Society of Christian Service of the Methodist Church would like to know if underprivileged children are now being temporarily adopted as after World War I? If so, where is the need greatest, how much does it cost for one child per month, and who disburses the money sent?

There are different organizations in different places, but I think the best thing to do is to write to the Central Relief agency of the country from which you wish to adopt a child. Almost all countries seeking relief have headquarters in this country. Ask them how much it costs to adopt a child and also for any other information. I should think the need is greatest in Greece, Yugoslavia and Poland.

The United States Committee for the Care of European Children, 215 Fourth Avenue, New York City, also brings children here for adoption.

All those I know seem to have raised their children by the standards of some pediatrician's book. Did you? If so, which one?

In my day there was a book written by Doctor Holt. I think I was more concerned with the part which dealt with feeding, and I remember very little about anything else, but I certainly found that book valuable.

I am a fifteen-year-old and a sophomore in school. I wish to be a model, although I am not especially tall. I would like to plan for a two weeks' course. This costs $135 and I am willing to work for this. My parents are opposed to my modeling. We live in a small town in Illinois and I want to go to New York as soon as I am out of school. My mother is very much against it. Could you please advise me?

My dear young lady, I think your mother is much better fitted to advise you than I am, but I assure you that modeling is not all "beer and skittles" and you might not find it half as pleasant as you think you would.

Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Roosevelt, c/o the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. It should be understood that Mrs. Roosevelt's answers reflect only her own opinions, and are not necessarily the opinions of the Editors of the JOURNAL.

Finest way to set 'em up for the younger set

how about a Citrusip Julep?

Rub rim of glass with lemon juice, dip in sugar. Fill with Stokely's Finest Citrusip, add mint sprigs. A smooth drink for smoothies! So tangy, so different . . . it's one of Stokely's Finest.

OUR Cisco Punch is super

Combine 2 cups ginger ale, 2½ cups Stokely's Finest Grapefruit Juice, 5 cups Stokely's Finest Pineapple Juice, ¼ cup Maraschino cherry juice. Sweeten to taste with light corn syrup. A sparkling taste treat . . . and good for you . . . when those juices are Stokely's Finest.

TRY a TOMATO JUICE FRAPPE'

Combine 2 tablesp. lemon juice, ½ teasp. Worcestershire, 2 cups Stokely's Finest Tomato Juice. Half-freeze in refrigerator tray. Always peppy and refreshing . . . pure and wholesome . . . when it's Stokely's Finest.

FIX YOURSELF an ORANGE SMASH

Add 1 tablesp. lemon juice, 3 tablesp. light corn syrup to 2½ cups Stokely's Finest Orange Juice. Carbonate in Sparklet bottle; shake. 'S wonderful, when you choose juice that's so-o-o luscious and fresh-tasting . . . Stokely's Finest.

E LUNCH on the house

wers, alternate thick slices frank-, bacon, onion, Stokely's Finest t Pickle Chips. Broil. It's those , mouth-watering pickles that put zest into these snappy sandwiches. ey're Stokely's Finest.

Stokely's Finest

ALWAYS DELICIOUS

Products of

Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis

and Stokely-Van Camp (Canada) Ltd

Sister Act

HAVING little-sister trouble? Are you another high-school girl who just can't keep her mind on her dates and her homework because she's bothered by an underage character in short skirts and pigtails? You have no privacy, no time to yourself, no possessions you can call your own. Your sister tunes in cowboy music when you want Perry Como; she wears your red sweater just the day you want to wear it yourself; she follows you everywhere you go and insists on sharing everything with you, from clothes closets to confidential conversations. And you have enough to think about without sparing time to answer questions, listen to arguments and make small talk with small girls who clutter up the kitchen after school for cookies and milk with Mary Ann. So, to make a sad story short, you've decided your little sister is a complete nuisance.

ONLY YOUNG ONCE

But did you ever figure out why your little sister seems to get in your way, why she insists on hanging around, chattering and asking questions, even when you'd rather be alone? You're sixteen and smart, so the answer should be easy. You can sum it all up in three brief phrases: she admires you, she's lonesome—and she's little. You're everything she'd like to be when she grows up. To her, you're the greatest thing this side of Lana Turner! You get phone calls from boys, you can wear lipstick, you get an allowance, you can stay up after nine o'clock and you're even allowed to go out in the evenings. But she's still a little girl. She has a good time riding her two-wheeler, playing with the girls on your block and taking in an occasional Saturday-afternoon movie, but she can't do "big" things the way you do. So she thinks you have all the fun—and she just wants to be kibitzing on part of it.

ONE FOR YOU

Sharing clothes can be one of the biggest problems. Maybe Mary Ann blithely borrows your green plaid slacks (all rolled up to the knee) to go roller skating and returns them with a three-inch rip from a hard fall. Or slips the last clean white blouse from your dresser drawer, or decides to wear the fuzzy blue socks just the morning you'd planned to wear them. And one day after school, you find her parading before the bedroom mirror in your best black-net formal, complete with long gloves and a sequin flower pinned in her hair. With your little sister around, nothing's safe! You can't find your cold cream or hairbrush; your curlers are scattered all over the bathroom; there's lipstick smeared on your powder puff and powder sprinkled all over the top drawer. And she dropped your white tennis shorts in the wash with a bright red hankie still tucked in the pocket! Your sister seems to be deliberately trying to make you unhappy. No matter what it is, if it's yours—she wants it!

But if you're a bright girl you'll figure out that Mary Ann has a mild case of "hero worship." She wants to wear your jacket for the same reason you'd like to own one of Van Johnson's reindeer sweaters. Because she likes you! And she thinks you have good taste and know all about clothes. So why not show her that you have taste in little-girl clothes too? Make her the center of attention. Ask your mother to get her a hairbrush and little-girl cosmetics of her own. Suggest she wear this sweater with that skirt; buy her a pair of blue socks just like yours, in a smaller size; tell her she looks pretty when she's leaving for school in the morning; spend an evening with a brush and comb finding a different hair style for her—a new part in the middle, a curl on to bright bow on one side. And get the fan terested by saying, "Doesn't Mary An nice with her hair that way?" Make h clothes seem important—and she'll forget yours.

Make a game out of sharing your roo vide the drawers between you, the drawers for her so she can reach them; part of Saturday morning tidying them gether. Put your books on one shelf, hers other. Divide the clothes closet with a brig ribbon tied around the clothes rod right middle, to mark off halves. You won't your clothes on her half and, as part game, she'll respect your half. It's an thing to make a little girl happy—and h as long as she's having fun doing it!

ONE FOR ME

Did you ever try to brush off a young s questions with an impatient "Oh, you "Go 'way, you bother me!"? Doesn't does it? If Mary Ann has something to s her say it. You probably spend at leas chattery half hour a day with your girl fr discussing love, life and next Friday's date your little sister has interests too. Try lo round-eyed and attentive when she tell that her friend Sally has a new bike or th night, at seven-thirty, she's going to find the Lone Ranger and Tonto really did dis the secret of the hidden gold mine. Then be contented and co-operative, come thirty, when you're all set to get dreamy the Dinah Shore show.

Remember she's the baby in the family you. If Mary Ann gets a sudden whim to the dishes in her week to dry, why not let If she has her heart set on a banana split ice-cream-cone budget, you can spare f cents, can't you? If she's got a hot date t baseball at the playground on Saturday ing, you might make her bed for her, just Let her get the idea that you two are friends. And if she's the "tag along" type little sister who wants to go along to Fr night basketball games, the Sunday-after Coke dates, and hangs around the living nibbling potato chips when the girls are forestall these crises by planning some pr fun just for the two of you. Make it a w event—a movie together, a walk down t lake to see the boats or just a trip down with a big fudge sundae later to finish of afternoon. But it's fun you will have in mon; something to talk about and plan while you're having your big-girl fun on the

You might even be perplexed by the e beaver type of sister who likes to lend an e telephone conversations and take a sly pe your private mail. Instead of running to mother with a tearful "You've got to do s thing about Mary Ann" complaint, why let your little sister know what's happenin your life? Then she won't need to pry snoop. No need to pour your heart out or her a date-by-date account of your latest mance; just a word or two will do it. Go in huddle with her: "Johnny Andrews is goin call me tonight and I think he's going to asl to the club dance. Wouldn't that be wor ful?" Or, "Remember Ned Strauss? He's ing home for spring vacation. Should be to have him around for a while." Let her k you're excited and that you don't mind te her all about it.

Little sisters can be good fun and they be good friends. All you have to do is t them a few tricks, give them equal billing let them into the act!

WHAT'S THAT YOU SAID?

Oh, nothing at all! You just can't think of the right thing to say—in school, out of school and especially when there are boys around? Then the new Sub-Deb booklet, SPEAK UP!, No. 2306, is just for you! It's 5c from the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

This is the story of Annie...

NOW ANNIE WAS...

AS BEAUTIFUL A GIRL...

AS EVER WAS PUT TOGETHER!

WHY, WHEN ANNIE WALKED DOWN THE STREET...
WOW!

YET ANNIE HAD HER BAD MOMENTS...LIKE ANY OTHER GAL.

AND YOU WANT TO KNOW WHY? ANNIE'S HANDS WERE A MESS. ALWAYS ROUGH AND DRY, LIKE SANDPAPER.

AND WHEN A MAN WANTS TO HOLD A GIRL'S HANDS... EVEN A GIRL LIKE ANNIE ...HE DOESN'T WANT TO WEAR GLOVES...

THEN, LUCKILY, FANNIE TOLD ANNIE ABOUT AN ENTIRELY NEW AND DIFFERENT HAND LOTION! THE BEFOREHAND LOTION...TRUSHAY!

SO ANNIE SMOOTHED CREAMY, FRAGRANT TRUSHAY ON HER HANDS BEFORE SHE DID DISHES...BECAUSE TRUSHAY GUARDS HANDS EVEN IN HOT, SOAPY WATER!

AND ANNIE PUT TRUSHAY ON HER HANDS BEFORE SHE TUBBED HER UNDIES...SO TRUSHAY'S SPECIAL "OIL-RICHNESS" COULD HELP PREVENT DRYNESS AND ROUGHNESS.

SO NOW ANNIE IS ABLE TO KEEP HER HANDS SOFT AND SMOOTH AND HOLDABLE... THANKS TO TRUSHAY'S WONDERFUL SOFTENING HELP.

TRUSHAY

The "Beforehand" Lotion

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

P. S. Trushay's grand for softening hands at any time. Wonderful, too, for rough, dry elbows and heels... as a powder base... before and after exposure to weather. Trushay contains no alcohol, is not sticky. Begin today to use Trushay.

"I told you we ought to take that course at the Singer Sewing Center!"

Don't just envy someone else's pretty clothes! Betake yourself to your Singer Sewing Center—sign up for a fascinating Sewing Course—and come out walking on air!

Singer experts teach you to make your own lovely frocks and suits—give you smart advice about how to remodel dresses—how to add fresh, this-minute charm to your wardrobe.

With Singer help, you can dress twice as well and cut your budget way down!

And when it comes to smart finish-up tasks—like picoting, hemstitching, covering buttons and belts—Singer does them all. And you'll find a wide assortment of chic accessories, useful notions, gala gifts.

Idea-hunting? Visit your Singer Sewing Center—today!

• Learn sewing the easy way—from Singer instructors. And make a dress while you learn. Expert advice on every step. Eight lessons, $10. Single lessons, $1.50.

• If finishing's your trouble, let us help. Covered buttons, covered belts, buttonholes, picoting, hemstitching—we do them all. And reasonably, too.

• A flower for your hair, a scarf for the throat of your plain blue suit. Frothy white cuffs to glorify last year's black dress. Come and see our pretties!

• Take a notion Dress shields, yarn, thread, zippers, tailor's chalk, buttons - you'll find every notion to fill your needs -at your Singer Sewing Center.

• Your understudy for fittings -A dress form, molded exactly to fit your form in only 30 minutes. The one model that never gets tired—assures perfect fit.

• See Singer's magic attachments. A Buttonholer which does a professionally perfect job—a Zipper Foot—a Zig-Zagger for fine appliquéing—and many others.

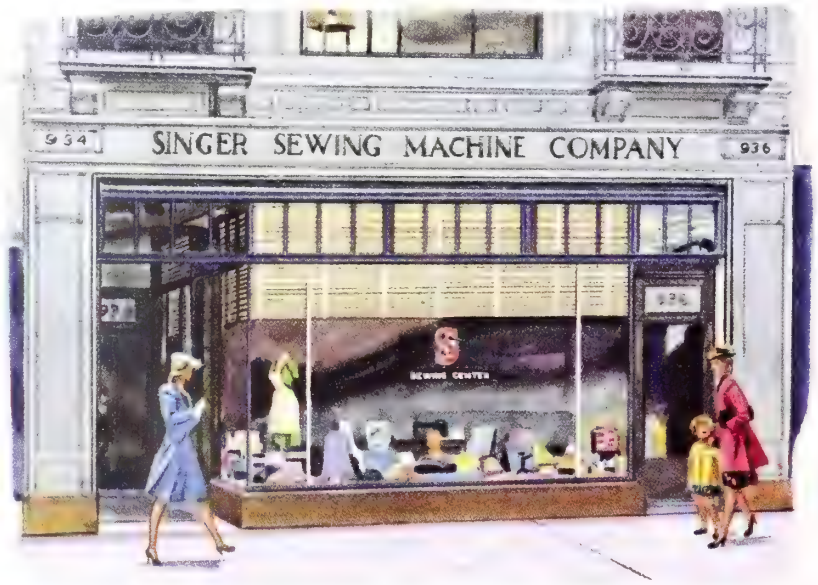
• Talented writing desk In blond oak or mellow walnut finish. A charming piece—with a dream of a Singer inside, to help solve all your sewing problems.

FOR YOUR PROTECTION!

Singer sells its machines only through Singer Sewing Centers, identified by the Red "S" on the window, and never through department stores or other outlets.

Check address of your local Singer Shop in phone book. Singer Sewing Machine Company.

Here's the Singer Sewing Center at 934-936 Canal Street, New Orleans, Louisiana. Hundreds more from coast to coast. There's one near you!



SINGER SEWING CENTERS

THERE'S ONE NEAR YOU TO SERVE YOU

Copyright, U.S.A., 1947, by The Singer Manufacturing Co. All rights reserved for all countries.

LETTERS TO JOAN

This is the second in a series of letters from a mother to her daughter, in which standards of today are discussed, frankly and understandingly — to insure the success of tomorrow.

BY GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ

)AN DARLING:

I am so glad that my letter answered the ost burning questions for you and made u feel better. Of course I don't mind ur showing it to the girls. But I am sur- ised to find such a general feeling among em that we parents leave you without idance in these important emotional and x matters. I am sure other parents don't tend it any more than I do. Maybe we ight to ask more questions ourselves and id out what things our boys and girls ed information about.

And how fine that you did have another ate with Tim and that he was so sweet. hen he took you straight home, asked ou to go with him to the big dance and ien gave you that one gentle kiss at the oor, he was telling you a lot. That he had een doing some thinking himself, I'd say. hat he really likes you, and that he in- nds to do his part toward keeping your elationship on the right kind of basis. Vell, dear, it looks to me as though you ad got yourself a beau—excuse me, boy iend! And one of the best.

I am very happy about it, believe me. But do still keep in mind the advice I gave ou—that in the final analysis, it's the irl's job to ride herd on the expression of ffection. It's evident that Tim's inten- ions are the finest. But passion is some- hing that can slip up on a couple when hey least intend it. Experienced people now that. And it's the reason why par- nts feel some pardonable anxiety when heir offspring begin dabbling in these dan- gerous waters.

No liquor, no prolonged embraces, no ate parking or dallying around with these motions, which are the strongest we hu- man beings have. That's the way to stay ut of trouble, whether the man means well or whether he doesn't.

But oh, darling, why did you have to ask me about petting! What does a woman of my generation know about petting, as it seems to be practiced today? The very word, let alone the institution itself, has come in since my time. But in as much as the girls seem so anxious to get my views about it—I can't tell you how flattered I am!—I did a little research into the matter and am ready to report.

From what I could gather, petting refers to caressing of those portions of the fem- inine anatomy which are situated below the neck—territory which, in my courting days, was labeled "No Trespassing" ex- cept to the man one chose out of all the world, and to him supposedly only after marriage. I say "supposedly," for I pre- sume not everyone observed the limita- tions. The important thing is that it was part of the code under which we operated, and it saved us many a painful experience.

As to how far petting extends, and what regions can be invaded without a lady's losing caste, I found a singular lack of co- operativeness on the part of my inform- ants. Nobody seemed to want to testify. I judge that is a somewhat individual mat- ter, and the less said about it the better.

But what it all seems to add up to is that girls today have to deal with a kind of ad- vance from the male which in my sheltered maidenhood would probably have resulted in calling out the militia, or at the very least in ostracism from select feminine so- ciety for the offending man.

And I must say, frankly, darling, that I wonder how the clever modern girl ever let this get put over on her. It's like making your opponent in a card game a present of all your trumps, and then wondering why it's so hard to win the game. How nice and easy it must make things for the predatory male! (Wolf to you, my sweet.)

From my experience as a woman, I should say that we already have enough strikes on us without deliberately going out and adding more. What Nature has done to us! What lengths she has gone to to make sure that we will get ourselves pregnant! We hear a great deal about the desires and passions of the male. But in our own quiet way, we females are quite as liberally endowed.

Perhaps one of those bits of information which we elder heads have not passed on to you young people as we should is the fact that at certain times of her monthly cycle, a woman normally desires sexual gratifica- tion. Her sex glands attend to that, whether she wills it or not, and Nature's design is quite obvious.

Another thing is that various parts of a woman's body are particularly sensitive with regard to sex feelings. The mouth is one such part, and as you've already dis- covered, prolonged kissing induces sexual excitement in the woman as well as in the man. This is even more true of other parts.

Nature, single-minded wench that she is, has arranged it all very cleverly. Prolonged kissing puts the girl in the mood for further liberties. And the more liberty she permits the man, the more she herself is disposed to want him to go on and on. At the same time the man becomes more passionate and harder to control. Any girl who doesn't want to go the limit, therefore, had best stay away from petting.

Some women, to be sure, are more re- sponsive than others. It's possible that a cold fish could stand very intimate petting without becoming affected. But who wants to be a cold fish?

A man I knew, who had a very attrac- tive and provocative wife, seemed strangely complacent at the obvious invitations she extended to men. Once he admitted to me that she was really quite cold. "I suppose all women who are great flirts are rather frigid," he commented rather sadly. "That's how they can afford to be flirtatious."

A normal woman wants to be ardent and responsive in the arms of the man she loves, and it is right that she should be. But those very qualities mean that she must be guarded in casual relationships. Or I suppose it's possible that a woman can school herself to keep her desires within bounds, if she is experienced and under- stands her limits very clearly. But that's a game for old hands, and is likely to prove disastrous to the inexperienced. A very good rule for a girl is not to permit han- dling or caressing of her body except by the man whom she is willing and ready to have as the father of her child. For if she allows these intimacies, the final step usually isn't far away.

Then there is the matter of good taste. With all the foregoing considerations in

(Continued on Page 216)

What slide fastener in a dress placket doesn't slip...
is light as a feather...
flexible as a ribbon?
TALON
SLIDE FASTENER
9 inch
FOR DRESS PLACKETS
BRIDEL TOP STOP
Those "in the know" sew with Talon
THE QUALITY SLIDE FASTENER
YOU'LL RECOGNIZE the Talon slide fastener for dress plackets on sight. It comes in the BLUE package—together with complete directions for sewing it in! At notion counters everywhere

There was a young housewife named Whitty
Who said, "Though I want my hands pretty Washing dishes this way
I'm afraid doesn't pay.
It's slow as a snail! What a pity!"

TOO BAD! Mrs. Whitty's mild bar soap was easy on her hands —but much too slow-sudsing for dishes!

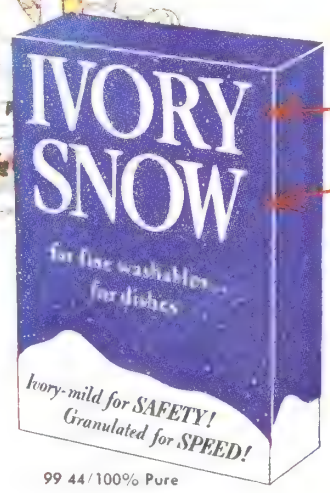
There was a young lady named Head
Who said, "Dishwashing makes my hands red.
In a rose—red's all right
But red hands are a sight.
I'd much rather have white hands instead!"

TOO BAD! Mrs. Head used her regular washday soap for dishes! Granulated for speed—but so strong it was hard on hands.

There was a young woman named Hays
Who said, "Ivory Snow's right two ways
It gives top sudsing speed
PLUS the safety hands need.
Do you wonder that I sing its praise?"

RIGHT! Ivory Snow is the only soap that's bot Ivory-mild for snow-white hands . . . and in granulated "snowdrops" for speedy suds! Tops in safety! Convenient! Leaves dishes sparkling clean . . . lovely hands soft and smooth! No finer soap made!

NO OTHER SOAP LIKE I'



99 44/100% Pure

for Mildness!
for Speed!

Here's one soap that gives both

Kindness to Hands!
Speed in the Dishpan!

HEAR KENNY BAKER on Glamour Manor! New high in daytime radio! All-star cast! Fun! Music! Monday through Friday, 12 noon EST.

...ity Years Ago ...the Journal

IN April, 1897, war was declared between Turkey and Greece. Charles Dana Gibson was sketching scenes from London society, and in Vienna Brahms was laid to rest Beethoven and Schubert. ...rent song hit was Yip-...-Ay; St. Louis built a bil... ...l for women; and Walter ... was born.

...ix to eight thousand peo...e hands with the Presi... Benjamin Harrison de... White House reception in ...il, 1897. JOURNAL "and ... wife if she is able to en... ordeal."

...ok suggests a training school ...stics as the answer to Women's ...xing Problem. "I wish that ... I stop this clamor for higher ..., he writes, "and devote ...ention to lower education."

... girl, 1897:" A sweater for a ...eventeen, made with lapels ... back in the front, a vest ... igh collar, costs about five ..."

...eth: Sometimes in the coun... ...ntleman might smoke while ... wife, sister or daughter, pro... ...he does not object, but no ...d man would smoke while on ...ets of a city with a lady."

... Dale: It is said that torna... ...sually occur between 3 and ...e afternoon."

...fternoon call is not the formal ...t was some years ago," admits ... Germain in his column for ...At many houses men leave their ...d sticks in the hall and do not ...w drawing room with them, as ...n the vogue."

...stions for mothers: "The old ... that if a baby's nails were ... would grow up a thief is an ...perstition."

...ne second floor there are three ...table bedrooms, a nursery, ...t's room, bathroom and ample ...," Walter Keith describes a ... hundred-dollar house for a ... couple.

...n a simple percale morning ..." Emma Hooper advises the ..., "wear a stock tie of satin or ...h linen collar with a plaid ... tie, dress bow or four-in-... ..."

...ie: Although your escort offers ...e bill of fare, allow him to choose ...pper."

Journal about Town

Crowds early in Times Square on New Year's Eve are the throngs of wanderers on Broadway and Fifth Avenue

If you think you saw a lot of people standing in line in the days when meat and cigarettes and nylons were hard to get—remember?—you should walk up Fifth Avenue Easter morning and observe the seemingly endless queues waiting to wind into the churches: or what is more, you should look down from the Workshop on Ash Wednesday, when at St. Patrick's alone more than 25,000 worshipers attend the Cathedral. Makes you realize that man does not live by meat alone; or for that matter, women by nylons.

A young lady named Robin McKown, who runs the Friends of Widows and Orphans of the French Resistance, sent Ruth Matthews a picture she took in France last fall of the six Bertholet children at Nantes, whose father and mother were killed because they wouldn't take the Nazi occupation lying down. Her organization arranged for the "adoption" of hundreds of French orphans like these, by generous Americans—men, women and children—who agree to send two packages of food and clothing a month for a year, in case you'd like to be a godparent. And if little Christiane, at the right, seems somewhat set up in Mrs. McKown's picture, it's because her godmother happens to be Eleanor Roosevelt.

Orphans of the Nazi storm.

Henrietta Murdock knows a woman named Laura Bankhead (a second cousin of Tallulah's*) who probably handles more questions from children than anyone else in the world—over 3000 last month. Keeps a staff of fifteen busy, with fifty outside experts on call; and while they answer adults' questions, too, Miss B. says the children's are mostly harder, and far more fun. The only catch is, you've got to own the Book of Knowledge. Longest inquiry they ever got was twelve pages from a girl in grammar school, asking about the UN. Shortest, and toughest, was from a boy in Kansas: "Who's Kilroy?"*

Nobody around the Workshop seems to get hay fever, but 200,000 other New Yorkers do, and anywhere from 6½ to 7 million other Americans; so Judy Barry had a talk with Director George S. Avery, Jr., of the Brooklyn Botanic Garden, who's holding a conference over there this month to do something about it—at the source. As he told Judy, what fixed malaria was getting rid of mosquitoes, and you shouldn't tolerate ragweed any more than you tolerate fleas, especially when you can get all the 2-4-D you want, which does the controlling, if communities only cooperate. Not much ragweed here in the city, he said. What makes the trouble is, the pollen blows in from the country. Write him, if you're interested.

In 1896 the U. S. had a horse population of 20,000,000 and a truck population of 1. At the latest count, there were 10,000,000 horses and 5,000,000 trucks. . . . The day of the nonrun nylon stocking is almost here. . . . Arthur Murray was delighted when so many G. I.'s used their Bill of Rights education money to study dancing—until the boys married and walked off with 18 of his best teachers. . . . .It is possible to give 1000 pints of blood in transfusions during a lifetime without ill effects, according to some New York physicians. . . . Out of about $5,000,000 worth of checks a leading New York hotel cashes for guests in the course of a year, it averages only $2000 worth that bounce. . . . In Pennsylvania there is a hairdresser for every four women. . . . Through depressions and booms two American rubber companies keep turning out 75,000,000 baby nipples a year.

With Radio City here still by far New York's most popular tourist attraction, they're fixing up something new for visitors—not to mention for millions of natives. You'll look right in from the street, through a fifty-foot window, to a vast room like Doctor Caligari's cabinet, only reeking with color—pale yellow, pink and purple-black. The ceiling will be waved and lighted; some walls leaning in, some accordion-pleated, and one will have tremendous ears and eyes. And in a space between a pink and a yellow pier you can step up and be televised—if you don't mind being projected on a screen, before everybody's eyes.

Donald Stuart has been telling us of a photographer out in Bronxville, who's opened what he calls a Hansel & Gretel studio. It's like a playroom in a dream, with talkies, balloons and Mother Goose murals, which engage the child's attention and cause her to look very natural and alive. But the trick is that lights and camera are all concealed, and a child never knows she's had her pictures taken until it's too late. Even the cameraman can be concealed, but he says that doesn't make any difference. Most kids are much too occupied to notice him.

No need to "watch the birdie" in a studio like this.

Friends and Lovers

There was one moment when David's head said, "Turn back!" But his heart said, "Go on!" . . . Beginning a new serial ★ By Helen MacInnes

THE morning mist had cleared. Now a fresh wind was blowing, curling the edges of the waves. The sea had lost its cold gray look; the blue waters were a darker reflection of the smiling sky, intensifying its color and emotion by their great depths. The mainland, wide stretches of heather and bracken sloping down from barren hills, ended abruptly in red granite cliffs. There was no sign of house or croft. There was nothing but the uneven hills, silent, watchful, folding eastward, one behind the other. To the west and north and south was the Atlantic, with the lonely islands jutting out of its deep waters to break the force of its rolling waves and turn them into swirling currents.

The men in the boat—single-sailed and small—had not spoken since they had left Loch Innish, on the mainland. But then, David Bosworth thought, this was the kind of place where conversation was hardly necessary. He watched the wide-winged gulls wheeling overhead, and wondered at their folly in chasing anything so insignificant as this small boat.

George Fenton-Stevens, standing upright with an arm hooked around the mast, oblivious of wind or spray or gulls, suddenly looked down at David, sitting securely in the well of the boat. "Well," he said, "what do you think of all this, David?" There was a smile of enjoyment on his face, possessive pride in his voice.

David smiled, too, and studied Fenton-Stevens for a moment. When in Rome, he reflected, old George could always be counted on doing more than the Romans did. In Oxford, for instance, George wore more twists of scarf around his neck, trousers both baggier and more stained, a gown torn into more tatters than the usual undergraduate adopted. And now, in the western highlands of Scotland, he was the Celtic sea reaver standing proudly before the mast as his ship bore down on an unsuspecting island.

"There's Inchnamurren," George said suddenly, and pointed to the larger of two islands lying close together. He was explaining that the smaller island was uninhabited, and that Inchnamurren's houses couldn't be seen yet. They were hidden by the sharp hill on the north end of the island, which fell steeply into the sea. "Devil's Elbow, they call it," George said. "Nasty piece of work, isn't it?"

"Sounds ominous," David agreed.

He spoke lightly, but his thoughts were serious enough as he looked at the crook of black rock thrusting itself so evilly out into the sound. Full fathom five. The grim sea raiders, the quiet fishermen who once sailed around these islands, and then sailed no more. The sea wrack their shroud. . . . Back to back they lie, lifeless lie. . . . The lines from the sea dirges which George's mother kept prominently displayed on the piano at the Lodge were haunting him today.

They passed the Devil's Elbow, and entered the island's sheltered bay. The scene became a study in bright color. The water in the bay was shallow and flowed over white sand. In the sunlight, it became a broad band of jade edging the shore. At the water's edge was a row of whitewashed cottages. Farther back there were other houses, scattered widely over the green fields and rugged ground. The heather was beginning to bloom; one rough hillside was already covered with reddish purple.

David watched the boat as it was carefully eased along the jetty where two brown-legged, barefooted children halted in their game to see the foreigners arrive. A white-haired man was working on the seams of an upturned rowing boat. Two (Continued on Page 76)

Copyright, 1947, by Helen Highet ★

She was smiling; and David, seeing that smile, was aware of a pang that was never quite to leave him, as if his heart could not bear the pain of loving Penny.

Candy's Second Husband

BY ELIZABETH DUNN

CANDY looked critically at the dining-room table. Silver and glass and dark-blue linen napkins. The flowers, she decided, were perfect: Arrangement for an Old Beau, of dark-red and white hollyhock blossoms, floating in a sapphire-blue glass bowl. They struck precisely the right note, halfway between the exotic and the domestic, a femme fatale in a bungalow apron. She hoped Adam Campbell would get the general impression, even if he didn't appreciate the details. In the hall mirror she examined herself intently. Her taffeta house coat was printed with great, glowing roses; above its low neckline her throat seemed longer and whiter than usual, and her lipstick matched the roses. Gracefully she leaned against the newel post and made her eyes dreamy; she thought, Après-midi of a castoff suitor.

"H'm," said Bill, peering through the screen door. "Not bad."

Candy came to attention. "Come along in, darling. You have ten minutes to shave and change."

"Shave!" Outraged, Bill let the screen door slam. "Why should I shave, all of a sudden?"

Candy looked at him distantly. "Because gentlemen frequently do shave, especially when they look like trappers after two weeks in the north woods—and most especially when people are coming to dinner."

"What people?"

"A man named Adam Campbell."

"Never heard of him," Bill said with finality, and added suspiciously, "Who is he?"

"A research chemist. He does very important and valuable work for that big firm of ——"

"Fine, fine! I'm delighted that Mr. Campbell has found happiness and success in his chosen profession. But who is he? How do we know him?"

"Oh, I've known him for years," Candy said airily. "At one time I thought quite a lot about marrying him. Do hurry up, darling, and put on a clean shirt, won't you?"

"Did he think about it too?" Bill inquired, hewing to the line.

Candy appeared to consider. "Well, he talked an awful lot about it," she told him. The house coat rustled in an intensely feminine way as she moved into the living room. She enjoyed rustling. Bill stood in the doorway, looking maddened, and that was enjoyable too.

"But you didn't, eh?"

"No, I didn't. I married you. Remember, darling?"

"I remember," said Bill darkly. "Adam. Imagine deliberately naming a helpless little baby Adam."

"It's an old family name, I believe," Candy said distantly.

"It certainly is—and what a family! Is this one married?"

"Oh, no." Candy opened a package of cigarettes and put them in the china box.

"Never married?"

"Never." It was very difficult not to sound just a little smug; she didn't quite succeed. She added quickly, "He's going to live here. He's bought the Dean cottage."

"He's bought a house? A bachelor?"

"I see no reason why bachelors shouldn't live in houses. You act as though he were an ape or something."

Bill hastily took the offensive. "Who are you planning to marry him to?"

"Whom. Nobody. I'm saving him."

Bill walked straight into the trap. "Whom for?"

Candy smiled at him. "For my second husband."

Bill went upstairs in a silence so dignified as to be nearly visible.

The evening, however, did not turn out quite as Candy had planned it. She had foreseen it all so clearly: herself rustling alluringly across the room; Adam bending to kiss her gently on the forehead (he was very tall—taller than Bill); Adam too moved to speak; herself making sparkling conversation, Adam lighting a cigarette to get command of himself. Bill coming in ——

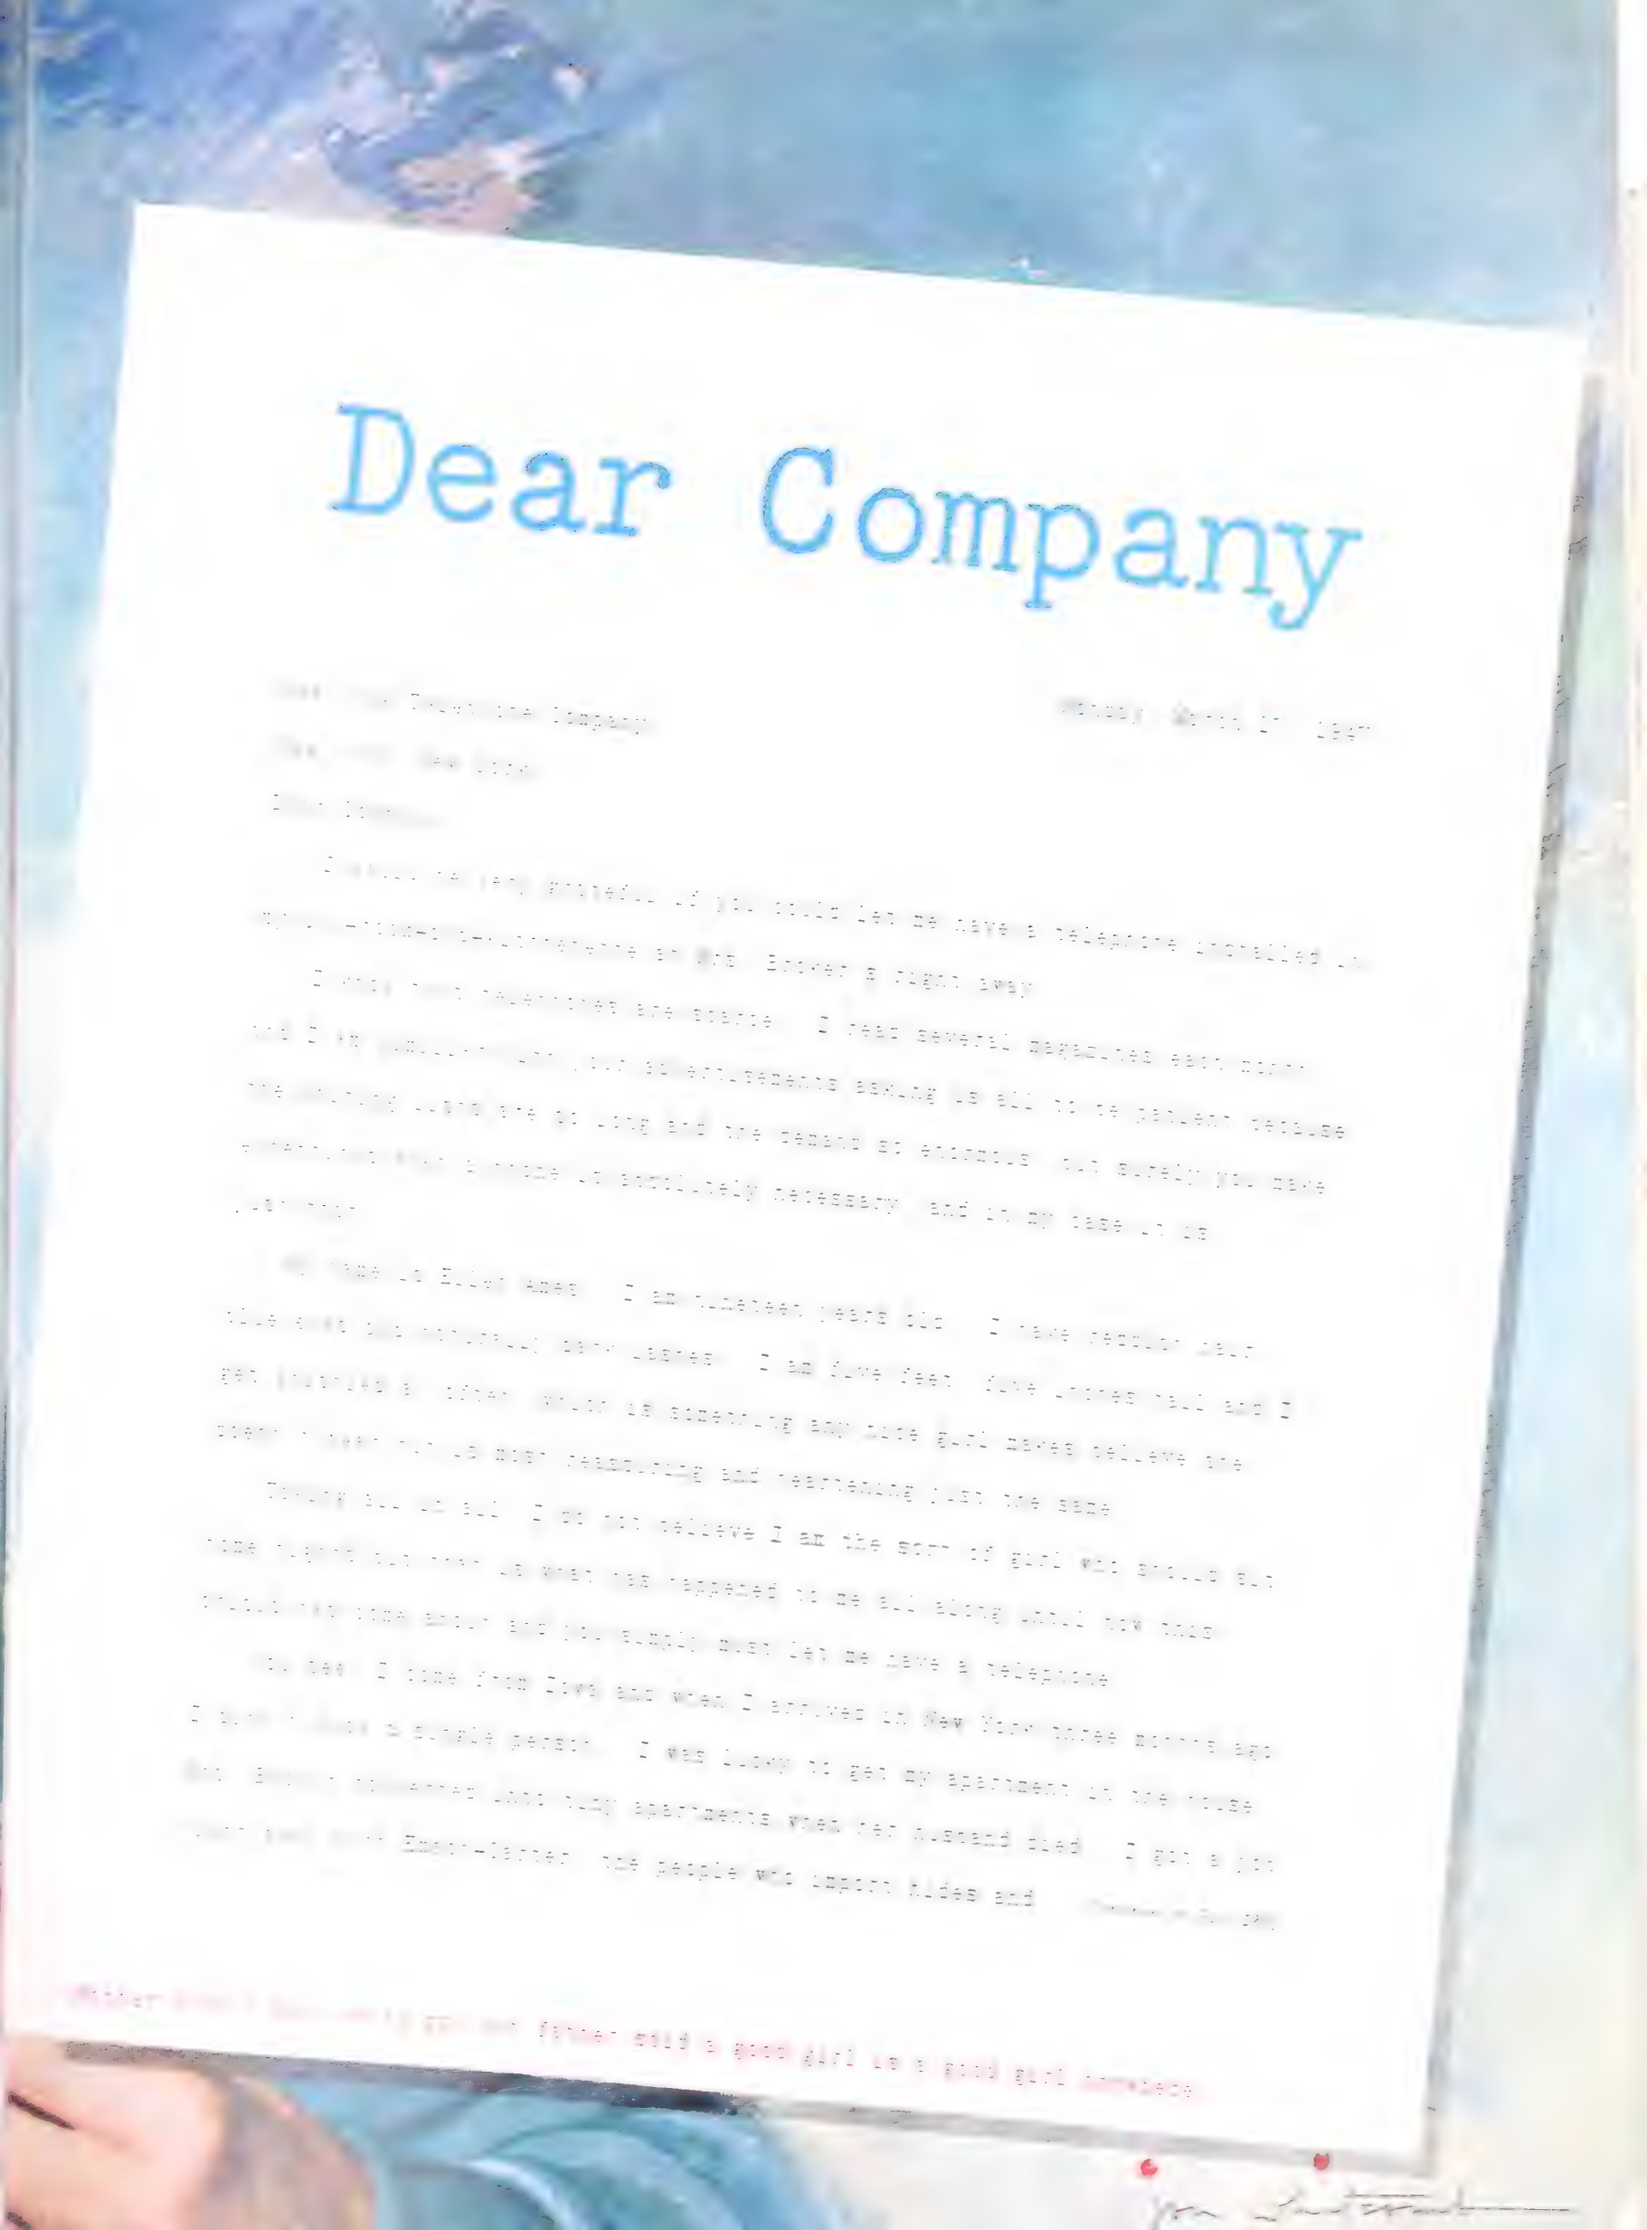
But difficulties arose at once. In the first place, Bill came in before Adam arrived. Then he had not only changed (Continued on Page 267)

It was one of those times when a wife remembers the girl she was—and isn't too displeased with the woman she is.

"Your back looks different." Bill observed. "Turn around and let's see if your face explains the mysterious air I feel around me."

What's the good of a telephone—if the wrong man calls?
By Alec Rackowe

Dear Company



WHY RELIGION HELPS MESS UP THE WORLD

MISGUIDED PRIVATE SECTARIAN DIFFERENCES TURNED RELIGION INTO A RIGHT-LOVING ELF WHICH MAKES MAN A SUSPICIOUS BELIEVER OF WHITE ▼ BY HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK

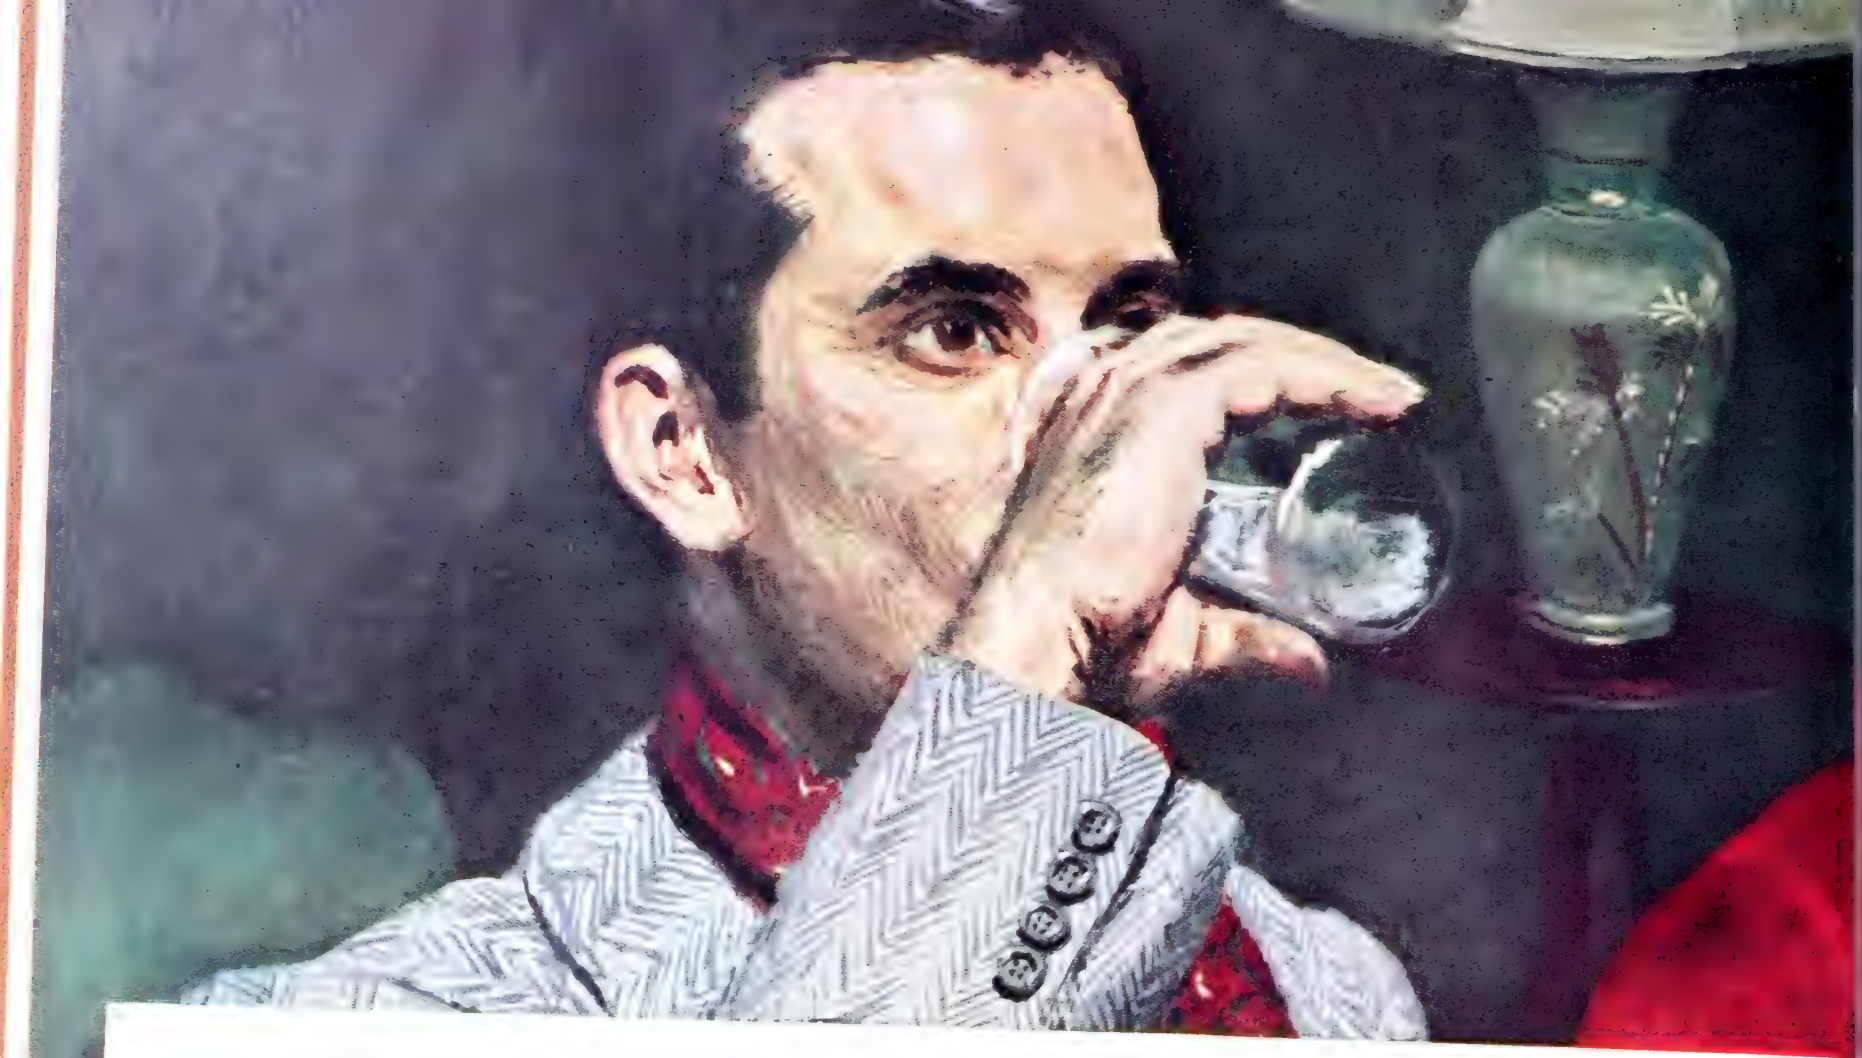
T

Continued on Page 142

The Lackawanna Valley

BY GEORGE INNESS

(Remarks on an interesting work, the purchase of art has come from comparatively lately and the present problems of the museum between patron and artist. Some would be sure should choose and the other acquiesce, but others oppose. In painting the famous picture of Scranton the Delaware and Lackawanna Railroad in 1855, George Inness was confronted with this controversy. He painted what pleased himself, not necessarily what pleased his patron. Had he not done so, he would have been compelled to paint a picture of a type of which he was heartily tired. Now, the railroad company wishes to own the painting, and I cannot at all blame them. It is a fine picture, and I cannot at all blame them. It is a fine picture, and I cannot at all blame them. It is a fine picture



DEATH for NOVEMBER

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE NOVEL . . . BY RONALD MITCHELL

SOME people say that Creston is the most vicious town in North America. It is only a few who say so, and they are regarded as an affected, precious group. Most of Creston's residents would laugh if they heard the slander, since it can be proved by reference to statistics that many towns have a higher juvenile-delinquency rating and more murders.

Occasionally a youngster gets into trouble, usually a professor's son or daughter, sometimes even the child of a professor of psychology or sociology; and as for murder, there has been only one since the year 1908, when Darius Woodbury, in an access of displeasure with the River Heights Village Board, invited all its members to a picnic at which every sandwich was fortified with henbane. The entire board perished. Darius Woodbury expiated his crime, and River Heights was incorporated into the city of Creston.

It takes an old sensation like this to remind the people of Creston how very peaceful and secure their home town is, and since most of them have forgotten all about Darius Woodbury, Creston is usually taken for granted by those who live in it.

The intellectuals mix their mythology by calling it an academic Venusberg and its inhabitants the lotus-eaters of the Middle West. The simpler folk merely say that it is such a lovely place to live in that almost everyone who comes there wants to stay there for life. You hardly ever see a wheel chair on its streets, and the lawns are dotted with play pens, woolly animals and tricycles. It is even rumored that couples who have been childless for eight to fifteen years find themselves excitedly visiting the obstetrician after a few months in Creston. The town is youthful and alive and vigorously beautiful.

The V-shaped section between the rivers is called the Triangle, and is especially attractive. Conrad Lawson, professor of political science, lives there with a softly purring wife whose white hair looks very distinguished at the concert series, row D, over gray, black or lavender. The McCarrolls live there too. Professor McCarroll, once a gardener's boy out at the Ketchum Nursery, is now head of the Department of Horticulture.

The richest in the Triangle are the Maxwells. Twenty years ago Leonard Maxwell was a graduate assistant in English at Creston, and for several years it seemed that he would never get his doctor's degree. What little money he had he increased and decreased alternately by paying more attention to horses than Creston thought a graduate assistant specializing in Victorian poetry should. Creston was proved wrong when he won a thousand dollars on a horse named Florence, and felt he owed it to her to go to Italy for the summer vacation on the proceeds. It seemed a sensible thing for a young student of Browning to do, but how very sensible Leonard did not realize until he went to Florence and ravished the heart of Leona Hopper, whose parents owned a villa in Fiesole, a block and a half in downtown Philadelphia, and the equivalent of three oil wells in Texas. Leonard and Leona were married, and the graduate assistant returned to live in the handsomest house in the Triangle and become one of the best teachers in the English Department or any other. He had (Continued on Page 116)

★ Copyright, 1947, by Ronald Mitchell. This is a condensation of the novel soon to be published by Harper & Brothers. ★

A story of love and its dark encounter with two hearts that sought only love.

ILLUSTRATED BY AL PARKER

He raised his glass and drank, and what she saw filled her with horror.

I WANTED A BABY NOW!

By Helene Wanderman Lefco

More than 3,000,000 couples in the United States applied for marriage licenses in 1946. Each of these couples must have faced the question: "Shall we have our babies now or wait?" Here are the differing opinions of two young wives.

THIS is being written [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Nancy, my [illegible]

Every woman needs a baby, wants a baby. But [illegible] never built a family's strength or an adaptable individual. There is no shame in support, in comfort, in [illegible]

Numerous potential mothers are stymied by what [illegible] do not feel self-sufficient or stable in themselves. They find themselves afraid of the love that may grow for [illegible] as in the family group would result in a vigorous, [illegible]

W[illegible] ers with them, while Hank can teach wrestling holds on the [illegible] bubbles within us. The No. 1 ably ended with my head dangling disconsolately from the window. Mornings were discouraging affairs where good nutritious food was wasted on an unappreciative woman. My days ended in a quiet, all-dressed evening, and an early exhausted yawn. But as soon as I discovered the eccentricities of my insides, and ate and rested accordingly, the intensity of my early discomforts subsided. All my former activities were resumed; I visited friends, went to the theater, read, wrote, walked for hours in the country air. With the peculiar "toe-out" gait of the pregnant [illegible] I learned to love [illegible] my formula equipment, and took care of my house. I drank quantities of milk, stopped smoking, and thought beautiful thoughts. I even went to a football game, and stood shamelessly up on a bench, cheering loudly.

W[illegible]

Maternity clothes made an early appearance in my [illegible] But expectant motherhood need no [illegible] I discovered several handsome, [illegible] Hank was ready with a quick compliment and an assuring smile. Most men think their wives loveliest at such a time, despite hidden female fears.

There was much solicitation [illegible] from my friends. My ravenous appetite amused them. My [illegible] My way constantly. [illegible] and bosses groomed [illegible] offering me their seats, arms [illegible] knowing. I was the natural [illegible] Speculation as to the sex of my baby ran high. Hank was [illegible] descendant of a predominantly female clan, insisted [illegible] a normal, healthy baby.

[illegible] and in a few weeks my prepregnancy clothes fitted [illegible] [illegible] Hank [illegible] and I are more closely allied now than [illegible] my relationship. Baby has become an expression of [illegible] Hank was [illegible] I expect to live with, bend to meet, mold and [illegible] my heart. I'm glad I had my baby now! THE END

WE DON'T WANT A BABY NOW!

By Jeanne Lenton Tracey

I DON'T want a baby—at least for the first five years! Although my husband and I feel very strongly about this, many of our friends refuse to take us seriously. Our families feel they have failed in the line of duty and we often meet raised eyebrows and patronizing shrugs of the shoulder which are calculated to "put us in our place" by young couples already in the stork set.

To be doubted and challenged on the basis that we are violating our foremost obligation to the human race is perhaps fair enough. But if our first and foremost obligation to the human race is to have children, certainly an equally important obligation to the world is to rear them wisely.

My husband and I both want children someday and would be terribly unhappy if we couldn't have them. But for the present, our answer is "No."

We have thought about this and talked it over together, and our reasons for not wanting children for the first five years of marriage are based on our mutual hopes, ambitions and the circun. 'ances at the present time.

When Jim and I met five years ago we liked each other immediately. Looking back, it seems impossible that our friendship survived the clashes of two youthful temperaments, but we finally narrowed our emotional interests down to each other and, in the process of growing up, fell in love. Our timing wasn't too perfect, however, for we had to sit out the war in single blessedness and watch our friends merge two by two. With the end of the war we made plans and were married.

We have been married for a year now and have been completely happy. One of the reasons we have been so happy is that we are totally absorbed in each other and ourselves. We both have our work. Jim is studying law under the G. I. Bill of Rights and I have a job, the care of the apartment and my favorite diversion, writing. I rush home at night, do what shopping has to be done, pressure-cook our evening meal and we sit down to a dinner as leisurely and as nourishing as I can make it. I've learned that there is many a trick to making uninteresting vegetables look interesting. We have plenty of milk and always a snack late at night to relax after some concentrated studying. But dinnertime is our most pleasant time, for there is plenty of talk, much sharing of opinions and mild arguing and the joy of just being together for an hour. After dinner, Jim returns to his typewriter to brief law cases endlessly, I do the cleaning-up job and settle down to my typewriter also. Mornings are slightly more hectic than the nights before, but things are evened up, for we are slightly less awake and therefore less critical. With breakfast over and the apartment cleaned up, Jim goes off to school and I'm at the office by nine.

THE fact that we both have such a rigid schedule to adhere to is one of our reasons for not wanting a baby now. Jim couldn't devote more than a loving look now and then to the child and I would have to be nursemaid, mother-father and playmate. It would be unfair to deprive Jim of his share as a parent and unwise for us to bring up a baby under these harried conditions. Moreover, a marriage is happiest when there is an even balance of responsibility between the husband and the wife. Plunging the wife into the arduous role of a mother and at the same time depriving her of one of the joys of motherhood—a father who is able to tumble on the floor with a delighted baby, play blocks and bounce a rubber ball, thus assuming his share of the care and the happy "we are three" feeling—would be tipping the scales too unevenly for comfort.

THEN, too, we are city dwellers. Our apartment is as near Jim's school and my job as we could make it, and we love everything about it. We have an immense antique mahogany corner cupboard which looks slightly ridiculous in our mite-size living room but is excellent for the morale. It, as well as Jim's wing-backed chair and typewriter, would have to be shifted to the kitchen to make room for a baby's crib and play pen, or the baby would have to be placed in the kitchen. A newborn infant could not get the necessary healthful sleep while the sound of Jim's typewriter was going on, for the walls of the apartment were made so that the second floor knows what is brewing on the third floor and the couple next door can rely on our radio if theirs gives out.

Living in the city seems to fit our desire to be in the center of things and yet be alone—but there are no parks to wheel a baby in, no fresh air which isn't tainted with the latest factory output and no back yard for the baby's sun bath. A baby needs fresh air and sunshine and a place to crawl around in. Also very necessary is clothesline space to dry the little sweaters and baby's things. Moving is out of the question, for the housing shortage still exists, with any new apartments renting sky-high.

Also, children cost money and parenthood will have to be postponed for us because our combined incomes are not enough to care for a child adequately. Lack of money often brings with it a necessary lowering of standards and a fear of tomorrow, and we are trying to skirt anything so dangerous to happiness. We can both imagine the emotional insecurity which would result if a grocery bill couldn't be paid or if baby's needs couldn't be included in an overburdened budget. Health and love are necessary to the well-being of a child, but even more important is the feeling of security and of confidence in the home.

We want to give our baby the same "charm in living" that we had. We want to have the happy, cheerful feeling which pervades the home where the budget can include such cultural touches as music, books and other forms of art. I can remember clearly the times mother and dad took my sister and me to see light-opera productions and children's-theater presentations when we were very young. They managed to surround us with good books and records by famous artists and the many things which helped us to grow in mind and in appreciation. And we loved them for it. Jim and I want to do as well along those lines as our own parents did, and we shall have neither time nor money to do that for a long time to come. We feel it imperative to wait until we can offer our children more as parents than we can now.

In the five years we shall be growing in understanding, we shall also be reaching a more complete maturity. The love we have to give our children will be tempered with intelligent guidance; the care and discipline they should receive will be readily known and willingly applied so that the child will grow not only in body, but in mind also.

It is a fact that in a great number of cases conception occurs before the desire to have a child is felt. We do not want this to happen to us, for we want to feel this desire before we start a family, and that is perhaps our strongest argument against parenthood right now.

We are not ready to be parents yet! We still enjoy each other exclusively and don't feel we are to be labeled "unusual" because of it. We don't agree when our friends say, "Wait a while; after two or three years of marriage you will both find you need something else to fill your lives besides each other." Our first three years of married life will not be normal ones for either of us, so that when the time for wanting children as an addition to our marriage comes, we shall not feel that we have done everything together. We shall hardly have been able to get to know each other as other couples do, for our time spent together as a married couple is so limited now.

With Jim's three-year law course over and our future somewhat more secure, we want to take a long holiday and realize one of our most cherished ambitions. We want to travel, to go to Europe and take an ocean voyage to far-off places. It will be a rich experience for both of us and we can think of no better way to spend the money we are trying to save now. If we wait until after our children have come, it might not be possible, and we shall have missed out on something we have always wanted to do. We want to see as much as possible, know as much as possible, and do as much as possible, and our enthusiasm cannot be thrust aside as an irresponsible whim. It would be as dangerous psychologically for us to have a baby right now, when we are mentally and emotionally unprepared for it, as it would be dangerous physically to advise pregnancy in the case of a heart patient. In addition, it would be dangerous to not one life, but three.

IF Jim and I wait for five years until we are in our late twenties, shall we be "too old" to enjoy our children? We don't think so, for when our children are grown we shall be in our late forties, still young. And in waiting we shall have had time to build mutual interests and a degree of individual independence for ourselves which will sustain us when our children have left us and we are once more alone. We don't want to lose sight of the fact that someday we shall be alone after a life centered around our children, and for the twenty years or more left to us we want to be as independent, emotionally and financially, of them and as sufficient unto ourselves as possible.

Yes, we do want children! We want them when we shall be able to offer them a home as nearly perfect in every way for a child as we can make it. We want children when we are ready for them! THE END

★S★A★L★E★M★

MASSACHUSETTS

A city made famous by history, Hawthorne and the exquisite handiwork of America's most celebrated architectural craftsman, Samuel McIntire

★ BY RICHARD PRATT ★

Architectural Editor of the Journal

SALEM'S memories begin with the Puritans, who settled there just ten years after the Landing at Plymouth Rock. And as far as posterity is concerned at present, those memories come to a climax with The Scarlet Letter, which was written on Mall Street there in the late 1840's by a sad, shy Salem man who had recently lost his job as surveyor of the port in the local customs office. In between, as you will recall, there was witchcraft. And there were the fabulous years of sailing ships, when riches from every region of the earth were heaped on Salem wharves, and Salem homes reflected the wealth of Salem merchants. These homes reflected, too, the talents of a Salem young man, a woodcarver by trade, with an extraordinary aptitude for architecture, whose taste and skill account for most of the major beauty which meets the eye in Salem today. For while in his comparatively short lifetime Samuel McIntire couldn't possibly have executed all the fine homes which Salem once possessed, it can be said that for all the best work in the great Salem tradition he was certainly the inspiration. The two great men of Salem never met: their lives overlapped by too little. McIntire began the Pingree house, which appears on pages 50 and 51, in 1804, the year Hawthorne was born; and seven years later McIntire died at fifty-four. All his life was lived, and all his work was done, within a few miles of his native city; and it is a credit to Salem that there, in the midst of so very much now which scarcely measures up to McIntire, some of the master's finest achievements are still tenderly preserved. And of all that remain, the most outstanding, in my opinion, are the two which follow.

One long block of Chestnut Street is lined on both sides by Salem's largest remaining cluster of homes for which McIntire was directly or indirectly responsible.

Because of these capacious, foursquare houses, beautifully designed in the fashion of the Federal period, Chestnut Street has been called the architecturally finest residential street in America.

PHOTO BY PRA

The sudden sight of this house as you come around the corner of Federal Street in Salem is almost overwhelming: so little are you prepared for such magnificence in the midst of the commonplace encroachments that crowd about it now.

★ ★ THE PEIRCE NICHOLS HOUSE ★ ★

BUILT IN 1782

SAMUEL McINTIRE was in his early twenties when he designed this house for a wealthy East India merchant of Salem, named Jerathmeel Peirce—a man who obviously could afford the best, and in this case got it. For this was just about the finest wooden house in America. Not only was it McIntire's design, but every important piece of carving was done by his own hands, from the original urns that capped the fence-posts to the doorways, cornices and the mantels within. Like most early American craftsmen, McIntire lacked any formal training in architecture; but as far as he was concerned, you could hardly call this a handicap. What simplified matters somewhat for him was an English volume of architectural details, very much in vogue over here since well before the Revolution, a book called The City and Country Builder's and Workman's Treasury of Designs, by a man named Batty Langley; and from it McIntire got many of the ornamental features which distinguish this extraordinarily handsome house, such as the Doric order of the façade and the Georgian mantel of the dining room at the right. But of course the main conception was McIntire's alone: the general mass and plan, and the bold idea of the great Greek corner pilasters that did so much, you can be sure, to please Mr. Peirce as he paced his balustraded roof deck, peering out across the bay for the tall sails of a clipper coming in from China.

When the house was built, the dining room at the ri
the drawing room, its carving in McIntire's early n

The east drawing room, with its exquisite carving in the Adam fashion, was finished by McIntire somewhat later than the one below, in time for the marriage of Sally Peirce to George Nichols. The teak tables were brought back from China as ballast.

Two houses in America present facades of such effective symmetry. One is McIntire's finest house, its simplicity as noteworthy.

★ PINGREE HOUSE

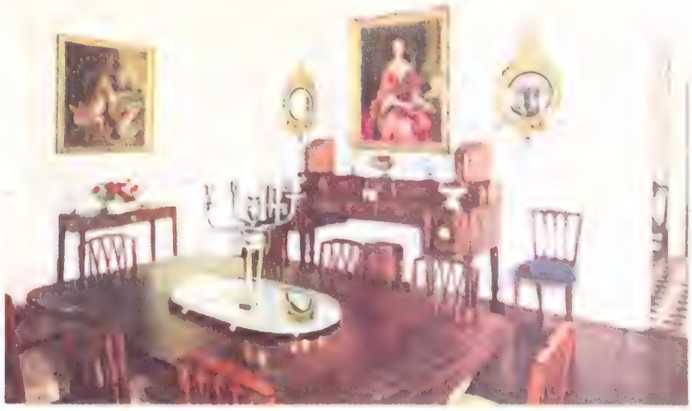
BUILT IN 1804

THE spirit of Samuel McIntire must find profound satisfaction with the way this wonderful brick house of his has been preserved and the faithfulness with which it has been restored and furnished. It is a tribute not only to the craftsman who created it, but to the generosity and painstaking care of its present patrons and protectors; and I only wish that hundreds of other famous American houses might be so fortunate as this one. At any rate, here you can feel at first hand the taste of those early times when skillful craftsmen and prosperous clients worked together in such close accord with the image of England in mind. On the day of his death it was written that, "This day Salem is deprived of one of the most ingenious men it had in it . . . indeed, all the improvements of Salem for nearly thirty years have been under his eye. He had a fine person, a majestic appearance, calm countenance, great self-command and amiable temper. He was welcome but never intruded." And on his tombstone you can read, "He was distinguished for Genius in Architecture, Sculpture, and Musick: Modest and Sweet Manners rendered him pleasing: Industry and Integrity respectable: He professed the Religion of Jesus in his entrance on manly life: and proved its excellence by virtuous Principles and unblemished conduct." Few men, it must be said, lie buried beneath such a tribute to their character, or amid so many mementos of their taste and skill.

The bedroom below is within McIntire's 1804-built second-story windows, and its most impressive piece of furniture is of course its great Directoire bed with the studded leather chest at its foot. Above McIntire's mantel is a painting of Salem harbor.

Marvelously carved sliding doors separate the front and back parlors on the right of the main entrance. The wallpaper panels are French, the side chairs are the finest examples of Hepplewhite, the piano is by Benjamin Crehore, and the rug is an Aubusson.

The entrance hall leads past Mr. Peirce's handsome staircase balustrade, and under his stairway to the garden door. The wallpaper is by the English carver, Grinling Gibbons.



The dining room, at the left of the entrance, is furnished in Sheraton, and the magnificent mahogany set off by superb pieces of silver.

The robin's-egg-blue bedroom is furnished in the French Chippendale style, showing Chinese influence, and typical Salem perfect taste.

HOW TO THINK

A FRIVOLOUS and worldly visitor returned to her home-town circle with a wide-eyed report on Indianapolis today. "It's the strangest city in America," she said. "I went to four parties and the people there smoked and drank and seemed perfectly normal in other ways. But all they talked about—imagine!—was sin! Is sin worse if you do it for the sake of sinning and not for the pleasure that goes with it? Is it worse to lead others into sin than to sin yourself? In Indianapolis they get angry at each other about sin!"

The puzzled visitor had stumbled into a circle of Indianapolis men and women whose social life has been transfigured by the Great Books discussions which have come lately to town. She was there in the week after everyone had read St. Augustine's Confessions; a little earlier in the year she would have found the same group debating the causes of the war between Athens and Sparta (431–404 B.C.). Later in the season she might have walked in on a series of vigorous drawing-room debates on Hamlet's character.

Not everybody in Indianapolis is reading the classics this year; but between five and six hundred of them are, as compared with the mere sixty-five men and women who attended the courses last year. And—under the Great Books system of split-and-multiply already operating in the mother city of Chicago—it is expected that there will be three thousand readers signed up next year in seventy or eighty courses. In Indianapolis (as in Chicago, Cleveland and Detroit) there is already a waiting list for many of the groups, under leaders trained for the work by Great Brains from the University of Chicago, which gave the Middle West its new and surprising fad.

It isn't the usual "culture vultures" who have taken up the Great Books as a fascinating diversion; most of the men and women who spend two hours every two weeks thrashing out the meaning of a classic would never have dreamed of signing up for anything so chilling as the usual "adult education" course. But the Great Books discussions are different, as any member will tell you: you don't need to know anything to join a class. There is no fee charged for attending. Nobody cares two straws whether you learn a single fact all year. And furthermore, classes are fun!

CULTURE IN STRANGE PLACES

Fun? To read Aristotle and Rousseau? It looks that way. For many of the men and women who belong to one of the fifteen Great Books classes in Indianapolis this year seem to have made over their lives to accommodate the sessions. A recent visitor to the local Stewart-Warner plant (heating equipment) wandered into the personnel office during the lunch hour and saw a dozen overalled men sitting on the floor, each munching a sandwich, with his nose in a paper-covered book.

"Boning up on Robert's Rules of Order for the union meeting?" he asked pleasantly.

One of the men looked up impatiently. "No," he said. "We're reading Aristotle's Ethics."

"I asked you boys a perfectly civil question," said the visitor, as he left in a huff.

But they were reading Aristotle's Ethics. The factory class—which began with thirty-eight assorted employees of the plant last year—has lost only two of its original members in the past twelve months. It now has a long waiting list of men who cannot be accommodated until a second class is formed. The educational background of the members has proved to be a minor matter: one of the best talkers and thinkers in the group never entered high school. The two or three college graduates who have joined from the front office have not, so far, distinguished themselves. Those reading Aristotle and the rest in this one group include four welders, three test-maintenance men, a vice-president of a CIO union, an industrial nurse, two foremen, an accountant, a diemaker, a sheet-metal worker, a cost engineer, an office manager, a girl from the assembly line, a bookkeeper, a plant photographer and an assistant sales manager.

BUT DID THUCYDIDES KNOW?

Take a look at the American "working stiff" at play in Indianapolis this year—perhaps in your city next.

It is the late afternoon. Forty men from the shop and offices are seated around a V-shaped table to discuss Thucydides' Peloponnesian War. Ash trays are at every place; some of the men are in their shirt sleeves. Nothing—least of all the leader—suggests the classroom atmosphere. For Milton Mayer, the magazine writer, is conducting the class, with the help of a faculty member from a local college. (Two directors are needed for these discussions, "to check each other and be sure nobody sneaks in any teaching," as they put it.)

"What," asks Mr. Mayer, "is the difference between Thucydides and Gone With the Wind?" It is an ice-breaking question.

"Thucydides was writing facts," somebody volunteers.

"But didn't we hear that Miss What's-her-name, who wrote the novel, spent twenty years doing research for Gone With the Wind? Why do you think she doesn't give us facts?"

"Thucydides was alive at the time he wrote about—at least during part of the time the war went on. Probably the last part."

"Certainly the last part, Mr. Brown. Well, how do you know he got the straight dope, even so? Would you know how to write an accurate account of the Normandy invasion?"

"Sure. Consult the newspapers of nineteen-forty-four."

"Did Thucydides do that? How does he sell himself as a good reporter? And, anyway, do you believe all you read in the papers, Mr. Brown?"

After an hour of this the debate is going strong.

"Whose fault was the Peloponnesian War?"

"Nobody's—no one side is ever to blame in starting a war," says somebody.

"Hey, wait a minute," cuts in his neighbor. "How about Germany in nineteen-thirty-nine?"

"If we were Germans we wouldn't think Germany was to blame," says someone else. "Everybody always thinks his own war is justified."

"Well, how about it?" tosses in one of the leaders. "Is there any right and wrong in international affairs? Or is the right country just the one that wins and writes the history books?"

It goes on.

"All wars start because of greed," says a socialistically minded man.

"Show me where Thucydides mentions economics, Mr. Wagner."

"Could the war have been avoided?"

"Yes—if only Corinth had taken better care of her colonies."

Here are intellectuals of a new kind—factory workers, businessmen,

A THOUGHT!

"Spoken like a true Briton, Mr. Faust," is the leader's comment.

The last debate before the two-hour session ends revolves around a teaser thrown out by Mr. Mayer: "So you agree with Henry Ford that 'history is bunk'?"

This discussion doesn't end when the class is over; little groups, leaving the plant, can be heard still arguing some point. "Well, if we really could learn anything from history, we wouldn't be in the mess we are today." . . . "No, I can't see why you believe Thucydides. There aren't any facts that we can be sure about." . . . "There aren't, eh? Well, you're here, aren't you? You know your own name, don't you? Aren't those facts?"

As the men stream out of the room into the twilight, several of them start hiking for the streetcar line; these men—shop employees—used to come to work in cars. Since starting the Great Books last year they have changed their habits and ride on the streetcars, so as to have time to read and study the text for the coming week.

This conversation will be carried back into the homes of the men who attend the course. Their wives during dinner will be involved in a lively discussion of war and right-and-wrong and whether facts are facts or only fantasy. The next day in the shop, men who disagreed will seek each other out: "I've thought of the answer to your saying, 'History doesn't repeat itself since gunpowder was discovered.'" And so on, for the next two weeks. Then another book—Plato's Gorgias—will come along:

"Mr. Warren, I think you said last time that you're a churchgoer. Well, do you, as a Christian, really believe that the 'meek will inherit the earth'?"

"Yes."

"Then you don't agree with Plato's thesis that the go-getter gets his? Where does Plato make his mistake?"

And they are off again.

SOPHOCLES A SELLOUT

"Organized bull sessions" is one descriptive nickname for the Great Books courses, but they are bull sessions with a discipline: whenever the conversation threatens to wander off, the leader pulls it back and forces the group to consider what Plato said (or Machiavelli or John Locke or Adam Smith). Whatever it was that the writer said, it's probably worth considering; for the men who wrote these chosen works were among the clearest thinkers of our race. And what they have said—at least in the selected portions read for the course—always has a distinct bearing on the problems that plague us all today: What is life "about"? What is man's duty to other men? What kind of government do we want? Why should anyone do right instead of wrong? Does economics run the world? Can a man be good without a belief in God?

The effect of having six hundred of its residents debate such questions as these has had a remarkable effect on the city: the Great Books readers in Indianapolis are few, but they are a powerful leaven. Demands for the classics have shot up in the Indianapolis library system, which has been forced to reorder copies of such "sleepers" as Sophocles' plays and Plutarch's Lives. Local bookstores now feature whole windowfuls of cheap reprints of the Greek philosophers. The level of conversation has appreciably risen in the town, according to one enthusiastic hostess. "A political argument used to lead close to bloodshed among my friends," she says. "But a single Great Books guest always saves things. He steps in and begins asking questions, as he's learned to do in his course. Pretty soon people are actually thinking before they speak; that slows down the impulse toward murder across the dinner table."

Prejudices, in some cases, disappear when the acid of the great minds goes to work on them. At a recent Great Books session at the leading men's club, the leader addressed a Republican businessman: "Do you think John L. Lewis has the right to strike against the Government?"

"No."

"But I thought," the leader said sweetly, "I thought you were just telling us that Antigone was right in defying the king, because her conscience told her the law was evil. Suppose John L. Lewis thinks injunctions are evil. Is he still wrong, Mr. Smith?"

Mr. Smith may have come out of the class with his viewpoint on the coal strike the same as when he went in; but he had certainly been forced to examine it from a new and different angle.

FOR DEMOCRACY: MIND TOUGHENING

Getting citizens to think through their prejudices is considered by some Americans to be the crucial problem of our time—of any time. Robert Hutchins, chancellor of the University of Chicago and a leader of one of the first Great Books courses ever held, feels so strongly on the matter that he has taken a nine-month leave of absence from the university to devote himself to the Great Books movement.

"We have been saying for years that the way to improve society is to educate the people," he says. "But we have limited education to infants between the ages of six and twenty-one. Thomas Jefferson said democracy would work well if education were given to all the people. We don't know whether he was right or wrong, for good education—the kind that makes the mind tough—has never been tried in America."

The Great Books, according to Doctor Hutchins and his colleague, Dr. Mortimer Adler, offer a tempting mental punching bag to those who wish to practice tough thinking. The Great Books, they insist, are not good because they are old, but because they aren't—their authors deal with fundamental matters that are of as great interest to us today as when they were written one or two thousand years ago. Great Books were never written for specialists; they were written for ordinary men and women. Yet they are always a little over our heads, and so they make us stretch and reach to grasp their meaning; this is good, hard, exciting intellectual exercise.

Doctor Adler—author of the best seller, How to Read a Book—has conducted more Great Books classes than any other leader. One of his classes, the first formed, has now been meeting regularly in Highland Park, Illinois, for sixteen years. Nobody who belongs has any intention of stopping the discussions this side of death. Everyone appears satisfied with the formula worked out for all the courses; according to this, the season starts with one of the Greek philosophers and works on, through history, to such a recent book as the Communist Manifesto of Karl Marx, or to (Continued on Page 278) ecutives, housewives. And they are not posing. ★ By Gretta Palmer

THE LATCHKEY

DAVID sat on the front steps and read the letter again, unfolding it carefully where the creases were beginning to wear thin. He had big, awkward hands, but they were gentle, almost delicate, with the letter. He could not see the words very well in the light from the corner street lamp, but he knew them all anyway.

Dear David. It was the way any letter written to him would begin, yet he felt it to be different. He had never really seen these words before in any other letter. This was no mere form, no meaningless salutation. Dear David. "Dear Susan," he whispered to himself. "Dear Susan." There were only two more lines, written in a small, neat round hand. They said that she would love to go to the country-club dance with him on Labor Day, and thanked him for asking her. And then there was the word at the end, the word that stood alone and wonderful in the middle of the page. Love, it said. Love, Susan.

He put the letter quickly to his cheek, against the fine down that he imagined needed shaving twice a week, and then thrust it into his pocket again, embarrassed, although no one could have seen him.

He had thought maybe she wouldn't go with him. He had known her such a little while, really—just for part of the spring term at high school, and then she had gone away for the summer. But they had had a few evenings together—one evening in particular—and they were different from any times he had ever been with a girl, and he thought he would never forget them.

They had gone down to the river that last night and sat on the grass holding hands—just sat there for a while, watching the water. He had not looked at her, because there was no need. He knew exactly how she looked, as though he had known her always and seen her in every mood—a small, gray-eyed girl with straight blond hair, staring at the fog coming up over the river with her head to one side and a little frown between her neat, silky eyebrows. If anyone had asked him whether she was pretty, he would have been surprised. He did not think of her as pretty or not pretty. She was Susan.

"'The fog comes on little cat feet,'" she said. "Somebody wrote that in a poem, but it's a thing anyone could have thought of, isn't it? Because that's just how the fog does." Her hand turned in his, and it was as though she flicked some switch that accelerated the beat of his heart. "I wonder what it is that makes some people the first ones to think of such things," she said. "I wish I knew, so I could be one of them."

He had never heard a girl talk like this before. It was like listening to a strange language, and yet it was not really strange—it was almost as though he knew it somewhere in the recesses of his mind, but could not remember it without her help.

"You're going away," he said.

"Only for the summer."

"I'll miss you."

"I'll miss you, too, David."

His throat felt thick and painful. He opened his hand and looked down at hers, lying quietly on his palm, and he wanted to kiss it, but couldn't. It would not have been a silly thing to do; he knew that. And yet he would have felt silly doing it.

"I wish I was one of those people too," he said hoarsely. "One of those who think of things first. Then I'd know a way to say—a way to tell you ——" He stopped, not wanting to stop, unable to go on. Corny, he thought fiercely—yet he knew there was nothing corny about it, about any of it.

"I feel as if we'd known each other a long time," she said.

It seemed miraculous to him that she had felt this too. "So do I," he said, his words hurrying with excitement. "It's a funny thing. When I walked into Algebra Three that morning and saw you sitting there, I thought you were somebody I knew, and still I was sure I hadn't ever seen you before. I guess that must mean something."

"Yes," she said. After a moment she added, "You're awfully good in algebra," and then she turned her head and he kissed her, without knowing he was going to, and their noses bumped, but neither of them laughed.

She went away the next morning, and he didn't see her again or hear from her, until he got the idea of asking her to the Labor Day dance at the country club.

He had never been to the Labor Day dance; he had never been inside the club, which every year sponsored for charity this one big dance to which nonmembers were admitted. It was the gala affair of the year, closing the summer season, and every girl and woman in town coveted an invitation to it—every boy and man who had the price and a girl to impress and please bought tickets for it.

David had waited in a state of alternating confidence and despair for Susan's answer. Of course, she would go with him; still, maybe someone else had asked her first. But he had written to her so early, weeks before the date; on the other hand, she might not be back in town by Labor Day. She had to be back—she had to go with him. Sometimes, when he thought over the times they had been together, it seemed to him that he had acted—well, young, without the proper confidence and dash. But taking her to the dance would fix all that. Kids didn't go to the Labor Day dance.

AND now she had said she would go with him—now everything was going to be swell. He leaned against the porch railing and smiled and whispered, "'The fog comes on little cat feet,'" to the clear, starry sky.

He did not even hear the car turn in the driveway and roar into the garage. He had no idea that his mother and Jeb were home from the movies until his mother spoke, right next to him.

"Oh, David, I'm sorry, darling. I forgot to leave the key under the mat."

He got her slowly into focus, a tall, tomboyish woman with flyaway hair who could easily, in this light, have been his kid sister. "That's all right," he said. "I didn't want to go in anyhow." From beneath the (Continued on Page 210)

David said, "You're going away." "Only for the summer," said Susan

You pay a lot for being young—l

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT G. HARRIS

ats the fee for growing up? By Gertrude Schweitzer

ADAM'S FEAR SHOT UP SICKENINGLY. "I DID IT!" HE THOUGHT.

Is Gran'pa Really Dead!?

BY MARIE READ SMITH

ILLUSTRATED BY HADDON SUNDBLOM

A LANTERN, carried from the barn to the front gate, dimly lighted the scene of the doctor's departure. Shivering in his mound of bedclothes, Adam pressed his chilled nose to the windowpane and anxiously watched his father hitch the doctor's horse to the sleigh. Another lantern was lighted and hung on the dashboard. Then as the smoky mist of dawn drifted and parted Adam saw the doctor leave their house and wade through a foot of new-fallen snow to the gate. There he stood for a moment, speaking in low tones to his father. The two men shook hands. In another minute the doctor had climbed into the sleigh, which disappeared, with a muffled jingle of bells, into the morning fog.

Adam breathed a great shuddering sigh that trembled through his whole young body. Then he pulled the quilts and blankets around his small form and stumbled wearily to bed. The doctor had gone. Gran'pa was going to be all right now. Maybe he would be well enough to take him on another sleigh ride in their big new sleigh before the snow melted. Surely well enough by spring to teach him how to shoot the shotgun in the woods—when father wasn't looking.

His head pushed deep into the pillow and he sank down—down into a dark worrisome pit of bad dreams.

Someone was shaking his arm. Before he opened his eyes he smelled the odor of barn on father's clothes. He looked up quickly, saw the somber look in father's dark eyes. It set his heart beating fast. Father sat on the side of the bed and took Adam's hand in his big red rough one.

"You'd better get up, Adam, to help your gran'ma and mother. Gran'pa . . . went last night."

Adam drew his hand from his father's grasp as though it were a trap. Needles of ice struck his heart. Why hadn't the doctor done something? Why had he left? Was father sure?

"Is gran'pa really dead?" he whispered tremulously. "Did you—how do you know?"

Father watched him soberly. "I know, son." He patted his arm and stood up. "Your mother needs you. There are things to be done and it's late already. After seven o'clock." He went out and shut the door.

Adam's hands were wet with perspiration. He began to shake from head to foot. In the next room, at the left, lay a dead man, the first dead person he had ever known anything about. Only this was gran'pa, who never should have died, not this way, anyhow. He shivered from nervous cold. There was an emptiness all around him. The house was very quiet, with just little rattling noises in the kitchen. Mother wasn't singing. He didn't hear father working in the barns. There wasn't even the tap of gran'ma's stick.

Gran'ma! His throat suddenly caught and felt awfully achy. He strained back sudden tears and held a little sob stiff in his throat. She'd miss gran'pa so! Who'd play cards with gran'ma? Or wind wool for her? Or bring her breakfast to her on a tray? Adam bit down hard on both lips.

He heard the back-stairs door open. In an instant he had thrown back the covers and was out of bed. They mustn't come for him again. Still trembling, he slid into his clothes. He couldn't seem to button his shoes, his fingers were so cold and shaky. He poured water into the basin and dabbed the washcloth at his face and neck. The reflection of his face in the mirror amazed him. It didn't look like Adam at all. His face was so white, and great shadows made his eyes look terribly large, like black holes. His eyes were all wet and teary. He rubbed them vigorously. Father mustn't see him cry. The thought of crying made his throat all sore again. He combed his dark hair real hard so that the hair would pull and make him forget fast. Then he threw the comb down on the marble dresser and dashed to the door.

In the long dark hall he stopped. Just a few feet down was that other door. Inside was a dead person—gran'pa. Was gran'pa really dead? Should he look? What would gran'pa look like? He tiptoed over the squeaky boards to the door. He put his hand on the wooden knob. Something stopped him from turning it—the sharp tapping of a cane inside. Instantly he turned and sped down the hall to the back stairs.

On the way down he heard two women talking. One was his mother, and the other voice was Mrs. Horton's, the woman on the next farm. Adam frowned. What was she doing here so early? She talked too much in a loud voice, and she wasn't pretty, like mother. She had brown straight hair pulled back in a bun. Not curly and gold color like mother's. And she wore ugly old black dresses. 'Cause she was poor, mother said. Mrs. Horton was queer about children too. She didn't have any of her own, but she was always inviting kids in, for candy, maybe, or cake; most often just to talk. She was so strange, though, nobody went much.

SUDDENLY he realized they were talking about him. He stopped in the middle of the stairs to listen.

"—— very fond of each other." That was mother talking. "He's so sensitive for his eight years. I declare, Clara, I don't know how he's going to take this. Aaron says the child went white as the pillowcase when he told him. I thought I wouldn't go up. Just let him take his time coming down this morning."

"Poor little tyke." That was Mrs. Horton, and he didn't like that word "tyke!" What did it mean? "If you like, Mary, you can send him over for the next couple of days, till after the funeral. 'Course there won't be any children for him to play with ——" Mrs. Horton blew her nose hard.

Mother mustn't say "yes" to Mrs. Horton! Adam clattered down the stairs in a hurry. Both women looked at (Continued on Page 203)

A little boy is often to blame—but not for everything

You CAN MAKE . .

You will hand-roll silk squares for summer scarfs, have belt to match.

BY WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

What makes one woman's clothes more interesting than another's? How can two women start with the same suit and make it look so different? How can we put our fingers on the intriguing quality? So many times it is an easy thing—the soft little hat, the bag, the gloves, the scarf, the gilet or the clever pair of matching accessories—that gives the perfectly simple dress or suit the wonderfully special look. This is particularly true in spring and summer when you can use splashes of color; particularly true when you can make the accent you need yourself. Famous designers have created these very adaptable additions . . . the JOURNAL offers the patterns.

You will be enchanted with polka-dot scarf-beret and gloves.

By John Frederics, for you to make. Beret, 2325; gloves, 2223.

You can wear your dots with dark navy wool or blue linen.

You can tie the scarf-beret in a big floppy bow in the back.

SUIT BY JOSET WALKER

Send 5 cents to the JOURNAL Reference Library, Phila. 5, Pa., for each pattern desired. Order by number given in description.

You make a gilet (2326) and a tramp's bag from one scarf. By Dorothy Dickerson.

SUIT BY MILDRED O'QUINN

You can choose a bag and draped turban for your polka-dot pair, also by John Frederics. Hat, 2331; bag, 2332.

You can wear two different-color ring-scarfs, combine them different ways. By Charles James.

BY CUSHMAN O'LEARY

You will make gloves (2223), and a Byron-collar gilet (2329) of striped taffeta, by Dorine Liebert.

You will want a cool shantung shirt in brilliant color for dark skirts. So easy. 2330. Sizes 12, 14, 16.

POPULARITY PLUS

Like an album of popular tunes, these clothes and their near cousins are sweeping across the country. The simple fact that thousands of women are choosing them for important spots in their wardrobes indicates their rightness, their almost universal becomingness. Their agreeably small prices prove once more "that good American dollars buy your money's worth of fashion." • by Ruth Mary Packard

THE LOOSE FINGER-TIP COAT—Popular because it looks and feels right over suit or dress, spring or summer; $39.75; in bright shades, beige, black or navy. Red goes with this wardrobe.

THE TWEED TAILLEUR—Popular this spring in a small check, slim lines, longer skirt; around $39.75. We suggest: off-white linen-crash blouse, panama cloche, brown leather bag.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY

THE RAYON SHANTUNG SUIT—By Morgan Fauth, popular because it's an all-day fashion, April to September; $25.00. Popular in dark green, black or navy, with gold jewelry, brown Milan hat.

THE PURE-SILK DRESS—Popular because silk is forever beloved and because it need not be expensive. This polka dot by Henry Rosenfeld is $25.00. Pretty with a big diaphanous white hat.

THE SHOULDER-CAPE DRESS—With the slim over-blouse silhouette in brown rayon linen. Popular because it does very special things for your figure, costs only $25.00; is worn with the same Milan hat, brown bag.

THE DRESS WITH THE FAN-PLEATED SKIRT—More and more popular as summer comes; also about $29.75; in black or navy sheers. Glamour added: white mesh veil tied around your sheer white hat.

The same idea as at right: plaid taffeta ribbon folded back to make a collar.

A length of wide-striped satin ribbon makes a bright change for a black or navy wool or crepe dress; wear it pulled under a narrow belt.

A strip of striped piqué or taffeta down the front and a little collar and tie—on a short-sleeved navy crepe dress.

ONE MORE SPRING FOR YOUR FAVORITE DRESS OR SUIT

White rickrack on a gray flannel suit. This little touch will cost all of 20 or 25 cents. Wear white gloves and hat.

Your new spring wardrobe may be hanging in your closet—unsuspected. It will require a little doing, but very little money. Almost any simple wool or crepe dress, pretty print, short-jacket suit or boxy coat can be made to look completely new and different—with the magic stroke of a good idea. What are the things that make you think of spring? White piqué, polka dots, bright ribbons, little capes, white braid, pretty edgings. These are the things we thought of, and here are ways we suggest using them. Interpret them your own way—for your own clothes. One good idea usually inspires another! ★ BY NORA O'LEARY

If you want to make the capelet, send 5¢ to the Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Phila. 5, for pattern 2317. If you want to carry out the other ideas, send 5¢ for 2319, Guide to Make-Overs.

DRAWINGS BY DUDLEY

e an off-the-shoulder neckline with net or lace ruch-nd a lace apron—for a black crepe dinner dress.

A knitted edging for pockets and collar, and a row in the center of the belt; match wool yarn to wool dress.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HAL REIFF

A two-tier capelet of black, brown or navy wool for last spring's print. To make, pattern 2317, 5¢.

. Turn back the cuffs, line

A button-on white piqué belt and piqué facing to refresh

SUDDENLY STACY KNEW THAT EACH CAREFULLY CHOSEN STEP OF HER LIFE HAD LED TO THIS MOMENT

BY WINIFRED HALSTED

"IT isn't as though I didn't know what it's like," said Grace Barnes, "to be tied down by a house and a two-year-old child. And he's such an active child—of course you wouldn't have them anything else. But I do think ——"

Stacy Adams, who was a widow, but childless, murmured ambiguously; tactfully accepting the limitations of her own experience, remembering that Grace Barnes was treating her to lunch.

"Jean's awfully young." She retreated to neutral comment on Grace Barnes' daughter-in-law.

"They're all young," said Grace Barnes testily, appeased but not comforted. "But that's what Charlie says too. And I can understand her wanting to have some fun; I think people ought to have fun. I think I showed that last summer when what I wanted to do was to go right out there and take care of the house and the baby and let them go off and just have fun. But Charlie wouldn't let me."

"I think he was perfectly right, Grace," said Stacy Adams accommodatingly. "It would have been too much for you."

"That's what Charlie said," agreed Grace Barnes. Her small, round face brightened at the recollection of the comfortable substitution of the wish for the deed. She said repentantly, "Listen to me! Running on about my troubles! What I thought when I called you was that we just ought to go out and have fun!"

"My dear, we are. Grace, I have an idea."

"Stacy!" said Grace Barnes. "What is it?"

Stacy Adams told her she was delicious. "The way you rise to excitement like a little trout! I love it."

Grace Barnes smiled happily at the younger woman's pleasant way of making her feel like an appealing, wide-eyed child. She also admired Stacy's easy use of "delicious." She herself could say "amusing" and "delightful" smoothly, but "delicious" was beyond her.

"It's nothing much," said Stacy. "But I have a feeling you've been thinking too much about family and . . . things. I wish you and Charlie would drop around for cocktails tonight."

"Why, I wouldn't think of it, dear," protested Grace Barnes earnestly. "That would be a terrible thing to do when you have an old friend coming that you haven't seen in ages."

"Scott's not that kind of an old friend at all," Stacy Adams said lightly. "I used to see him, years ago, in China." This was true, as far as it went, and Stacy seldom let the truth go further than she thought best. "He has a nice habit of looking me up for old times' sake when he comes to New York, and that's all there is to it. But he's an amusing creature, and I just thought it might be sort of fun if you'd like to." A lightning calculator of social sums, Stacy Adams had added things up and decided the invitation would cancel off the present luncheon and also set up a useful cross ruff, since Scott Pearson would strike Grace and Charlie Barnes as dashing, and they should impress Scott with the kind of friends she had. "Besides," she said, "I'd like to have him meet you and Charlie. You've both been so good to me."

"It's just lovely of you, Stacy," said Grace Barnes, her eyes liquid as a rabbit's with affection for Stacy and the delicate way she offered favors, with such finesse that the favor was kindly transferred to the other foot. "We'd love to."

The waiter presented a considerable check. Grace Barnes put down a bill. Stacy in turn wistfully appreciated the way Grace disposed of folding money, with an easy, homely implication of plenty more in the kitchen.

"Scott Pearson," said Grace Barnes. "What an attractive name. Stacy, is he ——"

"Grace, you old romantic! There's not a thing in it," said Stacy, religiously living up to her sound policy of keeping her own counsel unless a thing was absolutely sure to pay off.

"Well," fretted Grace, "but I wish you had someone to take care of you."

Stacy laughed merrily and said she couldn't agree with her more.

GRACE BARNES pulled on her good black Persian-lamb coat, patted her pretty gray hair to make sure it was staying up in back, and touched the brim of her small black hat so that it came properly down over her eyes. She tucked a squashy antelope bag under her arm and stood up,—neatly plump, with nice ankles and feet; the picture of a lady leaving a luncheon table.

Stacy, who put out her money where it would bring the highest return in effect, shrugged the skins of her stone-marten scarf into place with graceful carelessness. She followed Grace calmly conscious that women at the tables they passed sent appraising glances at the restrained understatement of her black coat, her clever hat, her tall thinness.

"Why, the sun's come out!" said Grace Barnes as they came out into the relative quiet of the street. Her whole day was turning out better than she had expected and she put her hand gratefully on Stacy's arm. "Are you sure you really want us tonight?"

"I really do," said Stacy; and since she really did, her tone was convincing. "Good-by, my dear; my hair appointment's at three, I'll have to run. Thank you a thousand times!"

They touched cheeks, then parted.

Grace Barnes watched Stacy cross the street, wait for a traffic light. Sun glistened expensively on the shining guard hairs of (Continued on Page 102)

"You'd be amazed at the amount of time I've put in wo about you," said Scott. "Every time I see you, I have a new

ILLUSTRATED BY COBY WH

Love is a Bargain

LET'S MAKE IT "THE PEOPLE'S RED CROSS"

By Margaret Hickey
Editor, Public Affairs Department

Margaret Hickey

THE American Red Cross belongs to the people of the United States. Its humanitarian services are universally known and appreciated. The Red Cross serves those suffering from privation or disaster in time of peace, reaches out to link the people with their men and women in uniform in time of war. Since it belongs to the people, it ought to be "the people's Red Cross."

But is it really "of the people, for the people"? During the past few years those who knew it best decided not and clamored for needed democratic changes. Although the Red Cross performed magnificently during the war years, it has struggled along with a too-heavy, moss-covered charter granted by Congress in 1905. This forty-two-year-old charter left little or no opportunity for the some 36,000,000 individual members to have a voice in policy making. It gave extraordinary powers of election to a vested, self-perpetuating body called the Board of Incorporators. And policy making was entrusted to a group of eighteen on a Central Committee.

When the 1905 Red Cross charter was granted, the organization had only 18 state groups and 3337 members. Today there are 3745 chapters—at least one in every county in the United States—and 5495 branches. During the past five years the Red Cross has operated on a budget of nearly three quarters of a billion dollars.

Quasi-governmental in character, with the President of the United States as ex-officio leader, the Red Cross is the largest, self-governing welfare agency in the world.

Long before the cessation of hostilities, revision was planned; and soon after V-J Day, Basil O'Connor, wartime chairman of the Red Cross, called together a group to study policies and to recommend changes to make the Red Cross the democratic organization it should be. At the head of the Advisory Committee on Organization, as it was called, he placed E. Roland Harriman, then full-time volunteer and manager of the North Atlantic area. From various fields he chose other able members, such as Dr. Edmund E. Day, president of Cornell; Maj. Gen. Graves B. Erskine, of Iwo Jima fame; Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Washington Post; Dr. F. D. Patterson, president of Tuskegee Institute; AFL's William Green; CIO's James B. Carey. There were, in addition, local chapter members who were as diverse in their opinions as they were united in their determination to make the Red Cross a people's organization.

Their objectives were clear-cut: first, to make certain that all the people who make up the American National Red Cross really shape its policies; second, to make such recommendations for modernizing the organizational structure as would be necessary for democratic efficiency.

The work of the committee was directed to "charter and by-law revision," not to reorganization. The members applauded the organization as a going concern: its amazing blood-donor service, the medical recreation performed at home and abroad, its widespread relief were magnificent in both concept and operation. Yet changes within the charter were so obviously necessary that the committee had no trouble getting twenty-three of its twenty-five recommendations—with only a few minor variations as to form—unanimously passed by the Red Cross Executive Committee. The self-perpetuating Board of Incorporators—under the gentle but firm persuasion of the Advisory Committee—agreed to vote itself out of existence.

The first recommendation of the Advisory Committee was to increase the Central Committee, or governing body, from eighteen to fifty members. Thirty members of this body of fifty—now to be called the "Board of Governors"—are to be elected by chapters, twelve by the thirty already elected, and eight to be appointed by the President of the United States. The twelve to be chosen by the chapter governors will be designated as "governors-at-large"—to represent the religious, professional, scientific and other elements with which the Red Cross desires close association. Of the eight members appointed by the President, not more than three may be from the armed forces; one of the eight will be designated as President of the Red Cross. The old "chairman" thus gives way to a new executive title.

The Advisory Committee recommended four meetings of the governing board each year instead of one as previously—with pre-meeting agenda to be circulated among the members. Each governor is to be reimbursed for the expenses incurred in attendance at these meetings, so that financial status may hinder no one from belonging to the executive group.

To insure fresh personnel in the policy-making body, provision for rotation in office is recommended. Any elected governor who has served two consecutive terms of three years each becomes automatically ineligible for re-election for at least two years. The length of term of the presidential appointees is at the pleasure of the President.

The individual Red Cross chapters came in for their portion of advice from the committee too. So that any twenty-five members from a chapter may make direct appeals on election or membership affairs, a standing committee on the Board of Governors will be set up to hear protests. Along with "honorary members," classification of members by amount of contribution is to be eliminated. Rotation of officers, notice of elections by publication, free opportunity for nominations, as well as interchange of ideas and liaison committees to maintain close contact with state and Federal officials, are urged. Chapters are cautioned against "killing the volunteer spirit."

To take effect, the new and democratic charter has only to receive the almost certain approval of Congress and of the June convention of the Red Cross. Each volunteer, each member, the country over, may then look ahead to the time when experience may qualify him to be a "governor" of "the people's Red Cross."

Orders of the day: Field Director Janice Shepard charts duties for the volunteers who serve as Gray Ladies at the Kennedy Veterans' Hospital.

"A link with peace and home": that, and the will to live, is the gift of women like Mrs. Tim Treadwell to all who suffer in the wake of war.

There's almost no hurt that music won't help to heal. Most popular therapy with mentally ill patients is playing in the hospital orchestra.

The Red Cross: Memphis, Tennessee

By Joan Younger

THIS is the story of the man who stared miserably, unblinking, at you when he looked your way: whose ears were twisted bits of flesh, and down whose face ran a scar that looked like the splash of coffee that flung across the mess hall as explosion rocked his ship so many months ago. This is the story of how he sat huddled in a chair in the hospital ward, refusing to speak to anyone, his staring eyes turned inward. And how day after day the woman with the gray veil and the spinsterish face came and sat down beside him and said, "What makes you think looks are so important? You think I like my friends only because they are beautiful, handsome people?"

She said it once, she said it dozens of times, she varied it with gentle words on how she might even learn to like him if he gave her a chance, and finally one day he spoke to her. "Okay," he said, "I'll try."

Four months later he left the hospital for his first trip home to see his mother. When he got to the airport, he stepped out of the Red Cross Motor Corps station wagon and then he stepped back.

"Walk with me to the plane," he said, grabbing the girl driver's arm. "Act like you like me, act like I'm human."

He came back to the hospital two weeks later. He smiled and he hummed and the fact that he had more operations to go through and that it would be many months before people would stop staring at him on the streets didn't bother him so much now. Once he said, "You know, I had a wonderful time at home. People really were glad to see me."

And then his little boy came to visit him. The whole ward held its breath as the boy came in. He looked casually around and spotted his father. "Hi, dad," he said in his four-year-old treble. "How you doin'?"

"Fine," said his father. "Just fine, son."

This is also the story of the man who got so afraid during a battle that the fact that he killed six Germans still didn't make him feel as if he had done enough. His buddy was killed in front of him and maybe, he thought, he could have done something about that, too, if only he'd had the courage. So he came home and he brooded. He couldn't think about anything else and he couldn't work and nobody was real to him. Finally it was all too much for him and he collapsed completely in tears. He was taken to the hospital. As he walked into the neuropsychiatric ward, the doctors locked the door behind him.

His wife got hysterical then, but a Red Cross Gray Lady came up to her and talked to her about the treatment that the veterans' hospitals give to disturbed veterans and took her on a tour through the recreation rooms and let her watch other boys who, when they first came in, came in crying or raving or drunken or fighting, and who now played billiards or bridge or wrote letters. She showed her the doors open to the miniature-golf course and the swimming pool and the art room and the small vegetable patch.

"I don't have to come here," she said. "I come here because I want to."

Then when the wife went home, the Gray Lady went to the ward where the men who were still lost and angry and tortured were, and knocked on the door and the ward attendant let her in. She walked into the ward of the staring eyes and the hidden eyes and the vacant eyes, and pretty soon she was talking to the tearful one who was shaking all over but who even through his fog could hear her say that he'd feel better soon; wasn't it a nice thing that he came here where he'd have a chance at getting well?

This is the story, then, of the men whose suffering did not cease with the sound of the victory bells; and this is the story of the women who, because they want to, have learned how to care for these men and help them and encourage them. In technical parlance, this is the story of the maimed and sick veterans of two World Wars and the Red-Cross-trained volunteers in the Hospital and Recreation Corps (better known as the Gray Ladies), the Motor Corps and the Canteen Corps. Specifically, the events in this story took place in Memphis, Tennessee, where 380 Red Cross workers gave 124,347 hours of work during 1946, the first full year of peace. But actually, this story neither begins nor ends in Memphis; it stretches across time and space to every battle front where a Red Cross girl has lightened the heart of a soldier, and forevermore, hurt or strong, well or disturbed, the Red Cross has meant to that man what it meant then—friendliness, courage, gentleness. (Continued on Page 214)

Menu

Tomato-and-Clam Consommé

Broiled Stuffed Lamb Patties

New Potatoes in Cream

Beet Greens

Cheese Refrigerator Rolls

Early Variety Salad

First Flowers Dessert

Coffee

Serves 8

Now that April's here: Greeting to friends—happy gardening and good eating

PHOTO BY STUART-POWLER

Early Varieties

BY ANN BATCHELDER

FOR the moment, but only for the moment, you may lay aside the most fascinating literature produced hereabouts. You may lay aside the seed catalogues, for now you will retire to the seed store and line up in front of counter and showcase, for you are about to join that innumerable throng who see, in the eye of the mind, the flowering and fruition of long hours with spade and rake, with fertilizers and back-fence advice: you are about to garden.

Now the early radish. I know from experience that the first scallion, the early radish and that shy and sandy lettuce can furnish a thrill that few achievements known to man can equal. Mr. Bell rang a bell and heard a whisper where no whisper was before. Mr. Edison fiddled around and produced a light where no light was before. But you, all by yourself, have scattered a few dry little seeds in the bosom of Mother Earth, and lo, without a single experimental waste of midnight oil, you have brought forth a miracle—and your first red radish!

Things just "come natcherly." Beguiled by the pictures on the seed envelopes, I have no doubt that you'll plant some carrots. Also beets. Don't think that you will drag out of me any remarks on these two matters. The foliage of both is quite good-looking, and if you're careful, you can plant them behind the rhubarb and keep the whole thing to yourself. Later, after the first flush of victory has faded from your face and the time comes for the June peas, you will ignore any misplaced enthusiasm and go right on to more peas until the great tall telephones come to flower—there you'll have something. Also corn—early, midseason and late. And what you do about the rabbits is your business. That is definitely out of my line.

Brief advice. Plant well, plant early, water and weed and watch the astonishing variety of bugs that will flock around thicker than ants at a Sunday-school picnic, and you won't need to plant yeast cakes along with the seeds to make them hurry up and rise. Let nature take her course—"doin' what comes natcherly." You'll see. This is all. You will get more advice than weeds—and I won't add another word. Maybe I've said too much already.

Let us examine the question. A gardener prays for rain. The milliner does not. The former wishes his garden to grow. The latter (Continued on Page 197)

Once and For all

BY DOROTHY CANFIELD

THE day had been one of the unbearable ones, when every sound had set her teeth on edge like chalk creaking on a blackboard, when every word her father or mother said to her or did not say to her seemed an intentional injustice. And of course it would happen, as the fitting end to such a day, that just as the sun went down back of the mountain and the long twilight began, she noticed that Rollie was not around.

Tense with exasperation at what her mother would say, she began to call him in a carefully casual tone—she would simply explode if mother got going: "Here Rollie! He-ere boy! Want to go for a walk, Rollie?" Whistling to him cheerfully, her heart full of wrath at the way the world treated her, she made the rounds of his haunts: the corner of the woodshed, where he liked to curl up on the wool of father's discarded old sweater; the hay barn, the cow barn, the sunny spot on the side porch. No Rollie.

Perhaps he had sneaked upstairs to lie on her bed, where he was not supposed to go—not that she would have minded! That rule was a part of mother's fussiness, part, too, of mother's bossiness. It was her bed, wasn't it? But was she allowed the say-so about it? Not on your life. They said she could have things the way she wanted in her own room, now she was in her teens, but —— Her heart burned at unfairness as she took the stairs stormily, two steps at a time, her pigtails flopping up and down on her back. If Rollie was there, she was just going to let him stay there, and mother could say what she wanted to.

But he was not there. The bedspread and pillow were crumpled, but that was where she had flung herself down to cry that afternoon. Every nerve in her had been twanging discordantly, but she couldn't cry. She could only lie there, her hands doubled up hard, furious that she had nothing to cry about. Not really. She was too big to cry just over father's having said to her, severely, "I told you if I let you take the chess set, you were to put it away when you got through with it. One of the pawns was on the floor of our bedroom this morning. I stepped on it. If I'd had my shoes on I'd have broken it."

Well, he had told her that. And he hadn't said she mustn't ever take the set again. No, the instant she thought about that, she knew she couldn't cry about it. She could be, and was, in a rage about the way father kept on talking, long after she'd got his point: "It's not that I care so much about the chess set. It's because if you don't learn how to take care of things, you yourself will suffer for it. You'll forget or neglect something that will be really important, for you. We have to try to teach you to be responsible for what you've said you'll take care of. If we ——" on and on.

She stood there, dry-eyed, by the bed that Rollie had not crumpled and thought, I hope mother sees the spread and says something about Rollie—I just hope she does.

She heard her mother coming down the hall, and hastily shut her door. She had a right to shut the door to her own room, hadn't she? She had some rights, she supposed, even if she was only thirteen and the youngest child. If her mother opened it to say, "What are you doing in here that you don't want me to see?" she'd say—she'd just say ——

But her mother did not open the door. Her feet went steadily on along the hall, and then, carefully, slowly, down the stairs. She probably had an armful of winter things she was bringing down from the attic. She was probably thinking that a tall, thirteen-year-old daughter was big enough to help with a chore like that. But she wouldn't say anything. She would just get out that insulting look of a grownup silently putting up with a crazy unreasonable kid. She had worn that expression all day; it was too much to be endured.

Up in her bedroom behind her closed door the thirteen-year-old stamped her foot in a gust of uncontrollable rage, none the less savage and heart-shaking because it was mysterious to her.

BUT she had not located Rollie. She would be cut into little pieces before she would let her father and mother know she had lost sight of him, forgotten about him. They would not scold her, she knew. They would do worse; they would look at her. And in their silence she would hear, droning on reproachfully, what they had said when she had been begging to keep for her own the sweet, woolly collie puppy in her arms.

How warm he had felt! Astonishing how warm and alive a puppy was compared with a doll! She had never liked her dolls much after she had held Rollie, feeling him warm against her breast, warm and wriggling, bursting with life, reaching up to lick her face. He had loved her from that first instant. As he felt her arms around him his liquid, beautiful eyes had melted in trusting sweetness. And they did now, whenever he looked at her. Her dog was the only creature in the world (Continued on Page 200)

It was one of those days in a little girl's life when the very worst might happen — and did.

ILLUSTRATED BY MICHAEL

"Rollie! Rollie!" She called out his name despairingly, as if he were her child.

ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT

By Gladys Taber

I LOVE old houses with a quite irrational passion. And I love new waffle-crisp houses, designed for tomorrow. We have many of both in the America we live in. But all over the country families live in middle-aged houses, and I always feel at home in them, for the town in which I roller-skated to school had nothing else.

The middle-aged house has no beauty of design, and usually the most casual plan. Rooms just open out from one another haphazardly, windows and doors burgeon everywhere. The front porch eats up any light that might get in the big living room; the bathrooms are big enough to swing an elephant in, if one could swing an elephant. There are halls and entryways, back stairs and side stairs. And the bedrooms open on a large space which used to be the despair of most women. You could store chests there, or park the whatnot, or line up a sewing machine and table, but mostly it was another useless place to polish and clean and repaper.

If you put your ear to the cellar floor, you could hear the hammers of the Chinese tapping below. But big and deep as it was, the stairs fell down to it like a canyon wall. "Be careful of the cellar stairs," was a theme song then.

Nevertheless, these houses were soundly built, with brave timbers, hardwood floors, golden-oak woodwork, well-fitted windows, high spacious ceilings. And now they are coming again into their own, as sturdy quiet folk often do in periods of stress. There is room in them for big families of children, for puppies and cats and goldfish and canaries; and in spite of being inconvenient in so many ways, they are comfortable.

And they have back yards. What can compare with a back yard? The rabbits have room there, the bicycles can be painted there, model airplanes flown and children may play safely.

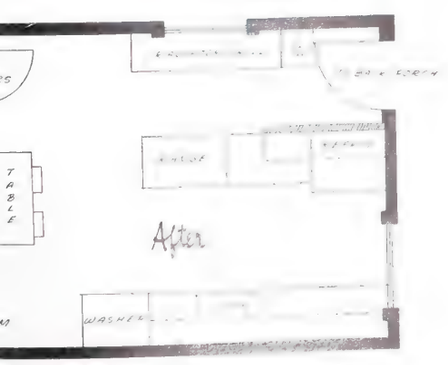
Usually the kitchen in such a house seemed hopeless. It was obviously just another room, big as a barn, with the stove, icebox and sink dropped in like stones in a pool. The only work surface was a table, covered with white oilcloth. After the children grew up and moved East or West, the icebox became an electric one, the stove modern, and the cast-iron sink moved out to become a fish pool. And that was all.

In such a house, on a corner lot, was such a kitchen. It looked discouraging at first (Continued on Page 224)

The snack counter folds against the wall when not needed. Rack above holds serving tray conveniently. Thrifty use of waste space adds a comfortable spot for quick casual meals.

High ceilings, ugly windows, dreary wal counters, one tall cupboard were discour

PHOTOS BY STUART-STEPHENSON



nty of space was available. Minor changes plumbing and wiring. Color did the rest.

The sink was moved to the right of its original location, which gave space for upper and lower cabinets. The refrigerator and range were moved opposite the sink, with a good cabinet space between them, where an ample work surface with storage above and below makes food preparation easy and convenient. Soffit lighting gives clear shadowless illumination.

Line a Day

1 I'm not always plumping for New England. Not all the time. But I do suggest reading IT'S AN OLD NEW ENGLAND CUSTOM, by Edwin Valentine Mitchell. Learn about pie for breakfast (never heard of it) and where drums are made and how. And the low-down about "bundling." It's a fascinating and well-done book.

2 Now the gardens are started—I hope. The peas—eating and sweet-flowering—ought to be in by now. If the last snow comes, all the better. Don't wait on weather.

3 A little piece of salt pork in the pea cooker is a choice thing. The pork won't be much good afterward, but the peas will be.

4 Fillets of fish, such as sole, perch, halibut or pompano, are deliciously toned up with chopped almonds browned in salad oil, well drained and served on the fish.

5 Observations from Ivory Tower Department: Man wants but little here below, but he wants that little fried.

6 To go back to fish for just a minute. Trout season will soon be upon us. "The maddest, merriest day"—that's the first trout-fishing day. And trout needs no almonds, coconut, chocolate-fudge frosting or marshmallow cream. A little lemon, maybe—that's all.

7 Boil or steam some rice according to your lights. Toss it, just before serving, with some mushrooms cut in halves and sautéed in butter or margarine. Season with salt. And a touch of paprika.

8 You know a nice breakfast dish, say for a Sunday morning, is done by mixing two cups of cooked rice with one egg and a pound of cooked sausage, all minced up. Make this into cakes and fry in butter or margarine.

9 Half or two thirds of the charm of baked spareribs is in the crisp succulent crustiness that comes from baking pork. Leave off the barbecue business occasionally. If you have a sauce, serve it separately. Don't swamp the ribs.

10 Casting about for salad greens, besides the ubiquitous lettuce—think, think hard—well? Why dandelion, of course. The little tender shoots may be mixed in raw. Others cooked and chilled. It's a bit bitter—but bittersweet.

11 Know what I did? Sliced the turkey stuffing that was left (it had a lot of Italian chestnuts in it), dipped the pieces in egg and crumbs and fried them. And good—it was indeed.

12 Every buffet supper should have one hot dish, and two aren't any too much. But one is a must. Creamed things in the chafing dish are best. Croquettes are top drawer. For dessert little strawberry shortcakes are pretty popular, and a big bowl of whipped sweetened cream should be right by.

13 Rhubarb soup is an item to paste in your memory book. Take half a pound of fine red rhubarb, cut it in pieces and cook until very soft in one quart of water. Put it through a purée sieve. Then into a saucepan with it, thicken it a little with cornstarch and water and stir until clear. Sweeten to taste. Add about half a cup of cream, whipped stiff with the yolk of an egg. Beat the soup well and serve hot with wafers. And this can be served chilled if you want a cold soup. Nice going, this.

14 Apple soup is another thing you might try in an idle moment. Made the same as rhubarb with five or six tart apples, and the juice of half a lemon for flavor.

15 Sliced canned pears mixed with pineapple, cut fine, make a luncheon salad de luxe, served on cold crisp greens. For the dressing, beat a cream cheese into a cup of mayonnaise until smooth, and serve very cold, on the side. Cheese sticks add a certain something here.

16 Chicken baked in cream curry-flavored sauce maketh the tongue hang out when it's done right. Garnished with sautéed fruit and served with a potato soufflé.

17 News items: It's wonderful to report that beautiful hams, 'most any size, in cans are now easily come by. That over in Pennsylvania Dutch countryside, smoked hams and sides of hickory-smoked bacon are shipped anywhere on order. And a ready-stuffed "broad breast" turkey, frozen and ready to roast, makes an easy "out" for the hurried and worried.

18 Department of moderate despair, grapefruit division: The terrible treatment a grapefruit undergoes when doused with chili sauce or catchup. There is a time and a place for everything but not for such works as this.

19 It is nice to bite into a little hot muffin and find in the middle a lovely soft date or a spoonful of raspberry jam. Just put the sweets in after the muffin is in the tin, or fill it after it's baked. Wonderful for supper or tea. Be sure the muffins aren't too sweet.

20 From an old cookbook: "The new vogue for salads is one to be discouraged from the start. The fashionable ladies who affect to find good eating in such fare are leading our better housekeepers into strange ways. Our advice is to cook your greens and eat them as Nature intended and let foreign falderals go by the board."

21 A little grated Parmesan or other hard cheese, with a suspicion of nutmeg, makes a perfect addition to the little new string beans. Dressed first with salt, pepper, and butter or margarine.

22 Few things are more delicious with coffee than freshly baked pastry cheese fingers. Roll the pastry very thin, roll in plenty of grated cheese and bake until crisp.

23 When you are bound to roast potatoes in the pan with roasting meat, you'll do well to rub the potatoes all over with butter or margarine and lay a few slices of salt pork in the pan with the potatoes. Cut it very thin. Don't let it burn. Take it out when done. See?

24 Maybe I've told this before, maybe more than once. Don't care if I have. You can take it. Just this—a deep-dish or regular apple pie is good enough, but enough isn't enough once you've eaten it hot with whipped cream sweetened with shaved maple sugar.

25 Now that guava shells and little bitter orange shells canned in their sirups are with us again from Southern places, you can decorate fruit molds, salads, ice creams and mousses in a pretty exotic way. For one—cream a cream cheese with salted cream and fill guava shells and serve with salted crackers with any salad.

26 Sugar on fritters—to me, anyway—is a must, and must be. If any maple comes your way, you'll find it perfect on apple fritters, shaved or grated. Add a touch of cinnamon too.

27 To my mind, there's no such thing as mushrooms à la king. But creamed—not "white sauce" mushrooms—the whole, strong-bodied white ones, done with halved hard-cooked eggs, are a fine luncheon dish. Serve them in a casserole and have plenty of hot biscuits to go with them.

28 Softly scrambled eggs served on broiled halved tomatoes, the tomatoes dusted with salt, pepper and basil, and finished off with sautéed whole mushrooms, are quite a dish for the contract crowd. Careful with the scramble, be sly with the seasoning, deft with the tomatoes and bold with the mushrooms. Serve with corn or wheat muffins.

29 You've heard, of course, of the fellow who found a whole chestnut in the stuffing and remarked, "Ah, a hen turkey, I see." Or have you?

30 And now the class may go and so will I. Our thirty days are up and I hope you've enjoyed them as much as I have. So—until we meet again—yours, as usual.

BY ANN BATCHELDER

The Long-Remembered

These are the things to remember:
Pattern of leaves on the pane,
Roses that bloomed in December
And the rainbow after rain.
Those long-remembered faces
In the album of the years—
How re-create their graces,
Their laughter and their tears!
These are the things to remember:
Sunshine and flowers of May,
The bluebird that flew in September—
Which way? Which way?

DRAWING BY R. C. ATHERTON

"Top-of-the-Basket" VEGETABLES
...for a soup that's GOOD to the Bottom of the Bowl
Think of the finest vegetables you've ever seen —in garden, field or store: luscious tomatoes, sweet golden corn, tender limas, young peas, crisp celery . . . Now picture these wonderful vegetables and a host of others—fifteen in all —mingled in a good beef stock, according to Campbell's own homelike recipe.
Is it any wonder that this hearty, homey vegetable soup gets the call more and more— that spoons are kept busy every time it's served? Women everywhere say Campbell's Vegetable Soup is "almost a meal in itself"— keep it on hand for husky appetites. Do you?
Campbell's VEGETABLE SOUP
Campbell's VEGETABLE SOUP
...Nourishing BEEF STOCK, too!

The right foods can mean better health! But remember, appetite and taste are not always the best guides to a good diet. Neither is cost, for some families that spend a lot on food are not as well nourished as those who spend less—but choose more wisely.

Today, medical science is realizing more and more that food can be helpful in fighting certain physical conditions, such as diabetes, high blood pressure, and overweight. However, the main function of your food is to help you keep physically fit. Eating the right amount of the right foods every day can mean better health and a happier life for you!

Choose foods to meet the body's needs!

Daily needs in nearly every normal diet include milk or cheese, meat, fish or poultry, vegetables, fruits, cereals or breads, fats, and sweets. You should also drink 4 to 8 glasses of water a day.

How much of each food you should eat for a well-balanced diet depends on your age, your physical condition, and the kind of work you do. Ask your doctor about your own health requirements, and be sure your diet includes all of the essential food elements in the proper amounts.

When and how you eat are nearly as important as what you eat. Have your meals at regular times. Eat them slowly and enjoy them—for a happy, peaceful atmosphere is helpful to good digestion and good health.

To help guide your choice of foods for a healthy diet, and to help you get the most good from the food you buy, send for your free copy of Metropolitan's booklet, 47-J, "Three Meals A Day."

COPYRIGHT 1947—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD
Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT
1 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK 10, N.Y.

TO VETERANS—IF YOU HAVE NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE—KEEP IT!

FRIENDS AND LOVERS

(Continued from Page 34)

women gathered seaweed on the shore. Three men leaned against the wall of a cottage under a small sign saying "John McDonald, Post Office."

"A hive of industry," David remarked. "Is there any decent place to dine, George?"

"The captain says his sister will give us tea, and then we can call on this Doctor MacIntyre of yours."

"Not mine," David said hastily. "This is all Chaundler's idea."

Walter Chaundler was David's tutor at Oxford. When he had heard in June about his pupil's visit to this part of Scotland, he had been delighted. "You must go to see MacIntyre and take him messages from me," Chaundler had said. "I shall write to him and tell him that you are tutoring this summer at the Fenton-Stevens' place on Loch Innish. Quite a remarkable man. He was born on Inchnamurren and went to school there. He even did some teaching himself, when he was fifteen or so. Then he went to Glasgow University, and after that came up to Oxford. We were at Balliol together. He became a don here, and later a professor in London. And then, quite suddenly, after his wife died, he went back to his island again. Quite remarkable." And when David had remained silent, wondering if retiring to an unknown island in a forgotten part of the world was the depressing proof of failure after so much effort, Chaundler had sensed the young man's doubts. He had smiled in his kindly, gentle way. "Do go," he told David. "I am sure MacIntyre would be delighted." And that was how this visit had been decided.

"Can we see Doctor MacIntyre's house from here, Captain MacLean?" David asked, as the three men clambered onto the jetty after making the boat fast.

The captain removed his pipe and pointed toward a house, long and white, set back from the village on the shoulder of a hill. "It's up there," he said, and once more the pipe was clenched deliberately between his teeth.

They walked over to the group of islanders, who stopped speaking Gaelic and watched the foreigners gravely as Captain MacLean introduced them. There was a brief exchange of polite phrases, the Highlanders now speaking in English with their soft voices and pure pronunciation. It was far removed from the coarse dialect of the stage Scotsman. David made a mental note never again to give a Scots imitation.

MacLean measured the necessary length of the slow, simple conversation with considerable skill, and as he led them away from the group, along the narrow earth road which ran in front of the row of cottages, David had the feeling that George and he had been weighed in the balance.

A white-aproned, square-set, apple-cheeked woman was waiting for them at a cottage door.

"My sister, Mistress McDonald," MacLean explained.

"Will you not come in and have a cup of tea?" she asked. "The kettle's singing on the hob." She had a gentle voice with music in it, and her eyes were as placid as her brother's.

Inside the cottage was the smell of a peat fire and freshly baked scones. The kettle was hissing cheerily, a clock ticked loudly on the high, crowded mantelpiece decorated with an edging of crochet. Through the small open window, the cries of the cormorants and harsh-voiced sea gulls blurred into the background murmur of breaking waves.

A girl rose as they entered, and Dav found he did not even hear her name as Mr McDonald made the introductions. He he out his hand, and he remembered afterwa thinking how very odd it was that he h made that gesture so impulsively. But at t time he was looking into a pair of very bl eyes in a very pretty face, and that was he could seem to see. He did not break th look, as he should have; and besides, didn't want to. Then he suddenly becan conscious that George was saying somethi to him about one of the curios which litter the mantelpiece, and remembered to dr her hand. But he found he was watchi the girl as she moved toward the doorwa and he felt a sudden stab of disappointmen

It was just as irrational and inexplicable the last confused minute had been. For minute he felt annoyance with himself. Th girl was saying that she was so sorry leave, that she was so very late. Her voic was gentle and yet clear and low. Her dar hair had strong auburn lights, almost a dar red and yet not quite. The sun was gleam ing on it now as she stood at the threshol There was a natural grace to her body as sh looked back into the room over her shoul der. And then she was gone.

He looked sharpl at George to see if h had observed anythin remarkable, bu Fenton-Stevens wa helping Mrs. McDon ald to clear a chair o magazines, and Mrs McDonald was sayin that Miss Penny wa always so thoughtfu about bringing he something to read which was a nice chang from the knitting. I was clear from he matter-of-fact words and George's equally sensible reply, and Captain MacLean's practical absorption in the excellent soda scones and fresh butter, that none of them realized they had just seen a miracle of a girl.

David concentrated on the difficult problem of eating a newly baked oatcake. He was thankful that George had noticed so little. He could hear George saying to a group of Oxford friends when the subject of women came up, "Remember David and his neat speeches on women being a snare and delusion? 'If they are pretty, they have no heart, no brain. A pretty girl doesn't need anything except her face value, which she has calculated to the last shilling.' Well, don't listen to him. You should have seen him, holding on to her hand." At least, David now reflected, he had been spared that. And at the age of twenty, almost twenty-one, with a definite attitude on life carefully established as protective coloring, that was a good deal to be thankful for.

"You are very quiet, David," George remarked, with a slight touch of prodding.

"I am wrestling with this," David said, and indicated the mess of golden crumbs which covered his plate. "It looks as if I needed a spoon, doesn't it?"

That amused his hostess; and her brother remarked, as he tactfully demonstrated how to spread butter on oatcake by placing the cake on the flat tablecloth rather than on the curved surface of the plate, that Mr. Bosworth was a great one for the joking.

So now David smiled around the table as he thanked MacLean for the excellent advice, and began to talk.

But on the way to Doctor MacIntyre's, he thought again of the girl he had met in the cheerful kitchen. Her voice had no Highland accent, but just the kind of accent, belonging to nowhere in particular, which a good school can produce. Was she a summer visitor, and

(Continued on Page 79)

We once had a cat who had four kittens: the mother being a Chinchilla Persian, the kittens were distinctly good. It was decided to keep one and give one away, and if nobody wanted the other two, to put them away. One was offered to the laundryman, who was very pleased and put it into an empty laundry basket and fastened the lid down. This was done in our kitchen. The kitten was then about three months old, and had never been outside the place. It was then taken four miles in a van to the laundryman's home. That kitten was back outside our door the next morning.

—L. R. THODAY: N'Importe. (Heath, Cranton, Ltd.)

ew! Blush-cleanse your face—for that Engaged-lovely look

See it give your skin:

instant clean, refreshed look instant softer, silkier feel

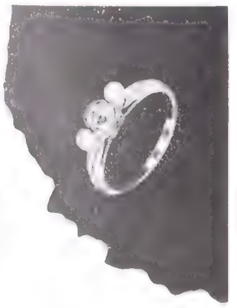
—a lovely blush of color

YOU'LL SEE RESULTS TONIGHT. With the powder-base cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream. Your cream-cleanse and cream-rinse your face to a softer, lovelier look.

YOU BLUSH-CLEANSE. Rouse your face with warm water. Dip deep into soft-smooth Pond's Cold Cream. Swirl it on your receptively moist, warm skin in little creamy "engagement ring" circles up over your face and throat. Tissue off.

YOU BLUSH-RINSE—Cream again with more snowy-soft Pond's Cold Cream. Swirl about 25 more creamy circlets over your face. Tissue well. Tingle with cold water. Blot dry.

EXTRA CLEAN, SOFT, GLOWING. That's the way your face will feel! Pond's demulcent action has softened and loosened dirt and make-up—helped free your skin! Every night—this complete Pond's blush-cleansing. Every morning—for a bright awake look. One once-over blush-cleansing with Pond's!



KATHARINE'S RING—set with precious family stone—ruby mined flashing between two white pearl

She's Engaged!

She's Lovely!

She uses Pond's!

Katharine Anne Kurr, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick L. Kurr of Rye, N. Y., is engaged to Lawrence Esterbrook Wattles of Wynnewood, Pa., who served with the Marines in the South Pacific. They plan to be married in a perfect country setting at beautiful Belgrade Lakes, Maine, where both families have their summer homes.

Katharine is startlingly like her charming mother—the same fine-cast features, the same dark blue eyes with enormous black pupils, and a complexion so rose-petal fresh you must see it to believe it.

She is delighted by this new blush-cleanse way to use Pond's Cold Cream. "It gives my face such a clean-soft, waked-up feeling," she says.

Have the Pond's blush-cleansed look! Get your Pond's Cold Cream today—a convenient big 6-oz. jar!

CHARMING KATHARINE KURR says . . . "My face feels gorgeously clean and glowy after a blush-cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream." Keep your face blush-cleansed, with Pond's, too!

...gement Diamonds and Pond's! Classic round diamonds, like Katharine Kurr's; luxurious emerald-cut diamonds; and a graceful pointed marquise!

Among the beautiful women of Society who use Pond's

THE LADY MARGARET DOUGLAS-HOME

VISCOUNTESS MOUNTBATTEN — MRS. VICTOR DU PONT, III

MRS. JOHN R. DREXEL — MRS. ROBERT BACON WHITNEY

THE COUNTESS DE PETITEVILLE

THE LADY DAPHNE STRAIGHT — MRS. JOHN J. ASTOR

MISS ANNE MORGAN — MISS CYNTHIA McADOO

"My—what an utterly different soap!

Only in Swan...this "super-creamed blend"

that does so many lovely things for y

IT'S THE happy result of Swan's patente process. Only pure, floating Swan has th "super-creamed blend"!

A great soap discovery that does so man lovely things for you!

Read below all the exciting improvemen in skin care that Swan's "super-creamed blend brings you.

Only Swan can help your skin to loveliness this special Swan way!

1. Beautiful

. . . you'll love the clear, fresh glow of your skin after pure Swan does its wonderful work—because Swan's velvet-soft lather cleanses so thoroughly! Lather so luscious it's like cream on your face—thanks to Swan's "super-creamed blend"!

2. Beautiful

. . . you'll love the satin-smooth feel Swan gives your skin. Never taut and drawn—for Swan's gentle, creamy lather is soft as a caress, and it rinses away so completely. Another luxury brought to you by Swan's "super-creamed blend"!

3. Beautiful

. . . the gentle way Swan takes care of even delicate skin. Swan is mild as the costliest toilet soaps—pure as fine castiles. It's beautiful how Swan agrees with your skin—and what a beautiful difference that "super-creamed blend" makes!

4. Beautiful

. . . the new bathroom gle daintiness you get with Sw more forever-scrubbing at ba bathtub ring. And no more ex messy soap-dish "goo." N soap gives you this thrift firmness, for no other soap the same way.

Swan is different—Swan is better!

A product of Lever Brothers Company

YOU'LL LOVE SWAN FOR BATH, COMPLEXION, DISHES —BECAUSE IT'S DIFFERENT, BECAUSE IT'S BETTER!

nued from Page 76)

taying anyway? He halted ked back at the village. What to behave, he told himself ned quickly to walk on with Good day" to two children,

d a young boy. Of the girl es and the dark auburn hair
n.

the pleasant room. Doctor ing in his favorite armchair he large brick fireplace, won-long they had been talking.
ion had been interesting always a delight to hear the rd, or to catch an echo of his s when he had been an under-watch a young man's ideas
s suddenly reveal themselves.
a half had disappeared when y thought of looking at his se quickly to his feet. "I'm sir," he said. "I've taken ich of ad no

th en-noon," Intyre
y. He nocked
m his eplace.
ll man n spite ir, was in his move-
e eyes and the ce was strong d sur-when t met:
holarly
if he live on
d. He ression enjoy-ife had ly suc-surprisning.
itated,
nd the g that st take yet re-
It was rk and nk in,
mfortll very David noticed the details of a civiookcases, tightly filled with o and a heavily filled music ss set beside the fireplace. A and a good variety of records.
indow there was a large desk
raph of three healthy children
e room, and a small table covazines and newspapers. At the looking over the sound toward there was a low table with a in progress, and two comforts.

living here," David said, and to hear his own words. And erely a polite remark either.
seeing it at its best today, I you," Doctor MacIntyre said
, but he was pleased all the d his hand on David's shoulder
y awhile longer. I have somet might interest you." He led kcase with photographs and ced on its top. He chose one of ded it to David. It was a group in the dress of forty years ago.
w anyone there?" he asked.
u a clue. It is a photograph
ken in our last year at Balliol."

David recognized MacIntyre's direct eye, strong nose and determined jawline. But Walter Chaundler was not so easy to find. David's unsuccessful attempts amused Doctor MacIntyre.

"Nothing at all like him," he said with evident relish. "There he is!" He pointed to the most elegant young blade of them all. "We look as if we were giving imitations of William Tell's son mixed with Oscar Wilde."

"And a touch of George Washington after he cut down the cherry tree," David suggested.

"After he confessed," Doctor MacIntyre amended. They both looked at the photograph and laughed. "It is a nice old horror," MacIntyre said affectionately, as he replaced it carefully.

DAVID was thinking of Walter Chaundler. He was remembering the quiet, thin face, imperceptible in a crowd, vague even to the pupils he tutored. He felt a sense of depression: the photograph's young faces were full of confidence and hope. MacIntyre had kept something of that look—life was a challenge which would be met. But Chaundler—something had happened to Chaundler: now he no longer looked for any challenge. On the surface, his was the more successful life. On the surface—but the photograph pointed him out quite clearly as the less successful man. Perhaps not in his career; but somehow, someway, in himself.

David said slowly, "Strange how one changes."

MacIntyre seemed to read his thoughts. "Life has a way of beating us down, perhaps because we don't see it coldly enough to be clear about it when we are young. Later we can see the decisions we should have made, but much good it does us then! If I were a young man again, there is one bit of advice I would like to get." He paused then, and smiled a trifle ruefully. "Now that's an old man talking, if ever I heard one."

"What would that be, sir?" David asked. He was curious to hear Doctor MacIntyre's idea. It might be an explanation of the photograph.

"Well," Doctor MacIntyre said, "it has to deal with the fact that a man's life is divided into two parts: there is his work and there is his own private life. Two small worlds which he has to make for himself. Now, a man may make a success of his career, and fail in his own private life. Or he may concentrate on enjoying life and abandon all ideas of worldly success. And it is only when he is old, and the time for decision is over, that he may realize he did not need to neglect one for the other. For if he concentrated too much on one of them, then he really confused their purpose. Honors and recognition are not going to make up for having failed in your human relationships. That's the rather tragic thing about age: to realize you have somehow never seen what is happiness until it was too late to start building it up."

David said, "But it may not be in our power to build happiness. If it were, a lot more people would be happier in this world."

"I am not talking of people who have been smashed to pieces by disaster. That is quite

(Continued on Page 81)

Utter Loneliness

By Grace Milburn

The utter loneliness of everyone
Bound to the land is sharper when the snow
Covers the roads and rivers, and the sun
Is not yet risen. Then a man must know
That he is part of time; his fathers went
With empty buckets to the frozen
wells,
Their fingers stiff and gray, their shoulders bent;
He must remember them or he rebels.

The old red barn abandoned to the wind,
The ruined orchards where the
black crows cry,
The house deserted, desolate and
blind,
Are sadder than the hillside where
they lie,
Whose sturdy hearts endured the cold until
April returned, as April always will.

How much freedom can a career girl enjoy?

102 OUT OF 127 MODELS, ARTISTS, WRITERS REPORT NO CHAFING WITH FREE-STRIDE MODESS!

Bright young careerists—girls to whom freedom of action means so much—have made a smart discovery for you.

Girls who had suffered chafe with their regular napkin tested a new, improved napkin, Free-Stride Modess. Object: to see if it gave freedom from chafe.

The answer: 102 out of 127 reported no chafing with Free-Stride Modess!

The secret of chafe-free comfort so many girls found in Modess lies in the clever fashioning of the napkin edges.

Free-Stride Modess has extra cotton on its edges—extra softness—right where the cause of chafe begins.

The extra cotton also acts to direct and retain moisture inside the napkin, keeping the edges dry and smooth longer. And dry, smooth edges don't chafe!

So safe, too! Free-Stride Modess has a triple safety shield to chase those accident fears. And a fine, sealed-in deodorant to help keep you fresh as May. No telltale outlines either—Modess is silhouette-proof. On sale everywhere now.

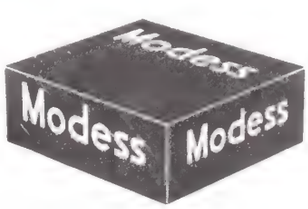
Product of Personal Products Corporation.



Walk with comfort! Try the new Free-Stride Modess!

"I'm charmed with the new Cashmere Bouqu
Beau Cake
with make-up sponge rig
in the case!"

——says beautiful

Hillary Brook

CO-STARRING IN "VENDETTA"
A CALIFORNIA PICTURES PRODUCTION
Released by United Artists

"BEAU CAKE kee
my handbag do no more loose c
in my purse."

"I find it easier than ever to apply lovely,
smooth cake make-up with BEAU CAKE."

Cashmere Bouquet
Beau Cake $1.50

(Continued from Page 70)

powers, I grant you. But there people who have never been disaster, and yet their lives are compared, that is, with what've had. I believe that happi- our power. But sometimes it ur vision. Until it is too late. man tragedy."

life sound like an equation," But the trouble is"—he looked Doctor MacIntyre—"that en get complicated, and one is -looking fractions. The answer s come out evenly."

have to. The main thing is to e equation is there, and that we at it. If we do, the answer will gh. That's the most any of us It would be a very exceptional who could find the complete lieve that success or failure as a on how near we become, or how ain from being, the complete pened, and Doctor MacIntyre's ne back into the room. She had pression of face with had wel- on-Stevens when they Mrs. Lor- t is in sight, said warn- iddle-aged. n, with her ond hair heavy knot of her head. and so had She always brown be- d been told of twenty e looked in ooked old. ded, to be of the three dren in the h on the ary?" Doc- yre said, re- be hurried. Fenton- thought he you in the as a long time ago." There was a nonstrance in the cool, precise r. Fenton-Stevens went over to west shore with the children. eading upstairs." Somehow there touch of self-pity in the way she r words. David stirred uncom- nd took a step toward the door. r MacIntyre either ignored or ot to notice the small complaint. ce," he said with his quiet smile. would do you good, Mary."

nter did not acknowledge that . "Have you that letter ready or can it wait until next week?" at won't arrive for another hour. ave plenty of time to write that e smiled suddenly, as much as to I had forgotten about it."

he children to be sure to return in. Lorrimer said. "They can take down to the jetty, and perhaps slip it into the postbag for you." ays does," her father said rem- 've a good postman here. Bos- never breaks a rule, because he made any. I'll join you later. k at the hollyhocks."

nded a pleasant way of spending r. But unfortunately, Mrs. Lor- a very polite hostess, and insisted anying David toward the garden. M brightly smiling in the sunshine. A gray stone wall had been built across a short field to join the southwest corner of it at right angles, and within the sheltered crook of this arm a garden had come to life. Here all the warmth in the air was trapped and held, and the hollyhocks grew.

David looked out over the bleak hillsides and then back at this smiling corner. "How remarkable to see anything growing except heather," he said.

Mrs. Lorrimer hardly seemed to notice the pleasure of the soft green grass underfoot. She ignored the excellent crop of vegetables, and looked critically at a rosebush which showed symptoms of withering.

"It is so very odd," she said almost apologetically, "that father ever came back here. It is so—so uncivilized. He is so out of touch with everything."

DAVID thought of the excellent collection of books, of records and magazines in the room which they had just left.

Mrs. Lorrimer's exact voice continued. "We thought he should retire to some place near us in Edinburgh. My husband is a Writer to the Signet there, you see." There was a slight pause to allow that fact to sink in. "Edinburgh really would have been much more of a spiritual home to him."

David said quickly, "I've always thought that a—a spiritual home is just not a matter of geography." He cleared his throat ner-

"You mean, it does not matter where we live?" Mrs. Lorrimer was shocked; she was probably thinking of Glasgow.

"Emotionally or physically, yes. We all feel happier or less happy in certain places. But if there is any spiritual home, surely it is what we have collected inside our own heads? After all, Descartes thought out half of his philosophy when he spent a day in a Bavarian stove. And he lived much of his life in foreign armies, although he wasn't at all warlike. I don't think he would call the stove or the barracks his spiritual home; they were just places that suited him for examining his own thoughts."

"Really!" Mrs. Lorrimer murmured. Inside a stove—but how ridiculous. Was he being facetious? Surely he didn't mean that people who talked of spiritual homes had few resources inside their own minds? She stared at him blankly, and admitted with a certain amount of effort that he was not disagreeable to look at. He was tall, and carried himself well. Gray eyes under strong eyebrows. Black hair, thick and rather too long; a mouth which was pleasant enough when it smiled, but seemed to fall naturally into a firm line. Rather too strong a face, Mrs. Lorrimer's taste decided as she completed her inventory. Still, he was not unattractive. And Mr. Chaundler's letter to her father had been highly complimentary about him. And her father would never have spent two hours with him if he had not liked this young man. Mrs. Lorrimer determined to try again. "Were you at school with George Fenton-Stevens?"

"No." David turned away from the hollyhocks.

"Where did you go to school?"

"In London."

"Oh!" She was vaguely distressed. "But you are at Oxford?"

"Yes. On a scholarship," he said very clearly.

"How interesting," she was saying, but her voice was far from interested. "And what

FIRST CLUBWOMAN

Today American women's clubs are a national institution including several million members in their ranks. Some of these clubs are [illegible] from coast to coast. Yet few have heard of Anne Hutchinson, the pioneer to organize women into a club and the furor she created when she did it. For Anne Hutchinson got no glory for her efforts. Far from it. Instead she was brought before a male tribunal and banished in disgrace. Disagreeing with the current [illegible] she held group discussions at her Boston home where she proceeded to criticize them in no uncertain terms. These discussions soon got to be the vogue, turned into [illegible] meetings, and drew nearly all the colony women, who were glad of the chance to get together and talk freely. But no matter how popular she may have been with her own sex, Anne Hutchinson was reviled by the men of the colony as a "breeder of heresies" and "a dangerous woman." She was brought to trial before Governor Winthrop on November 17, 1637, and not only barred from starting any more women's clubs, but forbidden to set foot again in Massachusetts.

Haunting as a Serenade

Perfume portrait by Audrey Buller

Poetic Dream—a tender floral blend sings of sheer enchantment

Leigh Perfumes

POETIC DREAM REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. BY HIGH FRAGRANCES, A DIV. OF THE ANDREW JERGENS CO., NEW YORK protect the woolens in your life with

WARNING!—MOTH DAMAGE ON THE WAY!

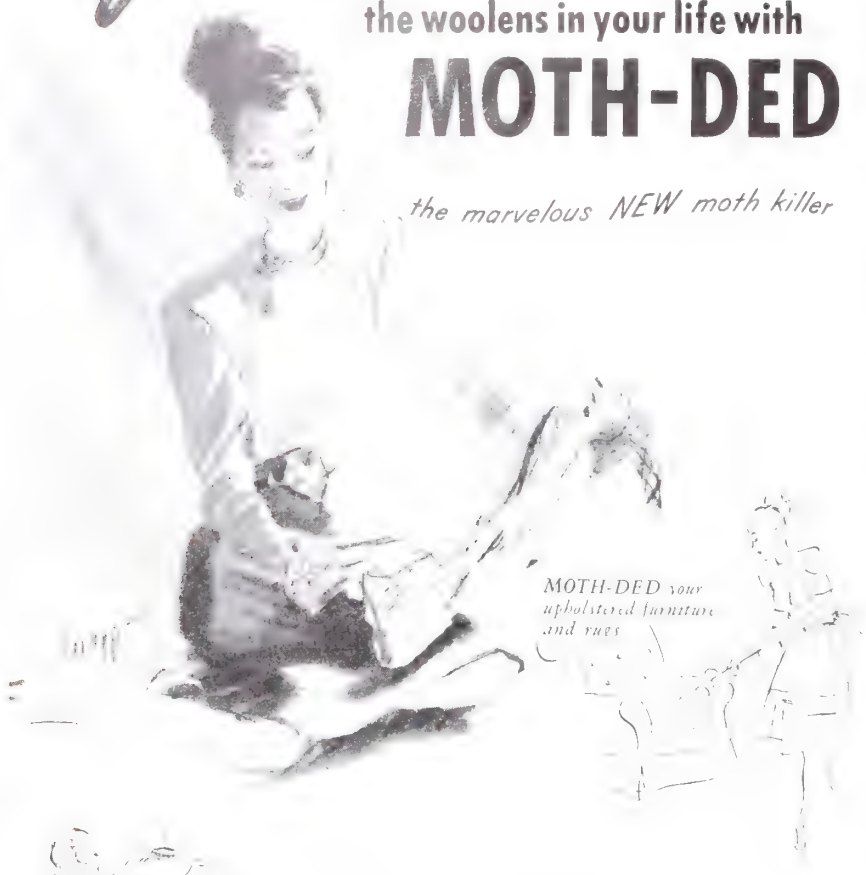
MOTH-DED

the marvelous NEW moth killer



CONTAINS 5% D.D.T.

One thorough spraying

lasts for months.

Safe! Sure! Economical!

Every drop effective

—contains no water.

Only 39¢ pint

T M Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Don't forget to spray closet walls and floors, storage chests and drawers.

HINTS FOR STORING WOOLENS:

Before storing your woolens for the summer, brush them carefully in the open air, spray seams, all cracks and crevices in your closets and chests with Moth-Ded. Then spray the garments, blankets, and put them away.

Bayle Midway Inc., American Home Products Corporation

are you going to do after Oxford, Mr. Bosworth?"

"That isn't decided yet." It couldn't be until he had first-class honors.

"Really?" Mrs. Lorrimer was amazed. "I thought young men always knew at this stage of their lives what they were aiming for."

They know, he thought. Most of them know, but only those with a private bank account talk confidently about the future.

Mrs. Lorrimer was saying, "Mr. Fenton-Stevens is thinking of the Foreign Office, I hear. A diplomat's life must be so interesting, don't you think?"

David agreed politely, but there was a strained look about his mouth.

What an odd young man, Mrs. Lorrimer decided. No ambition whatsoever, not a spark of interest in his face. She liked young men handsome and well mannered, with nice families and definite careers and high hopes. Who didn't, with three growing daughters to be launched into successful marriages?

She tried once more. "And how is Lady Fenton-Stevens?"

David turned to look at her with some surprise. "I think she is very well."

"Charming woman," Mrs. Lorrimer said, on the strength of one chance meeting some three years ago in Edinburgh. David only smiled, and Mrs. Lorrimer felt uneasy. "You are a friend of the family's, aren't you?"

"Not exactly. I'm staying at Loch Innish as a tutor. George's young brother and his cousin need some grounding, and George and I are doing some reading together, too, when we get time for that." Then, as David searched for some possible piece of conversation which would not leave them feeling this hidden antagonism, he found his release. "Hello!" he said. "There is someone coming toward the house. And in rather a hurry too." He pointed to a small thin figure scrambling over the hillside.

"That's Betty," Mrs. Lorrimer said. "I wonder where the others can be?"

"Oh, they'll be all right, Mrs. Lorrimer," David said. "George is really awfully good with children."

Mrs. Lorrimer looked strangely at the young man beside her. But she did not reply, for her attention was gathering on her daughter, now within polite calling distance.

"Don't jump like that, Betty. It's dangerous. And just look at you."

THE girl smiled cheerily. Her skirt was wet at the hem as if she had waded in the sea and had misjudged the height of a wave; there was a long red score on her leg still bleeding slightly; and her shoes were caked with the black earth of the peat bog.

"Doesn't hurt a bit," she assured her mother, looking down at the cut on her leg. "We were exploring the rocks, trying to show George the seals, and I slipped into a pool."

She surveyed David gravely, with frank curiosity. To her, a man meant someone who could run more quickly and climb more rocks than she could. But this man was smiling as he watched her. She felt he was sort of on her side. Mother was asking questions again.

Betty said wearily, conscious of her audience, "Oh, Moira and George have gone to the village to see the boat come in. I came to get grandpa's old letter."

Just wait until I can talk to you alone, my girl, Mrs Lorrimer thought angrily. "And to wash and change," she said sharply. "Where's Penelope?"

She stayed to see if the seals came. Don't worry, mummy," she went on quickly, seeing the frown on her mother's face. "She isn't climbing over the rocks. She's sitting on the shore. She can't fall off there." Betty, with her natural good humor once more regained, moved toward the house.

David felt himself abandoned once more to Mrs. Lorrimer's quiet disapproval. If only she would go away, it would be pleasant to stretch out on the grass and wait here for George to return. Or it would be pleasant to explore the island. This was a perfect day for exploring.

He said suddenly, "I say, Mrs. Lorrimer, why don't you let me go over to the shore

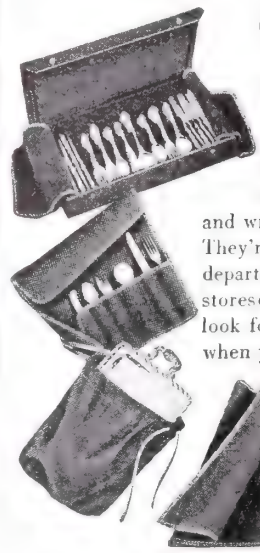
Why polish silver

IT'S AS OLD-FASHIONED AS THE HIGH-WHEEL BICY

PACIFIC Silver Cloth

ABSOLUTELY PREVENTS TARN

Gain new leisure time, and ma routine silver polishing a thing the past. Scientifically treated repel tarnish, Pacific Silver Clo keeps silver forever gleaming ready for use at a moment's notic



Guaranteed by Good Housekeep

This amazing ented Pacific Cloth may be l chests ($6 up), and rolls ($1 t and wraps (about $1 They're on sale in jew department and furn stores everywhere. Al look for the Pacific when you buy.

If you cannot find chests, bags, rolls and w made with Pacific Silver Cloth, write to u the name of your nearest dealer.

PACIFIC MILLS, DEPT. LH-4, 214 CHURCH STREET, NEW YO your daughter home? She may bout time."

'm afraid she does," Mrs. Lorrimer
I am not being silly about these y are dangerous, and the waves us."
ooked toward the western path island. "I suppose if I follow that, wrong?"
is a stretch of sand at the end of
. She is probably there. I suppose e all right, really. But I never these children are up to next. They are indestructible." Mrs. Lorri-with a certain relief. There were ings which needed her attention se, and she had wasted so much of noon already.
d her, and bring her home for tea.
ry. No trouble at all," David said nd started toward the road. Just oment he had felt Mrs. Lorrimer to change her mind.
s right about that. She felt like ter him, "On second thought, I k you need bother, Mr. Bosworth."
ad already walked away, and you very well raise your voice when to a stranger.
was thinking about the fact that he for the next hour, and that he was going to be left alone. This, he dee looked with keen pleasure around eer luxury. The air tasted of heather cken and sea.
as silence, so ence that it was sound; for here
ddle of the island,
nur of the waves
d in the sloping
.
nembered his er-
d increased his htly. If he must emaid to get this was quite willing Somehow, from ograph in Mac-study, David had he idea that Betty was the oldest l that he must keep his eyes open pigtailed creature with a passion for t perhaps, he thought hopefully, she home already, taking a short cut, ty, across the hills. That would ngs perfect.
west side of the island there were
s. The scattered trees had disapoo, and black rocks rose up like eth, standing boldly against the s breakers. As he looked, a small of the black rock moved and dived ent wave. Another piece of glistenraised itself and then lay down
He thought, There are seals after stood still; if he moved, they ke fright.
nembered, dutifully, to look for the child. She wasn't there. Instead, he girl with the auburn hair and the ue sweater. She was sitting on the motionless that the outcrop of black ide her had partly hidden her, and looking at the seals. She hadn't im.

t impulse was to leave. You don't ee her again, he told himself. She not noticed him, and wouldn't un-urned around by some accident. It choice, entirely, whether they did ce more. He did not even have to himself that he had been completely l this morning, for he knew that hen he began to walk slowly toward reached her, his heavy shoes sank harsh sand, and the sound made her head.

o," he said, hesitated, and then casually down beside her on the he smiled, but she did not speak.
the startled look which had greeted avid said, "Sorry, I'm afraid I've d off your friends." After his first ance at her face he had looked away,
and now all his interest seemed to be focused on the seals as they dived into the water.

She was silent for some moments. And then, as if she had suddenly realized that it was her turn to say something, she spoke quickly. "They are easily frightened. This is just about as near to them as we may go. And then, we have to keep very still." She hesitated, but as he seemed to be perfectly happy, she gained confidence. "They are funny, you know. They love showing off, and they will flap up on these rocks and pose for us because they simply can't help it. Then if we move, they'll dive into the sea. But a little later they'll come back onto the rocks. They'll look round, making quite sure we are still there, and start posing again."

"Disappointing for them, when they find their audience has gone home for tea. What were you trying to do, sitting so still? Tame them?"

"I don't always sit quite so still." She looked at him with her blue eyes smiling. The nervous tightness in her throat had altogether disappeared now. "You see," she admitted, "sometimes I get tired of them on the rock. Their fur gets dried all sort of brown and spotty. So I move, and they dive. And when they come back onto the rocks, they are black and glistening. Much more attractive."

He found he was laughing, partly because of the vivacity in her face, partly because she was laughing at herself. "One-woman society for the preservation of the beauty of the seal. And what else do you do here? Fascinate the waves?"

She was laughing openly now. "They do the fascinating," she admitted. And then her conversation crumpled under her, like a treacherous mountain path, and she was left stranded. The more things she tried to think of, the less she found to say.

> If the present Congress errs in too much talking, how can it be otherwise, in a body to which the people send a hundred and fifty lawyers, whose trade it is to question everything, yield nothing, and talk by the hour? That a hundred and fifty lawyers should do business together, ought not to be expected.
>
> THOMAS JEFFERSON

"What do you do?" he insisted gently. Did she just think about herself? Wasn't that what girls thought of, mostly? Even when they went out with a man, you'd see them looking in mirrored walls in a restaurant, comparing other women with themselves. But what did they think about when they could sit and watch this sea with so much real interest, when they had not even expected anyone to come and find them like this?

"Oh," she said, "this and that." She looked at him uncertainly.

Sugar and spice, David was thinking; was that what all girls were made of? Born with good bones and healthy blood, three well-chosen meals a day, no worries. But this girl - this, he realized in amazement, is what I think is beauty. He stared at her unbelievingly. This morning he had thought he was irrational. Now he knew that he had only met a strange and new experience, as overwhelming as that of a man who has been accustomed to lakes and rivers and then sees the Atlantic.

He became aware that she had been speaking. She must have asked a question, for she was now looking at him, waiting for his reply.

He said, "I'm sorry. I didn't quite ——" He halted, feeling that his frankness was an appalling blunder. But she was smiling. He recovered his sadly misplaced wits. "I was thinking about the sea," he said. "You can hardly help thinking about it, can you?"

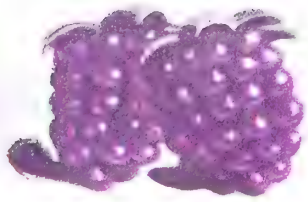
"Yes, it is sort of everywhere. At first you notice its colors and sounds, and you feel its power. Then you think of the sky, too, and how the sea and sky reflect each other, each influencing the other. They are two separate things, and yet they aren't separate. I mean"—she looked at him quickly to see if he were amused at her, but he was listening quite seriously—"I mean, a bright sky makes an angry sea less terrifying. Or a dark sky will make a calm, peaceful sea quite forbidding. So when you start thinking of all the variations they can produce on each other, then—well, that is what I really

HI, IDA! SAY, WHAT'S YOUR WASH GOT THAT MINE HASN'T?
OOOOOO- that OXYDOL SPARKLE!
OXYDOL
YES, OXYDOL WASHES SPARKLING WHITE! SPARKLING BRIGHT! SPARKLING CLEAN!
NOW THAT'S WHAT I CALL A WHITE TOWEL!
SURE, OXYDOL WASHES ALL MY LINENS THE WHITEST WHITE ANY SOAP CAN- SPARKLING WHITE!
HOW DO YOU GET BILL'S WORK SHIRTS SO CLEAN?
WHY, OXYDOL LIFTS OUT THE LAST POSSIBLE SPECK OF DIRT- GETS MY WHOLE WASH SPARKLING CLEAN!

1. TESTS PROVE OXYDOL WASHES WHITER than lazy soaps ever can! Sparkling white without bleaching!

2. FOR THE EASIEST WASHDAY POSSIBLE —use Oxydol. See how quickly clothes come sparkling clean!

Give Your Next Wash
That OXYDOL SPARKLE!



If you love fat, juicy blackberries...
the kind that just run over with flavor...
you'll revel in our EVERBEST Blackberry Jam. We remove every pesky seed beforehand so you get nothing but that wonderful berry goodness. Grand for everybody...even the baby.

EVERBEST
SEEDLESS
BLACKBERRY JAM

Wherever you see the Everbest label, you will find fruit preserves whose very names sing to your appetite . . . Spiced Peach with Cherry . . . Spiced Plum with Lemon . . . Old Fashioned Tomato Preserves... specialties that bring rare goodness to your table.

Glaser, Crandell Co.,
Dept. B-4, 2000 S. Western Avenue,
Chicago 8, Illinois

Send your free illustrated booklet of preserve recipes and dessert suggestions.

Name .....
Address .....
City ..... Zone ..... State .....

meant when I said that the sea did the fascinating."

He was still looking at her. "Yes," he said, "fascinating. Just as its power is terrifying. Sailors love and hate it, you know."

"Yet they keep going back to it."

"I expect they find they start to worry too much when they live on land. The sea is so dominant that we can't help remembering how small all our problems and worries are." He grinned. "Perhaps that is why some people, including me, never feel quite comfortable when we look at the sea. It takes away our sense of importance."

She laughed. "Or perhaps they are poor sailors." It was as if she had said, "I don't believe you have a sense of importance," and he felt ridiculously pleased.

Then remembering worries and problems and people who did not like the sea, he thought of Mrs. Lorrimer. He said, "I was sent over here to collect a child. I quite forgot." He rose hastily to his feet.

He looked down at the girl, and saw by the look on her face that he had indeed blundered. There was amusement—well, he deserved that—and there was also a hint of disappointment. He could have understood annoyance. But why disappointment? He started making appropriate excuses: he hadn't caught her name this morning—awfully bad at names; the photograph in the study—Betty's likeness to the oldest girl in it, so that he had assumed the others were still children. But he ended them by feeling he had only made matters worse.

He rubbed the back of his head and looked at her ruefully. "Too many 'I thoughts' in all this, if you ask me," he said.

She was smiling now, and then she laughed. "If you were sent over here to fetch me, then we are both in disgrace. The boat must have arrived ages ago and tea is probably over."

"Shocking," he admitted. "But then, I never did do the right thing. I'm glad I didn't today."

She didn't seem to hear that last sentence. He was relieved in a way, because he was embarrassed now that he had said it.

But Penelope Lorrimer had heard the sentence all right. And she was feeling happier once more, yet not so happy as she had been. For she had thought, when he had appeared on the shore so suddenly behind her, that he had come especially to see her, that having heard she was there alone, he had walked across the island to meet her. Instead he had come to look for a stray child. He hadn't even known her name.

If I were a man, she thought, and if I, as a man, had felt anything the way I felt in the McDonald cottage this morning, then I would have walked across three islands to meet the girl again. She wondered if he said "How d'you do" like that to every girl. Surely he couldn't, simply couldn't, go about staring at people when he first met them as if his whole life had stopped for a moment. And first she had stared back at him, and then she had felt as helpless as if she had been drowning, and then she had panicked, and rushed out of the cottage. An idiot, imagining—when the first wild surge of feeling had subsided—that he had known that strange emotion too. She felt a warm flush spread over her cheeks.

Her color deepened still more as s him laugh. He was saying that now t even: she hadn't been listening, this his question was left floating in the

"It wasn't worth answering, a he said. "Questions and answers a way of learning about people." He
I am always saying more than I shou
He searched for his pipe and tobac

Even that was difficult. The flickered and died in the strong s breeze. And then she suddenly cu hands around the pipe to form a wi
He looked up from the flaring loos of tobacco in surprise. She had be pletely natural in her action; she wa ing the tobacco as critically as he might have done.

"That's it, I think," she said. "M father is always having the same trouble with damp matches." She l at him and smiled.

There is an essential kindness in ... thought, and was amazed. For s quite well,
guessed, that started smo pipe only her smile t that without him. She had her hands as the tobacco
but her ey still held by

She turne and said q
"We really o hurry. We ar fully late."

"Yes," he

They starte
ing toward the
but their pa
just as slow a been before.
talked of little personal taste and dislikes amused them bored them. Al mixture of tal people and f
pictures and p novels. Little but they w somehow vit portant to them.

They came to the path tha
the house on
It was only wh
saw the group ing at the d
that they r how late the

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Spring—1947

By Anobel Armour

Now has come back the young and gentle spring
By whose green benison tired hearts are blessed.
Here is the leafing out, the stippled wing
Lifted again. Earth is not dispossessed
Of sunshine aureoles, nor of slanting rain,
Which probes with slender fingers through the ground
To free the small and tender blades of grain,
Nor of interplay of silence and of sound.
Again there has come the warm and singing wind,
Stirring new grasses and invoking leaves
To utterance. While minds are disciplined
To plan new vistas, here the soul receives
The old reminder in epitome
Of all that man and earth can do and be!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

be. For Captain MacLean was there.
remembered with sudden guilt tha were tide and current to be consider

Betty came running toward them."
late, awfully late. What went wrong?
mother's simply furious. You misse

David noticed Penny's suddenly face. "I'm sorry about this," he sai me deal with it. Is your mother real ried, do you think? Why on earth?'

"We have pretty strict rules," she a low voice. She thought miserably, will think that I am a schoolgirl. She at him unhappily; a man at a uni always seemed so old, so very sure self. She forced a smile as they reac group at the door of the cottage and her mother, "Sorry we were late."

"My fault entirely," David said, co of Fenton-Stevens' amused eye. "I believe that seals would appear.
waited until they did."

"They actually did?" George wa ested. "You saw them? Blast, I wis stayed too. How many?"

"A regular squad of them. Comple
sergeant major and waxed mustache.

Penny laughed, and the others smi except Mrs. Lorrimer.

(Continued on Page 87)

Can you spot the stumbling block?

an't quite get the hang of this ele-
I.Q. test. His rating won't be up ge. But before you put him down
—let's inquire into Johnny's diet.

ne same inquiry made into the eating most American children, the results heartening. But there are still too e Johnny, who go to school with a everage and a bun in their stomachs.
se — go without any breakfast at all.

that got to do with their I.Q.? The say — plenty. Pioneer tests in the v that ability to learn is affected by youngsters eat. For healthy minds, s strong bodies, tomorrow's citizens better meals.

Fortunately, more and more parents are learning how to provide them. Let's hope that soon the A, B, C's of good nutrition are something every parent will know.

We at National Dairy know a lot about food, for we supply many different kinds of it. Especially nature's most nearly perfect food — milk. We've gathered together many of the country's top specialists — and pooled their skills — to study milk's properties, its processing, its ever-increasing possibilities as a chemical resource.

This research has helped the whole field of nutrition. But the food needs of a nation like ours don't stand still. We expect to contribute even more to America's future health.

Dedicated to the wider use and better understanding of dairy products as human food . . . as a base for the development of new products and materials . . . as a source of health and enduring progress on the farms and in the towns and cities of America.

NATIONAL DAIRY
PRODUCTS CORPORATION
AND AFFILIATED COMPANIES

"Mixing Corner Kitchen" . . . with all the "tools" for easy baking concentrated in one central spot. But even more important . . . this latest "New Freedom Gas Kitchen" makes short work of four big kitchen jobs! 1. Food storage is the most convenient ever . . . with a new-silent Gas refrigerator that actually has enough room for a week's groceries plus 60 packages of frozen foods. 2. Cleaning is a cinch . . . thanks to a special ventilating system that catches greasy cooking vapors and unwanted cooking odors at source. 3. Dishwashing's almost fun . . . now that a new automatic Gas water-heater supplies plenty of hot water for a do-everything dishwasher. 4. As for cooking . . . read about a few of the wonders in a new automatic Gas range built to "CP" standards. Order one for the first step toward your own "New Freedom Gas Kitchen"—

Never before such a kitchen for cooking!

Here at last is an beautiful ultra-modern new Gas range that gives you new [illegible] in cooking result with no old-time cooking cares.

No [illegible] — complete oven [illegible] cooked automatically by Simplex Cook Control. Set [illegible] on and off . . . go anywhere you're invited from home!

No [illegible] automatic thermostat sets and keeps any oven temperature from 250° to 550°.

No "hot-cabinet" cakes — oven is ventilated so moist heat circulates evenly, on every level.

No [illegible] broiler really broils . . . [illegible] rich red meat flavor.

No [illegible] — cooker top of stove cooks [illegible] and you turn it off.

No [illegible] — top burners go speedily [illegible] to high heat.

No messy cleaning — burners won't clog from boilovers. Pan bottoms stay brighter.

And remember! The one sure way to get all these advantages of modern Gas cookery . . . is to look for this "CP" seal on any "make" Gas range before you buy!

P. S. For a complete guide to kitchen planning — send 10¢ in coin or stamps for [illegible] color booklet "New Freedom Gas Kitchens" AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION, 420 Lexington Ave., New York 17, N

GAS

The Wonder Flame th
Cools as well as Hea

Copyright 1947, American Gas Association

(Continued from Page 84)

ctor MacIntyre said, "I'm ave time to see the Atlantic
. And come again. Delighted all might have a picnic toy." He smiled cheerfully to a friendly hand to the two d retired into the house with which David thought add be grand," George said to

. "We shall have another free
s time. David is a slave driver noses to the grindstone."
e leaving at the end of the at's next week," Betty said.
haps we could arrange an an that," Fenton-Stevens said.
vid will let us ease up for ann, seeing that you are going day would suit you, Mrs.

George do all the arrangement.
that kind of thing anyway.
inking how idiotic all this dis-Conversation was not meant for ersation was meant for two.
y, then the time, then the did it all matter? He and not be allowed one moment to-now, the family's influence was eck the current of intimacy owed so easily between them hour ago.
h relief that he heard MacLean must leave.
by was as disappointing as he
Their hands touched briefly.
ouldn't meet his. George, he some bitterness, was given a shake and a generous smile.
Donald waved her white apron or of her cottage as they sailed
e sound and veered north for Inchnamurren became a lonely onely sea.
as watching him curiously. "I decent time," he said. "Hadn't avid said. "Doctor MacIntyre od value." He left his thoughts d began talking about her grand-he kept the conversation deter-Doctor MacIntyre throughout ne journey to the Lodge at Loch

In Doctor MacIntyre's study, Mrs. Lorrimer was finishing her monologue. "And the first thing that frightens away a young man is a girl who sets her cap at him," she concluded.

Penny turned away from the window as the small sailing boat disappeared behind the Devil's Elbow, ignored Moira's superior grin, and said angrily, "I wasn't, mother. We were walking and talking."

"You missed tea, and that was rudeness to both your grandfather and to Mr. Fenton-Stevens. What made you forget the time, anyway? You aren't a child."

Doctor MacIntyre rustled his newspaper impatiently. Time to change the subject, he thought. He said, "Depression in America, depression here, and the same trouble in Europe. It looks bad."

"Let's see, grandpa." Moira leaned over his shoulder to read the news. Moira had gone political since she had become a history student at Edinburgh University.

"Here, take it." He handed the paper to her. "Now go away and read it someplace else. I am going to talk to your mother."

Moira looked surprised, but obeyed.

"You, too, Penny. Go out and have a walk. Another one."

This time it was his daughter who looked surprised.

"And, Moira," he added as the two girls reached the door, "bring that paper back in half an hour, properly folded, with the pages in the right order." He rose and searched for his pipe. "Bad enough to be disturbed in the middle of an editorial without having the paper made altogether unreadable."

"Then why did you give it to her, father?" Mary asked. "You spoil the children, you know." Although, she thought worriedly, he really had been very cross in the last half hour. He had never been sharp with Moira like that before.

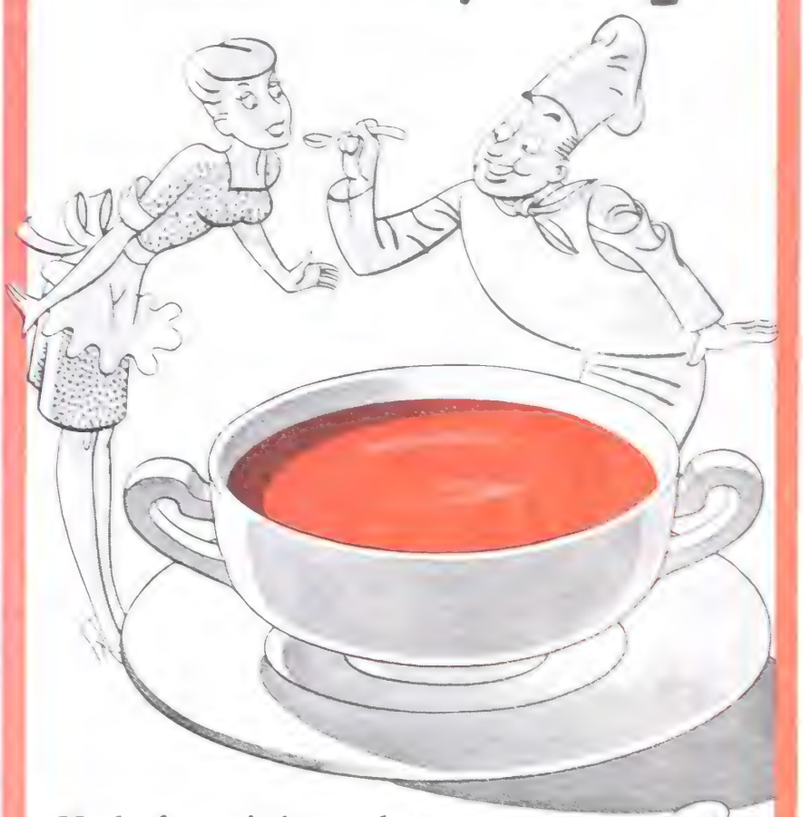
"I wanted to have a talk with you, Mary."

Mrs. Lorrimer's surprise gave way to a vague uneasiness. She had not heard this tone of voice for twenty years. "Yes?" She tried to show by the inflection that she was a married woman with children of her own.

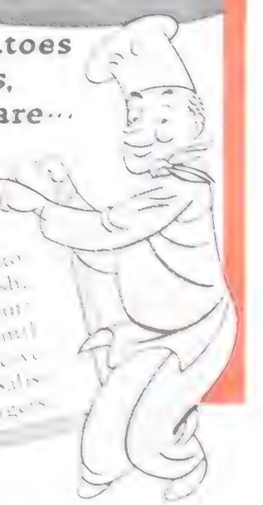
Doctor MacIntyre paused, and then filled his pipe thoughtfully. "I think you worry too much about the children, Mary. You have never allowed yourself to be separated from them, have you? Why don't you go alone with Charles to North Berwick in

"It's not that I overstate the price, I just think it's so important for him socially."

Taste the real tomato flavor in this lusty soup



Made from juicy, red-ripe tomatoes ...thick cream...fragrant spices, all combined with homelike care...
Heinz Skill



Recipe
Just wait till you taste meat loaf topped with this sauce!
Combine 11 oz. tin Heinz Cream of Tomato Soup (undiluted), ½ cup Heinz India Relish, ¼ cup finely chopped onion, 1 Tbs. Heinz Worcestershire Sauce. 1 Tbs. flour. Cook until thoroughly heated. Serve hot over meat loaf. Also fine for hamburgers.

Heinz

By adding one tin of milk or water to one tin of soup you double the quantity of this delicious soup Condensed

Cream of Tomato Soup

Thanks to glass—you see exactly what you're getting!

What 5 facts about this fruit does 1 glance tell you?

US: Check! One.

US: Two! And if it were vegetables, you'd see if they were diced, sliced, or whole.

US: Three!

US: Right! They're facts 4—and 5! Glass certainly lets you see what you're buying.

Owens-Illinois Glass Company, Toledo 1, Ohio

Ask your grocer for fruits in thrifty Duraglas Jars!

August? The girls can stay here for another month. It would do you all a world of good."

"I don't see how it would."

"If I must be frank, Mary, then I shall say that the children are getting on your nerves, and soon you will get on theirs. That is the quickest way to lose their affection, you know."

"Father, I think you are talking nonsense. What nerves? Why should they lose affection for me? I have been a good mother, haven't I?"

"Excellent. An excellent wife, too," he said soothingly. "But, Mary, the girls are getting big enough to stand on their own feet. You can sit back and enjoy yourself."

"Not yet," Mary said quickly.

"Certainly with Moira and Penelope. I agree Betty needs you for another five or six years."

"And then there's no more need for me? Father, you don't know how cruel you sound." Mary Lorrimer was indeed hurt.

"I am not cruel," Doctor MacIntyre said angrily. "And remember, I know quite a lot about the upbringing of girls." And you were not such a bad specimen either, he thought, when you were twenty. What has changed you? The people you chose for your friends, or your husband? "You see," he went on sadly, "the most a father and mother can do is to give their children a good beginning—health, character, moral sense. But you cannot go on controlling their development. They will meet other people who will influence them. They will change, certainly. But as long as they stick to the foundation you've given them, they won't go essentially wrong."

> I shall give you a few precepts to repeat whenever you are in need of comfort. They are simple and effective. Here they are: Anything can happen. . . . Everything is forgotten. . . . Every difficulty can be overcome. . . . No one understands anything. . . . Above all things, never be afraid.
>
> —M. GABRIEL HANOTAUX:
> Quoted in The Art of Living André Maurois.
> (Harper & Bros.)

"But they have such unsettled ideas. Moira with her talk of going to Geneva when she gets her degree. Penelope with her ideas centered on London and this Slade School. Why can't she be content with the School of Art at home? They will only suffer, both of them, looking for what they want. They could marry suitable men who would give them security and a decent position in life."

"Perhaps they don't want your suitable young men. Perhaps they want to decide for themselves. Let them make their own mistakes, Mary. They are old enough to pay for them."

"You didn't let me make any mistakes."

He looked at her. Indeed I did, he was thinking. I let you marry Charles, and look at the possessive snob you have become. But that is nothing I can control. That is your responsibility; you chose Charles.

He said quietly, "Well, if you feel you have made no mistakes, you must be a completely happy woman indeed."

Mary looked at him sharply. Then she looked down at her smooth, well-manicured hands lying folded in her lap. She picked a small white thread off her brown skirt—the material was excellent, she thought—folded her hands again and studied the toes of her long, narrow shoes. Even the way she sat annoyed Doctor MacIntyre at this moment.

With an effort, he said gently, "Don't you trust the girls? If you don't trust them, then you must feel you have failed in bringing them up."

"Of course I trust them."

"Then stop worrying, Mary. If they want your advice and help, they will come to you. Look at us, at this very moment. I am giving you advice which you did not ask for, so you don't like it and probably won't listen to it. You see, I've proved my point even if it is against myself." He smiled. The point was well proved.

But Mary didn't smile. She rose to her feet. "I must see about supper. We are having one of your old favorites tonight, father. I must go and find out if Maggie has remembered to put in enough seasoning."

Doctor MacIntyre stared at the door which she closed firmly behind her. His point had not been so well pro it seemed. In that moment o he decided it was a pity that M old for the hairbrush treatment

It was Penelope who broug newspaper, neatly folded. Sh him with a smile, and then round the room, looking at straightening a pile of music, the flowers in their vase on his

Doctor MacIntyre looked a laid it aside, and said in a res "Well, what is it, Penny?"

"Oh—nothing." She gave hi getic smile. "I'm sorry. I was ju

"Were you?" Then he relent "Don't go unless you want to. sit over here. Only stop fiddlin that way."

She was his favorite grandd though he did his best to hide Moira was clever, Penny had the of real intelligence. And she had mination, too, and he never had his jokes to her.

She suddenly came forward his ear. She must be really u something. A display of affecti in the Lorrimer tradition. She s the hearthrug; together side hand rested on the other hand flat on the floor supported the her body. She ful creature, he

"I want you admitted. "I w persuade moth go to London ne

"To the Slad

"Yes. I am playing with t did work hard a ter in these art my work has At least, I think so. Hasn't it?"

"Yes." Surprisingly so. Pen definite talent. She might be a pai day, given really good training work. And experience in life. As her pretty face now, he hoped would deal kindly with her.

"I thought last winter that, if hard enough, father and mother I was in earnest. But mother seen that painting is only some kind accomplishment, and father just d painters. 'Bohemian' is what he ca

"I didn't know people still word," her grandfather said with and checked her rising indignati father reminds me of George the hated all 'boets and bainters.'"

"Well," Penny said, "he hat them in his family. You see, eith comfortably at home until I get m I should choose a career that ca me instead of a husband."

"It is either-or, I suppose?"

"That is how father seems to s mother thinks it a waste of time for any career, because women ha it up when they get married. But that painting—well, that's one t I ——" She hesitated.

"That you could go on with, e you marry?" her grandfather sugg

"That is what I thought. Only fa painting is not a wise investmen future. That is, in case I don't ma

"Well, in that he is being very It is like all the arts—a good walk but a bad crutch."

"But if I don't mind risking Why can't I at least try?"

Why not? her grandfather wond she were serious and willing to w not? "What do you intend to do, finish at the Slade School?" he ask

"If I am good enough, I may wi eling fellowship. That would take m for two years."

"Well, you do know what yo don't you?"

(Continued on Page 90)

Flavor Ripened

Cured a [illegible] in [illegible] cheddar [illegible] the creamery to the [illegible] Swift's cheese makers and blended with [illegible] Swift's Brookfield American . . . and there [illegible] uniformly delicious. One of the wide variety of delicious Swift's Brookfield Cheese [illegible]

A Cheese Feast Dessert planned by Martha Logan

dessert . . . cheese, fruit . . . and hot [illegible]

Ringtum Diddy . . . cheese delight by Martha Logan

[illegible]

When buying butter, eggs and cheese — be sure to say Swift's Brookfield, please!

SWIFT'S BROOKFIELD American

SWIFT'S BROOKFIELD American PASTEURIZED CHEESE FOOD

American SWIFT'S BROOKFIELD

wift's Brookfield

BUTTER EGGS CHEESE

"You made a slam all right... at me!"
I DON'T LIKE THAT CRACK! WHAT DO YOU MEAN MY KITCHEN DRAIN IS DIRTY AS A SEWER?
BUT, MARTHA, IT'S NOT JUST YOUR DRAIN...EVERYONE'S SINK BREEDS UNHEALTHY SEWER GERMS,* 2 INCHES FROM WHERE YOU WASH YOUR FOOD!
(*SURVEY MOLNAR LABORATORIES)
BUT I SCRUB MINE EVERY DAY!
THAT'S NOT ENOUGH TO DRIVE AWAY FILTHY SEWER GERMS ...IT TAKES Drāno!
Drāno MAKES YOUR SINK SAFE AND SANITARY ...FOR Drāno BOILS OUT SEWER GERMS FAST! BETTER USE Drāno REGULARLY! I DO!
AND Drāno OPENS CLOGGED DRAINS, TOO!
Never over 25¢ at grocery, drug, and hardware stores.
Drāno
T. M. Reg. Pat. Off. by The Drackett Co.
Drāno
DRAINS CLOGGED DRAINS
Drāno MAKES SEPTIC TANKS WORK BETTER—CUTS DOWN ODORS.
Copyright 1947, by The Drackett Company

(Continued from Page 88)

She sensed his approval, for she began to speak quickly and enthusiastically. She had submitted some test drawings to the Slade School and had passed the entrance qualifications. She had even made calculations about the cost of living in London, and did not think it would be too expensive.

"Does that matter? Surely your father has money enough."

"I don't know if he has. He is always worrying about bills and 'needless expense.' That was what he and mother said at Easter, when I had that chance to go to Paris with some friends. They were thoroughly respectable ones too."

There was an edge of bitterness in her voice which worried her grandfather. He did not believe in making things too easy for the young, but there was a decent mean between that and making things unnecessarily difficult. One spoiled them, but the other crushed them.

"Or perhaps they did not want you to go abroad without the family. Oh, nonsense, anyway! Your father has quite enough money to let you go to Slade without giving you a sense of guilt."

He ceased abruptly. Penny was now looking unhappy. She was a loyal creature. And that was part of her present difficulty. She wasn't the kind of girl who would say, "Well, I'll show you!" and pack her bags and clear out to live her own life. Not, of course, until she was driven to it.

"Sorry, Penny," he said gently. "Your father is a wise man in his own way. I am sure that he will agree to let you go to London, if he can be persuaded that you really are serious about your work."

"Then you will back me up?"

"Yes." He came forward and held out his hand to help her to her feet, and they walked arm in arm over to the window.

Doctor MacIntyre was thinking about his promise. I'll see that she gets to London, to any place where she can have a chance to be free. If she stays with her family, she will be filled with inhibitions, blackmailed by security. She will be cribbed, cabined and confined into a nice pattern of what the well-brought-up girl should be. Charles Lorrimer has molded Mary. He is not going to repeat that pattern with Penelope if I can help it.

"You will find London hard, you know," he said. "You will be less comfortable than you are at home. And you may be lonely at first."

"I KNOW." She hugged his arm. "But there are other things too. If I don't make a fight for them now, then I'll never get them. Later on, I'd be too old to fight."

"I imagine you have still quite a way to go before you reach that stage. But it is just as well to make up your own mind early in life. Now remember, my girl, if you go to London and have this freedom you are crying for, don't confuse freedom with foolishness. You won't, will you?"

Penny shook her head solemnly. And then she smiled, with so much humor in her expressive face that he smiled too.

"Well," he said, "that's that!" and settled into his armchair. Yes, his pipe was on the ash tray, and his paper was lying neatly folded on the small table.

"Thank you. You are a darling," Penny said. But she still did not leave. Doctor MacIntyre looked pointedly at his abandoned newspaper. "Did you have a nice afternoon?" Penny went on. She sat down once more.

What's coming now? he wondered. "Very pleasant, thank you."

"I'm afraid your work was badly interrupted today."

Her grandfather repressed a smile and answered casually, "Oh, I did not mind. I rather enjoyed it. Bosworth is interesting. What we call 'good material.'"

"Then you did like him?"

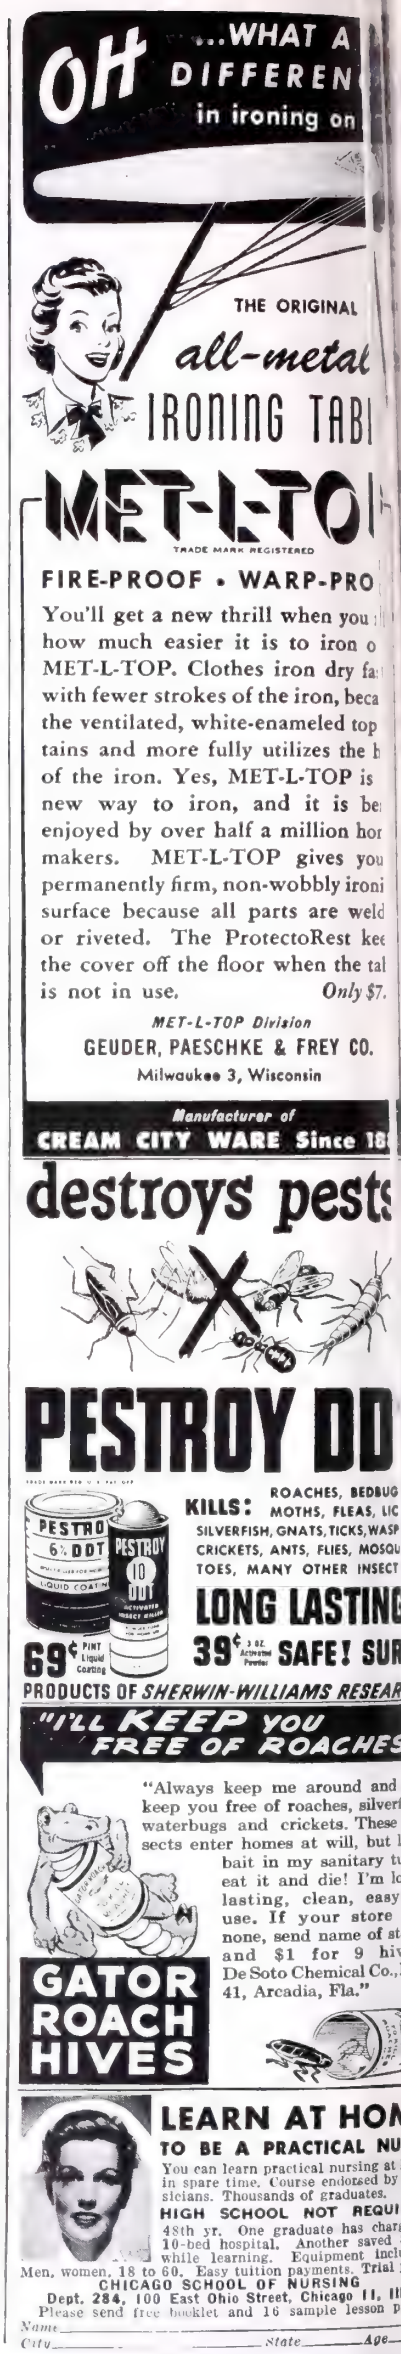
Doctor MacIntyre hid his surprise, and pretended to be looking for his tobacco tin. The long sunset was beginning, and the warm light from the western window filled the room. It was the best moment of the day. He smiled gently and closed his eyes.



OH ...WHAT A DIFFEREN in ironing on
THE ORIGINAL all-metal IRONING TABL MET-L-TOP
TRADE MARK REGISTERED
FIRE-PROOF • WARP-PRO
You'll get a new thrill when you how much easier it is to iron o MET-L-TOP. Clothes iron dry fa with fewer strokes of the iron, beca the ventilated, white-enameled top tains and more fully utilizes the h of the iron. Yes, MET-L-TOP is new way to iron, and it is be enjoyed by over half a million hor makers. MET-L-TOP gives you permanently firm, non-wobbly ironi surface because all parts are weld or riveted. The ProtectoRest kee the cover off the floor when the tal is not in use. Only $7.
MET-L-TOP Division
GEUDER, PAESCHKE & FREY CO.
Milwaukee 3, Wisconsin
Manufacturer of CREAM CITY WARE Since 18
destroys pests
PESTROY DD
PESTRO 6% DDT LIQUID COATING
PESTROY 10 DDT ACTIVATED INSECT KILLER
KILLS: ROACHES, BEDBUG MOTHS, FLEAS, LIC SILVERFISH, GNATS, TICKS, WASP CRICKETS, ANTS, FLIES, MOSQU TOES, MANY OTHER INSECT LONG LASTING
69¢ PINT Liquid Coating
39¢ 1 OZ. Activated Powder
SAFE! SUR
PRODUCTS OF SHERWIN-WILLIAMS RESEAR
"I'LL KEEP YOU FREE OF ROACHES
"Always keep me around and keep you free of roaches, silverfi waterbugs and crickets. These sects enter homes at will, but lo bait in my sanitary tu eat it and die! I'm lon lasting, clean, easy use. If your store h none, send name of sto and $1 for 9 hiv De Soto Chemical Co., B 41, Arcadia, Fla."
GATOR ROACH HIVES
LEARN AT HOM
TO BE A PRACTICAL NUR
You can learn practical nursing at h in spare time. Course endorsed by sicians. Thousands of graduates.
HIGH SCHOOL NOT REQUIR
48th yr. One graduate has charg 10-bed hospital. Another saved $ while learning. Equipment inclu Men, women, 18 to 60. Easy tuition payments. Trial p
CHICAGO SCHOOL OF NURSING
Dept. 284, 100 East Ohio Street, Chicago 11, Ill.
Please send free booklet and 16 sample lesson pa
Name
City State Age

said anxiously, "Or didn't you like sed himself. "Like whom? Young

? Of course I liked him. Would I t two hours with him if I hadn't?"
hed his legs comfortably as the door hind Penny.

odge at Loch Innish was a pugna-d of place. You felt it could face any orsemen, raiding clans, winter or the yearly invasion of its grouse
When the mists hung over the loch, out the sharp mountains falling oward its dark waters, this feeling ful loneliness increased. And if you k to do, the days of mist were wel-
For there was no temptation to go or fishing or swimming, or to have f tennis, or to lie among the heather e air was warm and sweet. On days determination could remain intact, vid had come to enjoy them for that conscience, reminding him relent-passing days and wasted hours, was satisfactorily silenced.

y was a day of mist, but David found eat irritation that he was thoroughly ed and unsettled. Here he was,
g at the window again, looking out at f-formed shapes and ghostly outlines orld which had disappeared and deon human memory for its existence.
afternoon, even books hadn't helped
He had pulled out A Portrait of the
as a Young Man, and opened it at ran-Pride and hope and desire like crushed
n his heart sent up vapours of mad-incense before the eyes of his mind."
grimaced and turned over to another mpatiently. Ah, here was what he was g for. "Now I call that friendly, don't Yes, I liked her today. A little or Don't know. I liked her. . . . All the ll that I thought I thought and all felt I felt, all the rest before now, in
. . Oh, give it up, old chap! Sleep it es, David thought savagely, sleep it off.
osed the book. Only those who had et themselves be possessed by thoughts elings, only those could sleep it off. He d over at George, who was reading by
e. George, now, could sleep off any-
David came back to his armchair, up Aristotle's Politics, tried to force tention on tyrants and their ways of spreading tyranny, and then suddenly rose once more and walked to the window.

"I say, David, could you stop wandering around? I can't concentrate," George said.

"Sorry."

Something in David's voice made Fenton-Stevens drop his book and rise. He crossed over to the window. "David, what's eating you? Nothing much to see out there."

"No." Expression came back into David's face. He half smiled as he looked at the worried George.

"I hope this place isn't getting on your nerves. Come over to the fire. I don't feel like working much, either. It is difficult today, when we had all the arrangements made for that picnic on Inchnamurren. And the Lorrimers leave tomorrow, so it's off altogether." He paused, leaned his head back against the high armchair, and stretched his legs toward the flames. "You weren't really serious last night when you said you weren't going?"

"I don't suppose I was," David answered slowly, remembering his disappointment when he had wakened to see the mist. Yet, yesterday he had been quite decided that he was not going to Inchnamurren.

"I lay awake last night thinking up a reasonable excuse to use about you," George admitted. "I was glad this morning when I saw it was a filthy day, for I couldn't think of anything that would sound adequate." He laughed. "Probably would have been an awful bore, anyway. Flies in the tea, and midges down the back of your neck. Never did enjoy a picnic."

David said nothing. He was wondering if Penelope Lorrimer felt any of this strange disappointment which had angered him all day. Then he reminded himself once more that she had probably forgotten all about him by this time. Girls, if you could believe what you read, did not brood over what might be or what might not. Perhaps they did not know what they wanted out of life when they were young. And that was a pity, because then they had poetry in their life; they had intensity and emotion. Later, they lost that warmth, with the poetry in them well under control. Which was more than a pity.

"Penny for them," George said; and then as David looked startled and did not reply, he repeated, "I said, a penny for your thoughts."

JENNIFER

"All right—maybe it's cute from a grownup's point of view, but there aren't any grownups in school!"

Here's How to MAKE CLOTHES DAZZLING WHITE!

IT'S THE AMAZING NEW WAY TO WASH and BLUE at the same time!

BLU-WHITE MAKES MY CURTAINS LOOK LIKE NEW BECAUSE IT'S A COMBINATION OF SPECIAL BLUING AND PURE, MILD SOAP FLAKES!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Tune in "ROSE OF MY DREAMS" and "EVELYN WINTERS"... Two shows, Coast to Coast, Mon. thru Fri. See your paper for times and stations.

SAVES TIME IN TUB AND MACHINE!

Time to wash your curtains and blankets? Get Blu-White! For this NEW, revolutionary product does what soap alone cannot do. It washes and blues at the same time—gives you mounds of cleansing white suds with beautiful blue water. There's no extra bluing rinse! In tub and machine, Blu-White works wonderfully alone—or with regular soap—into full, rich suds.

WONDERFUL FOR "WASHBOWL" WASHES

Blu-White is all you need to wash lingerie and stockings dainty, pretty as new. Yet Blu-White is safe for everything you wash, even nylons and washable colors. It never over-blues! Try it!

Get BLU-WHITE Today

BE WISE—BUY PLENTY WHILE YOU CAN!

Libby's PEAK FLAVOR Pineapple

PINEAPPLE-HUNGRY GUESTS will be thrilled by this beautiful and luscious dessert of baked meringues and Libby's glorious slices, served with a sauce of crushed strawberries.
And right now you don't have to "treasure" one precious can of Libby's Pineapple in order to have a party treat. If you stock up now you can serve this peak flavor Hawaiian pineapple regularly!
Yes, Libby's is back! But if you're wise you'll "get it while the getting's good," because there's no telling how quickly pineapple-hungry folks will snap up Libby's famous pack now in food stores.
So buy now and be sure of getting the pineapple that's picked only at peak-flavor goodness. Lay in a good supply of Libby's sparkling Pineapple Juice, too. It's sweetened only by Hawaii's magic sun.
LIBBY, McNEILL & LIBBY
Chicago 9, Ill.
LISTEN TO "MY TRUE STORY" Thrilling dramas from real life. Every morning Mon. thru Fri. 10:00 EST, 9:00 CST, 11:30 MST, 11:30 PST. ABC stations.
Libby's
HAWAIIAN SLICED PINEAPPLE
Libby's
PINEAPPLE JUICE
IN ALL FRUITS
LOOK TO Libby's
FOR PERFECTION
Libby's FRUIT COCKTAIL
Libby's PEACHES
Libby's PEARS
Libby's APRICOTS

David drew a deep breath. "I was thinking about a topic which men never discuss or even mention," he said.

George looked startled. "Just what could that be?"

"Women."

George grinned widely. This was the old David back again, true to form.

"I was thinking," David continued, "about your brother and his agonies with girls. He hasn't learned to hide them yet. You and I have. Chris feels uncertain with every girl he meets; we are now at the stage of feeling it with only a few. But we are still afraid of being laughed at. Because, I suppose, we feel we are choosing in our emotions, and we have been told often enough that that is wrong. Yet, frankly, I don't see how else we can choose: meeting a girl you like is an emotional experience, isn't it? At a time when we have enough hot blood to enjoy life fully, we are surrounded by a conspiracy of age to settle the rules and regulations as if love were a game or a business. It isn't. It's a state of being. With it, you're alive. Without it, you exist."

"Here!" George said in alarm. He had never heard David talk this way before. "I say, David, you aren't still worrying about Eleanor, are you? As her brother, I can frankly say that she isn't worth much worry."

"Eleanor? No!" David was vehement enough to be believed this time. It was true. Eleanor had now become a period piece. Last night he had even torn up the verses which he had written to celebrate his disillusionment and unhappiness over that affair. Tripe garnished with the brains of calf love. He had torn the poems into fragments, thinking with a good deal of relief and some amazement that he was cured of Eleanor. It had been a lucky escape for him when she had decided there was more fun in the world than one man could offer. Eleanor, that little nitwit? "No," he repeated.

"Oh, she isn't a bad scout, really," George said, "But she wouldn't have done at all. You were too serious about it."

"That's the trouble." David wasn't thinking of Eleanor Fenton-Stevens now. "When do you know whether you should be serious or not serious about a girl? You don't, in fact. Either you have to pass her by altogether, or take the chance."

"Well, don't take being serious about a girl too seriously," George suggested. "After all, a man knows he can't marry until his career is well established. But there's no ban on following your fancy when you are still at the unmarriageable stage. In fact, you're a fool if you don't."

"Thanks," David said dryly, "but I've no taste for camp followers."

"I wasn't talking about camp followers," George said placidly.

"It is only a difference of degree, not of kind. For what else are women who serve round the same smiles and kisses to several men? They have got a price, too, you know, in theater tickets and flowers and chocolates and dinners you buy them. You and five other chaps."

"Look, David, you can't expect a pretty girl to sit at home and not go out. If she is pretty and amusing, you are lucky to be allowed to form up in the queue."

"The true richness of experience."

"Don't be so sarcastic," George said irritably. "Besides, you know that you like a pretty girl as much as the next man."

David laughed. "My trouble is that I know what I want. It isn't just beauty, alone, although it is rather nice to have around the house. If I don't make excuses for liking Mozart and Beethoven, why should I make excuses for liking beauty in women?"

George searched in his pockets for his pipe, and filled it thoughtfully. "Well," he said with resignation, "you can't find everything in one woman. It takes all kinds to make experience. If you have several girls, or a succession of girls, you'll end your life by ... had everything. What more do you w...

"Nothing. Except I don't think t... the way to get everything." David l... at him speculatively. "Really, George... have got to admit that if people put as... thought and concentration into their... life as they do into their jobs, there wou... a good deal more of real happiness in m... age. If men and women, when they... young, were clever enough to take lov... riously instead of avoiding it, or maki... into some kind of mystery or joke, ... might have a better chance of making... success. After all, why not put some ef... and thought into it? We aren't a bun... eunuchs, and we may as well admit that..."

The average girl would rather have beauty than brains, because she knows that the average man can see much better than he can think.

George laughed suddenly. "Hardly ... you can't rationalize, David. A job ... career can be planned. But love isn't ... that."

"No job or career is certain of success ... work and hope and aim for something, ... often we get it. But we wouldn't if we ha... aimed for it. For instance, if a man w... hard at medical school, he will probabl... a doctor someday; but no man becom... doctor by just wishing to be one. That's ... point I am making. All I am saying is th... we looked at love that way, we might ... a better chance."

"Well, what you were saying might ... true, if it could be worked out. But I d... think it can be. Because it all depends o... man finding the right girl."

"It depends on both of them," David s...

"I see old MacIntyre's words are tak... root."

"What do you mean?"

"All that stuff he t... you about being happ... one lives a complete l... That is what you ... thinking about, isn't ... A week ago, you sat ... that chair and told ... that if a man was seri... about his career, he had ... time to worry about ... men."

David laughed. "It's only talk. Talk fo... gray day and a warm fireside. Besides, e... if a man had an idea of how to be hap... though young, in what way could he man... it? Tell me, George; suppose you found t... Phyllis or Kitty or Dorothy was just the ... you wanted. What would you do? Wo... you make the effort to keep her, or would y... just let her slip because you knew it might ... years before you were making enou... money?"

George stared. "Heaven help us if we ... into that fix. Better not let yourself fall ... love—seriously, that is—until you can ... ford it. If you believe in arranging your l... life, that would certainly be the first thi... to remember." He thought over that for ... moment, and then smiled in relief. "Here's ... the girls who won't take us seriously until ... can afford it."

David looked moodily at the fire. Th... he roused himself and said briskly, "Wh... I need is a walk. Coming?"

"In this weather?"

"The mist is clearing. It is only raini... now. Come on. Good for your complexion."

"I'm quite satisfied with my complexi... as it is, thank you."

George was smiling as the door closed b... hind David. A walk would probably do hi... good: liver, or something.

David followed the path which led hi... through the gardens onto the moors. To h... right was the sea in its grim gray mood. O... his left were the rising hills, their crests st... hidden by cloud. The track was fairly fir... in spite of bad weather, and he could set ... steady pace.

There had been no help from George, ... thought. But then he had not asked f... direct advice. Every man had his own id... about life and what he wanted out of ... Happiness, yes, but we all found very d... ferent ways of trying to reach it. Life wasn... a neat, single track like this path along t... cliffs. It was more like a twisting road wi... no signposts. You had to depend on your ow...

adgets to lock
No pressures to choose gauges to watch
So SIMPLE to use!

beautiful new ESCO
essure Pan

dbye to complicated do-dads! orld's largest manufacturer of ares, has reduced pressure to its simplest, safest, easiest orrying about whether you've wrong pressure or operated s gadgets properly. Nesco dishes at one pressure—15 lbs. g the cooking time according ions.

esco pressure weight is wide —won't fall off when you move Closing takes but a twist of the handles, and keeping the pan g beautiful requires only sim- ing because it's made of fine n that stays bright indefinitely. e new Nesco Pressure Pan at ler's!

LEAK-TIGHT double-lip sealing gasket is impervious to grease. No stretching or reversing.

IP HANDLES
d-Hand-guard e fingers from n the hot pan.

ENAMELING AND STAMPING COMPANY
Largest Manufacturers of Housewares
th 12th Street, Milwaukee 1, Wisconsin

ucts include electric ranges and heaters, kitchen containers, ware, enameled ware e. Look for the Nesco housewares.

NESCO

questions and answers. He wasn't even putting the question in his own mind openly to himself. He was hedging it with arguments and generalizations. Certainly he had never felt like this before. His mind might keep telling him it was all ridiculous, an exaggeration, a delusion. But he didn't believe it. All right, you want to see her again, he admitted.

But how?

That, he suddenly realized, was the real problem that was worrying him. He halted then, and stood for many minutes with the strong wind whipping his soaking raincoat around his legs. He listened to the heavy blows of the waves against the cliff, falling away in front of him into the surging force of water. Out to sea, there was the long dark shape of Inchnamurren. He stared at it, then he turned away abruptly and started back toward the Lodge.

The Lorrimer house in Edinburgh was solid and comfortable. It was one of a row of three-storied houses in a quiet crescent-shaped road, each with its broad white steps, polished doorbell, name plate, letter box, and large oriel windows set into thick gray stone. There were no children playing, no people to be seen. Only the rows of large windows looked at you. The fashion was, it seemed, to have the curtains in the top row meeting while the ones in the lower half of the window were drawn to leave a uniform gap in the middle. David wondered if the mistress of each house went about with a ruler in her pocket each morning to achieve such precision.

But here he was, and there was the house. The choice was made in any case. It had been made last night when, after a tedious journey by car and then by steamer and then by train from Oban, he had arrived in Glasgow and had purposely failed to catch the London express. He had spent a noisy night at a railway hotel built over a station, and, between this additional expense and the sheer boredom of killing time until he could take a train on Monday morning to Edinburgh, he was in a state of gloom.

His pace slowed down as he neared the Lorrimer house. What on earth had ever made him think of this idea, anyway? He should have posted his letter to Penny instead—it was still in his pocket, soiled and crumpled from five days' handling—or, if he had had to obey the mad compulsion which had made him travel home by way of Edinburgh, then he ought to have telephoned first from the station. But after he had written the letter, he had delayed posting it until it was too late.

He turned to the house, ran up the broad white steps and pulled the bell before he could persuade himself to walk away, back to the bus stop. Either he would see her, or he would not see her. That was all, and it was everything. If he were to see her, he would know whether this strange self-tormenting was valid or not. A girl's face. A girl's way of talking. How easily he had surrendered. If he didn't see her—and he probably wouldn't—then he could laugh at the whole thing and at himself. But as he waited for someone to answer the bell's clamor, he was now worrying that no one would be home at all.

A maid, stiffly correct in a starched dress, white apron, white cap, opened the door. Yes, Mrs. Lorrimer was at home. The maid glanced quickly at the pin-striped gray flannel suit, the long-pointed collar and college tie, the brown suède shoes and soft felt hat. Would he come this way?

He entered the drawing room, a cool place of green and white with formalized roses to be picked off curtains and chairs, and was left with the three faces in the large portrait which hung over the mantelpiece, for company. Three girls, heads conventionally together, throats and shoulders bare with clouds of soft tulle caught carefully with pink roses. The artist had not captured the right color of her hair, David thought with annoyance.

He turned to face the door as he heard the sound of a light footstep. Mrs. Lorrimer

For a Velvet Blend
...use Carnation
So good . . . for breakfast, brunch, or midnight supper . . . this inviting Coffee Wreath. And with the coffee . . . Carnation, of course! Concentrated, heat-refined, and homogenized to creamy smoothness, Carnation Milk brings a velvet blend to the cup . . . just as it does in cooking.
COFFEE WREATH
A treat—with coffee and Carnation!
½ cup Carnation Milk, scalded
½ cup water
¼ cup shortening
¼ cup sugar
1 teaspoon salt
1 pkg. household yeast
1 egg
½ teaspoon grated lemon rind
½ teaspoon vanilla extract
½ teaspoon mace
3½ cups sifted flour
2 tablespoons melted butter
½ cup brown sugar
½ cup raisins
½ cup nutmeats, chopped
Combine Carnation Milk, water, shortening, sugar, salt. Cool to lukewarm; add yeast. Let stand 5 min. Mix well. Blend in egg, lemon rind, and vanilla. Gradually add flour and mix combined and mix until dough is well blended and soft. Roll dough on floured board to ¼-in. thickness. Spread with melted butter, brown sugar, raisins, nuts. Roll like jelly roll. Form into ring on greased baking sheet. Cut ring diagonally with scissors at 2-in. intervals almost to center. Turn pieces sideways. Let rise until doubled in bulk, about 1 hr. Bake in moderate oven (350°-375° F.) about 30 min. Frost while warm with confectioner's icing. Makes 1 large or 2 small rings.
WRITE for the "Velvet Blend Book" of milk-rich Carnation recipes to Carnation Company, Dept. 7-L, Milwaukee 2, Wis. And tune in Carnation's romantic daytime serial, "Lone Journey," Monday through Friday. Consult your newspaper.
For Baby ask your doctor about a formula prepared with safe, nourishing, digestible Carnation Milk, fortified with pure vitamin D3—universally approved for babies and children.
Carnation
EVAPORATED MILK
© CARNATION CO.

My-but it's good with Gold Label
Brer Rabbit
Molasses

"Satisfy your family's sugar-hunger with my mild and sweet molasses"
Brer Rabbit

Why let shortages deprive your family of the sweets they need for energy? Let them enjoy Gold Label Brer Rabbit Molasses.

Gold Label Brer Rabbit is highest quality, light molasses. Deliciously mild—and sweet. Over 60% natural sugar!

√ On pancakes, waffles, French toast, hot and cold cereal—this mild, sweet molasses is a tongue-teasing delight for the whole family.

√ As a spread for bread—youngsters love it after school or when they're hungry between meals. And it gives them extra iron they need!

√ For cooking, Gold Label Brer Rabbit Molasses gives a delicate molasses flavor. If you prefer a richer molasses flavor, use Green Label Brer Rabbit.

Brer Rabbit Molasses

Rich in Iron

Iron is needed for good red blood!

stood looking at him. "Mr. Bosworth," she said and came forward to shake his hand, "this is indeed a surprise."

He colored slightly. She was weighing him very carefully, and he had the unpleasant feeling that he was being found wanting. He certainly would be found gravely wanting if he didn't explain his visit adequately. His excuse, which had seemed so natural and excellent, now appeared weak in the extreme. But actually there was no reason for any worry.

Mrs. Lorrimer had her own problems: Monday was such a bad day to offer lunch. Cook wouldn't change the arrangements, not on laundry day. And you couldn't offer a man an egg and a salad, even if you did not particularly like him. Certainly he looked very much better now in these clothes, really very presentable. She began to listen to his explanation, something about having a book for Penelope.

"I do hope I haven't disturbed you," he concluded. "It is rude of me to descend on you like this without warning, but frankly I had no idea how long I would have in Edinburgh between trains."

"When does your train leave?"

"This afternoon. Rather late in the afternoon." He had a very charming smile, Mrs. Lorrimer thought with surprise. "It seemed dreary to spend the day here by myself. I thought that your daughters might lunch with me, and show me the castle afterward. I hear it is very fine."

"I'm afraid Betty and Moira are both out. And Penelope has settled down to do some painting in her room. At the moment, she says she is very behindhand with something or other." Mrs. Lorrimer eyed the thin book which he had drawn out of his pocket and now held in his hand.

"I should be sorry to interrupt," he said. Careful now, careful, he told himself.

Mrs. Lorrimer's sense of guilt at having missed so much of his first conversation now resulted in sudden affability. After all, a stranger in Edinburgh had to be welcomed decently. "I shall tell Penelope you are here, and she can thank you herself." She rose and went to the door. "We have coffee at eleven in the morning. You will stay and have some with us?" He had obviously never expected to have luncheon here, she thought. That was a great relief.

"I should love some coffee," David told her. "Breakfast in Glasgow seems very far away now."

Mrs. Lorrimer acknowledged the truth of that with a smile. She left the drawing-room door open, and he heard murmured instructions to a maid who then ran upstairs.

David walked to the window which faced into the back garden. Front garden, he corrected himself. It was obvious, from the care expended on it, that this was really the front of the house. As if it had turned its back on the street to live its own life in contemplation of a long narrow stretch of grass and flower beds and cherry trees within its own high walls.

He heard footsteps on the staircase, running quickly down, and then a short halt in their rhythm followed by a thump as she landed neatly on both feet in the hall. She had jumped the last four or five steps.

"What is it, mother?" Penny was saying impatiently. Then she halted, and her voice altered. "David Bosworth!" She came forward, smiling. She looked just as wonderful as he had remembered her.

"Hello." He tried to be casual. The result was that he forgot what he had been going to say. And the longer the silence lasted, the more difficult it was to break. "I brought you this book. I was passing through Edinburgh and had some free time. Hope I am not being a nuisance."

"Oh, no."

"What about your work?"

"Oh, that's nothing."

Mrs. Lorrimer established control the minute she entered the room. "Penelope, I never imagined you would come downstairs in that disreputable smock."

"What are you working on?" he asked curiously.

"Oh," she said for the third time. And then, half laughing, "A chest of drawers."

Mrs. Lorrimer's eyebrows had gone up as her daughter had spoken. "Why don't you show Mr. Bosworth your work?" she suggested.

"I don't think he would be interested."

There was a pause, and as it lengthened David felt he had to say, "I should like to see it very much." He was equally as embarrassed as Penny.

Penny stood hesitating for a minute, and then, catching the slight nod of command from her mother, she suddenly moved toward the hall. She led the way without looking back, and David followed. She was

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Baby Sitter

BY ETHEL JACOBSON

Oh, where shall we find us a sitter
To stay with our precious papoose?
I've been buried alive
Till I yearn to contrive
Just one festive night on the loose.
I love little Suzie,
I'd do her no harm;
I'll praise till I'm woozy
Her virtue and charm;
But we haven't stepped out
Since we dated the stork—
And waiting without
Is all Greater New York!

But first we must find us a sitter
To park our sweet innocent lamb
with—
Who won't pacify her
(I.e., gag and tie her),
Then grab the best silver to scram
with.
I'm long overdue for a fling on the town;
This joyless confinement is getting me down;
Yet Suzie, bright jewel in
motherhood's crown,
We can't simply take to the river to drown.

Please, someone, send us a sitter
To trust with our cherished bambino!
We would doll up and go
To the neighborhood show
For a mad, frenzied orgy of Screeno!

But here I stay cooped;
I'm mentally looped;
My eyes have a glitter;
My youth I must fritter
Until we sequester a suitable sitter!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

wearing fine silk stockings today, and the seams were straight, too, on an excellent pair of legs. He admired them all the way up the two flights of stairs.

"Penny insisted on changing her room to her own ideas," Mrs. Lorrimer said as they passed two sweetly pretty rooms belonging to Moira and Betty. There was the slight edge of amused criticism in her voice.

David wanted to smile. But instead, a look of surprise came into his eyes as he followed Penelope into her room. The walls were plain, and they had been painted a strange shade of clouded blue, almost gray. The carpet, also unpatterned, was the color of sand. Long straight curtains were striped in white and coral red. The furniture was of plain wood, simply fashioned, painted white. There were bookcases, long and low against one wall, and above them a long deep band of dark green felt over cork had been fixed to the wall. On this were pinned reproductions of pictures cut out of art magazines. D walked over to the uneven rows of une pictures, which somehow balanced one other in their lack of pattern.

"Good idea," he said involuntarily. was the kind of thing he would like to h in his room at Oxford.

"Here is Penelope's workroom," M Lorrimer said. She opened the door wh led into Penelope's small studio.

As David turned away from the pict to follow politely, he glanced at Pen Somehow, he felt that in these last two m utes he had known her for two years.

"Show Mr. Bosworth your drawings, nelope, and then we shall go down for cof I am sure it is waiting for us," Mrs. Lorrim said.

PENNY hesitated, looked at David and th at the table. "There's nothing really v much to show you. How do you like t room? It used to be a box room, you kno where we kept trunks and old toys and fi of newspapers. But its light is much too go to waste, and so ——" She watched an iously as he walked over to the half-finish canvas on the easel. It was an impressioni study of the west shore of Inchnamurren. I the black rock in the foreground two figur were roughly blocked in, but so far only t sky and the sea had been painted.

"Where are the seals?" David asked.

"At least you recognized it," she said d lightedly. "Mother, there you are! You a ways say that no one can recognize anythin I try to paint."

"I like it," David said, and he was bein honest. He was a little confused. The se study was not at all bad. In fact, it was gooc Surprising. He took a closer step to look a the two figures, placed adequately in the bar foreground. They were just right, there, t bring the jagged rocks into proportion. On was certainly a girl. The other figure migh be, could be ——

"Now, Penelope, get rid of that dreadfu smock, and I'll take Mr. Bosworth down stairs. I am sure the coffee will be cold if w wait any longer."

David and Penny exchanged glances.

"I always think this room is so bare, s masculine," Mrs. Lorrimer said, walkin quickly through Penelope's bedroom.

David thought it wise not to contradict even politely. To him, it was a very feminine room, even if there was not a frill or a rosebud to be seen. The colors were not those any man would have dared to use together.

"Your house is charming," he said to Mrs. Lorrimer as they went downstairs, and his remark won a real smile.

In the drawing room, the coffee tray was waiting on a low table in front of the couch. As Mrs. Lorrimer poured coffee and hot milk in equal proportions into the cups, she talked about her husband. "He enjoys the tennis at North Berwick, you know. We go there every August. I am just packing now, and making all the arrangements. If you had arrived here next week end I am afraid you would have found an empty house."

David felt some of the concealed annoyance in her voice, accepted a shortbread biscuit, and said quickly, "I wonder if you and your daughter would have lunch with me today?" Thank heavens, he had his ticket for London bought, but he wondered if the thirty shillings which remained in his pocket would be adequate. He made some quick calculations as he waited for Mrs. Lorrimer's reply. Her taste in food would no doubt be expensive. He set down the fine cup on the silver tray, almost letting it fall in relief as he heard her refuse. Politely, sweetly, but definitely. She was already engaged for luncheon. She was so sorry.

"I am, too," he said, now beginning to worry whether Penny was already booked up in this same party or not. He looked so dejected that Mrs. Lorrimer was suddenly friendly and began to talk very pleasantly about Edinburgh.

Her criticism was turned on Penelope, who had appeared at last. Her quick glance took in her daughter's newest suit, which normally was worn only for the most special occasions.

(Continued on Page 97)

How word is getting round about the

BIG NEWS IN CORN FLAKES!

Orchids to Post's Corn Toasties - the NEW, TENDER-CRISP, FRESHER Corn Flakes!

YIPPEE! New Corn Toasties are packed with QUICK ENERGY and wholesome nourishment!

Mr. C. 444

POST-

Vol. 23, No 165

NEW YOR

NEW TOASTIER FLAVOR taking the town by storm!

No wonder the big swing is to

POST'S CORN TOASTIES!

Kept Tender-Crisp, fresher, by the NEW Post's FreshProtector Package

A finer margarine makes finer-flavored dishes!
Durkee's is delicious. Blended to smooth perfection—mild and sweet and fresh. Durkee's is made of pure, nutritious vegetable oils, churned with fresh, pasteurized skim milk. Every pound is enriched with 15,000 units of Vitamin A. Use this healthful, delicate-tasting margarine in all your cooking. And use it freely—it's so economical.
SO MILD . . . SO SWEET . . .
SO COUNTRY-FRESH IN FLAVOR
Durkee's
VEGETABLE
OLEOMARGARINE
(MARGARINE)
DURKEE FAMOUS FOODS
© The Gilders Company

BETTER MEALS —AND HOW!

by Virginia Coates

A quick trick for dressing up those fresh garden vegetables is a tasty sauce of melted margarine. Nothing complicated . . . but flavorful enough to make your family clamor for second helpings. Melt margarine over low heat and serve at once. Easy, isn't it?

• • •

For company fare, you might like to show off with a smooth, creamy Hollandaise sauce. Good cooks have found that Durkee's Margarine does wonders here. That rich, country-fresh flavor guarantees taste appeal for your sauce. You can use plenty of Durkee's both in your sauces and as a spread. It's economical and it's good. And here's an easy, never-fail recipe.

Hollandaise Sauce

2 large egg yolks
1 tbsp. Tarragon or Cider vinegar
½ tsp. salt
Dash Cayenne pepper
2 tbsp. light cream
8 tbsp. margarine

Place all ingredients except margarine in top part of double boiler. Beat over hot (not boiling) water on low heat until mixture begins to thicken. A whisk is good for this, if you have one. Now add margarine, a little bit at a time, beating constantly. If sauce is too thick, add a little lemon juice or cream. Makes approximately one cup.

• • •

What to do with a cold roast. Even cold roast beef needs added zip. So point up the good flavor of your meat with a dressing that's mellow and tangy—Durkee's Dressing. Spread it on roast beef sandwiches for the lunch box . . . delicious.

• • •

Something new in flavor! Give your apple pies a truly luscious taste with Durkee's Apple Pie Spice. It's a well-tested blend of cinnamon and other spices . . . balanced so that you can depend upon the same perfect flavor every time. With this new spice blend, you can turn your apple pie into something really special! Try it in applesauce and baked apples, too, and in all your favorite apple dishes. Durkee's Apple Pie Spice is a new product—just arrived on your grocer's shelf.

• • •

Write for lots of other interesting recipes to Durkee Famous Foods, Elmhurst, Long Island, N. Y.

DELICIOUS ON COLD CUTS
DRESS IT UP WITH DURKEE'S DRESSING
SINCE 1887
Durkee's
FAMOUS DRESSING
AND MEAT SAUCE
A Rich Wholesome and Delicious Dressing
DURKEE FAMOUS FOODS
ELMHURST L. I. N. Y.
10 OZ NET WT
A spirited dressing is a good companion!
Turn a plain dish into a triumph with Durkee's Dressing! Enjoy its tempting flavor on meats, salads and fish. And, for extra zest, combine Durkee's with any of your favorite salad dressings. Made of a combination of rare spices, this rich, golden dressing is so tasty, so tangy and so versatile you'll use it in many delightful ways.
DRESS IT UP WITH DURKEE'S DRESSING

(Continued from Page 94)

n't all, either. Penelope was wear-artest high-heeled shoes, and that blouse which had been bought only

' Mrs. Lorrimer said. "We wont was keeping you."
said nothing, but her color heightvid gave her a smile that was both ing and admiring. So she smiled said, "Are you going out to lunch no," Penny said in surprise. She her mother's startled face.

I hope you'll have it with me. You ect, will you, Mrs. Lorrimer?"
orrimer found she was helpless in he direct attack. If he had said, e?" Mrs. Lorrimer could have said,
y, but Penelope can't manage that
But now she would seem rude if she es." And she had no real reason for
. She looked at her daughter's ile and at the young man's face as l for her reply.
urse not," she said.
said quickly, "I'll get my hat," and oward the door.
Bosworth rose. "You've been aw-d, Mrs. Lorrimer. Thank you for ity on the stranger within your Lorrimer smiled faintly. There nything else she could have done, ght worriedly. Only, she did wish s young man wasn't quite such a

. All she knew was that he was poor, nd thoroughly determined. Quite le qualities, no doubt, if you hadn't ageable daughter. She wondered if s still time to say
r engagement for n did not matter,
t she would be de-
to accept his invi-
But Penelope came
irs at that mo-

> We can't help the past. But we don't have to repeat it.
>
> —Gleaner, in the Sligo Independent.

was wearing that with the rakish tilt which she had on buying. And her new handbag pensive gloves. Before her mother y anything, Penny came quickly over sed her on the cheek. "I'll be home er," she said cheerily. Somehow Mrs.
r found herself walking into the hall em, and saying good-by with a smile.
tood for a moment at the open door,
l them almost run down the steps and rt walking in the direction of the bus hey were already talking as if they gotten all about her. And they looked tly right together, Penelope just a orter than the man and Bosworth
s straight shoulders half turned toe girl as he talked, that Mrs. Lorrind herself thinking for a moment how t it was to be young and walk so conrning to the drawing room, she stared hree daughters over the mantelpiece.

ked at their portrait gloomily, as a r might look at a window display of expensive, highly perishable peaches.

took a deep breath of relief when eached the pavement and he still Penny beside him. Until the very last t, he hadn't been quite sure that he ng to manage it.
w what do you want to see first?"
asked.
thing. Everything. It doesn't mate answered. You, his eyes said.
pretended to laugh, but the color in eks told him that she knew quite well e had wanted to see. He became conthat he was hurrying her along the nt, and slackened his pace.
ry," he said. "I was making sure that nother would have no afterthoughts.
e, does every man who wants to take t find it as difficult as I did?" The pplied to others, seemed rather an ive one.
ell, you are sort of unexpected, aren't
I mean, mother knows who the others are. She doesn't know you. Actually, you avoided the main difficulty."

"What's that?"

"You didn't phone. You called at our house."

"Is there a ban against phoning?"

"Not exactly. But there's a kind of opposition." She paused in embarrassment. "It really is much better to call."

"That makes it respectable?"

"It helps."

He smiled broadly. "Well, I very nearly wasn't respectable."

"We've passed the bus stop," she said quickly. "Shall we go back?"

"No, let's walk. Do you mind, Penny?" They couldn't talk on a bus, and it was a pity to waste any of the few hours he could have with her.

"I'd love to walk, David."

THEY were both conscious of the strange sound of their first names.

"Good," David said with enthusiasm. "Let's head for the castle. That's the place to see, isn't it? We can find a spot to admire the view, and you can point out all attractions round about."

"You won't see much of Edinburgh that way, I'm afraid."

"I'll buy a guidebook at the station and do some memorizing on the train, if you insist. You look startled. What's wrong?"

"Nothing." She tried to look natural. Then she laughed suddenly. "Do you always behave like this?"

He didn't answer that. He had never behaved like this before, he thought, as he took her arm to guide her across a street.

He felt the impulse to punch between the eyes every man who looked a moment longer than necessary at the girl walking beside him. All his protective and possessive instincts were aroused, which was an entirely new sensation. And he enjoyed it. I'm sunk, he suddenly thought as he made some small remark and waited to see the answering smile on her face; I'm sunk, completely and absolutely, and I don't care if I am. He began talking as amusingly as he could. He might groan afterward at this display of sheer exhibitionism, but each smile and laugh and comment won now was well worth it.

And when they at last entered a steep street which looked as if it might lead them toward the castle, he had his reward.

"Why, here we are!" Penny said with considerable surprise. "It usually takes an hour to reach the castle from our house. At least an hour, if you are walking."

David glanced at his wrist watch. They had been walking for more than an hour. "What about some food first? Is there a restaurant near here? I expect we passed several decent places. You should have told me, you know. I'm the stranger here."

Penny smiled and shook her head. Decent restaurants were expensive. "There's bound to be a restaurant near here," she said. "If you don't mind something simple."

David wondered if he were hearing correctly. "It is a pity to waste your pretty clothes," he suggested. "Isn't there some place you'd like especially for lunch?" All the girls he had ever met before chose the best restaurant as a matter of course.

Penny shook her head again, and felt some surprise herself. She had thought, when she had dressed so carefully, that she would make a very smart appearance at one of the well-known places. But now, it didn't matter. Anywhere at all seemed marvelous, wonderful.

"I don't suppose you have ever missed a meal in your life?" he said with a strange little smile.

"You make me sound greedy. But actually, I don't believe I ever have. Have you?"

"Sometimes. When I'm busy and can't be bothered."

"Frankly, I am not very hungry now. Perhaps we shouldn't bother. We can have something to eat later on."

What a tangy, fresh surprise — the different, new flavor of Mott's Apple Juice! Delicious with meals and in-between. Mott's is made from juiciest, tree-ripe apples.
MOTT'S
APPLE JUICE
You'll love 'em all—try 'em all!
Mott's Apple Cider—Mott's Apple Sauce
Mott's Fine Vinegars
Mott's Jellies
Sunsweet Prune Juice
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
NOW RICH IN VITAMIN C
MOTT'S apple juice

The wonderful thing about Unguentine is that it's genuinely antiseptic as well as soothing. You can use Unguentine freely—and with confidence—for all the every-day skinjuries—scrapes, scratches and skin irritations as well as burns and scalds.

1. It fights infection
2. It relieves pain
3. It promotes healing

In handy tubes and economical family size jars. At drug stores.

THE THING TO USE IS

Unguentine

® M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Office

A Norwich Product

Norwich

"Good heavens, no!" he said vehemently, and flushed. Did she think he had no money at all? One was always inefficient about restaurants in strange places; in Oxford or London, he would have known where to take her to eat. He grabbed her arm suddenly and led her toward a sign. "This looks a restaurant of sorts. Seems all right. Is it?"

"Yes," she said. But she was relieved that there was no one on the street who could recognize her as they entered its door. A tavern would have been Mrs. Lorrimer's name for it. But there were white tablecloths and the appetizing smell of roast beef and Yorkshire pudding, as well as the tobacco smoke and the clusters of bowler hats on the racks which stood beside each table.

"Are you sure it is all right?" David repeated, as he noticed the few women at the tables.

"Of course." Why, she thought with some disappointment, it really looks very respectable! There were an awful lot of men, of course; that was probably why her mother disliked such places. She followed David to a table, trying to appear oblivious of the looks given her by the younger men.

"If you really don't care for this place," David began hesitatingly, and then stopped. He was noticing that the tablecloth, although white, was not well laundered and that the menu was thumb-marked. Penny must have noticed these things at once. He thought, I've bungled things badly. He scowled savagely in the direction of an interested table. "And who are these young men, anyway?" he asked suddenly.

"Medical students," Penny said.

David glanced at her sharply. "Do you know them?"

She shook her head and smiled. She liked the quickness in his voice, somehow. "You can always tell them. It's their clinical interest, perhaps."

David relaxed and a smile spread over his face as he ordered lunch. By a skillful process of suggestion and elimination, he managed to make her decide in half the usual time she needed to cope with a menu.

Well, she thought, as the waitress retired with the order, well, it is rather nice to have someone make up your mind for you—especially if he decides on the things you really wanted to have anyway. She wondered if that medical student with the red hair knew her, and was he perhaps a friend of any of Moira's friends? And then she suddenly thought, I don't care even if all the family find out. I don't care if I get into the most awful row. This, she decided, is fun. She laughed suddenly.

"A good joke?" he asked.

"I'm feeling rather good," she said. She told herself she shouldn't have admitted that, but her tongue had outwitted her.

"Are you?" He looked pleased. "So am I. Nice feeling, isn't it?"

Their eyes met and held in the same way they had met and held in Mrs. McDonald's cottage. Penny took fright, retreating into words; David was silent, watching as she talked. She felt suddenly that he knew why she was talking like this, and fell silent.

"And what happened then?" he asked. He must have been listening, after all.

"Nothing very much. I'm afraid I'm boring you."

He shook his head slowly.

The waitress brought the food, and the intrusion brought them back to earth. Besides, the roast beef was tender and properly underdone, the roasted potatoes were crisp and hot, the vegetables were an appetizing green, and they were both hungry. David congratulated himself on his choice of restaurant. It could cook.

"Thank heavens," he said to Penny, "you are a girl who can eat."

She looked up quickly, horrified.

"No, please don't," he said. "That was a compliment I was trying to pay you. There is nothing sillier than the girl who picks daintily and leaves most of the food on her plate. Actually, she always reminds me strongly of the princess in A Thousand and One Nights. The one who ate rice with a bodkin. Only rice, grain by grain, everything else refused. Remember her?"

Special for DRY SKIN

The Lady Moyra Forester, noted beauty, says: "Pond's Dry Skin Cream is so rich and smooth and satiny."

All smooth richness—like country cream! Pond's luscious Dry Skin Cream has special skin-softening power. You'll find your dry, tense skin just seems to "drink up" this rich softening help.

3 Special Features

Rich in Lanolin—very like oil of skin
Homogenized—to soak in better
Special Emulsifier—extra softening aid

Work its seepy smoothness well over face, throat. Leave 5 to 15 minutes or overnight. Use every day. Watch your dry skin start to feel softer, look prettier. Everyone loves this richest Pond's Cream. Ask for Pond's Dry Skin Cream today!

Pond's DRY SKIN Cream

VETO Colgate's Amazing New Antiseptic Deodorant, Checks Perspiration, Stops Odor—Yet is Doubly Safe!

Safe for Skin! Safe for Clothes! Keeps You Dainty!

Says EDNA HINES Registered Nurse

Only VETO Contains DURATEX, exclusive new safety ingredient! Veto is different from any other deodorant... Does not rot clothes. Safe for any normal skin. Stays moist in jar, never gritty, rubs in easily. Use doubly safe Veto regularly to guard daintiness—and to check perspiration, stop underarm odor safely.

DOUBLY PREFERRED!

Registered Nurses who have tried Veto prefer it almost 2 to 1 over any other deodorant, according to a nation-wide survey.

Veto COLGATE'S NEW DEODORANT

APPROVED SAFE FOR FABRICS—Better Fabrics Bureau

chocolate éclairs with as much if it had been made of linoleum.

leave," David said. And then he Penny and added, "Of course, I miss this train. Then you might r with me. Would you?"

dn't," Penny said slowly. "I hat I would be home for dinner." ose it would be tactless to phone you weren't coming." He hadn't a question, but he was watching r a reply. "All right, then," he e, gentlemen, time."

gan walking slowly down the steep l.

me home with you first," David find a taxi."

smiled. "I don't think so, David. And we haven't very much time we?" She turned back the cuff of and glanced at his watch, then her head. "Besides, I travel about n every day by myself. I am such a wilting lily as all that!" he didn't join in her laugh, didn't at just stood looking at her, quickly, anxiously, "What's wrong, ing, nothing." She likes me, he she really likes me. She wouldn't that if she hadn't liked me. Fool, he elf, how do you 'e wouldn't? " he said sud- d then stopped Penny, will e to me? he going to say. not ask—it pretty silly Better write nd then see if ered.

" Penny, isn't t Penelope?

n't like Penel- nean, I love it e, but I don't eing attached We should all numbers to us until we e age of eight- en we could he name we anted. It is t times what will think up hristening."

ably they are desperate and thor- ewildered by that time," David sug- "Anyway"—he looked at her with a he paused—"anyway, Penny it is." niled. And then she said in surprise, we are walking in the wrong direc- e station is up to our left."

?"

asn't quite sure if he had been trying hat train after all. She colored, half nd looked quickly away.

ect your mother will hold it against on't take you home safely." I'd even horrors of a family dinner if I could r four more hours, he thought.

her won't know. She is at the clinic ternoon, weighing other people's nd telling them how to feed them." Bountiful, David thought. I might ssed that.

ren't very impressed," Penny said, g his face. "Don't you like good y are useful in an emergency. And as hey go. But often we would have esults if we depended on professionals han amateurs."

volunteers can be ——"

ow. They have hearts of gold, and e up their time, and what would we ut them? But if help were on a pro- l basis, then people would learn to be like about it, and ask for it knowing ally theirs and not a matter of char-

"But ——" Penny began again. She looked at the strange bitterness in his face, and felt suddenly bewildered and unhappy. I've always accepted these things, she thought; I still do, I suppose. "But it would be impossible, wouldn't it? Or wouldn't it?"

He shook his head. "No," he said more gently. "Let's not begin anything we can't finish, Penny. I'll argue with you, if you'd like that, when you come to visit me at Oxford. We'll have lunch at the George, and then we shall walk out to the Trout for tea. Will you come?"

"I'd love to." It did sound wonderful, although Penny wondered what on earth the George and the Trout could be.

"THAT'S settled then." He sounded pleased. He was indeed relieved: he had been worrying how to phrase that invitation for the last fifteen minutes.

Then something began to happen to their conversation. They were practically silent by the time they reached the station. They halted at its entrance, Penny pretending to be absorbed in the busy street, David studying the pavement. He was thinking with some disappointment that he had better not suggest that she should come and see him off. She was waiting for him to say, in that easy way of his, "Why are we standing here?" But he seemed quite immovable. His silence made him suddenly appear remote. He is halfway to London already, she thought, and in London we shall probably meet againasstrangers. Probably, too, she would never see either this George and the Trout, whatever they were. That was another world—his world. He had come into hers for a day, because he had been passing by, and because it had pleased him. For a day. She felt miserable.

This is the letdown, David thought. Goodby's were always depressing affairs. You said either too much or too little. And afterward you thought of all the things you should have said, which would have been just right, neither too much nor too little. Perhaps he had begun to bore her and she was too polite to show it.

He roused himself to say quickly, "Well, thank you, Penny. Tell your mother that I think Edinburgh is a lovely, lovely place."

She half smiled. "Good-by." Well, here it was. You said good-by, and you held out your hand.

"Good-by." He took her hand. "I hope I wasn't a nuisance."

"Oh, no!" She looked up at him then. "I've had a marvelous day."

He still held her hand. Dashed if I don't kiss her in front of the whole ruddy town, he thought. But then, at that moment, a stranger's shoulder rubbed his, and a stranger's voice said "Sorry!" and then she gave him one of her brightest smiles, and turned to walk quickly away. David watched her. The worst thing about saying good-by, he decided, was this feeling of uncertainty: would he ever see her again? For that depended on her too.

David went into the station. He bought a newspaper to read in the train, and disagreed savagely with every editorial and article in it.

Then he sat in the gathering dusk and watched the fields flow past his window, and wondered gloomily just what had happened to him. By the time he had reached York, he wasn't even bothering to wonder. He was trying to balance a sheet of paper on a book and make his writing legible. This letter was going to be posted, he told himself grimly.

(To be Continued)

"I suppose," said the lady to the conductor, "if I pay the fare for my dog he will be treated the same as the other passengers and be allowed to occupy a seat."

"Of course, madam," the conductor replied politely, "he will be treated the same as other passengers and can occupy a seat, provided he does not put his feet on it."

•

John Wesley was walking with a zealous disciple who was in great trouble, and saying he did not know what to do; and as they walked they passed a stone wall over which a cow was looking. "Do you know," said Wesley, "why that cow looks over that wall?" "No," replied his friend. "I will tell you, then," said Wesley. "She looks over the wall because she cannot see through it. That is what you must do with your troubles—look over and above them."

FASHION ORIGINAL DESIGNED EXCLUSIVELY FOR DAGGETT & RAMSDELL BY "DEBUTANTE" BY C. D. HARMON PHOTOGRAPHED AT THE RITZ-CARLTON

a cosmetic sensation... captivating and gay!

One of the most exciting beauty events of the season! Never, never in all its wonderful history has the House of Daggett and Ramsdell presented a more brilliant collection of beauty preparations. Debutante is different! Enchantingly new . . . engagingly young-in-heart. Completely modern! Ask for Debutante creams, make-up, bath accessories —at your favorite cosmetic counter.

Created by the House of Daggett and Ramsdell

COPR. 1947, DAGGETT & RAMSDELL

Don't turn it out, Honey—you'll be back by ten!

SURELY A BUNDLE of charm like you couldn't miss out tonight. Yet just when the fun's getting started, the dance will be over for you.

It's so easy for even the prettiest girl to miss, when she fails to keep her charm safe from underarm odor.

She should remember—a bath washes away past perspiration, but to guard against risk of future underarm odor—Mum's the popular word.

Mum — better because it's Safe

1. Safe for skin. No irritating crystals. Snow-white Mum is gentle, harmless to skin.

2. Safe for clothes. No harsh ingredients in Mum to rot or discolor fine fabrics.

3. Safe for charm. Mum gives sure protection against underarm odor all day or evening.

Mum is economical, too. Doesn't dry out in the jar—stays smooth and creamy. Quick, easy to use—even after you're dressed. Get Mum today!

• • •

For Sanitary Napkins—Mum is gentle, safe, dependable . . . ideal for this use, too.

Product of Bristol-Myers

LOVE IS A BARGAIN

(Continued from Page 64)

her marten scarf as she flipped it closer around her throat. The light changed, the river of traffic halted, and Stacy walked over Park Avenue like an elegant Moses.

Grace Barnes walked on, thinking happily of Stacy, who ornamented her circle of acquaintances like an effective pin on a dull dress. They were chance-met friends who had been rattled together in one of the city's interminable dice throws of meetings and partings. The quick intimacy of women who have nothing very much to do and take their shopping seriously had sprung up between them, and now their friendship operated smoothly on the basis of an even division of advantages.

For Stacy, Grace and Charlie Barnes performed the substitute function of a piece of family silver or an inherited highboy, implying a solidity of background which added some roots to the air-plant quality of a woman living alone. Grace Barnes admired Stacy's urbanity, felt younger by virtue of Stacy's fewer years, and also felt more interesting herself in Stacy's reflection. She was so interesting to introduce. She had a last name for a first name, that definite if intangible asset for a woman, so well understood in the South. And she had lived in China, where her husband had had something to do with a bank. In fact, Stacy Adams began in Tientsin for the Barneses, since she had made the most of the advantageous way a city makes it possible to reveal the past from its best point only. Her youth was vaguely assigned, like a war communiqué, to somewhere in Pennsylvania.

TENTED in privacy by the noise of the hair drier under which she sat, lulled into a sleekly feminine sense of well-being by the ministrations of the beauty parlor, Stacy Adams spread her hands carefully, pleased at the smooth brilliance of her nail polish, pleased at the smooth way the evening promised to work out.

She remembered Scott Pearson in China with tolerant amusement. She had always been able to think tolerantly of Scott, when she was away from him. She remembered Scott the eternally eligible, the eternally uncaptured. She thought now that probably he had escaped all the visiting sisters from England, all the hopefully traveling American girls just because, ironically, they had gone to such trouble to give him a good time that they had left him no lonely leisure to dream of filling. If he had simply wanted something soft and pretty, he could have had it years ago.

But Scott was clever, she thought; clever about a lot of things, in spite of the way he had of appearing to regard his life as one long cheerful accident. Stacy was sure, with an old reflex of irritation, that there was more to it than that.

He was lucky, of course. But wasn't it Napoleon who always asked if an officer under consideration for a high post was, in addition to other qualifications, lucky? It had certainly been sheer luck, in the guise of a casual inspiration to take a holiday in the States, that had saved Scott from the war in the East.

Otherwise, reflected Stacy soberly, she might never have seen him again. With artless egotism and the tinge of superstition that so often colors shrewdness, she was inclined to think such an elaborate operation of fate showed that Scott Pearson was meant to have a permanent place in her life. She had seen him several times during the war when the volatile course of his activities as a Far Eastern expert in a war agency had brought him to New York, and the idea had grown on her. Now he was launching some new venture, with his usual enthusiasm.

She hadn't gathered what it was from his long-distance-telephone conversation with her. He only said he had a bright idea and was coming to New York to pick up some capital to go with it. Off handy trees as he breezed by, from the way he spoke about it. But Stacy thought Scott's actions always

Don't laugh of bleeding gums
YOU MAY BE GETTING GINGIVITIS

4 out of 5
May Have This Sly Enemy of Firm Gums and Handsome Teeth!

When people brush their teeth and their gums bleed—too many of them pay no attention. Now don't you be so foolish—

Because tender, bleeding gums are often some of the first signs of Gingivitis—a mild gum inflammation but a wicked foe of firm gums and healthy, handsome teeth.

Neglect of Gingivitis often leads to dreaded Pyorrhea, which only your Dentist can help. See him every 3 months. Then at home to—

Help Gums Be Firmer—Teeth Naturally Bright

Massage your gums and brush your teeth twice a day with Forhan's Toothpaste—the famous formula of Dr. R. J. Forhan for BOTH massaging gums to be firmer—more able to ward off infection and for cleaning teeth to their lovely natural sparkle.

Notice the difference even after the first time you use Forhan's. Your gums feel so invigorated. Your teeth look so clean. You'll like its refreshing tangy taste, too!

Used and recommended by many dentists for over 30 years. Buy a tube at any drug, dept. or 10¢ store.

NO HARSH ABRASIVES IN FORHAN'S!

use Forhan's with massage

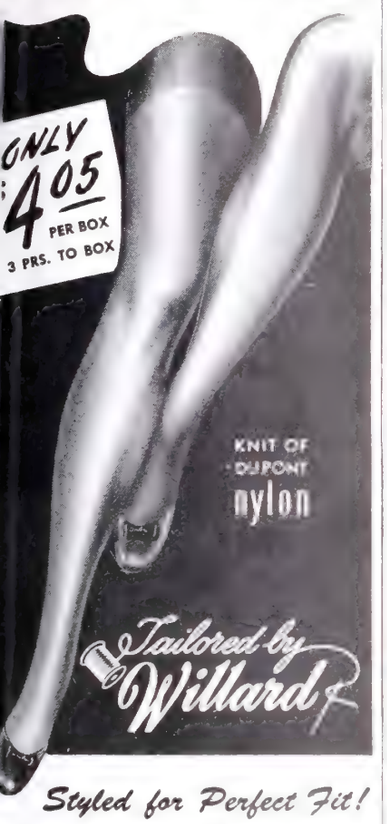
FOR FIRMER GUMS—CLEANER TEETH

OW! BUY DIRECT!

Lovely, Full-Fashioned

NYLON

STOCKINGS



Styled for Perfect Fit!

s exciting news! The search is over! Ready for mmediate shipment are fresh stocks of precious ylons . . . as many pairs as you want, direct om FLARON. Nationally known, superbly tai-red by Willard, these are stockings of the very est quality—all Nylon top to toe. They are iced at only $4.05 a box (3 pairs). Sheer, yet dur-ly constructed for long wear and repeated wash-gs. Graduated knitting process makes these ockings hug the leg . . . assures streamlined fit.

OUR CHOICE of 2 Glamorous Shades

ame the color you want. SUN SHADOW, a ghly flattering beige color popular for Spring ear, or TROPIC BLUSH, a very alluring sun-ush tone worn with lighter shades. (Also vailable in Black or White.) Sizes 8½ to 10½. very pair of Willard Nylons is factory inspected guaranteed for flawless workmanship.

SEND NO MONEY

st fill in and mail Coupon. We'll send your ockings C.O.D. (plus postage). If you wish to nclose payment now (check or money order), e'll pay postage. Get your order into the ail at once!

RUSH COUPON for PROMPT DELIVERY

FLARON, INC.
1523 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia 2, Pa.

Please send me the following quantity of Nylon Stockings. I will pay Postman $4.05 per box, plus postage. (We pay postage if you enclose payment now.)

Quantity: . . . . . Boxes ($4.05 per box of 3 pairs)
Color: ☐ Sun Shadow ☐ Tropic Blush
☐ Black ☐ White
Size: 8½ 9 9½ 10 10½ (Circle size)
☐ C.O.D. ☐ Cash

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ Zone_____ State_____

turned out to be more practical than his words. She had no doubt he'd recognize his luck in meeting Charlie Barnes. Charlie Barnes, who was not only senior vice president of an imposing bank, but a member of its loan committee. And Scott would appreciate that her new apartment, which he had not yet seen, was a much pleasanter place to meet a man like Charlie than by appointment across a desk.

Stacy realized gratefully that she couldn't have planned a more perfect opportunity to show a man what a help a clever woman with a well-directed social sense can be.

"Little Miss Muffet," said Scott Pearson, gazing around Stacy's apartment, "always sitting on a new tuffet. This is quite a nice one."

He glanced at the two east windows in which, with characteristic effectiveness, Stacy had invested her rent money. They framed the night tricked out with necklaces, and sunburst points, and square-cut jewels of light above the shining blackness of the river, on which tall mast lights moved, swimming silently upstream.

"Nice river you have, too, dear."

"Isn't it? The whole place couldn't be more impractical, but I simply couldn't resist that view."

"Stacy! I can take most things, but if you've stopped playing it practical and close to the chest, love—well, then, I don't know!"

"What are you talking about?" said Stacy coolly. "Here's the bedroom. Small, dark, but adequate."

"Roses," admired Scott. "Well, well. Red roses. What next?"

Early sex education, using botanical examples, is an excellent thing, but it may be embarrassing. In a cinema, during an overly long embrace by an enthusiastic romantic screen hero, a small voice piped up, "Is he spreading the pollen now, auntie?"

"Oh, Scott," said Stacy, then quickly shifted gear. "Something Victorian is really about all that can be done with these old-fashioned, made-over, high-ceilinged rooms, don't you think?"

"Oh, indubitably," he said, and hung a friendly, but totally unimpressed, arm around her shoulders. "In-dubitably."

Stacy shrugged away from his arm, walked across the living room and arranged herself on a carefully graceful Empire sofa. Behind her head hung a long Chinese scroll painting with precisely wandering wistaria and roses that were pale, rare, elegant cousins of the fat blooms climbing her bedroom walls. She looked at the river windows, away from Scott Pearson.

"You spoil things," she said. "You spoil things. You always have."

She picked up a cigarette and put it between her lips, creating an effect, which fortunately she couldn't see, of a child crossly ramming thumb in mouth. Scott pulled out his lighter. Then he sat facing her, on the arm of a chair, freakish crinkles of amusement around his hazel eyes.

"Stacy," he protested. "And me your admirer since the age of sixteen."

"Admirer!" said Stacy Adams.

Her mind lurched back through time like a jolted pendulum, back to her teens and somewhere in Pennsylvania. "And how are you this morning after, Lady de Vere de Jefferson High School?" Scott Pearson had called cheerfully from his bicycle, and managed instantly to smudge the sheen of last night's school play. Ripping off Lady de Vere's draperies of lingering illusion, he revealed Edna Brown to Edna Brown, sent on an errand to the grocery store. Saturday morning on the dreary street of the wrong and ugly kind of Pittsburgh suburb had filled her mind as bitterly as the taste of illness in the throat. Stacy Adams could still taste the bitterness.

(Continued on Page 105)

...so nice to stay home with!

Enchantingly pretty, these rayon brocade Oomphies, with a distinct flare for making a foot look little. Wear them when you're hostess—and whenever you just want to be comfortable. Don't let their smartness fool you—Oomphies cushion platform sole provides a heavenly rest. $4

OOMPHIES, INC. NEW YORK

Sorry, no mail orders.
Slightly higher in the Far West.

Very personally yours

You're Dining Out . . . and you adore it. You love the festive atmosphere . . . listen for the heady Latin music that recalls your first ecstatic glimpse of "night life". It was like a great neon pinwheel spinning with fun and glamour and romance . . . and all very personally yours.

Tonight, you're radiant with that same young enthusiasm. Proving once again that any woman can stay young-in-heart, when she's free from care. "Those" cares, for example. And that's why you always insist on Kotex, for with that exclusive safety center you're sure . . . secure.

Moreover, you're free from revealing outlines, with those flat pressed ends of Kotex. Free from discomfort, too, because Kotex is a dream of softness . . . is made to stay soft while you wear it.

And because your daintiness is so important, each Kotex napkin contains a deodorant. Yes, and only Kotex has 3 sizes (Regular, Junior, Super Kotex).

Naturally, then, your every evening can be as carefree as your laughter-loving heart. You can keep that radiant charm always very personally yours.

More women choose Kotex than all other sanitary napkins*

(Continued from Page 103)

In a way he did her a favor. She didn't ke to look silly, and at sixteen it really hurts. he saw that fairy tales were baby food. She ut away childish things and took a good hard ite of reality. She liked nice things as the dvertisements in the trolley car that carried er to and from high school phrased it or her. She liked nice people; at least she as sure she would. And she liked nice surroundings; those she was sure she could learn bout. With all the drive of the pioneer omen who pushed their way west she began o plan the latter-day traverse, the rugged limb up, to the things she knew she wanted. he worked at it, storing away bits of observation like a bright-eyed squirrel storing uts in its cheeks, until she could really ravel.

She had a head on her shoulders, and gradally the swing of fashion veered around so hat, with her intelligent co-operation, it ecame the right kind of head pictorially too. he had the high cheekbones, narrow chin nd poster mouth that went with a smart ngularity. She dressed well, making the ost of the discount that went with her job n the colossal department store, because of ourse she had come to New York. She lived n the East Thirties; Murray Hill, not the illage.

Scott Pearson whistled low and admiringly hen he called at her office she had a ucicle of her own—to take her to lunch. She ad progressed from black with pearls to uite good tailored suits. It was during the epression, which had settled down like a tray, unwelcome hound, and she had found possible to say, a subtle advantage in saying ruefully, that finances ere a problem. It was uite respectable not to ave much money and, dmitted in the right ay, distilled an impreson of having lost some. Which was also respectble and correct for once, briefly.

"Shades of the old oaken ucket!" Stacy Brown eeted Scott cordially. Come in and rest your et, Pearson."

"I had a fine time finding you," he said, utting his feet comfortably in her wastesket. "Is this solitary grandeur all yours?"

"Yes, it is," said Stacy. "It may be small, ut it means something."

It was remarkable how he cast ripples in he smooth stream of her assurance. She idn't care at all for the assertive voice she eard herself using. It made her careful.

"Stacy," said Pearson. "Stacy from what, lease, ma'am? That was what put me off."

"Stacy from Edna Stacy Brown, dope," aid Stacy, back in the light key. "Becoming, o?"

"Ah, oui," said Scott. "It's wonderful, it's narvelous"—because that's what they had een singing lately. "Do you still eat under he same name, though?"

"You bet," said Stacy, all folksy friendliess. "Let's go."

THEY went over to the Pennsylvania Hotel nd up to the roof for lunch. Stacy looked ut dreamily over her acres, New York.

"I'll tell you what," said Scott. "I always ad a feeling you and a career would be that ay about each other someday. What kind I idn't know, but local girl makes good I did oresee. In a modest way, I'm psychic."

"I'm glad," said Stacy, "you've sprouted touch of modesty somewhere. As a matter f fact"—and she made up her mind definitely at that moment, as though he had ouched a button—"I'm thinking of switching careers and being married."

"Tell me all," said Scott.

"Later. What are you doing? I thought I eard you were a rising young oil man in Oil ity."

"Baby," said Scott earnestly, "oil is without charm, without spark, without anything o offer except a living."

"Well, but after all," said Stacy, "a ving's the important ——"

"No, it isn't," said Scott promptly. "Besides, I don't care if it is. What's more, it's against my family tradition."

Stacy looked at him suspiciously, but he was apparently just enjoying himself in his own way. And looking very handsome. His hair had darkened to a light brown, but it still had the crisp springiness of curly hair cut very close. He grinned suddenly, and his hazel eyes flickered happily.

"I come from a long line of peddlers," he expounded. "My grandfather drove a notion wagon in Wisconsin—did you ever hear of a notion wagon?"

"No, but I get the idea."

"I CAN see you don't like it, but I'm crazy about it. Anyway, so I have this inherited talent and do you know how I'm going to use it? I'm going to sell condensed milk in China. Either that or camphor ointment for colds on the chest. I haven't quite decided which, but by five o'clock this afternoon I'll know. Some fun, huh?"

"China," said Stacy thoughtfully. Then she told him about Walter Adams, whom she was now sure she would marry.

"Solid," said Scott to the description. "Very solid."

"And nice," said Stacy firmly.

"I'm sure of that," said Scott politely. "Congratulate him for me, Stacy." It was the first time he'd used her edited name. He added reflectively, "Did you say he worked in a bank?"

Stacy nodded.

"He'll die president. He's a made man. You know—Stacy—you'll be the kind of wife that's a regular outboard motor for a man."

"What a pretty idea," said Stacy, irritated. "Walter would simply love that, I know. Any man would."

"Well meant, but expressed wrong," said Scott, undismayed. "I tell you the guy's in luck."

"Well, it's nice of you to insist," said Stacy, still with a faint frosty rime on her voice. "Good luck, yourself, along the condensed milk route."

"Thanks. I'll probably need it. Well, I'll be seeing you, Stacy."

"Who knows?" said Stacy. "But I forgot; you're psychic."

Three months later she married Walter Adams. It wasn't a stylish marriage, but it was a good solid bicycle built for two; a reliable vehicle, and Stacy climbed on with the honest satisfaction of a job well done. Walter Adams came from White Plains, and had graduated from Dartmouth into the training rounds of a large bank. Stacy wouldn't let him buy her an engagement ring; after all, they had an apartment to furnish. His parents praised her for a practical girl with a head on her shoulders and tried hard to be fond of her, feeling very guilty as they tried, because her manner toward them was perfect. She kept her job at the store until Walter was permanently assigned to the bank's foreign department. The apartment was furnished attractively, she was well supplied with clothes, and they had a small savings account. It seemed the right moment for Walter to take over.

"I'm glad it turned out to be the foreign department," Stacy said one night at dinner after Walter had gone through the domestic rite of recapitulating the day's events. "It's more interesting in a way, isn't it?"

"I'll say," said Walter Adams, who had a fresh, boyish quality of easy enthusiasm. "Stacy, you ought to come down someday and let me show you around. Do you know what I like, and you would too? The clocks on our office wall. There's a big one in the middle that's regular New York time, and all around it little ones with the time in London and Paris and Rome." He drew a long breath. "Wouldn't it be fun, Stacy, if someday ——"

"It would be wonderful," said Stacy, right with him. "Snap it up, darling, if a chance ever comes."

Women speak easily of platonic love; but, while they appear to esteem it highly, there is not a single ribbon of their toilette that does not drive platonism from our hearts.

—A. RICARD: Quoted in The Golden Treasury of the World's Wit and Wisdom, Edited by Norman Lockridge. (Black Hawk Press).

Only one soap gives your skin this exciting Bouquet

What is the secret of so many popular girls' fragrant appeal?

What makes a man murmur, "You're very alluring tonight"? If you bathed with Cashmere Bouquet Soap you might well give credit to its dainty, subtle perfume . . . the fragrance men love. This ravishing fragrance comes from a secret wedding of rare perfumes, far more costly than you'd expect to find in any soap. For seventy-eight romantic years it has enhanced the appeal of popular girls. Let lovely Cashmere Bouquet Soap make you more exciting. Bathe with it every day. Use it for your complexion, too.

Cashmere Bouquet

Adorn your skin with the fragrance men love

Are you really sure of your present deodorant? Test it against Fresh
See for yourself why more and more women are switching to Fresh—the new cream deodorant they find the most effective and so gentle

Use FRESH and be lovelier to love

Lovely to know . . . that you can really rely on Fresh. Fresh contains the most effective perspiration-stopping ingredient known to science!

Lovely to use . . . creamy Fresh stays smooth . . . never greasy, gritty or sticky . . . doesn't dry out.

And gentle . . . Fresh contains a patented ingredient that makes it gentle to skin, safe for fabrics.

No wonder . . . more and more women are switching to Fresh.

When the chance came it was a place in the bank's Tientsin branch.

"Walter," said Stacy, "I think I like that." She smiled unexpectedly, reminded for the first time in ages of Scott Pearson, condensed milk and camphor rub.

"Sound good?" said Walter. His talent for enthusiasm had been affected by indoctrination in banking caution, so he expressed some doubts. "There's one thing to think about a little," he said. "You do get sort of out of sight of the head office in a foreign branch. Out of sight, out of mind, and all that."

Stacy quickly objected. The project was so favorable. At the moment they were just another youngish couple getting along, but with no striking . . . flavor. By the time they came back from China something new would have been added. That extra something that set off a person, as it did a dress from the ones that had been cut wholesale from the same pattern.

"That depends," she told Walter. "You could just as well think of it as a chance to stand out in a smaller group. And look how well you've done even in this big boiler factory of a place here in New York! You never give yourself enough credit."

"Well, you certainly do," he said gratefully. "I'll tell you what I do give myself credit for—having brains enough to marry you."

"Wal-ter," she teased him, "and all along I thought it was love!"

"You know it was," he said seriously, and pulled her to him.

She went willingly. She was fond of him in a quiet way, and pleased, within reason, with him and with life. "Me too," she said. "Oh, Walter, do let's go to China."

They went, rather wistfully waved off by the elder Adamses, who said comfortingly to each other that of course it would be an experience.

Stacy found it a charming one, heightened by a happy feeling that its value could be figured at a compound rate, personal as well as financial. Tientsin lacked the high aura of Peking, the racy dash of Hong Kong and life on the Peak, but that had its advantages too. She and Walter enjoyed themselves and had the pleasantest possible feeling of consequence; one that it was impossible, except for the very highly favored, to achieve against the uniformity of looks and level of living standards at home. They enjoyed having servants, they enjoyed the stepped-up round of entertaining and being entertained that they were a part of. Stacy thoroughly enjoyed the interestingly flawed emerald Walter had been able to buy her in place of the pure, modest stone it would have had to be in New York. Looking at her emerald, she visualized it on her finger after they were back in New York, the trademark of that unusual, that cosmopolitan young couple, the Walter Adamses. It was a good investment, and that sanctified her pleasure in it.

LIFE was going so well in general that she wasn't surprised when Walter turned up late one afternoon with Scott Pearson.

"The milk route!" she cried in welcome. "I never dreamed I'd be on it. Scott Pearson, you were psychic!"

"I still am," he said, taking her hand. "Stacy, you look more glamorous than ever."

"I am, dear," she said, contentedly aware of the finely rubbed finish life was giving her, as it could if you made proper use of its friction. "Isn't it fun? And you're looking very brisk yourself."

"I am," Scott assured her. "I'm marvelous. I love it. Do you know what? I've been telling your husband's bank all about how I'm thinking of taking on a side line of chewing gum."

STACY laughed helplessly, along with Scott. His teeth were whiter than ever, his hair crisper, his clothes very British, and he radiated the most cheerful energy.

"Oh, it's really wicked," he confided, "the fun I have selling things!" and laughed again at the thought of it.

Walter Adams looked a little ruffled by this breezy attitude toward the serious business of life, like a small, neat pond whose surface is unsettled by ripples from a carelessly skittered stone. Stacy saw that he looked uneasy, and he also struck her as looking rather small and neat, compared with Scott Pearson. Her whole setting, which had given her so much satisfaction looked neat, small and local in the reflection of Scott's conversation, his unrestricted forays up and down the China coast. And, Stacy had an envious suspicion, up and down the rungs of the careful social ladders that held the foreign colonies erect like spines.

Something disturbing and unregulated had blown in with him, left over from all the footloose peddlers gone with the springtime of the western world who had sold ribbons and laces, or wooden nutmegs, and now chewing gum. When he stole a kiss while strawberries ripened and grass glistened in the sun.

Inevitably, Scott had an engagement he stayed only an hour.

"He may crack jokes about it," said Walter, anxiously fitting him back into the groove, "but his credit rating's no joke. He makes money."

"Does he?" said Stacy rather absently. "It's so queer, the way he turns up in my life."

"But," went on Walter more cheerfully, "I'll bet he spends it."

"I'm sure of it," said Stacy, twisting her emerald, which was, after all, far from an important stone.

She stared into it, a fortuneteller's green crystal. She saw Walter back in New York belonging to a luncheon club called the Something Tiffin Club, fanning up the bright patch of earlier days with the bellows of conviviality on alternate Tuesdays. She couldn't see her own future very well, but she viewed her present with a fine new clarity—thanks somehow, to Scott Pearson. She identified with a certain wry courage, what she was feeling: that elevator drop in satisfaction between looking in the mirror at home, and facing the great mirror of the world that every woman has known.

Walter's voice penetrated. "—— pretty late, hurry up about dressing," he was saying.

"Wouldn't it be a treat," said Stacy, "if some of these people would change their faces with their clothes once in a while? Just for variety."

(Continued on Page 108)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Tears

By Isabelle Bryans Longfellow

Tears of women are April pools
From darks of sudden cloud;
Or the slow rain of a long day,
The sky low-bowed;
The glint of a jeweled drop that clings
To a flower's face;
A lashing sheet the wind drives wild,
Bewildering space.

But the tears of men—oh, the tears of men
Are depths of ocean writhing,
When the final raft with a shriek is gone
And never a soul surviving;
A mountain at midnight and torrents down
Where a stream's low word was spoken—
Haste to the highland, all valley souls,
The dam has broken!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

For the first time ever!

THREE REVLON REDS are better than one!

"FATAL APPLE"! "ULTRA VIOLET"! "BACHELOR'S CARNATION"!

NAIL ENAMEL · LIPSTICK · FACE POWDER, TOO!

Madly beautiful? Capricious? or . . . Tempting? Fashion can't choose any single one of these three great Revlon reds this Spring—loves them all with a deathless passion!

Matchless on matching lips and fingertips. Now and forever to the woman of taste Revlon is the very symbol of quality and fashion color.

Always, there is that famed Revlon "stay on".

A new way to take the chill off a room—

If a room seems chilly, don't go turning up the furnace.

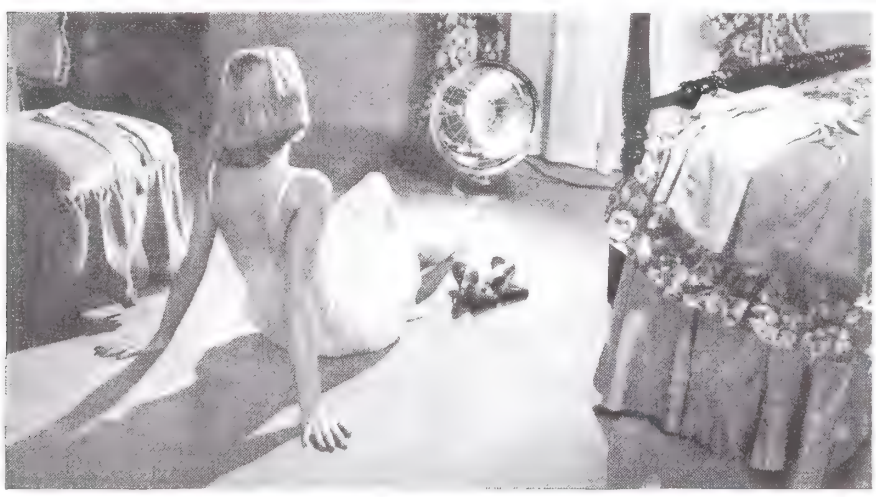
Be modern, save money—plug in General Electric's streamlined, portable Arizona Heater.

Instantly it fills the room with currents of warm, clean air. No noise. No moving parts. It's all done by natural-draft circulation.

Ever so light, the Arizona gives off an odorless, red-warm glow—so safe, even with children around.

Approved by the Underwriters' Laboratories, it's all precision built by G.E.

A new way to keep warm when dressing—



Glory be, what bliss—just plug in General Electric's Sunbowl Heater. Now, spot its heat right on yourself.

Keep warm all over when dressing on chilly mornings. Bathe in Sunbowl's spot of heat whenever you're cold.

P. S. In The Early Spring, turn off your central heating. Save money. Keep really warm, early mornings and late evenings, with G-E Space Heaters.

All the electricity that goes into any G-E Heater comes out as heat! Buy G.E.—a great value! General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

Always insist on G-E Space Heaters and be sure of the best!

THE ARIZONA—Only $14.95 plus tax

THE SUNBOWL—Just $8.25 plus tax

GENERAL ELECTRIC

(Continued from Page 106)

"What's wrong with 'em?" said Walter, surprised at the whiff of criticism. "They're a good gang."

Gang, thought Stacy; it might as well be Westchester.

She went on about the business of dressing. But she also began to examine in new perspective the design of their life. One result of her examination was so clear that she shared it with Walter, pointing out to him the added importance, when living in a foreign country, of being discriminating about people. Mistakes in judgment were so easy to make. She quoted two or three they'd seen made, with unfortunate results. Walter agreed: he knew his bank held strongly the same point of view.

Scott Pearson reappeared several times, on occasion producing friends whom Stacy, always quick to learn, approved of as amusing.

As carefully as a painter arranges a still life, Stacy was one day arranging a party with an eye to every highlight of advantage when Walter interrupted her by coming home early, with a pain. The father and mother of all pains in the middle, Stacy was forced to admit, judging by his very peculiar color.

It was subsequently the opinion of the senior Mr. and Mrs. Adams until they died that appendicitis was managed much better in New York, but they always hastened to admit that a ruptured appendix was a great risk anywhere. They also said Stacy had been wonderful, with their old guilty offering of admiration in place of love. But they saw her only after she had come back to New York and was doggedly reweaving the raveled pattern of her life.

For at first Stacy had been shocked into numbness by the brutal irrelevancy of death. For the first time in her life she felt bitterly, instead of confidently, alone. All the small dependencies of marriage had built themselves into such a total that she confused her sense of their loss with that of Walter himself. It shook her badly to find her own emotions could go so wildly off the leash. Everything for a while seemed unreal, especially herself. People were kind, she found with dull surprise, but she was too bemused to make note of the useful implication that people can be kind only when they are allowed to be. Little by little she found her balance, and during the long transition of the journey home she began to fit into her new identity as an interesting, attractive widow and to see that it could be a becoming one.

She made it so. Walter's life insurance gave her a small capital for the first time in her life. She could afford, because of it, to take a job with an interior decorator that paid better in possibilities of desirable acquaintances than in money. The war came as a rude disruption, but she moved on to the Red Cross as a paid worker. Then Mr. and Mrs. Adams died in fairly rapid succession and left Stacy all they had, since they knew Walter would have wanted them to. Stacy found it such a novel experience to be standing on a margin of security that she had a brief period of uncertainty about what to do next. It was while she was hesitating on this plateau, without the push of necessity to give her direction, that she had met Grace Barnes.

She began to enjoy her new status, encouraged by the picture of herself that was reflected in Grace Barnes' admiration. Then Scott Pearson had to blunder in like a bull in a china shop of illusions.

"Stacy," said Scott, reaching over and swinging her hand reproachfully, "Stacy, come back. Very rude, going away like that when you have company."

"Rude," said Stacy. "I'm not the one who's rude."

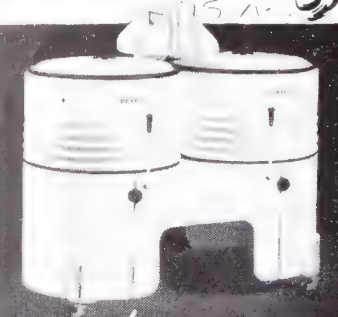
"It can't be me," said Scott reasonably, "because I'm never rude. Now come on, what have I ever spoiled?"

"Oh—nothing," said Stacy. "It's just ——"

"Liver, dear," supplied Scott. "Don't worry about it; a touch of liver makes the whole world kin. You've put me more at ease right away."

For fifty years
Dexters been my pride.
Let my experience
Be your guide.

Oh yes! My Dexter
Meets the test!
With speed and ease
It washes best!



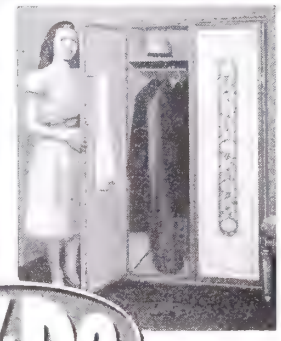
the Triumph of washer dependability!

Through more than a half century of washing America's clothes, the Dexter Twin Tub triumphs as the time-tried way to shorten wash day. Wash day becomes wash hour when you use a Dexter Twin. It washes, rinses, and wrings all at the same time — even dirtiest clothes miraculously become sparkling bright and white, ready for the line in half the time. So see your Dexter dealer or write Dept. L-47 for free booklet "Two Instead of One".

THE DEXTER CO. Fairfield, Iowa

DEXTER TWIN TUB

WASHES CLEANER—QUICKER—EASIER

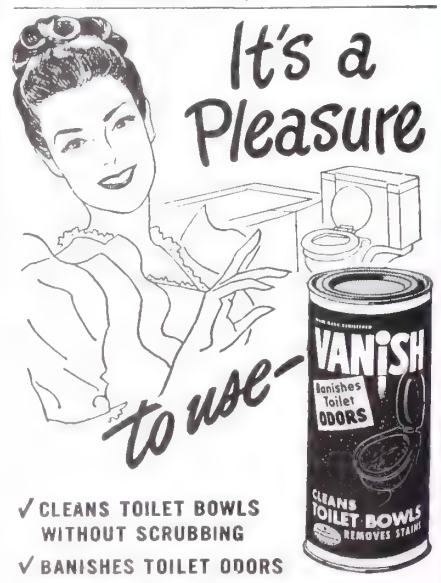


E-Z-DO

WORLD FAMOUS Wardrobes Chests AND CLOSET ACCESSORIES

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

At your favorite store
Write for
Illustrated booklet
E-Z-DO, Department DD
261 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.



✓ CLEANS TOILET BOWLS WITHOUT SCRUBBING
✓ BANISHES TOILET ODORS

Stacy said she could never remember see- him when he wasn't perfectly at ease.

"That only proves," said Scott, "that in ite of all the years you've known me you n't know any more about me than I do out you. You would be truly amazed at e amount of time I've put in wondering out you, Stacy."

"About me?"

"About you," he assured her. "Every me I see you I have a new attack. Tell me mething: do you like living alone?"

"Do you?" said Stacy. "Of course it's still man's world."

"Quaint," said Scott to that, "very quaint, ear. I suppose you don't do about as you ke?"

Stacy said distantly that she did what she ought sensible.

"That I can believe," said Scott. "You al- ays have."

"Haven't I had to?" demanded Stacy otly, stung to unanalyzed resentment. Haven't I always had to?"

"That's one of the things I've wondered bout," he said seriously, pulling out his igarette case and offering it to her.

He had excellent hands, smooth-knuckled nd long. They caught Stacy's eye. She tared at his hand and forgot to take a igarette. Involuntarily she drew a sudden, eavy breath.

"Stacy," said Scott, "now you do make me wonder. More than ever. If I thought, if I'd ever thought ——"

The bell broke in on what he'd thought.

"What would that be?" he said impatiently.

"That would be Grace and Charlie Barnes."

"Blast Grace and Charlie Barnes."

Stacy's first reaction had been impatience too. Then, more sensibly, she saw the value of diversion. She needed time; time to put in its place, its useful place, the tide of emotion that endangered her footing. "You'll like them," she promised in a nearly normal voice.

She watched Scott light a new cigarette, unconscious of the one he had laid down.

"They've been terribly kind to me," she said, and walked composedly across the room to push the button that released the catch on the street door.

She felt excited, but also a coolheaded confidence in her ability to go on pushing the right buttons. She knew now why Scott's opinion had always been such a goad. But it gave her a happy, feminine sense of power to think that he didn't know—yet—why he had always wondered so about her. It gave her an advantage. Women have just so much to bargain with, she thought, and even a small advantage is a great help.

She opened the door and greeted Grace and Charlie Barnes with an enthusiasm that startled them and helped her conceal a sudden burst of inner hilarity. She had just realized that for a moment she had forgotten the original point of asking Charlie Barnes to meet Scott. It was like found money now. She felt the exaltation of a gambler floating on a run of luck.

THE stir of introductions swept the traces of tension from the air. Scott was all amiable charm to Grace, who fluttered. He quickly found points of common interest with Charlie Barnes. He passed cocktails. Stacy watched him with almost luxurious satisfaction. Pink with suppressed admiration, Grace caught her eye and Stacy smiled back, but not possessively—hospitably. A gracious hostess glad to have pleased an appreciative friend.

"Stacy," said Charlie Barnes, "I don't know when I've seen you looking so well. What have you been doing to yourself?"

"Oh, just living right, Charlie. You know, early to bed, good plain food ——"

"They never tell," said Scott Pearson confidentially. "It's the real secret weapon, I've decided after years of research."

"Happy, happy research!" said Stacy. "Can't you see he's enjoyed every minute of it, Grace?"

"He certainly doesn't look worn down by it," said Grace generously.

Stacy thought it was really generous of her. Compared with Scott, Charlie Barnes looked dusty. As though years of working, paying bills, rising to vice-president had sifted over him an impalpable fine dust of fatigue. His face was kind and lined and blurred and, at the moment, reflective.

"THAT'S a very interesting idea of his," Charlie Barnes said to Stacy. "This South American business."

"South America?"

"Stacy and I hadn't got that far," explained Scott. "I'm thinking of hitching up the old notion wagon again, Stacy. Only this time it's going to be all mine, if I can manage it. I'd like to peddle for myself."

"A small export company," Charlie Barnes phrased it more respectably, "might not do so badly right now."

"South America," said Stacy reverently. It was so perfect. She could see the great curl of surf bowing to the vast hotels along the sweep of beach near Rio. The opulent tango beat of Argentina. She said, "Why, Scott, how very bright and enterprising of you!"

"Oh, how exciting!" breathed Grace unselfishly.

"It would be fun, you know," said Scott.

Fun, thought Stacy, was a weak word. The accelerated projector of her imagination ran off a series of pictures that slid rapidly across the inner screen of her mind. Heads turning as she and Scott, a couple to turn heads anywhere, walked into a hotel, a restaurant, the best in Rio or Buenos. Yellow Brazilian diamonds. A long dinner table, herself at the head, with scope at last to show what she was capable of. A whole frame of life from which she could look out with the feeling, nobly heightened, of looking out a taxicab window, removed from the jostling pedestrian crowd.

We cannot tell how long love lasts. We cannot swear to that fidelity. But we can swear the fidelity of friends—whatever the emotional event, quarrel or separation, never to traduce the character or betray the secrets and intimacies of other people; to behave honorably, whatever the affective grievance.

—GEORGE BUCHANAN, Words for Tonight (Constable & Co., Ltd.).

Her disciplined social instincts automatically helped her make conversation, but inwardly she was so far away that Grace's hand on her arm startled her. A little tardily she took in what Grace had said.

She protested, "But Grace, you've just come!"

"Dear, we've been here hours," exaggerated Grace Barnes firmly. "And Charlie's tired." Grace always decided when Charlie Barnes was or was not tired, according to the demands of the occasion as she saw them.

She looked so small, loyal and determined as she rose from her chair that Stacy gave her a rare impulsive hug. "You're stubborn," she said warmly, "a stubborn little piece!"

"That's what Charlie says," said Grace, beaming. She linked her arm lightly in Stacy's, flattered and pleased by her unusual demonstrativeness, and they walked together toward the bedroom and Grace's coat. "I do love these roses," said Grace. "Every time I see them I like them even better."

"They're fun, aren't they?" agreed Stacy.

"Stacy!" said Grace, as soon as they were private and safe. "He's so attractive!"

Stacy smiled and dusted a large feather powder puff shieldingly across her face. "I thought that you'd enjoy him," she said casually.

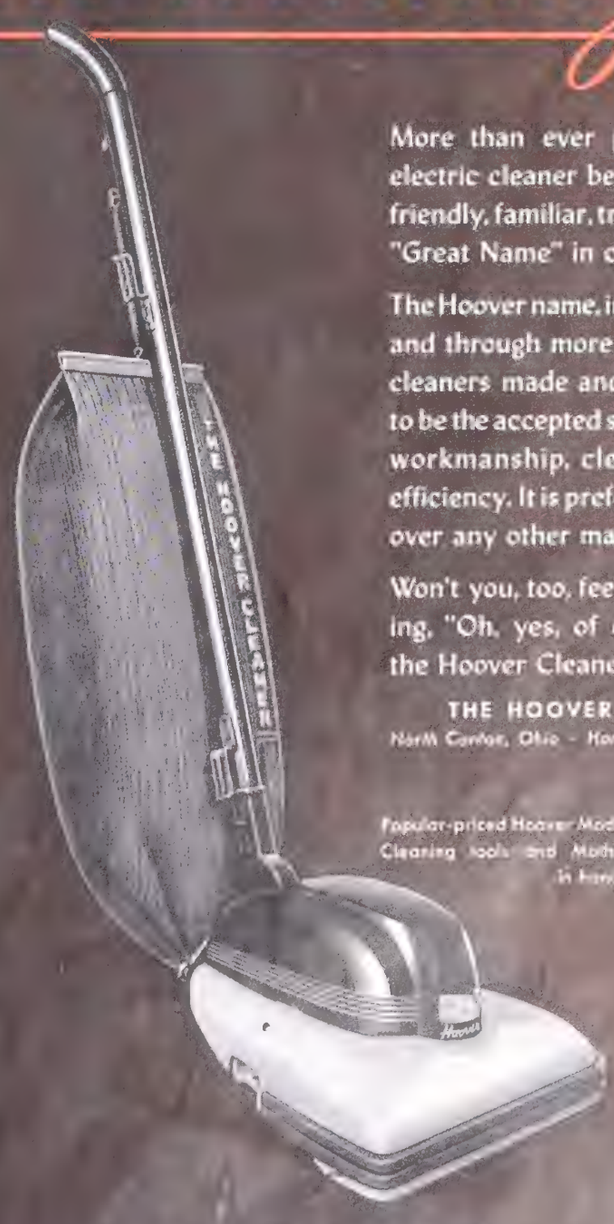
"Stacy, I know you won't want to, now, but I promised Charlie to ask you. He wanted you to have dinner with us tomorrow night. A man—I think he's an investment banker—is coming from St. Louis and Charlie wants to give him sort of a special evening; he's somebody quite important. But I know you won't have time—it makes me so mad, the way everything always comes at once, or not at all! And Charlie says he's a widower too."

(Continued on Page 111)

Hoover

"Great Name

in cleaning



More than ever people buy t electric cleaner because it has th friendly, familiar, trusted name—t "Great Name" in cleaners.

The Hoover name, in nearly 40 yea and through more than 6,000,0 cleaners made and sold, has co to be the accepted standard of val workmanship, cleaning ease a efficiency. It is preferred two-to-o over any other make.

Won't you, too, feel prouder in st ing, "Oh, yes, of course I boug the Hoover Cleaner!"

THE HOOVER COMPANY
North Canton, Ohio - Hamilton, Ontario, Can

Popular-priced Hoover Model 28. Cleaning tools and Mechanizer in handy kit

It beats . . . as it sweeps . . . as it cleans*

"Nope...it's not done with mirrors!"

This half-and-half floor demonstration shows you why more women use Johnson's Glo-Coat than any other floor polish

SAVE MONEY by buying the larger sizes

Eyes quickly turn to the right side . . . the bright side . . . of this charming room. Linoleum colors are sparkling fresh . . . wood flooring is shining clean!

This is the kind of lustrous new beauty you can look forward to when you use Johnson's Glo-Coat on your linoleum and varnished wood floors. Without rubbing or buffing, Glo-Coat brings a wax-polished glow of youth to surfaces that might otherwise soon begin to show their age. It's as bright and durable a self-polishing wax luster as science has produced.

Can you imagine anything more perfect for playroom or kitchen floors? You know how children are . . . they spill things, track in mud. But with Glo-Coat's tough wax protection, dirt doesn't readily penetrate. Linoleum life is lengthened for many years. An occasional wipe with a damp cloth keeps a floor clean and sanitary.

You'll find Johnson's Self Polishing Glo-Coat is easy to apply . . . dries in 20 minutes. No rubbing, no buffing . . . because Glo-Coat shines as it dries.

For long-lasting gloss, for lustrous floor beauty . . . remember, it's Johnson's Self Polishing Glo-Coat.

Hear Fibber McGee and Molly — Tuesday nights — NBC

FIVE FAMOUS JOHNSON POLISHES

Self Polishing Glo-Coat, Paste Wax, Liquid Wax, Cream Wax, Carnu for cars

New! DRAX Johnson's new product DRAX gives invisible wax protection to clothes and fabrics. DRAX-treated garments resist dirt, keep fresh longer, are easier to wash and iron. Look for the DRAX tag on garments you buy. Ask your laundry and dry cleaner for DRAX service. Coming soon! DRAX for household use. Write for information. S. C. JOHNSON & SON, Inc., Racine, Wisconsin.

(Continued from Page 109)

"Oh, Grace," laughed Stacy, "you are a goose, you really are!"

Instinctively she hedged her bet, superstitiously she avoided admitting her luck in case she should spoil it. So she assured Grace she'd probably love to have dinner.

"Scott's perfectly apt to light out tomorrow as suddenly as he came," she said, "and anyway, if I could ever be any help to you and Charlie! You know I'd be thrilled."

"Stacy," said Grace Barnes helplessly, "Stacy, you're—well, you're just wonderful."

"My dear!" said Stacy deprecatingly. "Suppose I call you in the morning, and we'll fix it, one way or another."

They went back to the other room in time to hear Charlie Barnes saying something hearty about lunch downtown to Scott.

"In the morning," murmured Grace, "let me know."

Stacy nodded, promising the answers to everything Grace's elliptical question asked, and closed the door behind the Barneses. She turned around, one hand still on the doorknob. The long cool curves of her body in the clever black dress were pulled into sharp relief against the white panels of the door.

"Aren't they nice?" she said.

"Very nice," said Scott. "They're fond of you, Stacy."

"I hope so," she said modestly. "I'm fond of them."

And so she was. Her friendship with Grace had turned out very well. It proved the wisdom of choosing for a friend a slightly older woman who was interested in helping, not competing. Stacy felt real love for Grace.

"Very nice," repeated Scott. "But you always have nice friends, don't you?" He began to prowl restlessly around the room. From over near the river windows he said, "I bet I'm the only bum you know!"

Stacy just looked at him derisively. The close-cut, crisp hair. The cuff link that gleamed as he put up a hand and gave the back of his head a quick, hard knuckling. The hang of his clothes, the manner he wore that she knew brought headwaiters running.

"This clean collar," Scott interrupted her as though she had spoken, "is a disguise. Protective coloring."

"It fooled Charlie Barnes," said Stacy, deciding to laugh. "I hope," she added, vexation ruffling her voice. "He's - Charlie's in a position to help you, Scott. I should think ——"

"I know you do," said Scott. "And you never take any time off either, I realize now. It impresses me. It's always impressed me, the way you use your head. That, and the way you always have not only nice friends but useful friends."

STACY caught the shift in his attitude toward her emotionally before her mind really battened on the implications of his words. She stepped away from the door, her body erect and collected. She was annoyed, righteously annoyed. After all, she had gone to considerable trouble to help Scott Pearson.

"It's always terribly amusing," she said, her voice as bright as sun on ice, "to see how perfectly naturally old friends can take so much for granted."

"Not you, dear," said Scott. "Never you, Stacy! Next to four-wheel brakes, you can bring an old friend out of a slight skid faster than —— Well, as I told you, I'm a shiftless type. In spite of the clean collar and South America."

"My dear," said Stacy absently, "you positively rattle."

She didn't understand what had thrown him into this odd mood, but she did understand that he was warning her he was a bad matrimonial risk. With the admirable courage that had never allowed her to yield easily Stacy informed herself firmly that Scott was fighting himself; thrashing around in an instinctive male struggle to escape the hook of responsibility, much as the bait attracted him.

"Do I rattle?" said Scott, and cocked an eyebrow at her. "I must have that fixed. What I'm getting at, though, is that no amount of repairing will ever bring me up to your high standard of efficiency. I don't run right. Just look at this evening: would you believe it, all the time I was talking to Charlie Barnes—and I do appreciate your thought in asking him, Stacy—all I could think of was that he'd interrupted my train of thought! How's that for shiftless?"

STACY felt chilly. The heat must have been turned off. That was the trouble with these old houses, they weren't managed properly. She asked Scott what train of thought the Barneses had interrupted. She knew he'd escaped her. He was wily, he'd had too much experience in protecting his freedom.

"Why," said Scott, walking over and standing near her, "I was thinking of kissing you! What do you think of that? Would you have kissed me back, I wonder?"

Her afternoon recollections of all his easy success with women came flooding back to Stacy. He was the kind of man, she thought severely, who'd never been made to understand that love wasn't a matter of lightly given kisses, that it was a fair bargain, that right-thinking men saw it so and paid up. It might still be useful, she thought, to show him she was a woman who didn't forget the value of her side of the bargain just because he looked at her with his bright, confident hazel eyes.

"I might have," she said indifferently, and waited to see how the novelty of indifference affected him.

Scott grinned at her. The lines of his face crinkled into rays of amusement. "Past tense!" he said. "You're wonderful, Stacy; you're the only completely consistent woman I've ever known! You know a bad bargain when you see one, don't you? You always have. I think I'll kiss you anyway, just for instance ——"

He gave her one brisk, innocuous buss. Turned her around and gave her a friendly spank. "Run put your hat on," he said. "Let's go find some dinner."

Stacy left him to put on her hat, feeling as though she had been driving a car and had someone, somehow, reach over and take the steering wheel bodily out of her hands. She couldn't figure it out and she never did, particularly since she agreed with Scott that she'd been perfectly consistent in everything she'd done.

By the time she had her hat on, though, she'd figured out the line she'd take with Grace Barnes when she called her in the morning to accept the invitation for dinner. She would say it was maddening, the way women always had to make a choice. That Scott had all the charm in the world, but when it came to a matter of marriage—there it was, charm and dependability never seemed to come in the same package.

Picking up her marten scarf, she glanced in the long mirror; she was pleased with her reflection, she really looked very smart. She couldn't do better, she decided, than to wear exactly the same costume for dinner the next evening. The St. Louis investment banker, the substantial widower, sounded very promising. Stacy's spirits rallied strongly as she pulled on her gloves and completely readjusted her plans for investment in the rising market of the future. THE END

We may all learn from the Chinese boy who reported that "I am now reading the Bible and behaving it."

—Religious Digest.

My wife and the woman next door have quit speaking because of trouble the children had. The children were playing together again in a few minutes, but the mothers are still mad.

—CLAUDE CALLEN.
Quoted in Capper's Weekly.

To enjoy a thing exclusively is to exclude yourself from the true enjoyment of it.

—THOREAU.

MANSION OR BUNGALOW

YOU CAN AFFORD THE BEST!

...and the best is

CHROMCraft

the finest name in chrome dinettes!

No matter what your household budget, there's a CHROM*Craft* dinette to fit within your means. Beautifully designed, made of gleaming, tubular, chrome steel...with colorful upholstery that WEARS and WEARS. CHROM*Craft* dinettes come in three smart table-top styles...porcelain, enamel and NEW PLASTIC that's stain-proof, heat-resistant, and easy to clean. A CHROM*Craft* dinette will make your kitchen the happiest, most-lived-in room in your home. CHROM*Craft* is Mrs. America's Favorite!

AT YOUR FAVORITE FURNITURE AND DEPARTMENT STORES

CHROMCraft DINETTE FURNITURE

DIVISION OF

AMERICAN FIXTURE & MANUFACTURING COMPANY

2300 LOCUST ST. ST. LOUIS 3, MISSOURI

GLOSHEEN*

THE HEART OF YOUR

COLOR SCHEME

Do as many decorators do—trust to Glosheen* for your color ideas. "African Daisies," Glosheen's new bow tied bouquet print, for example, brings its own light hearted color scheme right into your favorite setting. Here's rich fuchsia for deep toned slipcovers, chartreuse to brighten your walls, and nature's own blue and green for background. Trust to Glosheen too, for lasting beauty that's guaranteed by the Waverly* Bond to keep its crisp, shimmering finish and fresh flower colors through repeated washings, cleanings and exposure to brightest sunlight.

*Reg. Trademarks

GLOSHEEN Waverly GUARANTEE BOND ONE OF Schumacher's WAVERLY Bonded FABRICS

COLOR TRICKS GALORE WITH FABRICS

WAVERLY Bonded FABRICS, Dept. W-31
F. Schumacher & Co., 60 W. 40th St., New York 18, N. Y.

Please send me your decorating booklet "Color Tricks Galore with Fabrics." I enclose 10¢ to cover cost of mailing.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

WHY RELIGION HELPS MESS UP THE WORLD

(Continued from Page 40)

earthly ministry He stood out too big—much too big—for His contemporaries, with their legalisms, ritualisms and religious conventionalities, so now the impression made by Christ Himself of size and range, of universality of outlook and spirit, so that He needs the whole world to operate in and the whole world needs Him, stands in sharp and shameful contrast with the impressions which the churches make. I speak from inside the church, loving it, after a lifetime of ministry believing in it and loyal to it, but deeply troubled by its trivialities, its divisive littleness, its emphasis on small peculiarities that split and dissever the world it was meant to unify. To have a Master and Lord Who impresses even unbelievers with His universal range and sweep, so that H. G. Wells said, "His is easily the dominant figure in history," and then to have churches, supposed to represent Him, which impress even believers as much too petty and small-minded to meet the world's need, is indeed a tragedy.

One bedeviling factor that causes this evil is our scrambling of universals and local peculiarities as though they were equally important. They certainly are not, any more in religion than in family life. Our homes have local peculiarities: our special types of houses, our special diets, our methods of housekeeping, our gadgets, our cherished household traditions, and all the details that make a home our home, and not someone else's. But in fine family life there are universals, too, without which nothing else matters. True love and loyalty between man and woman, the fulfillment of romance in friendship, the desire for children and love of them, the creation of an abiding unity out of the sacred trinity—father, mother, child—such factors in a home know no boundaries of race or nation, and in comparison with them the special material our houses are built of, and the various gadgets they are furnished with, are of minor import.

Religion is like that. Its local peculiarities are to be cherished and enjoyed, but the big matters in religion are universals, and when they are made central religion begins to draw men together instead of ripping them apart.

To some this insistence on the priority of universals will suggest surrender of Christian conviction for the sake of liberality and breadth. They will think it leads to shallowness. This, however, is the very reverse of the truth. That a house is built of brick instead of bamboo is not the deep factor in a home while the true love of man and woman is but superficial; and no more in religion are the universals shallow and the local peculiarities profound. When we say that the truths of science are universal, are we not thinking of the profoundest scientific truths, the great laws true everywhere and for all? So, one who makes central, as Christ did, the spirit's universal laws is not so much spreading out as plunging deep. One God of all mankind—that's deep. One Spirit, strengthening us with power in the inner man; one moral law, of which the Sermon on the Mount is our noblest utterance; the dreadful fact of sin and the desperate need of saviorhood; the transiency of the seen and the eternity of the unseen—such faiths go deep.

The profoundest elements in Christianity, as in any religion, strike the universal note. It is utterly unrealistic to minimize the differences between the world's great faiths; they are real and critical; but when Jesus announces His profoundest insights, as for example when He describes prayer as solitary communion with the unseen Spirit, a Hindu answers, "I make prayer mine inmost friend," and a Moslem says, "Allah is nearer to you than the great vein of your neck." C. F. Andrews, a very influential missionary in India, was working on this basis when he said, concerning his approach to the Indian people: "I always assume that they are Christian; and after I have talked with them

NOW!
GLAMOROUS NEW
Kem-Tone COLORS!

1. Kem-Tone ... the miracle synthetic resin and oil finish!
2. Kem-Tone ... covers most surfaces—paint, plaster, even wallpaper—in one coat!
3. Kem-Tone ... applies like magic! Dries in one hour!
4. Kem-Tone is economical!

$3.49 ONE GALLON DECORATES AVERAGE ROOM
(ONE GALLON MAKES 1½ GAL. FINEST PAINT, READY TO APPLY)

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

The modern miracle wall finish

Kem-Tone

AVALON B

DRIES IN 1 HOUR
ONE COAT COVERS

COVER THE EARTH PRODUCT OF
SHERWIN-WILLIAMS RESEARCH
BLE CRS

BRINGING THE MARVELS OF SCIENCE TO YOUR HOME

SEE YOUR Kem-Tone DEALER

while I sometimes see the light of Christ heir eyes." In presenting the universals is faith, he knew he had the best chance aving the old psalm come true: "Deep th unto deep."
he importance of this matter appears not e on the world-wide field, but here at
e. My radio mail for years has revealed what keeps many people, especially ng people, from being Christian is the ndary trivialities which they hear ssed in the churches. It is the local pe-arities they balk at. They have identified Christian Gospel with them. A physician, said, having hung out his sign in a comnity and waited in vain for a practice, put addition on it: "Small fevers gratefully epted." That sign could appropriately
g on many a church.
count it a privilege to have dealt with y men and women thus in revolt against istianity's local trivia, and to have had chance to lead them back, until they had ace Christianity's universal profundities.
ere, at least, the e arguments they been using against istianity did not
ly; there, at least,
y had to confess
t they were resisting real Christianity,
its caricature;
re, at least, they had
face great matters
t reach far and go p: the Sermon on Mount; the Para-
of the Prodigal
; the first chapter
ohn's Gospel, with ight lighting every n coming into the
ld; the thirteenth
pter of First Co-
hians; the letter to Ephesians about
prehending "the
adth, and length,
d depth, and ght," and knowing
e love of Christ,
ch passeth knowl-
e, that ye may be d unto all the ful-
s of God."
Our shame as Chris-ns is that in the spel committed to care there is this
adth, length, depth,
d height, and that
have so shifted our phasis from that to local peculiarities
t we have become tarian, partisan,
vincial, cooped up
the confines of our isolated cultures. The spel in our hands sometimes seems like a at ship made to sail the seven seas, but so ttered with small barnacles that it can rdly move.
Yet of all eras in history this is the time greatness in religion. Thank God for the ristian leadership that today sees that,
d for the inclusive, ecumenical movents of life and thought in the churches that present it!

this endeavor to disentangle the Chris-n universals from the special settings and nesions that have come from our local tures, Christianity faces a competition on e outcome of which the future of mand's religion depends. Confronting this e world where isolation is no longer possible, e best thinkers in all religions recognize at their local peculiarities cannot persuade e world—never!
When we think of Hinduism, or Budism, or Islam, we know that their details cult, their differentia of thought and actice peculiar to their special histories, ve no chance of being even understood, uch less accepted by us. As well try to rsuade South Sea Islanders to live in kimo igloos, or us here to live in bamboo houses. Thus local, thus peculiar to their special cultures are the "mint and anise and cummin" of all religions. Thoughtful Hindus, Buddhists and Moslems, therefore, are busy unscrambling the universals of their faiths from their local peculiarities, preparing to face the world saying:

"This is essential Hinduism, or Buddhism, or Mohammedanism, the profound gist of the matter with the superficial accretions stripped off."

I AM not saying that when this is done the essentials of these various religions will agree. They certainly will not. There are real differences. But I am saying that this endeavor to get at the universal essence of the great religions is one of the most momentous movements of thought that have taken place in our time; that we Christians must meet it; that we cannot meet it with our petty sectarianism; that Christianity's hope now depends on presenting to the world the universal profundities of the Gospel.

This does not mean that we must surrender our cherished habits of thought and worship. There is no use pretending to be bigger than we are. We cannot live on universals alone in religion any more than in family life. Our local peculiarities are often precious. So Kipling sang:

God gives all men all earth to love,
But since man's heart is small,
Ordains for each one spot should prove Beloved over all;

and then rejoiced in the one locality he loved best, his "Sussex by the sea"! Such delight in an accustomed and cherished locality is natural and right in every area of our lives, but Kipling also sang:

What should they know of England who only England know?

The special "Sussex" he cherished because of his peculiar heritage, dear as it was to him, had no business in the center of the total picture, as though he could persuade all mankind to love that.

So our sectarian peculiarities have their uses. The separate churches have performed an important function in history, representing minority convictions which the majority was denying or neglecting, and, often with creative vitality, playing the part of trail blazers and pioneers. Today, however, that emphasis is not enough. We are living in one world—one world, not only for the nations, but for religion too. To have religion go on as one of the most estranging and alienating forces on earth, as it is now, so that even in common speech religious prejudice is paired with racial prejudice as a major curse of mankind, will never do. "New occasions teach new duties," and our new era with desperate urgency calls for a kind of religion that will make for unity, mutual understanding, inclusiveness and brotherhood.

What that involves a great Protestant, Bossuet, once put into a ringing phrase: "Speak to me only of necessary truths." Let the various churches and religions answer that call, and our children might have some chance of living in a world where spiritual community undergirds the endeavors after international peace. So may God grant!

THE END

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Portrait

BY E. V. GRIFFITH

They thought my father, since he lived alone,
Distrustful of his fellows: yet he bore
Five sons with backs as strong as pasture stone,
God-fearing titans sturdy at the core.
My father lived apart from other men,
Was stern, and never sang, and rarely spoke,
And yet he planted in one mountain glen
Three orchards and a grove of towering oak.
My father's single passion was the land—
Whatever grew my stoic sire could grow.
Dead seeds found life beneath his nursing hand.
He reaped from slopes that no one else would sow.
And, dead, my father, like his seeds, each spring
Awakens in some green and growing thing.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Cotton and Color

. . . make a Tumble-Twist boy's room that's livable, lovable, and wonderfully tubbable!

At last! A boy's room you can keep soap'n water clean right down to the Tumble-Twist Rug on the floor. Of warm, all-woven cotton bouclé, Tumble-Twist Rugs have permanently twisted loops . . . are pre-shrunk and color-fast. They actually look lovelier with laundering! For room beauty that's practical, plan decorating around Tumble-Twist Rugs! In room sizes and scatter sizes, in refreshing, garden-gay pastels and deep tones. At America's smartest stores.

BOY'S ROOM WITH A FUTURE! A "pin-up" board for the moment's interests . . . a toy bin made from a clothes hamper . . . and bookcases with "boy-height" shelves make orderliness easy. Build up a new color scheme by re-dying the Tumble-Twist Rug . . . a new paint job . . . a few changes in accessories, and—presto!—a big boy's room or one for guests.

Room Plan Courtesy Better Homes and Gardens
Rug Illustrated Is Tumble-Twist No. 1111 Medium Blue

So Bright! So Right! Tumble-Twist Rugs come in a rainbow range of colors, all decorator-approved and color-fast. Their exclusive stagger-woven texture flatters any style of furniture.

So Easy to Keep Clean! Simply shake out the dirt from scatter-size Tumble-Twists. Use drapery attachment of vacuum for daily cleaning of room sizes . . . send to laundry for washing.

Tumble-Twist RUGS

"They look even lovelier with laundering"

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

LIBERTYVILLE TEXTILES, LIBERTYVILLE 1, ILLINOIS

"In 3 Minutes, this Simple Test Showed us How to buy a Radio-Phonograph" say Mr. and Mrs. Louis Bos of Dolton, Ill.

1. "We asked our radio dealer to play one of our favorite records (an orchestral number we have at home) on any well-known radio-phonograph in his store except the new Zenith with the COBRA TONE ARM. We listened carefully to this music we know so well . . . ➟

2. "Then we asked him to play the same record on the new Zenith with the COBRA TONE ARM. The difference was breath-taking! Others make claims about fine tone, but here was our record as we'd never heard it before . . . with beautiful shadings we never realized were there...with all distracting surface noise and rattle gone—as if erased by magic! In 3 minutes, we knew we'd never be happy with anything but a COBRA TONE ARM Zenith!"

LATER, Mr. and Mrs. Bos found that even their oldest records gave them a brand new thrill through the COBRA's magic. For the COBRA uses no crystals, no magnets, but reproduces tones an entirely new way—on a Radionic Wave! And it floats so lightly in the groove (only ⅔ of an ounce) that records also stay like new—you enjoy them hundreds of plays longer. It's foolproof, too . . . drop the COBRA, even scrape it across records . . . its filament retracts so nothing's harmed!

What's more, Zenith's new Silent-Speed Record Changer gently, quietly, changes 10 inch records, 12 inch, or both sizes mixed—so quickly that you enjoy a practically continuous flow of music. Like Mr. and Mrs. Bos, you too will learn how to buy a radio-phonograph from this thrilling demonstration. In just 3 minutes, it will show the way to years of extra enjoyment that only a Zenith can give. Get the proof at your radio dealer's today!

NO OTHER INSTRUMENT . . . AT ANY PRICE . . . CAN GIVE YOU THIS SENSATIONAL NEW WAY TO PLAY RECORDS!

ONLY ZENITH LONG DISTANCE RADIO HAS THE AMAZING

COBRA TONE ARM

ZENITH RADIO CORPORATION, CHICAGO 39, ILLINOIS • 30 YEARS OF "KNOW-HOW" IN RADIONICS EXCLUSIVELY

Vibrant red against white walls and woodwork. Red for the handmade carved wool rug, and flame-bright linings of silk damask draperies.

ROOM IN RED AND WHITE

By H. T. Williams

Red is a fine color, yet it has some pitfalls. It welcomes harmony with its happiest. The sophisticated red and white living room of this city house has proved that a room treated in striking color can be an amiable, pleasant background for living. The assured, spirited qualities of bright reds—depending, of course, on tall, stuffy interior relationship with city shades or country charm with silk or homespun—with polished rosewood or scrubbed pine.

Red, perfect, soft, not frantic, but splashed boldly and dramatically against white. Suppose the balance of power in white is given to the more red, warm and assertive. Use both of them in tone and texture for interest. White, of course, is variable in color. It may be: Hot red. Like an over-yellowed white while blue is a perfect cultured oyster or cool-shadowed white. Gilt and brass, as well as black painted metals, have an affinity for red—pink, a tentative, at the basic hue, may be used with great success.

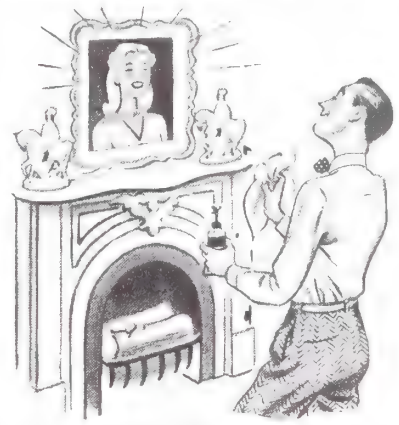
In this room, for example, the walls might have been pink, the draperies of pink, red and white patterned schantz. Or the room might have been pink, with sheer white curtains against red and white patterned wallpaper, with accents of clear fire engine red in furniture and in accessories introduced throughout the room.

Dark red-violet wool sofa in dramatic contrast to chairs of nail-studded white leather and red-striped chintz.

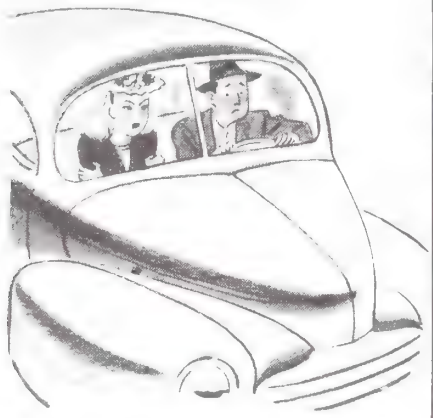
Johnny watched a passing shower,
Nose against the pane.

Mother sprayed some WINDEX and
The window's bright again!

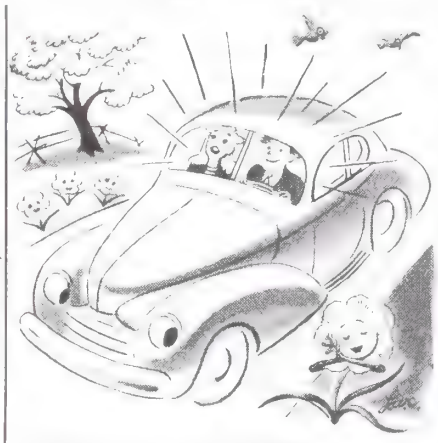
Dad was helping Mother, but
His fingers marked the glass.



A dash of WINDEX made it shine—
Dad knew his work would pass!

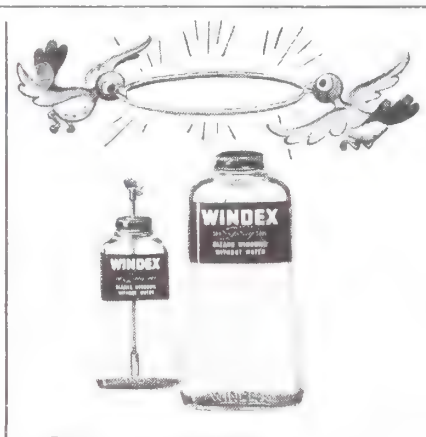


Driving in the early spring
Kate was bored for hours.



Walter used some WINDEX—
Now she sees the pretty flowers!

Picture glass and window panes
And windshields gleam for you.



Spray some WINDEX, wipe it off—
Your glass shines bright as new!

WINDEX is a must for house cleaning! No streaking, no film, when you insist on this dustless, noninflammable, oil-free cleaner. Don't trust cheap substitutes!

Get Brighter Windows Quicker With—

WINDEX

TRADE MARK REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. by The Drackett Company

COSTS LESS THAN A PENNY PER WINDOW—EVEN THRIFTIER IN THE BIG 20-OUNCE SIZE

Copr. 1947, by The Drackett Co.

DESIGN FOR NOVEMBER

(Continued from Page 42)

so many offers from rival institutions of learning that he was promoted to the rank of full professor more quickly than anyone else had ever been since the founding of Creston University.

Before the two-o'clock race that sent him to Italy and into the arms of Leona, Leonard Maxwell lived in a brown-painted apartment house in the section of Creston that all good Crestonians do their best to forget. South of the river and fairly convenient to the campus, the streets lie close and thick, so that computed by area the Hollow, as it is called, covers only a tenth of Creston. It is in the Hollow that the students who do not live in the well-appointed dormitories cluster in little baching apartments. Between the Hollow and the campus live the young married instructors on their twenty-one hundred a year; also a few unmarried women of various academic ranks. But no faculty members live in the Hollow, none except graduate assistants, and they are a group apart. The faculty regard them as students and the students regard them as faculty. Everyone hopes that they will quickly earn their doctors' degrees and go away.

Creston is especially beautiful in October. The Triangle is hilly and rocky, and the vacant lots are blood red with sumac. On silent evenings the smoke rises from the smoldering heaps of leaves, and the sky over the Triangle hangs heavy with the sweet memory of the Maxwell cannas, the McCarroll begonias, and the humbler zinnias and marigolds.

It is then that the desire to live always in Creston rises most strongly in the heart, and the determination to move to another town slackens. Even at the opposite end of the year, in the restless spring, people are always saying, "Creston is a lovely place to live in"; "I don't see how I can live anywhere else now"; and "This is the place we've been looking for—this is it—this is home."

Sam Forester, graduate assistant in the Art Department, was a little afraid as he took Catharine down Collins Street and stopped outside No. 931 that she would think this place no better than Ryan's. He wanted her to be pleased and excited, to recognize that this move was in the right direction, a tiny edging nearer the way of living they were looking forward to, and which they considered their right. Sam knew very well that Catharine had married him in the full knowledge that for a few years she would have no luxury and not much comfort, and he considered himself a most fortunate man to have won her. He looked forward to the day when he might reward her with the news of a permanent appointment and a reasonably comfortable salary.

UNTIL that time it was a stretch to move from Ryan's to Foxy's. It would hurt a little financially, but if it meant some earnest of what he intended for Catharine's future, it was worth it for Sam.

"What's the rent?" asked Catharine.

"Thirty-seven-fifty."

"Couldn't you make it thirty-five?"

Foxy shook his head.

Sam looked at Catharine. She must be liking the appearance of it or she wouldn't haggle over two-fifty a month. It might be that she was wearing the severe and disapproving look in order to deceive Foxy. But Foxy seemed unimpressed. He was sucking a toothpick, the flat end of which he now and then prodded with a dirty forefinger and thumb.

"What do you say?" asked Sam.

CATHARINE surveyed the room from the buff-colored chair. Heavy raspberry-colored curtains hung at the edges of the only window. The walls were sandy, with three or four lighter rectangles where the pictures belonging to the previous renters had hung.

"It's cozy," said Sam, to break the silence.

Foxy looked unconcerned, pursed his lips as if to whistle, emitted no sound, and gazed into the street. "There's twelve other parties that'll be glad to take it if you don't," he observed.

After a little pause Catharine said, "Let's take it."

Sam was relieved. He liked this place better than any of the others, even the forty-five-dollar ones, but he wanted Catharine to have the final choice. At this moment it seemed a bit unsavory, but that was Foxy more than the apartment.

Foxy, with a yellow-toothed smile, closed the door behind them. They walked home, light of heart. It was a joy to go back to the fourth floor at Mrs. Ryan's now that they knew they would be out of it at the end of the month.

As they opened the door a warm smell of cabbage pushed itself out and dispersed into the sweet night air.

"That's one thing," said Sam, "the new place won't have."

"Isn't there a janitor in the basement?"

"Didn't you hear me ask? I checked on the amount of cooking he did."

Sam headed for the bathroom and Catharine searched along the bookshelves for Vanity Fair. Reading was a double pleasure at Ryan's. It took the mind off the cold in winter and off the heat in summer. It whisked you out of the drabness of the furnishings and it even quelled the smell of cabbage and washing and garbage.

When Sam came out of the bathroom Catharine was so deep in the Battle of Waterloo that she did not even raise her eyes. Sam glanced over at her and settled into his own chair with The Golden Bough.

Halfway through the evening the telephone bell rang.

"Where have you been? I've been calling all evening."

"Oh, it's you, Mrs. Cornish."

Catharine put her book down and listened.

"She is? . . . Sure we can be there. . . . If you think it will help. . . . Three-fifty. . . . That'll be easy. . . . I know how you feel. . . . Well, you'll see tomorrow. . . . Don't worry about it. . . . Good-by!"

Sam put the receiver down thoughtfully.

"What on earth are you letting us in for? And what's going to cost us three-fifty?"

"Three-fifty is a train."

It annoyed Sam that Catharine's constant preoccupation with expense came out at such moments. But almost as soon as he was conscious of the annoyance he pushed it aside, remembering how poor he was and how little he had to give her.

"Where do we have to be?" she asked.

(Continued on Page 118)

Next Month

Norah watched them—Liz and her son—walking hand in hand. As she heard them laughing together, she remembered another time and another love. And, like the other one, this was all wrong. But only some chanced-upon letters, the note in a woman's voice, showed her finally what she must do.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE MOON

By Martha Albrand

condensed from the novel soon to be published by Random House, complete in the May JOURNAL.

LOUISE ALLBRITTON, featured in the Universal-International production, "THE EGG AND I."

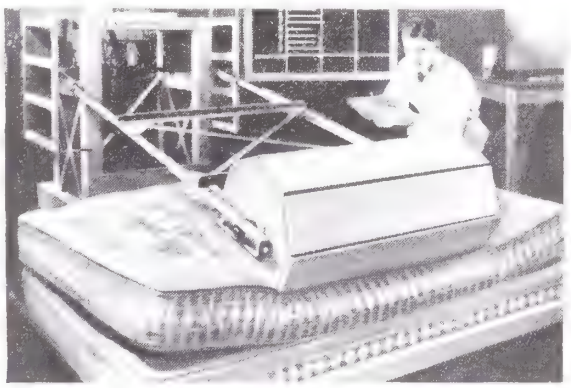
Louise Allbritton discovers the secret of "luxury sleeping comfort"

What gives a Beautyrest mattress the "luxury comfort" other mattresses don't seem to have? e answer is simple: Inside, Beautyrest is built dif-ently! To dramatize this difference, we asked Louise britton to make the "glass of water test."

2. First . . . notice what happens when Louise puts the water glass on the springs of an ordinary mattress, and presses near-by coils. The water spills. Why? Ordinary mattress coils are all joined together . . . go down together . . . form uncomfortable hollows.

3. Now see what happens when Louise puts the glass on a Beautyrest spring—and presses down, as above. Each of Beautyrest's 837 individually pocketed coil springs acts on its own . . . conforms to every curve and movement of your body—as springs should.

. Compare! Above, (a), see how an ordinary mattress often sags under you. But below, (b), notice w Beautyrest's individual springs give your back ore restful support. We know the difference—we make th kinds. That's why we recommend Beautyrest.



5. Lasts longer! In "torture tests" made by the U. S. Testing Co., Beautyrest lasted far longer than any other inner-spring mattress tested. P.S. Beautyrest's patented "no-sag" edge keeps edges neat, firm for the lifetime of the mattress, too!

6. "Luxury comfort"—1¢ a night! Beautyrest is guaranteed for ten years, costs only $49.50. This amounts to little more than 1¢ a night! Matching Beautyrest Box Spring also $49.50. For the world's most luxurious sleeping comfort, order both today!

Only SIMMONS makes *Beautyrest

MAKERS OF THE WORLD'S ONLY ELECTRONIC BLANKET AND OTHER FINE-QUALITY BEDDING

G. U. S. PATENT OFFICE
947, SIMMONS CO., MDSE. MART, CHICAGO, ILL.

Tie this one!

it's keen...it's "Krene"
sensational new plastic apron!

- The same "KRENE" brand
- Ruffles stay ruffled and perky
- A gardenful of colors and a
- Won't rot, crack, peel,

Prices from $1.25 to $2.95.

A Krene PLASTIC PRODUCT

IN PLASTIC PRODUCTS
"Krene" is Queen!

"Mrs. Cornish's. Roger's wife is coming."

"Roger's wife?" Catharine drew in her breath sharply and Sam wished he had been able to soften the blow for her, for it was a blow; the way she had drawn her breath betrayed her. Sam felt that a sudden cloud had darkened their evening.

"It's something we have to face, honey," he told her. "As Roger's best friend, I've got to help out."

"She's coming ahead of Roger, then?"

"He's tied up in Europe. She's bringing the baby with her."

"Baby? Has she got a baby?"

"Sure. I told you."

"No, you didn't."

"But you knew."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"I thought I had -honest! Anyway, it all seemed so far away."

Sam floundered. He was unaccustomed to deception, and this was as close to guile as Sam ever got. It had been on the tip of his tongue to mention the news of the baby to Catharine, but each time he tried some little uneasiness stopped him.

Catharine was looking at him steadily and he thought it must be perfectly obvious to her why he was embarrassed. All this elaborate avoidance of a simple piece of news concerning one of her so well, and because everyone had said couple Catharine and had stirred up a little resentment at the them together. Somehow, too, all the important events in Sam's life were tied in Cornishes. He remembered the day he had first met Catharine Mackenzie at one of Mrs. Cornish's Halloween parties. And going farther back, he remembered the day he first met Roger Cornish.

When Sam was eight years old he lived in Cannon Court, a row of small houses on the edge of town. On a fine October afternoon he was sitting on a wall pretending to fish with a stick and a long piece of string when his attention was diverted by a strong whiff of skunk. Sam looked around and saw approaching him a boy a little his junior walking slowly among the imaginary carp and pike. The boy was sniffing and occasionally his whole body shook with a sob. Sam looked at him without much interest until he realized that the powerful waves of skunk smell were coming from the boy.

"What's the matter with you?" he demanded.

"I'm lost."

"Don't you know your way home?"

"I ran away from Ellen. I can't find her anywhere."

"Who's Ellen?"

"She's my nurse."

"Are you sick?" Sam knew about nurses in hospitals.

"No."

"You are too. You smell awful."

The other boy began to whimper.

"What's your name?"

"Roger."

"Roger what?"

"I'm Sam Forester."

Roger stopped whimpering. "Are you fishing?"

"Sure. Want to help?"

"I can't. I'm lost." Roger began to whimper again. "I don't know my way home."

Sam put his rod and line on the wall and jumped down. Roger smelled fearful, but he looked a friendly little fellow and Sam fel sorry for him.

"Where do you live?"

"One-two-five Walnut."

"Walnut?"

"I don't know the way," confessed Roge

"See here, I'll take you."

Roger brightened. "I'll give you my re engine," he promised.

"What happened to you? Why do yo smell like a skunk?"

ROGER told him. He had run away fro Ellen in the woods near the bridge. In th thickest part of them he had tripped an fallen over a black-and-white animal wit beautiful fur. It was still warm when h discovered it, and although something in th woods smelled very strong, he clasped th pretty creature to his chest and continued Then he felt sick and the animal becam distasteful to him. He threw it away and ra out of the woods into the street, a street h had never seen before. He felt better whe he ran and some of the smell seemed to ge left behind, but every time he stopped fo breath, it surged up from his chest. When h grew tired of running he became frightene and then he found himself looking at San

Mrs. Cornish and Ellen were frantic an had already called the police when Sam, wh by now smelled a most as strong a Roger, dragged th unhappy and e hausted little boy t Walnut Street and u the broad steps the house at numb one-twenty-five.

Roger, who ha seemed a frail an pitiable object wh he was lost, now b gan to assert himse In spite of his e haustion and the e citement induced h the women, he clu to Sam and loud demanded that h red engine be fetche Sam was emba rassed. He wanted go, and he could s that the women wanted him to go too.

Roger stamped his foot and Sam looked him in amazement. "I will have my r engine," Roger cried. "I promised. Dad said I must always keep a promise."

Mrs. Cornish burst into tears, sent Ell for the red engine and asked Sam for h name and address. In a few moments Sa had shaken off his embarrassment and w hurrying home smelling strongly of sku but with the reddest, shiniest engine he h ever seen, a legitimate possession.

Life would probably have been ve different for Sam if Roger had been le spirited. Roger insisted that Sam be invit to his party, and because he always had h way, the note of thanks which Mrs. Corni penned to Mrs. Forester was accompanied a scrawled and decorated invitation Roger's Halloween party.

Sam had been so well scrubbed by h mother, who was no more partial to t smell of skunk than the dwellers in the T angle, that he created a favorable impressi at the Cornishes'. His manners were goo better indeed than Roger's, and Mrs. Corni saw no harm in letting the two boys contin their oddly begun friendship.

It was at one of the Cornishes' parties th Sam met Catharine. Being a year and a h older than Roger, Sam moved in a circle his own at school, but their independe friendship survived these shifting circ Catharine was aware of this friendship a she singled out Sam for her smile, only shade less welcoming than the ones she corded Roger. Her poise, for a high-sch freshman, was almost alarming, and she h a very mature trick of looking straight you. She was neither jumpy nor noisy, l many of the other girls. When she smilec Sam, Sam returned the smile, but he kn

(Continued on Page 120)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

I Know It's Spring

By Mae Winkler Goodman

I know it's spring not by the sound
Of bird song quivering, April-sweet,
But by the music on the ground
Of skates that sing along the street.

No crocus need announce the spring
When I behold the magic sight
Of a lad whose heart flows with his string
Into the sky, pinned to a kite!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Our marriage is a perpetual date

I thought, when I married Ted, that I'd miss the fun of our having dates together. But I find it's like having a date every evening.

Best of all, I guess, are our twosome dinners. I dress up for them — I know I'm vain! — and I fuss over the table, wangling flowers from the budget, setting each precious piece of Sterling precisely. It's my Towle Sterling that makes my table so beautiful.

We still go out to exciting new places once in a while. I get all dressed up and I'm as lavish as ever with Ted's favorite perfume. But those real date evenings we linger long over coffee, Ted helps with the dishes, and then we sit in our living room, admiring our home — and each other.

• • •

You'll never lose the desire to 'fuss' if beautiful Towle Sterling makes your table lovely. Towle Sterling is fashioned by skilled craftsmen in solid silver to grace your table for all your lifetime.

See the Towle Sterling patterns—those below and many others including Louis XIV, Old Mirror, Cascade — at your jeweler's; and for new table-setting and Sterling ideas, write to Towle Silversmiths, Dept. J-4, Newburyport, Massachusetts, and ask for the 16-page book, For Gracious Living.

TOWLE
STERLING

OLD LACE

OLD MASTER

(Continued from Page 118)

that if it were a matter of competition with Roger, his only advantage was his age. Fifteen had charms that thirteen and a half lacked, and Sam felt instinctively that in a year or two this advantage would be dissipated. But he was wrong. In spite of the decision of the Creston biddies that Catharine and Roger were made for each other, in spite of the fact that people commented on them at football games, basketball games, dances, concerts and the fashionable eating places, the relationship had fizzled to nothing and Roger had gone to Europe and Catharine had stayed behind. Then the news of Roger's marriage had come, and shortly after that Catharine had consented to marry Sam. For some reason Sam wished that it had happened the other way around. There was the merest hint of second choice in Catharine's acceptance of him, and now, as he felt himself trying to explain why he had not told her about the baby, he seemed to be admitting his fear of it.

She had said, "Why didn't you tell me?" in that sharp, probing way she had, and his reply, "I thought I had. Honest!" sounded like a small boy lying about the stolen cake. And trailing weakly after the lame excuse came: "Anyway, it all seemed so far away."

Catharine let the matter drop as if it were not worthy of further discussion, but she picked up his last fumbling phrase. "It's not going to be far away any longer," she said. "What is it, a boy or a girl?"

"A boy."

"Does he have a name?"

"Roger."

"That's imaginative."

"I'll bet you Roger insisted on that," said Sam, trying to divert attention from known facts to conjecture, "for Grandma Cornish."

"And we're to be there to help out, I take it."

"That's the idea. Mrs. Cornish wants me to drive to the station and for you to stay with her. Ellen's going to have tea ready. They drink a lot of tea in Wales, and Mrs. Cornish figures it will make the girl feel at home."

"Jenny—isn't that her name?"

"Jenny Thomas."

"Jenny Cornish now."

"Jenny Cornish."

Catharine repeated the name slowly, as if she liked the sound of it, then abruptly she picked up Vanity Fair, tucked her legs up on the chair and said no more until bedtime.

But when they were in bed and he put his arm around her she murmured an excuse as if she were sleepy and turned her back to him.

"Any sign of them?"

"No." Catharine stood at the large window of Mrs. Cornish's living room, toying with the woolen fringe on the gray-and-brown curtains.

Mrs. Cornish glanced at her and her face softened. This was the girl she had intended for Roger, a quiet, cultured girl of good family whose mother was in agreement with Regina Cornish on almost every social, political and moral subject. What could have been better?

"I spoiled him," Mrs. Cornish went on. "You know very well I did. He was over twenty-one and he ought to have been able to take care of himself. But I suppose you don't think in the middle of a war. You just act."

Catharine turned from the window and Mrs. Cornish continued.

"There must be thousands of women in Europe ready to fasten on to the nearest American just to get themselves to the States."

"Oh, Mrs. Cornish, it may not be as bad as you think. She may be very sweet. I can't think that Roger ——" Catharine broke off and Mrs. Cornish glanced at her swiftly.

"Catharine darling, come here. Come here and sit by me."

Catharine sat down.

"Forgive me, Catharine, for saying this, and I don't mean to be disloyal to Sam ——"

She paused and Catharine eyed her steadily.

"I'm just a curious old woman," Mrs. Cornish went on, "but if it doesn't embarrass you to tell me, I wish you would. Did Roger ask you to marry him before he went overseas?"

Catharine gave a tiny, confident smile. "No."

"No?"

"No."

Mrs. Cornish looked surprised, and then, to cover her confusion, spoke very rapidly. "You must know, my dear, that Roger didn't confide in me much after he was sixteen or seventeen. I just had to guess things. Even in letters now he never tells me much. But at first it bothered me, and because it bothered me I kept it to myself. And when he went away I wanted to know about you, but somehow I couldn't ask him, and I didn't feel that it was right to ask you—you do understand, don't you?"

"Of course."

"Now that you're happily married to Sam it doesn't seem so hard to ask. You know, two years ago I really hoped that you and Roger—I don't regret it—don't think that—but I've always been so fond of you—I couldn't imagine anyone I'd rather have for a daughter-in-law."

"Thank you. It would have seemed very natural to call you mother."

"That's sweet of you."

The front door slammed shut.

"There they are!"

The women rose and braced themselves for the meeting, but when the door opened, a familiar and excitedly breathless Sam appeared.

"She wasn't there."

"Wasn't there?"

"I looked all over."

"What on earth has happened to her?"

Catharine came to Sam. "Are you sure? Did you look at everybody?"

"I personally inspected every woman with a baby."

Mrs. Cornish sat down and threw up her hands. "What in heaven's name do we do now? Call the police?"

The three of them were so busy contemplating this prospect that they were hardly conscious of a startled Ellen announcing, "Mrs. Cornish, ma'am, and a gentleman with her," when suddenly in their midst was Jenny, dressed in a dark-blue dress with salmon-colored buttons and a round white collar, a small black hat and a salmon-pink ribbon. She was not entirely as Sam had pictured her, but there was something about her that took his breath away as she passed him without a glance and made for Mrs. Cornish. Perhaps it was merely her speed.

"Mrs. Cornish! Mrs. Cornish!" she exclaimed. "How lovely to see you! How beautiful to be here!"

Sam smiled as the girl put her arms around Mrs. Cornish and kissed her warmly. The funny way she spoke was attractive.

Mrs. Cornish, taken aback and not expecting to have this well-prepared situation handled for her, held Jenny away from her and looked into her face. "Let me look at you."

For the first time Sam saw Jenny's face, a white face, too narrow to be pretty, with small blue eyes, a straight nose and a small straight mouth. The dark hair seemed a little overabundant for the little face and the hat was no help.

"You are just as I'd pictured you," said Jenny.

"And you are Jenny!"

"Yes. Do you like me?"

Mrs. Cornish was spared from answering so abrupt and personal a question by seeing for the first time a man in the hallway, a seedy-looking man of about thirty-five, with a baby in his arms and his hat politely dangling from the baby's seat where his firm red hand clasped both.

"Who is that?" asked Mrs. Cornish.

She: "I hear the chief of police is going to stop necking."

He: "I should think he would—a man of his age!"

IMPERIAL Washable WALLPAPERS

Costume by Hattie Carnegie

Fashion firsts for '47

NEW PATTERNS . . . NEW COLORS . . . NEW BEAUTY FOR YOUR HOME

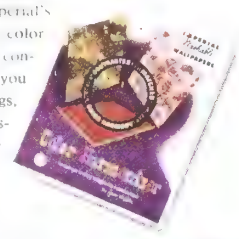
Vibrant with color, sparkling with interest, authentic in design, the new Imperial Washable Wallpapers are now available—ready to give your home the fresh new beauty, the fashion authority that Imperial always provides.

FOR QUALITY AND PRICE PROTECTION LOOK FOR THE IMPERIAL SILVER LABEL

In whatever price range you choose Imperial papers, you can be sure of fair prices . . . established by Imperial and plainly shown in sample books. And you can be sure of the quality . . . Imperial Washable Wallpapers are Color-Locked*, guaranteed washable and light-resistant for lasting beauty.

COLOR HARMONY MADE EASY BY IMPERIAL'S NEW BOOK — COLOR HARMONIZER

Send for Color Harmonizer — the helpful new color harmony guide, written by Joan McLain, Imperial's decorating authority. Authentic color charts show you matching and contrasting harmonies, and enable you to coordinate wallpapers, rugs, draperies, upholstery and accessories with complete assurance of being absolutely correct. Send for your copy today!



*COLOR-LOCKED . . . an exclusive Imperial process by virtue of which all Imperial Washable Wallpapers are guaranteed for 3 years from date of hanging to withstand room exposure without fading and to clean satisfactorily in accordance with the instructions included in every roll. Should any Imperial Washable Wallpaper fail in these respects, it will be replaced without charge.

Imperial Paper and Color Corporation
Dept. L-46, Glens Falls, New York
GENTLEMEN: I am enclosing 25c for my copy of your new Color Harmonizer booklet

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

© Imperial Paper and Color Corporation

PREFERRED
for washability

manufacturer

d homemaker

NYLON Curtains with Wat-a-set FINISH!

IS NOT SURPRISING that people who know, from curtain manufacturers to omen who buy for their homes, agree at the Wat-a-set label on any curtain eans safe and easy washability, without stortion of weave, and with less shrinke. (Wat-a-set does not eliminate shrinke entirely, but does reduce it.)

Wat-a-set Nylon Marquisettes, in particar, are preferred for their consistent alities of better appearance, longer wear d greater resistance to surface dirt. And en when your nylon curtains do become iled, if they are finished with Wat-a-set, ashing is so quick and easy that you'll d yourself doing them on days when you n't feel like really working. A dip or two suds, a rinse in warm water, and your rtains are sparkling clean.

Nylon plus Wat-a-set is quality plus ality, and a curtain combination that ways adds to the grace and beauty of your me. Remember, too, that all Wat-a-set rtains are dyed with long lasting, fade sistant colors.

You'll find the Wat-a-set label on a wide nge of well-known brands of curtains at prices. If you live in or near one of merica's 50 largest cities, look in the Where-to-buy-it" section of your telehone directory under CURTAINS—Wat-set" for the name of e store nearest you elling Wat-a-set urtains.

MT. HOPE FINISHING CO.
North Dighton, Massachusetts
Wat-a-set Trade Mark Reg.
A LASTING Finish
for Rayon, Nylon and Cotton Curtain Fabrics

"That's little Roger." Then Jenny laughed at the amazement on Mrs. Cornish's face and pulled the man gently into the room. "I don't know your name, do I? And you so kind to me. What is it?"

"Sims. Wally Sims," said the man awkwardly.

"Mr. Sims, this is Mrs. Cornish, my new mother."

"How do you do?" greeted Mrs. Cornish, and the relief that this man was not a brother shone all over her face.

"Maybe I should explain ——" he began, but Jenny was already shaking hands with Sam.

"You must be Sam Forester. Did you meet me at the station and I wasn't there?"

"I tried to. Where were you?"

"I was in such a hurry to see you all I got out at the other station, the one before this one."

"The East Station?"

"That's right," Mr. Sims put in.

"The East never entered my head," said Sam. "Nobody ever gets out there."

"I did," said Jenny with a touch of pride. Then, standing in front of Catharine, she held out her hand. "I suppose I ought to know who you are, but I don't."

Catharine took the proffered hand in silence and Mrs. Cornish came to the rescue.

"Excuse me. You took me by surprise. This is Catharine Forester, an old friend of Roger's."

"Fancy that now!" said Jenny. "I don't think he ever told me about you."

CATHARINE smiled as she answered, "Didn't he?"

"There wasn't much time, you see," explained Jenny hastily. "Just a few weeks and so many things to do and to talk about."

For a moment Sam was afraid that Catharine was going to say something sharp. He could hardly believe that this last remark of Jenny's was studied insolence, but with women you never knew.

"Mr. Sims, won't you sit down?" invited Mrs. Cornish.

"I'll be going, ma'am, just as soon as I ——"

Jenny laughed and took the baby from his arms deftly. Mr. Sims uncreased his sleeves and looked relieved.

"You were a dear," said Jenny. "Come and have tea with me now you know the way"; then, with a quick turn to Mrs. Cornish, "May he?"

"Of course."

Mrs. Cornish smiled indulgently, as if there were no thought in her mind that Mr. Sims would ever claim this invitation, and Mr. Sims, catching her eye, murmured his thanks and withdrew.

Now that Mr. Sims had been explained and settled, little Roger became the focus of attention.

"Isn't he exactly like his father?" said Jenny.

"Is he?" Mrs. Cornish sounded uncertain.

"You ought to know, I suppose," admitted Jenny. "You've known his father much longer than I have."

"Over twenty years."

Jenny looked up at Mrs. Cornish's face and Sam saw her quickly decide that this was neither the time nor the place for a heart-to-heart talk about Roger. She turned to Catharine.

"Do you want a look too?"

Catharine looked and said, "He's fine."

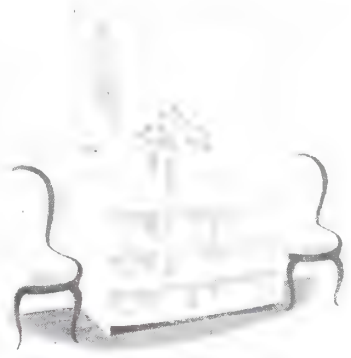
"Why leave me out?" asked Sam. "I'm his father's best friend."

"I know you are."

Sam noticed how her smile lit up her whole face so that he was no longer conscious of its pale narrowness, but simply knew that she smiled. Looking into her face now, he recalled what he had imagined her to be like the day the news of Roger's marriage had come. She was utterly different in appearance, shorter, older-looking and not nearly as pretty, and yet there was something almost familiar about the smile.

It was summer when the letter came, and ten of them were going on a picnic beyond

(Continued on Page 123)



This familiar label, affixed to the face of a mirror, is the easy way to identify quality. It tells you the mirror was made with L·O·F Plate Glass, ground and polished on both surfaces to assure true reflections.

it looked so small ...
until we put up

MIRRORS

The house we bought was so much smaller than the one we wanted to build. But that didn't discourage us — for we had discovered mirrors.

Like magic, our small home seemed to grow and expand. It was fun, too, creating different mirror groupings for each room.

True — we couldn't get all the mirrors at once. So many people want glass that it's sold as fast as it's made. Which is faster than ever, the salesman said.

Our mirrors are beautiful...so clear and sparkling. That's because the glass is of such fine quality... it's Polished Plate Glass. And our mirrors will be just as attractive in the large house we'll have someday. We think that is real economy.

We found lots of our smart ideas in the book, MIRRORS, STYLED BY DOROTHY DRAPER. You can get it just by writing Libbey·Owens·Ford Glass Company, 647 Nicholas Building, Toledo 3, Ohio, and enclosing twenty-five cents.

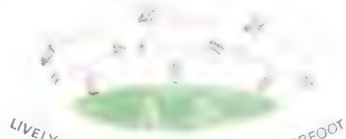
L O F
LIBBEY·OWENS·FORD
a Great Name in GLASS

Distinction is given this room by its handsome but moderately-priced Bigelow Beauvais carpet 1770

Best-laid plans... begin with Bigelow

FLOORS come first, say expert room-planners. Step number one for this make-yourself-at-home room was Bigelow's beautiful Beauvais. Its traditional floral pattern and delicately blended colors harmonize with furnishings of every period and fabrics of every hue.

For you there are the loveliest Bigelow rugs ever. In wonderful new patterns and textures...handsome, hand-carved effects, modern two-tones, exciting new twist weaves...all in a multitude of glowing decorator colors and the nine official B.H.F. (Basic Home Furnishings) colors.



Every Bigelow rug is made of Lively Wool... that superb blend of springy wools, tough wools, lustrous wools that make Bigelow rugs look lovelier... longer.

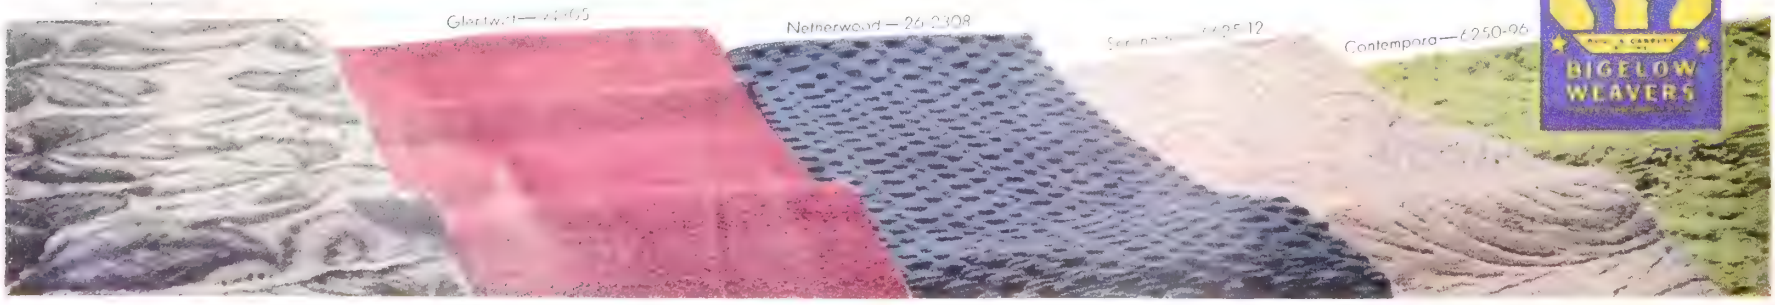
Next time you are downtown, uptown, in town, or wherever your favorite store is, see the new Bigelow rugs. All are marked by the blue-and-gold Bigelow label. All are sure to give you years of proud possession.

SEND FOR Bigelow's new, purse-size "Match Book," 72 paper color samples to use in harmonizing your rug, wall, upholstery and drapery colors. Send 10¢ to Bigelow Weavers, Dept. L-47, 140 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

Copr. 1947, Bigelow-Sanford Carpet Co., Inc.

BIGELOW WEAVERS

Fine rugs and carpets since 1825



(Continued from Page 14)

River Heights. Catharine was there and they were starting from Mrs. Cornish's. Mrs. Cornish cried a little, but the ice cream was packed in dry ice and the picnickers were ready and Mrs. Cornish knew it would be game of her to go on the picnic nevertheless, so she went.

Sam had been discharged from the Army just a week before the picnic and the occasion was something of a celebration for him, a kind of welcome back to civilian life. But now that the news of Roger's marriage had come, they dropped their interest in Sam, who lay in a shady place, looking at Catharine and feeling confident that his silence would scarcely be noticed.

Until the picnic Catharine had puzzled him. Had she been in love with Roger or hadn't she?

He scrutinized her and wondered. Her behavior was normal. She was neither morose nor nervously chatty. She talked a little, she smiled, and yet there was something about her that struck Sam as odd. He could tell that she knew he was watching her and he wondered whether she knew what was going through his mind.

Then Sam realized that what was odd about Catharine was merely that he was regarding her as a desirable woman with the barrier removed, the gate open. Up to now he had looked at other girls in this way, but with Roger's girl, even though they were good friends, there had always been the gate. Catharine was powerfully attractive. Her tanned legs were bare and the short yellow dress and the yellow ankle socks accentuated their brownness. Her brown hair was no different in color from several hundred heads of hair in Creston, but she had natural ringlets, and she was independent enough to wear her hair in the way that suited her best, with only the faintest leaning toward popular fashion.

Sam saw that Mrs. Cornish was looking at him, so he turned his eyes from Catharine, but he went on thinking about her and the more he thought the more pleasurable his thinking became. On the way home they had to cross the creek by a stone crossing and he saw to it that he was there to take her hand. He held it longer than was necessary and it remained in his, firm but compliant.

It was perhaps because the realization that he was in love with Catharine dawned on him the day he heard of Roger's marriage that the memory of the picnic flashed through his mind as he stood looking at Jenny now. So this was the girl who had captivated Roger! The familiar dark little thought came to him again, the thought that perhaps, if it had not been for Jenny, Catharine would never have married him. What of it? What if Roger had been first? All that was over now.

Ellen came in with the tea.

"Are you Ellen?" asked Jenny, looking up from the davenport where she was tucking the sleeping baby.

Ellen put the tray down and looked startled.

"Roger told me all about you. You used to smack him when he was naughty."

"Not hard enough or often enough," said Sam.

Ellen gave a deprecating giggle and went out.

"There's a funny thing now," said Jenny. "She's known Roger ever since he was a baby and Roger's known her all his life. It makes me feel very new—almost like an egg."

"You'll feel at home when you come to know our ways," encouraged Mrs. Cornish. "Cream or lemon with your tea, Jenny?"

"Milk, please."

"Milk?"

"Don't bother if you haven't any. Cream will do fine, thank you."

"We ought to have remembered," said Mrs. Cornish. "Roger's father and I spent two summers in London and we had milk in our tea."

"Did you go to Wales?"

"No. We went to Scotland. It was beautiful."

"So is Wales." Jenny's voice showed eagerness and disappointment.

Mrs. Cornish smiled apologetically and sought a common bond. "We loved London. You must know it very well."

"I've never been to London."

"Never been to London and living only two hundred miles from it?"

"You stayed in London two summers and you never went to Wales," retorted Jenny.

Sam grinned at her. "You don't like England."

Jenny warmed to him instantly. "In Wales everybody sings," she explained. "In England they just talk."

"The Welsh don't do so badly at talking themselves," said Sam, and Jenny laughed.

She put her teacup down and addressed Mrs. Cornish boldly. "Tell me. Am I something like you expected?"

Mrs. Cornish hesitated. At that moment she would not have cared to admit how low she had sunk in her fears and expectations.

"Give her time, Jenny," Sam put in quietly.

Mrs. Cornish recovered speech. "I'm old, you know," she said with the kindest of smiles. "It takes me longer to know people."

"I'm quick," said Jenny. "Four weeks only I knew Roger. Then we were married."

There was a silence. Mrs Cornish was pouring the tea. Catharine clinked her spoon against the side of her cup. Sam was conscious of the loudness of the clock on the mantelshelf and of the distant whirr of the refrigerator in the kitchen.

Jenny looked straight at Mrs. Cornish and smiled. "Perhaps you think I'm too quick," she said.

(Continued on Page 125)

"I'm a postwar plan!"

LESTER Betsy Ross Spinet

Nothing else that you buy for your home will give children and adults the limitless pleasure that they will receive from a Lester Betsy Ross Spinet.

The striking design and rich woods of this fine piano make it the center of attraction in any home . . . its compact size is ideal for small or large rooms.

Hear its rich, melodious tone . . . try its easy, responsive action . . . you'll realize at once why the Betsy Ross is America's most famous Spinet.

Moderate in cost, guaranteed for ten years . . . the Betsy Ross Spinet is made ONLY by the Lester Piano Manufacturing Company . . . makers of the renowned Lester Grand Pianos.

Foreign Sales Office:
H. A. ASTLETT & Co. • 27 William St., New York 5, N. Y.

ONE name quality price SOLD BY AMERICA'S FOREMOST PIANO DEALERS

LESTER PIANO MANUFACTURING CO., LESTER 13, PA.

Send me your 24-page illustrated book showing new arrangements in fine rooms. (Enclose 10c for postage.)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

MAIL THIS COUPON FOR ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET CC

A BEAUTIFUL PIANO WITH A MAGNIFICENT TONE

Decorator Colors GIVE ALARM CLOCKS A PARTY DRESS

U. S. Time thought up this wonderful new idea—and now the Cinderella of clocks is richly dressed, a beautiful addition to any room. Deep glowing colors that go along with the B.H.F. Plan (a plan whereby all Basic Home Furnishings will go together, color-wise) . . . plus these great features:

- ★ Muffled tick . . . melodious bell
- ★ Silvery nickel full-back bell and base, rubber cushioned
- ★ Only one key to wind both alarm and time
- ★ 40-hour duty on one winding
- ★ Unusually clear dial (radium-painted hands and numerals optional)
- ★ Accurate U. S. Time precision movement

A jade green WATERBURY ALARM CLOCK to go with the B.H.F. "Shenandoah Group"

A maroon WATERBURY ALARM CLOCK to go with the B.H.F. "Adirondack Group"

A sapphire blue WATERBURY ALARM CLOCK to go with the B.H.F. "Great Lakes Group"

Waterbury CLOCKS

THE UNITED STATES TIME CORPORATION [US TIME] International Building, Rockefeller Center, New York

dodland

(Continued from Page 123)

To Sam it looked precisely as if it were with this thought that Mrs. Cornish had put the teapot down upon the Mexican-tile stand with a little more firmness than usual.

"Roger's a quick one, too," Jenny went on. "We had just three weeks and look you." She waved a hand toward the davenport.

When Catharine spoke it made Mrs. Cornish and Sam turn to look at her. She had hardly said a word all through tea. "You were very lucky, Jenny."

"Yes indeed I was lucky. Every night I thank God for giving me Roger and then I thank Him for giving us the baby."

Mrs. Cornish struck the little silver bell on the tray in front of her. "Wouldn't you like to see your room?" she asked.

Jenny put her cup and saucer down. "Oh yes, please—will you show it to me?"

"Ellen will show you up."

Ellen opened the door.

"Show Mrs. Cornish her room, Ellen."

"Yes, ma'am."

Jenny all but ran out of the room, and although the door was shut they knew that on the other side of it Jenny was holding a scandalized Ellen by the arm.

Mrs. Cornish took a deep breath, let it out on a gasp, and said, "Well!"

"She's like a little girl," said Sam.

"Little girl!" echoed Mrs. Cornish. "She's a lot older than Roger. She must be nearly thirty."

"She's like a little girl just the same."

"Did you notice her hands?"

"She's worked hard with them. I think she's very sweet."

Sam looked toward Catharine's chair for support, but Catharine had moved to the davenport.

"A little exhausting, don't you think?" said Mrs. Cornish.

Sam frowned. He was fond of Roger's mother, but once she had made up her mind ——

Then she noticed Catharine leaning over the davenport. "Why, Catharine," she said, "I believe you've fallen in love with him already."

As Catharine moved away from the baby Sam saw in her eyes the softness of wonder and the hardness of envy, and in that moment something leaped excitedly within him. Perhaps Jenny and Roger had done the more natural and satisfying thing. Was it a mistake to wait and be sure of his appointment before they had a child? Seeing the look on her face as she turned away from little Roger gave Sam the feeling that he had been selfish to demand security first. It was easier for him. He was working toward his appointment. Catharine was looking forward to it just as eagerly, but the prospect was naturally not so deeply satisfying to her. It meant security, a raising of living standards, a pride, a satisfaction. A child would mean far more than that to her, something that was hard to speak of but stirringly felt.

SAM gave Catharine an understanding smile, but she seemed too wrapped up in her thoughts to answer it. From above, in the room that had been Roger's nursery, came the sound of singing.

"Listen!" said Sam.

Jenny's fresh high voice seemed a dozen years younger than herself, and fifty years younger than the Cornish house. With the song upstairs and the stirring bundle on the davenport it seemed as if the forces of youth and life had burst once again into the gaunt old house.

"She has a pretty voice," said Catharine.

"Roger was always singing." Mrs. Cornish was remembering the gaiety of fifteen years ago.

"Look! He's waking," said Catharine. Mrs. Cornish lifted her hand to strike the bell, but Catharine stopped her. "Please don't ring. I'll take him up to her."

Sam smiled again. He was certain now, and rather proud. Catharine lifted little Roger from the davenport and carried him out and up the stairs.

WHEN the smell of cabbage at Ryan's became unbearable, Sam and Catharine used to take the bus to the northwest end of town and walk along Westover Creek, and they had not been living at Foxy's many weeks before Catharine suggested that they take a picnic lunch there.

That morning in bed she had told him, during the half hour between waking and getting up, "I'm five days overtime."

"I thought you must be."

"Are you keeping an account?"

"No, but a fellow can't help noticing."

Catharine giggled. "This isn't right," she said. "You ought to be surprised."

"You're not doing it right either," said Sam. "We should be in a big living room with windows overlooking the garden, and you should have your back to me."

"Do you want me to turn my back to you?"

"No."

"Would you rather I'd waited for the living room?"

"No. Here is just right. I think it's wonderful."

There are tiny moments in life that seem to stand out as being perfect in their blissful excitement, and this day for Sam held many such moments.

They ate the lunch just beyond a clump of birches. After lunch, Catharine stretched herself out on a grassy bank and Sam began to sketch.

"Do you want to snooze or may I talk?" he called over.

"Talk away!" she answered.

"This is my idea of a perfect life," said Sam. "A picnic with my wife and child, a lovely, sunny day ——"

"You've got your child in a very convenient place. In a year or two a picnic won't be so simple."

"It's still my idea," persisted Sam. "Quietness no people around except the ones I want around something to sketch! Leisure! Trouble with most people they don't know what to do with their spare time. It bothers them."

"I'm going to enjoy mine now," said Catharine. "In a year I won't have any."

"The secret of a good life," Sam went on, "is to be easily satisfied."

"I don't agree. People who are easily satisfied are deadly. No life! No ambition."

"What's the use of being ambitious? You never get what you really want in this world. Next best thing is to be contented with what you've got."

Catharine sat up and looked at him. "I hate the next best thing," she said.

"I'd rather have the best, naturally, but if I couldn't, I'd take what was left and be satisfied."

"And be satisfied?" There was more than a hint of scorn in her voice; Sam caught it.

"Oh, don't be so superior. I'm not the kind of guy who gives everything else up if I can't get what I set my heart on."

(Continued on Page 127)

CROCODILE TEARS

According to Sir John Mandeville, a grand old literary faker, the crocodile was supposed to entice his victims by pathetic moaning and groaning. Then he would hypocritically shed tears while devouring with relish and gusto the meal he made of those who fell for his "pitch." The fake tears shed by a person in the act of committing a crime are termed "crocodile tears." The idea that the crocodile had tears in his eyes while in the act of hunting and capturing his prey is not entirely without some basis in fact. Certain scientists have suggested that the tissue surrounding the eyes of the crocodile is so arranged that a cursory glance, which is about as much as one gets of a crocodile in action, gives the impression of a tear.

—DAVID T. ARMSTRONG.

"Inlaid Linoleum in the Living Room . . .
. . . Printed Floor Covering in the Nursery"
. . . and they're BOTH
Whether you buy inlaid linoleum, printed floor covering, or both, buy Pabco to be sure of getting everything you want in distinctive beauty, easy-cleaning and long wear!
PABCO LINOLEUMS set a new pace for rich custom-appearance. Soil-Sealed to resist dirt, stains, scuff-marks.
PABCO PRINTED FLOOR COVERINGS—in both room-size rugs and all-over styles—have the famous Sanded Sheen surface. Tough-wearing. Clean-like a china dish!
Just off the press! Pabco Floors of the Modern Home—sixteen fascinating, full-color pages.
Send 10c to Dept. 147, nearest office below.
THE PARAFFINE COMPANIES, INC.
New York 16 • Chicago 54 • San Francisco 19
Makers, also, of Pabco Mastipave Heavy Duty Flooring; Pabco Paints, Roofings, Building Materials
PABCO

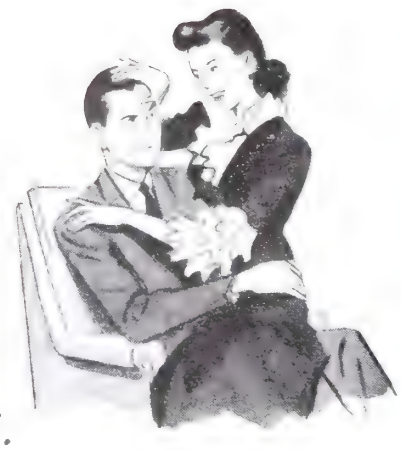
"There's a trick up my frilly sleeve!"

1.

Yep, I'm working my famous system again. Getting Joe in just the right mood before I break the news about [illegible] a certain pink hat, and [illegible] some luscious Cannon Percale Sheets I seem to have bought, today!

2.

Dressed in my dreamiest, I'll serve up Joe's favorite chicken pie. Then, when he's relaxing over coffee, I'll purr, "Dear, I saw the most beautiful Cannon Percale Sheets down town! Just as so-oft as moonlight and petals, and just just what we need!"



3.

Quickly, I'll smooth away Joe's budget-frown. "And guess!" I'll rush on. "The lovely things cost just a little more than best-grade muslin sheets! Isn't it simply too wonderful that we can afford Cannon Percales? Won't we be luxurious?

4.

"I try so-o hard to be a good housekeeper," I'll go on. "And Cannon Percale Sheets are so fine and light weight that bedmaking and washdays will be easier for me!" With that, I'll produce my prizes. And if I know Joe, he'll agree that such a smart wife deserves a new hat!

CANNON

Cannon Percale Sheets

Cannon Towels · Sheets · Blankets ★ Cannon Mills, Inc., New York 13, N. Y.

Copr. 1947 Cannon Mills Inc

P. S. Another real Cannon value: Cannon Muslin Sheets. Woven of sturdy American cotton; well-made, long-wearing!

(Continued from Page 125)

tharine waited a moment before she ered him. "No, I don't think you are," aid.

ake this, for example," Sam went on. or seven years ago I thought I was going an artist, a real one, a great one. If one had told me then that I was going e no more than fifth-rate, I'd have ght my life over and my future damned. here I am, satisfied and happy, and I mind it any more. What does it matter mediocre? Most people are. I'd prob- feel uncomfortable with anyone who 't."

are you calling me mediocre?"

m laughed at the indignation in Cath- 's voice. "Honey!" he said cheerfully. u're the nicest person I know, and if you remarkable I wouldn't be so fond of .

ust nice and ordinary!"

Say just nice?"

Ordinary goes with nice," snapped arine.

Maybe it does. I never thought of it way before."

atharine was up and pacing across the s. "I don't want to be ordinary," she ned. "I want to be individual. Do you to be like the rabble?"

don't care," he answered lightly. "I get ble salary. Maybe I'd better wait until ke more money before I get individual."

atharine stood in front of him, obstruct- the clump of birches he was sketching, now he saw for the first time that she was y taking it all seri- .

You've got no more ition than a fly," she ned. "You don't care more. You're only in twenties and you've all the ambition you had."

he turned away angrily Sam found himself ing at the clump of n trees again, but their ry pattern was gray dull now. Until her last outburst he had ght she was joking. It was the mention oney, perhaps, that had set her off. She er reproached him with his humble posi- and pitiful income, but the eagerness which she spoke of his appointment and envious tone which crept into her voice n they talked of their more fortunate eagues told him more clearly than any ct reproaches that her mind was set upon ancing him. To Catharine it was just a erable lack of ambition that kept him tented.

When you come to think of it," he said, e ordinary things are the important gs. Look at what happened to us today! happens to half the people in the world. wouldn't call it remarkable, but it's derful, isn't it?"

Catharine made no reply for a moment, then asked, "Would you call Jenny inary?"

What made you think of her?"

Would you?"

am's answer was slow and a little puzzled. o, I suppose I wouldn't." Then he added tily, "But she's a foreigner. I've never anyone quite like her before. Maybe 's ordinary in Wales."

Catharine was silent for a long while and n, after a few moments, went on sketching. perceptibly the sky grew hazier and less e. The sun felt as warm, but the shadows ast, instead of being sharply defined, were rred, and soon it was hard to tell that re were shadows at all.

NNY had no difficulty in adapting herself life in Creston. As she said of herself, she s quick—quick to admire, quick to object, d quick to make friends. The Creston peo- liked her. The Chronicle interviewed her d got enough to run a serial each Thursday twelve weeks. All Creston was told quite nkly that Jenny's father was a tobacconist a rather ugly red-brick village called Llan- r, that she had eight sisters and four brothers her mother had been quick too and that she had spoken to Roger Cornish only a dozen or so times before they were married.

Jenny soon came to know every road in the Triangle and, being naturally curious, almost every homeowner's name. She met only a dozen of them, but she knew the professions and the characters of scores she had never seen, and she amused herself while she wheeled the baby buggy along the broad sidewalks by looking at each house and recollecting what people had said about the occupants.

"THERE'S lucky you are, Roger," she would murmur into the buggy, though Roger lay sleeping and unaware. "Your mother grew up as poor as a church mouse in a grubby little village and look at you, living from the age of one in the grandest big house and having the best of everything."

The more Jenny learned of Roger's life in Creston, the more she planned that little Roger's should be like it, partly because it could scarcely be improved on and partly because she saw herself living her husband's life over again with him as little Roger grew up doing the same things in the same places.

Jenny loved the Ridge Road, as it was called, and she astonished the lazy Creston people by vigorously pushing the baby buggy all the way along to the campus.

It was during one of these excursions in the late summer that she met Catharine Forester again. Today she had a letter from Roger, a fat one that must be at least twelve or fourteen pages long, and she slowed her walk after reaching the bridge, partly to have more breath to sing and partly because she liked to delay, wondering what was in the letter.

As she turned the buggy into the sunken garden she saw that her usual bench was occupied. There was another bench on the other side and she started for it when Catharine called over pleasantly:

"Jenny Cornish -don't you remember me?"

Jenny apologized, wheeled the buggy to the bench on which Catharine sat and gave the letter in her pocket a regretful pat.

To see Catharine again was a stroke of luck. As she sat down she thought to herself that perhaps this meeting would lead to others. Sam had been so friendly and kind. She asked after him immediately.

He was fine, Catharine assured her, working hard in the Art Department.

"It's all sunshine here," said Jenny. "Do you always have it so lovely?"

Catharine smiled at her enthusiasm. "Just before you came we had it cool and wet."

"It must have cleared up special for me."

"Are you homesick, Jenny?"

"Sometimes. Everything is so different here."

"You'll get used to us."

"It will be all right when Roger comes ."

"That will be a great day for all of us."

Jenny was reminded again that almost everyone she met in Creston had known Roger far longer than she. "There's funny it is," she said. "He's my husband and I've only seen him seven weeks. The rest of the time it's been just letters."

"Seven weeks!" said Catharine. "I've known him seven years."

"Seven years!"

"I suppose that seems very strange to you."

Catharine was looking away and Jenny suddenly had the uncomfortable feeling that it might matter to Catharine that Roger had married her so quickly and excitingly. There might be something that she, Jenny, did not know about. Her hand stole softly to her pocket and the feel of the padded letter reassured her. "No," she answered slowly,

(Continued on Page 129)

> Nobody is bored when he is trying to make something that is beautiful, or to discover something that is true. This is what Goethe meant when he said: "He who has science and art has also religion."
>
> —WILLIAM RALPH INGE, Outspoken Essays: Present Discontents. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, London)

With all my love . . .
And why not treat all your beds to a complete North Star Blanket Wardrobe*, your Nocturne plus a North Star Pair . . . versatile trio to combine for comfort whatever the weather. What a perfect gift for brides!
236 S. 2nd St., Minneapolis 1, Minn.
$9.95 to $115.00
North Star Blankets

—that Always-Fresh look...

"Try my beauty-freshener . . .
Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream
beautifies skin as it cleanses,"

says Beverly Tyler

featured in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's forthcoming picture
"THE BEGINNING OR THE END"

WOODBURY Complete BEAUTY CREAM

- Beautifies skin as it cleanses
- Freshens tired skin as it cleanses
- Brightens dull skin as it cleanses
- Smooths tiny dry-skin lines as it cleanses

around the clock...this Woodbury-Wonderful Way!

8 A.M. Morning, beautiful! Skin a-bl—m. Beverly reports for a film-full day. "Bright and early, I date with Woodbury," she says. "Cream-cleanse my skin so-o smooth." Be as beauty smart, girls. Follow this Woodbury-Wonderful care that cleanses, softens . . . really beautifies your skin!

7 P.M. Evening, lovely! High spot of a night spot is Beverly . . . with her "Always-Fresh Look"! "Skin sparkles," Bev tells you, "after Woodbury Cream cleansing. A second film is my powder base! Make-up glows!" Easy, girls, to revive your skin beauty with beautifying Woodbury Cream!

That "Always-Fresh Look" this Woodbury-Wonderful Way

Cleanse with Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream, using upward pressing strokes. Tissue off cream, loosened dirt, make-up. Smooth on more for plus-softening. Tissue off. Woodbury's four rich oils soften, smooth, beautify. Next—a brisk cold-water spanking. Now skin glows with Woodbury "Always-Fresh Look".

FOR SPECIAL SKIN PROBLEMS

Very Dry Skin: Woodbury cream-cleanse. Soften with Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream—lanolin's benefits! Under make-up, Woodbury Creampuff Powder Base.

Oily Skin: Use Woodbury Liquefying Cleansing Cream. Light—melts on skin. Finish with Woodbury Vanishing Facial Cream to check shine. Purifying Stericin in all Woodbury Creams helps protect against blemish-causing germs.

11 P.M. Goodnight, sweet! "Before dreams, a thorough Woodbury cleansing," says Beverly. "Then my Beauty Nightcap . . . a cream-mist of Woodbury to soften dryness while I sleep!" By morning, skin's dewy! For that "Always-Fresh Look" . . . it's Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream.

(Continued from Page 127)

"there's no reason why that should be strange to me. It's more the other way around. You think it strange that I ——" She could not go on, and Catharine made no response to the trailing off of her words. Jenny was puzzled. Could it possibly be that Roger and Catharine had ever been in love with each other? Not reticent by nature, she immediately asked, "What was Roger like when you first met him?"

Catharine looked back at her. "He was in high school then. He was handsome and very popular."

"I'm glad. I suppose everyone liked him?"

"Oh, yes. All the girls lost their hearts to him."

"Not all!" hinted Jenny.

"Almost all," said Catharine with a slight smile, and Jenny felt that she had met her match.

"I think it's nice," said Jenny, "that Sam and Roger are such friends. It makes me feel that I have friends here, too, before Roger comes back. I don't feel so much that I'm intruding."

Roger caused a diversion by crying out.

"A bubble," Jenny explained, and she patted his back, feeling a great deal more comfortable now that she had something to do. For a single moment she had felt herself to be an intruder, and felt also that Catharine knew her feelings.

"This time next year," said Catharine, "I hope to be doing that job, Jenny."

"Really?" Jenny put Roger back abruptly and looked at Catharine.

"Unless something goes wrong."

"It won't. It won't," said Jenny. "Oh, I'm so glad for you and Sam."

"Sam is very pleased with himself."

"Of course! Oh, isn't it wonderful? I do hope Roger will be home by then."

The impulsive words came out. Not three minutes ago she had made a mental note to be tactful, just in case, and here she was! Then she became angry with herself. Why couldn't she mention her own husband if she wished? Did she have to be afraid of his friends just because they had known him longer?

Catharine was looking at little Roger, who, after turning his head first to the left and then to the right, decided to look directly upward.

"May I tell Mrs. Cornish?" Jenny asked.

"Why, yes. It's no secret. Half Creston is having babies."

"As soon as Roger comes home ——" started Jenny, then cut herself short.

Catharine had risen. "I've got to go start dinner for Sam. Tell Mrs. Cornish we'll call and see her one of these days."

JENNY watched her as she turned east. She walked with an easy grace and no one, thought Jenny, would have guessed that she had to scrimp and save to buy that dress. She wheeled the buggy out of the sunken garden. She might have made the dress. She was probably an excellent needlewoman. Jenny found herself wishing she knew more about Catharine.

She had reached the third lookout before she recollected her letter. Then, putting Catharine out of her thoughts, she fixed the buggy against a large stone, chose a flat piece of wall to sit on and gave herself up to the distant enjoyment of her husband. What she had needed was there on the last page:

You ask me why I never mentioned Catharine to you before. Now I come to think of it, that does seem rather odd. I knew her very well. All the boys in school were crazy about her. I saw more of her than the others because her mother was over to the house a lot and she brought Catharine with her. Maybe you think I was in love with her, but if you do you're barking up the wrong tree. We liked each other a lot, but maybe we were both a bit cautious because mother would have liked to see me and Catharine get married and Catharine's mother felt the same way. Anyway, the question never came up, and I guess Sam's the explanation. Sam's a great fellow. If you want to trace the gals I fell in love with, ply Sam with half-a-dozen beers and then mention Mamie Sloane, Peggy Pushover (her real name was something I've forgotten, but we all called her that) and the redheaded daughter of a biochem prof whose name also escapes me.

Jenny laughed, and little Roger gave a jump of surprise. Roger's letters made her feel gay and carefree. She had not remembered writing as if she suspected that Roger had been in love with Catharine, but somehow the idea had been transmitted. She thought that it was only just now, a few minutes ago, that it had first occurred to her. She tried to think back and she found herself wondering whether or not there had been the merest inkling of it that very first day in Creston. Not that it mattered, she decided briskly. There was too much to do and dream for the future—the past must take care of itself.

FOXY'S turned out to be only a meager improvement over Ryan's. Ryan's had been cold in winter and hot in summer. Foxy's was comfortably stuffy at all seasons. It smelled of dusty upholstery, and instead of a roof over their heads they had a ceiling which was the reverse side of Lulu Bronsky's floor. The first night they moved in, Lulu was celebrating her twenty-sixth birthday and Sam and Catharine nearly moved back to Ryan's at four o'clock in the morning. They consented to stay only when they discovered that Lulu spent most of her nights more quietly. They saw a great deal of Lulu because the only telephone in the house was in the hallway opposite their living-room entrance, and Lulu had complicated arrangements to make by telephone. The telephone was the faint kind, which made Lulu's conversations over it entirely one-sided for the Foresters, but left more to imagination and conjecture.

The average human being is sensible and just, but in warfare human nature reverts to the jungle, thus suffering a relapse more deplorable even than the physical horrors of war. We can only think in terms of peace when the man with the little shop on one side of the street ceases to hate the man in the little shop on the other side.

—COMPTON MACKENZIE

It was Catharine's job to handle the accounts, and Sam was full of admiration for her tidiness and efficiency. When she bent her head over her book, he watched her and now and then he threw in a hopeful or encouraging remark. He felt it showed interest. On sixty-five dollars a month they paid their rent, ate three meals a day, bought a book every two months and went to the concert and play series in Convocation Hall. The month they did not buy a book they ate out, by way of a treat.

It was on an evening when accounts were balanced that Mrs. Lawson came. When the doorbell rang, Lulu ran eagerly down the stairs, stopping for a moment to give Mrs. Lawson a curious stare before she started to her room again.

"What a dear little place!" Mrs. Lawson exclaimed.

"It is rather small," Catharine apologized.

"You've furnished it so nicely. It's cute."

Sam and Catharine looked uncomfortable. The place looked deadly and Mrs. Lawson knew it. Why did she have to pretend it was attractive?

It was better when Charlotte Garrity arrived, with an odd smile on her face, half of pleasure at seeing Catharine and half of surprise at seeing Mrs. Lawson.

"How nice that you've come!" Mrs. Lawson said. "I can kill two birds with one stone. I was going to call on you next. It's just a little idea some of us had." Mrs. Lawson's voice was deep and rich. She sang mezzo-soprano in the Episcopal church. "You know that we faculty women—the older ones, that is—have a little group of clubs. Well, it occurred to us that we need new blood and someone suggested a group of junior clubs, not exactly mixed with the senior ones, but under our auspices—affiliated, as it were. We

(Continued on Page 131)

Only the PERFECT SLEEPER
TUFTLESS
Innerspring Mattress and Box Spring $49.50 EACH gives you this remarkable new PERFECT SLEEPING COMFORT
This
NOT This
You sleep ON it—not IN it
—in thrilling new healthful luxury! Satin-smooth, soft outer cushioning! "Live" relaxing, patented inner support!
ASK YOUR DEALER FOR A DEMONSTRATION
SERTA ASSOCIATES, INC., 35 Leading Mattress Manufacturers
From Coast to Coast and in Canada. Executive Office...
Permanent Showrooms, 666 Lake Shore Drive, Chicago
Sealy

COPYRIGHT 1947, THE INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO., MERIDEN, CONN.

A social success in 1847

A social success in 1947

1847 Rogers Bros. brings you 100 years of beauty

ETERNALLY YOURS

ADORATION

When a woman of fashion entertained 100 years ago, lustrous 1847 Rogers Bros. was the proudest ornament of her table.

A century-old heritage of expert silver-craftsmanship sets this finest silverplate, today, apart from any other. The rich modern designs have that extra height and depth of ornament...beautifully etched detail...quality you find, as a rule, only in solid silver.

Select your favorite from the only patterns with the year-mark "1847"... the silverware that is loved and owned by more women than any other! America's finest silverplate... same quality, no increase in price since the war. No federal excise tax. 52-piece service for eight, $64.75, with chest.

1847 ROGERS BROS.

100th Anniversary

TUNE IN: "THE ADVENTURES OF OZZIE AND HARRIET," SUNDAY, 6 P.M., E.S.T. OVER CBS.

(Continued from Page 129)

pay twenty-five dollars a year in dues and we all felt that that was asking too much from some of the younger people—graduate assistants especially—so we made it seven-fifty a year for the junior members. It's a very reasonable offer, I think, and all the surplus, if there is any, goes toward entertaining visitors—foreigners, you know, and people like that."

"Have you had many people join?"

"You two are my first. Now, wait a moment. I must do this properly. Mr. Forester, you're an instructor in the Art Department. Isn't that so?"

"Oh no! I'm only a graduate assistant."

Mrs. Lawson gave a tiny stifled shriek and put a playful finger on her lips. "Mrs. McCarroll made a mistake on my list. I must certainly talk to her about it. Some people are very sensitive about their rank."

"It doesn't matter with us," said Sam.

"That's very charming of you. Now, Mr. Forester, we don't believe in pushing people. I want you to think it over."

Catharine took a breath, gripped the sides of her chair and spoke firmly. "I'd rather be frank with you, Mrs. Lawson. With seven-fifty to pay I couldn't possibly join. Graduate assistants don't get much."

Mrs. Lawson looked taken aback, but she smiled again and went on. "Of course. I quite understand. But surely some of your money goes into entertainment, doesn't it?"

Catharine's voice was calm and firm. "I'm afraid seven-fifty would still be too much; and anyway, I'm looking forward to being kept very busy. I'm having a baby in the spring."

Mrs. Lawson's eyes tilted downward for the merest glance, then brightened. "Why, how lovely! I'm so glad!"

Sam wondered why everyone said how glad they were. It was natural for the parents themselves to be glad if they wanted children, but why should the merest stranger charge into ecstasies as soon as Catharine's pregnancy was mentioned?

"I won't be outdone," declared Mrs. Lawson with a bantering air suited to the jolly mood of the moment. "Mrs. Garrity, your husband is a graduate assistant in physics. Is that right?"

"No. He's an instructor."

Mrs. Lawson was too stunned to shriek. "Bother Mrs. McCarroll!" she said.

"And it's chemistry, not physics."

"I beg your pardon. You will forgive me, won't you?"

"Of course."

MRS. LAWSON again smiled broadly. "Do you know, last week someone wrote to Professor Lawson and called him a doctor of home economics. He was so amused." She laughed a little; then, pretending not to notice that no one else was very amused, she went on quickly: "Well, Mrs. Garrity, I've got you and your husband straightened out."

"Not entirely," said Charlotte. "I'm going to have a baby too."

"Really!"

"Sounds like a racket, doesn't it?" said Sam.

Mrs. Lawson quickly recovered her equanimity. "Isn't that a happy coincidence! I'm glad I came, just to learn the good news." She purred a little and then rose. "I'm disappointed, though, not to have you both as junior members." Under the dim light in the hallway she paused and asked, "Are there two steps here or only one?"

"Two. I'm afraid the light is poor."

Sam saw the anger in Catharine's face as she came back into the room, and he sought to lighten it by appealing to Charlotte. "You certainly squelched her with the unborn babes."

"She packed up and went as if she thought it was catching."

"Seven-fifty!" said Catharine venomously. "I wonder if she knows how many days seven-fifty keeps this family."

"She probably knew once," said Sam, "but she's forgotten. We'll be just the same at her age."

"Sure!" agreed Charlotte. "You forget very easily. When Fred got his job we said we'd never complain again—twenty-one hundred instead of seven hundred. We've done nothing but crab ever since, and we don't save a cent."

THE air was clearing a little. The uncomfortable sourness that Mrs. Lawson had brought with her was being dissipated. It was nice of Charlotte to lead the conversation into the cozy channel of academic advancement. He and Catharine often sweetened a dull evening with talk of a pleasanter life and more security ahead.

"I guess it's silly to count on it ourselves," he said, "but they seem to want us to stick around."

"Tell Charlotte about that job in South Dakota."

"There was a chance of a job in South Dakota, but Smithton said not to take it because something better was sure to turn up."

Catharine warmed to the subject. "It's unusual, isn't it, for the head of a department to tell a fellow not to take an offer?"

"Maybe he's been to South Dakota," said Charlotte.

"Most of them are only too glad to get their assistants placed anywhere," pursued Catharine.

Charlotte rose to go, murmuring something about Fred mixing something in his lab and leaving it to boil. Sam suddenly felt depressed again, as if maybe Charlotte didn't really want to talk about the future of the Foresters.

"Can't you get that thing moved some other place?" Charlotte was pointing to the telephone.

"It keeps the rent down," said Catharine.

"So do bedbugs," retorted Charlotte and went to the front door.

Catharine came back into the room and sat down, drumming her fingers on the arm of the buff-colored chair. Sam knew what she was thinking. Even Charlotte found the place depressing and she hadn't long been out of one just like it. Had Charlotte changed, he wondered, since Fred got his instructorship? Maybe when Fred became a full professor of chemistry, Charlotte would be more like Mrs. Lawson. Maybe Catharine would, when he became a full professor of art. The prospect glowed invitingly before him in the distant future.

The telephone bell brought him back to the immediate present. Yesterday he had said that he would let Lulu do all the answering, but ancient habit impelled him, and there was a certain childish pleasure in answering Doctor Smithton and using his name ostentatiously while he gave the eager Lulu a glance of dismissal.

Catharine listened and Sam glanced over to see disappointment overshadow her face. As he spoke a sudden fear leaped to his mind and he hoped that Catharine would not think of it too. He replaced the telephone and tried to look bright and unconcerned.

"Another lunch, I take it," she said.

"Yes, Monday."

"For what this time?"

"Konopka's brother."

"Who?"

"Konopka, the painter—his brother. He's visiting the college."

"Will it do you good to meet him?"

Sam smiled. That was Catharine, always looking for a chance to push him ahead. "Jan is the famous one," he found himself explaining. "The whole family is in art of some kind or other. This one is an older brother. Jaroslav, his name is. They had a lot of trouble getting out of Europe, I believe."

"He'll make a good catch for Mrs. Lawson and her cultural women," said Catharine. "I bet they ask him to speak to them."

You will find it true that the things that are eagerly followed and admired are of no use to them who have gained them; while they who have not yet gained them imagine that, if they are acquired, everything will come along with them.

—EPICTETUS.

MIRRO

the finest aluminum!

PROVE THIS IMPORTANT TRUTH TO YOURSELF

Go to your dealer today. Ask for MIRRO, The Finest Aluminum. Then, lift it and see! You can feel the protective thickness that means over-all evenness of cooking . . . the honest weight that promises years of extra use. You can see the beauty of modern MIRRO design, its sturdy strength and easy balance. Your senses will tell you that MIRRO is, truly, The Finest Aluminum!

At department, hardware, and housefurnishing stores.

DOUBLE BOILER
1½ Qt. 2.25
2 Qt. 2.50

COMBINATION PAN
3 Qt. 2.25

PERCOLATOR
1½ Qt. 1.95
2 Qt. 2.25

DRIP COFFEE MAKER

COVERED POT
4 Qt. 1.75 6 Qt. 2.15
8 Qt. 2.65 10 Qt. 2.95

SAUCE PAN
1 Qt. .60 2 Qt. .80
3 Qt. .95

TEA KETTLE
5 Qt. 3.75

MIRRO-MATIC PRESSURE PAN
4 Qt. 12.95

All prices slightly higher in west

MIRRO

THE FINEST ALUMINUM

ALUMINUM GOODS MANUFACTURING COMPANY · MANITOWOC, WIS.

WORLD'S LARGEST MANUFACTURER OF ALUMINUM COOKING UTENSILS

"MORE MEAT, DEAR?"
"NO, THANKS—I'M SAVING ROOM FOR TWO PIECES OF YOUR SWELL PIE. BOY, YOU SURE CAN MAKE IT!"
AUNT JENNY'S
Daffodil Chiffon Pie
Fluffy as April clouds . . . cool and fragrant as a Spring breeze . . . and such mouth melting pastry. Try it!
SEE EASY RECIPE BELOW

"They'll all want seconds once they try this better tasting Lemon Pie"

says Aunt Jenny

Spry and my "Can't-Fail" Method—the secret of flaky, tender pastry

You ladies relish compliments, I know. You'll get praise a-plenty when your folks taste this airy-fairy chiffon pie. Its tender, flaky piecrust fairly melts on your tongue.

"Yes, this piecrust recipe is a winner . . . easy as rolling off a log! Just use pure, bland, all-vegetable Spry and follow these simple directions exactly. You're sure to get perfect pastry every time!"

Spry's "Can't-Fail" Pie Shell

Mix 1¼ cups sifted all-purpose flour and ½ teaspoon salt. Measure out ⅔ cup Spry. Step 1 for Tenderness: Cut in about ¼ cup Spry until mixture looks like coarse meal. Notice how it creams. Spry cuts in!

Step 2 for Flakiness: Cut in remaining ⅓ cup Spry to size of large peas. Sprinkle 2½ tablespoons cold water over part of mixture. Mix thoroughly with fork. Add just enough more water, 1 tablespoon at a time, to hold pastry together. Gather all pastry together and form a ball of dough. Did you ever see pie dough so easy to handle?

So easy to roll out! Shape with fingers into smooth, flat round. Place on floured board; with floured rolling pin, roll toward edge with successive light strokes, keeping dough round. Roll into a circle ⅛ inch thick. Notice how lightly Spry dough rolls out, how easy it is to shape. No cracking, no crumbling. Place dough in 9-inch pie pan, pat with piece of dough to fit into pan. Trim pastry 1 inch larger than pan; turn back edge. Flute rim. Prick shell. Bake in very hot oven (450° F.) 10-15 minutes.

Daffodil Chiffon Filling

2 teaspoons gelatin
¼ cup cold water
3 egg yolks
¾ cup sugar
½ teaspoon salt
¼ cup lemon juice
Grated rind of ½ lemon
3 egg whites
1 baked Spry Pie Shell
¾ cup heavy cream, whipped

Soften gelatin in cold water. Combine egg yolks, ½ cup sugar, salt, lemon juice and rind; blend well. Cook over boiling water until thick and foamy, beating constantly with rotary beater (about 3 minutes). Remove from heat. Add gelatin mixture. Cool.

Beat egg whites until stiff, but not dry. Add remaining ¼ cup sugar, a tablespoon at a time, beating after each addition until stiff. Fold carefully into gelatin mixture until well blended. Pile lightly into baked pie shell. Chill several hours, or until filling is set. Before serving spread with whipped cream; garnish with grated lemon rind, if desired.

Get more praise for all your cooking. Spry's magic cake-making secret makes possible the new easy, One-Bowl Cake Method and lighter, more delicious cake to do you proud . . . Fry with Spry and see how good fried foods look and taste. Digestible, too. No other type of shortening has all of Spry's wonderful qualities. Use it regularly.

A Product of Lever Brothers Company

"BELIEVE ME, YOU'LL BE A Better Cook WITH Spry"

Sam was relieved. Catharine was taking it lightly. Suddenly she gave him a sharp look and he knew that she had guessed.

"This Konopka—is he poor?"

"Is that why he's here?"

"He's seeing the whole country. I guess he isn't leaving out the universities and colleges."

"But if he was asked to stay here—he would, wouldn't he?"

"How do I know?"

"Do you think he's going to ask them for a job?"

Sam stretched out his leg with exaggerated casualness. "There's one chance in a hundred he wants my job, and I can't see them changing their minds here without very good reason."

"I don't care about their reasons. Suppose they did. Suppose they changed their minds about you."

"They can't. Their minds were never made up. They'd have a right to take someone else if they wanted to."

"But what would you do?" persisted Catharine.

"Nothing. Except look for another job."

"You'd let them push you out?" Catharine's voice was rising and it had a sharp, hysterical edge to it.

"I couldn't stop them," Sam said.

"What would happen to us? Suppose it was too late to get another job? What about the baby?"

"Cut it out!"

Catharine was standing and her mouth was contorted with fear. Sam's order calmed her a little and she sat back in the chair, but her hands grasped the arms so that the half-moons on her nails were sharply white in contrast.

Sam spoke more gently. "Wait until there's something to worry about before you worry," he told her. "If things don't go the way we want, there's nothing we can do."

Catharine's hands relaxed their grip and came together in her lap. "I suppose there isn't," she said.

If tombstones told the truth, everybody would wish to be buried at sea.

From What This World Needs, by John W. Raper

(Copyright 1945 by The World Publishing Company, Cleveland and New York).

Jenny did not see Catharine for two or three weeks after the meeting in the sunken garden, and she had not seen Sam since that first day when he had tried to meet her train. When Mrs. Cornish announced at breakfast that they were coming that Saturday morning Jenny felt quite excited. Now that she knew of Catharine's pregnancy and added to that knowledge what she had read between the lines of Roger's letter, she would no longer feel uneasy. She sat in the window seat overlooking the front lawn while Ellen dusted. The leaves were reddening, but the sun shone with all the power and brilliance of summer. She hummed as she watched the leaves flutter gently without falling from the branches.

Ellen looked up from the elaborate turnings of a walnut chair leg. "You're a bit homesick, aren't you?" said Ellen.

"Everything is so different here."

"You'll get used to us, and when Mr. Roger comes home ——"

"Oh, Ellen!"

Jenny, suddenly feeling that Ellen in her slavish, impassive way knew the depths of her lonely heart, slid off the window seat and embraced her. There was something comfortable about Ellen. She was an old maid, but her bosom was motherly and her thick arms ready to enfold and pat.

"My dear Jenny," said Mrs. Cornish when Ellen had been asked to go, "there are some things you have to learn, and one of them is not to be quite so friendly with Ellen."

"But I like Ellen."

"So do I." Mrs. Cornish's voice was smooth and patronizing. "Ellen has been with us for thirty years. I don't know what we should do without her."

"Mustn't I be her friend?"

"It's a little hard to explain," said Mrs. Cornish, untying a knot in the long silver chain she wore around her neck. "Ellen is paid for her services and there's an understanding in our relations. She respects me because I treat her kindly but with dignity. Believe me, Jenny, she'd be embarrassed if I did otherwise."

"With you it's different," Jenny tried to explain. "You've always been a lady in a comfortable house, but I'm only Jenny Thomas and my father is a tobacconist in Llanfair."

"You're Jenny Cornish now, my dear. You're Roger's wife."

"It was Jenny Thomas he married," argued Jenny. "It's upset he'd be if I changed into someone else."

Mrs. Cornish smiled, as one smiles at a persistent child in need of gentle but firm correction. "When he comes home things are going to be different, you know, and you'll have to face it. He'll be the Roger Cornish we raised in this home for twenty-two years. He won't be quite the same boy you knew in Wales for just seven weeks. You can't expect that."

Jenny drew herself up a little. "I don't think he'll be any different at all."

Mrs. Cornish was not touching her now, nor was she smiling. "Don't you realize, my dear, that you met him and married him at a very unusual time of his life? He'd been gone from home two years. He was lonely and overexcited. He must have felt, like many of the boys, that he must live his life to the full that summer in the dreadful fear that it might be his last. But my boy was not like many of the others. I trained him well—perhaps too well. He was taught to despise everything cheap and dirty and dishonorable, so it was impossible for him to have dealings with any woman not his wife."

Jenny eyed her steadily and said nothing.

"I'm not saying that he married you because that was the only way to get what he had to have," continued Mrs. Cornish. "And I'm sure he loves you dearly—but I know that if it hadn't been for the war, two people of so different a background as you and Roger would never even have met."

"Of course not," said Jenny. "What would have brought him to an ugly little place like Llanfair?"

"But now that you're his wife, surely you must realize that you have to adapt yourself a little to the kind of living your husband has been used to all his life."

"Does that mean I mustn't be friendly with Ellen?"

Mrs. Cornish threw up her hands with a hopeless little gesture. "Oh, it's impossible to explain," she said.

"Then why do you try?" asked Jenny, a mischievous gleam in her eye.

"Here come Sam and Catharine," said Mrs. Cornish.

Sam and Catharine looked a little surprised at the hearty welcome Mrs. Cornish gave them, and Mrs. Cornish at once drew Catharine to the sofa and asked her questions in low, motherly tones.

"Getting to feel more at home in this crazy country?" asked Sam.

Jenny smiled at him gratefully. He really looked genuinely pleased to see her again. "Some things are funny," she answered. "But it wouldn't be natural to have everything the way you want it, would it?"

They talked easily and without the feeling that there must on no account be any pauses, until Mrs. Cornish interrupted them. Catharine said little directly to Jenny until Mrs. Cornish took Sam upstairs to settle an argument by referring to the books in Roger's room.

Jenny smiled at Catharine, and seeing her differently now from the day they met on the campus lookout, she suddenly thought of Peggy Pushover's name and the absurdity of Roger's letter.

"You are happy here?" asked Catharine.

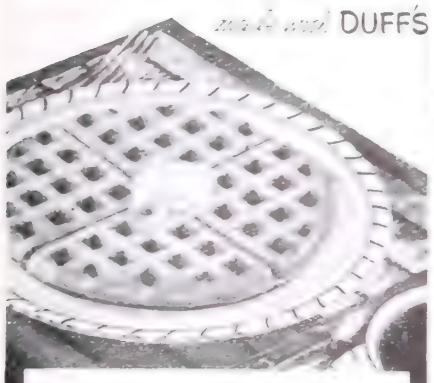
"Yes, very."

"Mrs. Cornish tells me that you sing a lot."

For a hearty breakfast

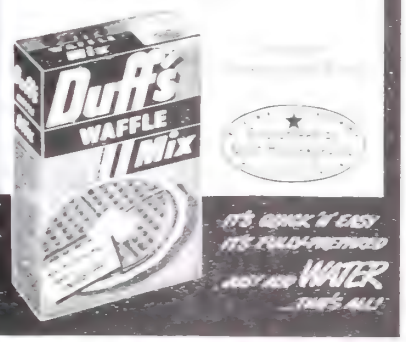
WAFFLES

made with DUFF'S



The quickest, easiest way to make perfect waffles!

Just add water to Duff's Waffle Mix and you're all set to start baking the finest waffles you've ever tasted! A grand way to provide the kind of satisfying breakfast every family needs!



It has that real maple sugar flavor

Right in New England—where they know maple sugar flavor best, Vermont Maid Syrup is the favorite!

To capture real maple sugar flavor, we first choose a maple sugar with unusually full flavor. Then, by blending it with cane sugar and other sugars, the maple flavor is made uniformly rich and delicious.

Every time you pour Vermont Maid Syrup on pancakes or waffles, you enjoy that same mouth-watering real maple sugar flavor.

Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc.,
Burlington, Vermont

Vermont Maid
Syrup

"We Welsh are always singing."

"You must be a very lighthearted people.

"Oh no, no indeed!" protested Jenny. "Wanting to sing doesn't mean you're happy. We Welsh sing when we're sad, too, and we're often sad. Somehow it turns you sadness into something beautiful instead o keeping it inside you where it hurts."

Catharine looked at her for a moment an then said slowly, "You don't know hov lucky you are, Jenny."

"Oh yes, I do," said Jenny. "I thank Go every night for Roger and the baby. Some times I think I'm the luckiest girl in th world."

Catharine smiled, and Jenny, feeling tha she had let the expression of her content ment slip from her grasp again, looke quickly into her eyes to see if she could trac a shadow of disappointment in them. Bu Catharine's eyes were bright and all absorb ing.

"Tell me," Catharine said, "what a tracted you first to Roger?"

J[illegible] off-guard, and a again she felt the insecurity and the sense intrusion which had assailed her in th sunken garden. But it was absurd to fe so nervous. Americans were always askin questions and they meant it kindly.

"I was in the shop," she answered, and she went on she gained confidence. "H came in for some tobacco. He talked so ea and he seemed to like to listen to me. He get me talking sometimes and all the tir he'd watch me with a half-smile on his face Jenny raised her eyes, but Catharine ignor the look in them that said, "Is that enough

"When did you first go out together?"

"I met him in the village one evening. stays light in the summertime until te o'clock, you know."

"I know," said Catharine, and waited.

"He asked about the walks in the neig borhood," Jenny went on, "and I told hi one I liked very much. He asked m take him and I did. We went differe walks almost every evening."

"Did you fall in love with him righ away?"

"No. To tell you the truth, I didn't. liked two or three of the village boys bett

"Until what?"

Catharine's quickness was out of rhyth with her steady eyes and quiet hand Jenny thought she heard Sam and Mr Cornish coming down the stairs. If on they would come quickly!

"Until what?" repeated Catharine, m slowly now, and gently.

"Wouldn't you rather ——" began Jenn then, stammering a little, "I don't und stand why you ——"

"Tell me," urged Catharine. "Tell m Please!"

Jenny had the feeling of not being in M Cornish's living room at all, but of bei drawn up and into a great emptiness wh there were only Catharine and herself. T words came easily, and now she knew th they had to come it did not embarrass h to hear them fall from her lips. She spo slowly and in a low voice and Cathari watched her all the time she spoke.

"He didn't use any words. He kissed m and I knew exactly what he meant. On t way home we had to cross a little river. O the middle of the steppingstones he held m hand and he said, 'How would you like to li in America?' And I said, 'Someday I'd li to go there.' And then I think he said, you marry me you can either wait for m here or go to America and be ready for m when I come home.' And I said, 'I'll go America and get everything ready for yo Then he helped me off the last stone."

"And after that?"

Jenny was silent. The emptiness withdre and she felt herself firmly in possession of h strength once more. The dark eyes had power to force her against her will or to p out her treasured secrets. This time s looked steadily back at Catharine and wit out saying a word refused to speak. T silence was painfully long and it w Catharine who averted her eyes first.

Florida Oranges . . . all

UEEZED

peak of deliciousness!

● FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION · Lakeland, Florida

RANGE JUICE

YOU DON'T Cream Shortening

YOU DON'T BEAT EGGS !

Betty Crocker
of General Mills

Yet amazing Betty Crocker Double-Quick New Method with Softasilk will give you lovelier cakes than any other method, any other flour!*

- Uses only 1 bowl.
- Cuts mixing time to 4 minutes!
- So sure—brides, too, turn out light, tender, fresher-tasting, higher, wonderful cakes!
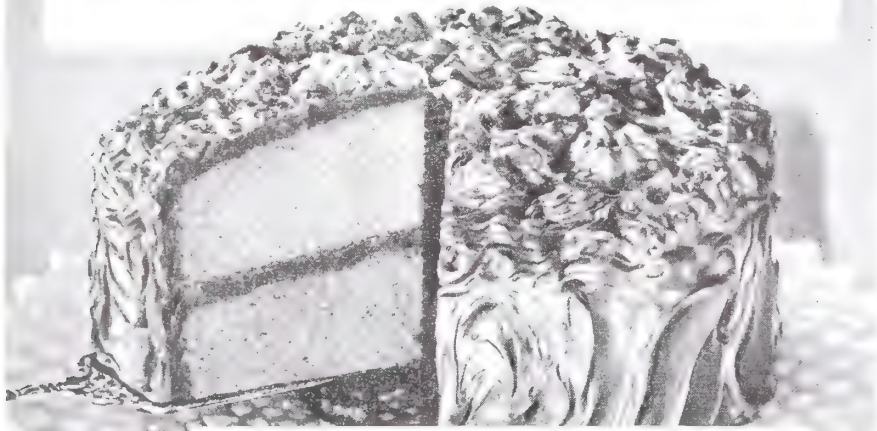
- Betty Crocker Softasilk is cake flour—made for cakes and cakes alone. The kind of flour leading cook books specify. The only cake flour Betty Crocker recommends for new method Softasilk recipes.
- Get Softasilk. In one box you get the cake flour and the Betty Crocker Double-Quick New Method recipes that spell cake-making magic!

* See guarantee on package



To Celebrate
Betty Crocker 25th Anniversary

Creamy Fudge Chocolate Cake

A fudgy chocolate cake—fine-textured and moist

Preheat oven to 350° (moderate). Grease generously and dust with flour 2 round layer pans, 8-in. diameter, 1¼-in. deep. All measurements level. Spoon sifted SOFTASILK lightly into cup, level off. Due to soda, there should be no delays in the mixing or baking of this cake.

Mix to a smooth paste — 2 sq. unsweetened chocolate (2 oz.), melted; ½ cup boiling water

Sift together into bowl — 2⅛ cups (2 cups plus 2 tbsp.) sifted SOFTASILK Cake Flour; 1⅓ cups sugar; 1 tsp. soda; ½ tsp. cream of tartar; 1 tsp. salt

Add ..... — ⅓ cup high grade vegetable shortening; ⅔ cup milk; 1 tsp. vanilla

Beat vigorously with spoon for 2 minutes by clock (about 150 strokes per minute). Or mix with electric mixer on slow to medium speed for 2 minutes. Scrape sides, bottom of bowl frequently.

Add .....⅓ to ½ cup unbeaten egg whites (3 large)

Beat 1 more minute, scraping bowl frequently.

Add.....the chocolate paste

Beat 1 more minute. Pour into prepared pans. Bake 25 to 30 minutes in moderate oven (350°). Frost with Brown Beauty Icing, adding ½ cup chopped nuts to top icing.

TO SAVE ON SUGAR: Use ⅔ cup corn syrup and only ⅔ cup sugar. Reduce water to ¼ cup plus 1 tbsp. Add syrup with milk to dry ingredients.

BROWN BEAUTY ICING. Beat with a rotary beater until consistency to spread (3 to 5 minutes) 1 cup sifted confectioners' sugar, 3 egg yolks, 3 tbsp. milk, 2 sq. unsweetened chocolate (2 oz.), melted, 3 tbsp. softened shortening, ½ tsp. vanilla.

Copr. 1947, General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn. "Betty Crocker" and "Softasilk" are registered trade marks of General Mills, Inc.

13 CAKE RECIPES, 6 ICINGS
SUGAR SAVING HINTS WITH PACKAGE

SOFTASILK
CAKE FLOUR
A Product of General Mills

BARGAIN! AMAZING OFFER OF 14-PIECE CAKE-MAKING SET WITH PACKAGE!

(Continued from Page 134)

The other reason was a deeper secret. In the background of her thinking and feeling were other figures: Roger and Jenny and their baby. She thought she had known how she felt toward the man she had once loved, but when she met Jenny and saw the baby envy had welled up in her, so that now she was assailed with the fear that she had not conquered her love for Roger.

And yet, when he took his leave of her there was no hint of love in his good-by's. And when Sam came back from the Army she was sure she was in love with him, so sure that when the news came of Roger's marriage, that day of the picnic, it hardly stirred her. It was only when Jenny came to Creston that Catharine had begun to think of Roger again as he used to be. Because the child was Roger's, her old love for Roger surged up at once and she wanted to hold it in her arms. She could not look at Sam for the shame of her jealousy and she knew, then, that she must have a child, for she was confident that the child would cast out of her forever this foolish return of a youthful love.

But even now, with the knowledge of the baby and the excited looking forward, the feeling for Roger would not leave her. It was infuriating and absurd. She was sure that the instant she faced Roger when he returned, all the stirrings would be allayed.

By then, perhaps, her own child would be born and this would prize them still farther apart. She was likely to be so preoccupied by that time that Roger's return would be no more disturbing than that of the boy across the street a day or two ago. She tried to persuade herself, but deep down she knew that she dreaded Roger's return, in case the hurt would be too great. However great it was, she must keep it from Sam and Jenny. To keep it from Sam was easy, but from Jenny it was not so easy. She wondered if Jenny had suspected anything the day they had talked while Mrs. Cornish and Sam had gone upstairs.

After a plunge to all the dismal possibilities in her life Catharine felt almost lighthearted when she recovered her spirits, and it was so today. The chances were that Konopka would go away and not come back. And as for Roger, even if she found herself in love with him when he returned, the hurt would be a sharp experience, not like the dragging ache to which she was subjected now. It was something to look forward to, something she had to experience, like the recurring stabs of labor and the feverish birth that would mark the end of her pregnancy.

> Flattery pleases very generally. In the first place, the flatterer may think what he says to be true; but, in the second place, whether he thinks so or not, he certainly thinks those whom he flatters of consequence enough to be flattered. —SAMUEL JOHNSON.

SHE ate an egg for lunch to the jingling salon music the radio offered between twelve and one o'clock, and after washing the few dishes she checked her appointment with Doctor Prescott.

It was a raw day, not yet down to freezing, but feeling colder than midwinter. Only a few weeks ago she had been wearing a summer dress, and now she was shivering in her thin coat. Brown leaves clung to the street and the air was heavy with dampness. Catharine was glad when a large and shiny car drew up beside her.

"Hi, Katie!"

"Hello, Joe!"

"Going downtown? Can I give you a ride? Haven't seen you in months," said Joe Geyer, looking her up and down in a manner curiously reminiscent of those war years, when Creston was full of uniforms.

"How's your wife?" asked Catharine.

"Just fine. She's having a baby in the spring."

"So am I."

"Well!" Joe looked down as far as her knees and up again.

"Did you play much tennis last summer?" asked Catharine, recollecting Joe's bare chest and tight figured shorts.

"Every day," said Joe. "I'm going down for some handball right now." Then, with a glance that she didn't like, "What does Sam do for exercise?"

"He walks a lot."

"Walking's no exercise."

"He was in the Army, you know," said Catharine.

"That's all over now," said Joe. "Some of the boys got the only exercise they ever had in the Army, and now it's all over they're getting fat and lazy."

"Sam isn't fat and lazy," she argued back.

"What does he do with himself all day?"

"The department is keeping him busy right now. You'd be surprised what a lot of preparation goes into one week of classes."

"I sure would," said Joe.

SHE knew that Joe despised Sam. Eight years ago Sam was doing pretty well in college and Joe was working at the Everquick filling station, smiling at all the women in the cars. Sam was still "doing pretty well" in the university and no nearer his objective than he was eight years ago, while Joe, partly on his own account and partly because his father had seen a good business venture in taxis, was one of the richest men in Creston. People like Mrs. Cornish called him nouveau riche, but Joe had an easy shamelessness that blunted the barbs. "I'd rather be nouveau riche than never riche"—and the way he drew out the Frenchiness of riche had his companions convulsed with merriment.

"Who's this Konopka guy?" asked Joe presently.

Catharine answered with a smile. She was too proud to let Joe Geyer see her bitterness. Indeed, she drew a faint pleasure from describing a background of which Joe knew nothing, until she was taken aback when Joe volunteered a piece of information that Sam, if he knew of it, had not told her.

"Did you hear what Maxwell did? Wired from Florida and handed his house over to this new fellow! Can you beat that?"

"Handed it over?"

For a moment Catharine thought that he meant that Konopka was staying, that already he had been offered their job, that Joe Geyer and everybody but them knew of it. Her whole skin tingled with fear, and it was only when Joe went on to explain that she eased back and breathed a great sigh of relief.

"Told him to live in it for the three weeks or whatever it is he's here. Said he'd be honored to have a guy with that name stay in his house and use it."

"Well, it was just sitting around empty," said Catharine.

"Sure, but you know how fussy old Maxwell is. What kind of a reputation does this guy have, though, to get an offer like that? I'd never heard of him before—had you?"

"Of course," lied Catharine.

"That's something," said Joe admiringly, "when you go to a foreign country and people know you're somebody and offer you a house to stay in."

And Catharine felt a fellow feeling. With all his swift success, his pretty wife, his biceps and his glass brick, Joe's heart was yearning for importance. Was anybody satisfied, she wondered, or did everyone envy everyone else?

She suddenly felt guilty and ashamed, she who had Sam whom she loved and who loved her. She thought of the people who had every reason to envy her: Miss Jacoby, the old maid who lived with and quarreled with another old maid ten years her junior; Mrs. Dunham, who had been wanting a child for thirteen years and who had only about three more years to go. She shuddered.

"Cold?" asked Joe.

"No, thanks. I'm quite warm."

"Got to take care of yourself. You've got two to think about now."

"Three," she answered. "I think about Sam too."

(Continued on Page 138)

Something different in cake? How's this?

No baking skilled! But a rare flavor with Del Monte Brand Pineapple!

1—We put extra care here

How would you like the job of keeping tabs on the descendants of 25,000 different pineapple plants? Then selecting and eliminating among them year by year for texture, color and flavor of fruit—till you got down to just seven superior types? Quite a task—when you consider that each plant takes almost two years to produce a ripe pineapple!

But Del Monte has been at that exacting job for 25 years—and is still watching, with a critical eye, for plants of outstanding character. The search for finer flavor is never ended—for us. Because flavor is our responsibility—to you and to our brand. We know every bit of extra care we take means greater enjoyment for you.

2—You get extra flavor here

Watch eyes brighten any time you bring on any style of Del Monte Pineapple! That same authentic tropic flavor—lively, tart-sweet, completely refreshing—is deliciously yours in tender juicy Slices, sparkling golden Juice, ever-so-handy Crushed. Have it your own way—or in this decidedly different dessert:

PINEAPPLE NUT CRISP

- 1 No. 2½ can Del Monte Sliced Pineapple
- ¾ cup sugar
- 1½ tsps. unflavored gelatin
- Dash of salt
- 3½ cups Rice Krispies
- 1 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped
- Whipped cream

Pour ½ cup syrup from Del Monte Pineapple into small saucepan; add sugar, cook over low heat, stirring constantly, till sugar is dissolved. Continue cooking to 240° F. (soft ball in cold water). Soften gelatin in 3 tbsps. pineapple syrup, add with salt to hot syrup; stir till dissolved. Beat with rotary beater till white and fluffy. Heat Rice Krispies and nuts in oven; place in buttered bowl, add syrup mixture and stir till well-mixed. Press lightly into buttered 9-inch cake pan, chill in refrigerator. When ready to serve, spread with sweetened, flavored whipped cream and top with pineapple slices. Garnish with nuts and cherries if desired. Serves 6.

Extra flavor? Sure—Del Monte always puts

flavor first

Del Monte PINEAPPLE

SLICED • CRUSHED • JUICE

New Charm for your Smile

with the triple-action tooth powder

1. BRIGHTENS TEETH!

And cleans 'em clean. Five cleansing and polishing ingredients make Calox a whiz at bringing out all the natural brilliance of your teeth.

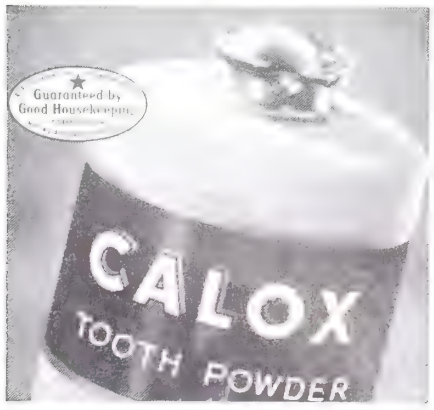
2. FRESHENS MOUTH!

You'll love the tingly fresh-as-a-breeze taste of mint-flavored Calox. It tastes so wonderful ...and leaves you feeling wonderful.

3. SWEETENS BREATH!

Romance-minded? Important secret of every attractive girl is her breath-less beauty. Calox gives you extra protection against bad breath originating in the mouth. Try Calox today!



made by McKesson & Robbins with 114 years of pharmaceutical know-how

(Continued from Page 136)

Joe smiled and drew the car to a standstill a few yards from the central crossing of Creston. "Will this be okay?" he asked.

She tried to sound airy, but she failed. She knew that he was looking at her legs as she scrambled sideways out of the car, and as she walked to the Inglis Building, where Doctor Prescott's office was, she smarted beneath Joe Geyer's smiling scorn of Sam and everything Sam stood for.

As she waited for the slow, squeaking elevator of the Inglis Building she told herself angrily that Sam was worth a dozen Joe Geyers with their loudness and flashiness. A man with the promise and sensitiveness of Sam Forester had to work his way steadily for years before he could hope to gain the position that made all his study worth while. And Joe Geyer, this loudmouthed grinning oaf, was an established success.

They would see, she stormed to herself as the gate clanked open, they would see that Sam had it in him to be a success too. If only she knew for certain! Poor Sam! Once he got the appointment, perhaps he would be different. It might be the making of him. He might even be seen at the country club now and again. All he wanted was to be given his chance to show his capabilities. She was sure of that. Joe Geyer had the push and Konopka had the influence. As an unknown American, Sam had to have one of these. She would have to help him.

The gray-faced old man who operated the elevator brought it to several stops slightly above and slightly below the fourth floor and finally opened the gate with a "Watch your step, lady!" Catharine stepped down and turned toward the door labeled RANDOLPH PRESCOTT.

Doctor Prescott was uncommunicative and Catharine's mind was more on what Joe Geyer had told her. How easy to be a foreigner with a famous name! Already, even though he was staying only three weeks, he was settled in the big house between the rivers.

"Be sure you drink plenty of water," said Doctor Prescott.

"I do. Plenty," said Catharine.

"And milk."

"Yes, of course. Milk."

Doctor Prescott looked at her oddly and Catharine flushed. She had scarcely listened to what he said, but the mention of water and milk had called out familiar responses and she had uttered them mechanically while she went on thinking of something else. And Doctor Prescott had caught her at it.

That evening, with pretended casualness, she told Sam what Joe Geyer had said about Konopka and the house.

"Isn't that swell!" was Sam's response.

The great gulf that lay between her way of thinking and Sam's revealed itself to her so suddenly that she laughed, and Sam looked up at her, puzzled.

"Never mind," she said. "You go on with your homework."

SAM bent his head over a pile of student themes, dating from the beginning of the semester, entitled "Why I have elected a course in the history of art." Dear Sam! If only she could be possessed with such generous thoughts! It was odd, she mused. How different she and Sam were in their reactions! She had brooded and fumed all day, her anger pointed alternately at Joe Geyer and Jaroslav Konopka. And all Sam felt was a gladness that his rival was comfortably settled for his stay in Creston. Her heart seemed suddenly to overflow and she longed to put her arms about Sam and tell him how much she loved him and how much better he was than she.

Her attention was arrested by a large black spider that was crawling up the wall. Saying nothing to Sam, she got up, fetched an old rag, rolled it into a pad and stalked the creature along the wall.

"Why didn't you tell me? I'd have done it," said Sam.

Catharine said nothing, but with a quick motion, to spare the wall, brushed the spider to the floor, and as it hurried for shelter she pounced on it with the rag. The rag was loose and the creature was only partially squashed at the first blow. It limped, crablike, from the side of the rag, and for a moment Catharine let it limp, watching it with triumph and hatred, its ugly black hairiness awry and awkward, the terrifying beauty of its speed and skill and co-ordination wrecked.

"Finish it off," said Sam.

Catharine hesitated, watching the spasmodic movement that grew weaker with the effort of each struggle; then, with a final stroke, she crushed the life out of it. She felt as well as heard, through the rag, the breaking of the body.

When she had washed her hands with disinfectant-smelling soap, she came back to sip her coffee. And in some odd way the dissatisfaction had gone and it was not long before they were chatting in the coziest way over the pot of coffee and the scattered themes.

It was quite by accident that Jenny came to sing at the Academy Club. It all started when Professor Small, of the Music Department, drove Mrs. Cornish home from shopping and was invited in for tea. Jenny was singing when he entered the hallway, and he stopped to listen, his hand on Mrs. Cornish's arm.

"Good voice," he said. "A bit undisciplined, but it has a nice ping."

Jenny stopped when she heard the door shut, but Professor Small hurried into the room and took her by the hands.

"Sing some more," he asked her.

Jenny, always pleased to be singing, sang again.

"Would you sing at the club for us?"

Mrs. Cornish began to protest, and Jenny, who was about to protest on her own account, immediately folded her hands and said, "Thank you. I'd very much like to sing for you."

It was arranged that Jenny should sing half a dozen Welsh songs. Professor Small was sure that Doctor Konopka, who, in addition to being an art historian, was a more than acceptable pianist, would accompany her. The program could be of the folk variety, Welsh and Bohemian. He thought she would enjoy it.

Jenny welcomed the rehearsals that Professor Small suggested, and she could see that Mrs. Cornish wished she had never invited him in for tea. Four of the songs were in collections in the university library, but the two others were only in Jenny's head and fingers. Doctor Konopka would have to listen to Jenny accompanying herself and then copy and arrange the accompaniment.

"Why don't you make it easier for everyone by singing the songs that are in the book?" asked Mrs. Cornish. But Jenny insisted on the other two and Professor Small, when she had sung them, wanted them on the program. "It means so much more practice," complained Mrs. Cornish.

"But if Doctor Konopka has the time and doesn't mind."

"I'm thinking of Roger," said Mrs. Cornish.

Jenny flushed. "Why should Roger mind?" she demanded.

"Little Roger," explained Mrs. Cornish.

"I wheel him out every day," said Jenny, feeling that she was made to seem neglectful in front of Professor Small. "Besides, Ellen loves to look after him."

"I don't think it's quite fair to Ellen, either."

Professor Small smiled and Jenny caught it and turned to him quickly. "Would Doctor Konopka mind if I brought the baby along?" she asked.

"I'm sure he wouldn't."

"Jenny—you mustn't think of doing such a thing!" Mrs. Cornish's voice went up on "think" in a circumflex of horror.

"Doctor Maxwell's house is very large," observed Professor Small.

"I forbid it," said Mrs. Cornish. "You go and practice, Jenny. I'll look after Roger."

"Thank you. Thank you."

Mrs. Cornish turned away before Jenny could kiss her. Jenny gave a little skip of delight.

"When shall I start, professor?"

"I'll take you and introduce you to him first. Will tomorrow be all right?"

"Will tomorrow be all right?" echoed Jenny.

"I suppose so," said Mrs. Cornish. "I'll cancel my shopping trip."

"THEN I'll be saving you money," said Jenny cheerfully. "What time, professor?"

"Three o'clock. And cut the 'professor.' Everyone calls me Jake."

Jenny liked Jaroslav Konopka the minute she set eyes on him. His face was round and the corners of his mouth were turned up as if he often smiled. His eyebrows slanted Slavically and attractively and his whole face had an alertness and a concentration that were flattering to other people. The first thing he did was to ask Jenny questions about Wales, and she answered readily and felt perfectly at home with him. Jake Small sat in a large armchair and twiddled his thumbs, smiling benignly and not seeming to be at all in a hurry.

Jenny quickly threw off the nervousness that had assailed her on the way, and after Konopka had played a little she sang. Once or twice, delighted by some phrase, he joined in with her and the clock struck five when Jenny felt she had been there no more than half an hour.

"Two hours I said to Mrs. Cornish," she said, looking around for her handbag.

"Oh, but we are going to have some tea," said Konopka. "I rang for it several minutes ago."

"I didn't hear you," Jenny protested.

"That was when you were holding on to that A-flat," said Konopka. "See?"

Jenny laughed and saw him point to an old-fashioned bell pull to the left of the piano. She was thoroughly and excitedly happy.

Professor Small did not come to any of the three subsequent rehearsals, and each time Jenny and Konopka had tea together. He played her the Bohemian pieces he had chosen for the concert and some other pieces that made him very sad, and Jenny knew how he felt. Each time she saw him she liked him more, and her rehearsal afternoons were made the more delightful by Mrs. Cornish's silent disapproval.

But even Mrs. Cornish admitted that the songs that Jenny sang all over the gaunt house were pretty, and once or twice she heard Ellen humming them in the kitchen at the end of the day's work in a cracked, uneven voice.

Sam, usually so good-natured, showed a little annoyance when Catharine refused to go to the Academy Club concert. He thought it absurd that she should hold it against

(Continued on Page 140)

WITH THE CHILDREN

Gazing at the clouds as they rolled by, our young daughter said, "I know just what clouds feel like. They feel just like I do when I walk barefooted up grandfather's sinky, soft stairway."

"There are some houses that do not have rocking chairs in them. What do people in those houses do when their children feel a little sick and the baby is fussy?"

"I can say 'umbrella' but 'underbrella' sounds right to me because I like to be under it."

The little boy was asked his name. He replied, "I don't know." Then he was asked his father's name. Again he said he did not know. The grownup did not give up and continued, "What does your mommy say when she calls your daddy?" Quickly the small lad spoke up, "Oh, she calls him Hurry Joe."

–KATHRYN COFFEY GLENNON.

Read what you get in
2 GLASSES OF OVALTINE
more VITAMIN C than 4 ounces of Tomato Juice
more PROTEIN than 3 Eggs more IRON than 3 servings of Spinach
more NIACIN than 6 slices of Enriched Bread
more VITAMIN D than 10 ounces of Butter
more VITAMIN B1 than 3 servings of Oatmeal
more VITAMIN G than 1 pound of Sirloin Steak
more VITAMIN A than 2 servings of Peas
more FOOD-ENERGY than 2 dishes of Ice Cream more CALCIUM and PHOSPHORUS than 2½ servings of American Cheese

GET ALL YOUR Vitamins IN FOOD

Here's the Newer Way...for better results!

As you know, authorities agree that most people should get extra vitamins as a safeguard to good health. And authorities also agree, beyond question, that the best way to get vitamins would be in your everyday food. But that's hard to do:—

Because everyday foods vary considerably from day to day in vitamin and mineral values. And, besides, they lose a lot of their vitamins in shipping, storing and cooking.

That's why so many people are supplementing their meals with Ovaltine. Ovaltine is standardized. Its content is scientifically controlled. It never varies. Each spoonful supplies the same generous amounts of vitamins and minerals. You know exactly what you're getting. It's a supplementary food that makes up deficiencies in ordinary foods.

So you don't have to worry about variations or losses. You know that a serving of Ovaltine in a glass of average milk always gives you the same substantial quantities of Vitamins A, B_1, C, D, G and Niacin—and Calcium, Phosphorus and Iron. And you can be sure that 2 glasses of Ovaltine daily and just normal meals will give you all the vitamins and minerals any normal person can use. And when you drink Ovaltine you get these vitamins and minerals the preferred way—in food.

You'll find, too, that Ovaltine has a very agreeable taste—a taste that grows on you. So for better results, why don't you start drinking Ovaltine at meals, just as you would tea or coffee? Or, if you prefer, between meals or at bedtime. Then, if you're a normal person, you'll know, as far as you are concerned, you've solved the vitamin problem.

FAR MORE THAN VITAMINS... Ovaltine also contains virtually every other precious food element needed for buoyant health and vitality, including the elements that vitamins must have to function properly. That's why Ovaltine is so widely recognized as the ideal supplementary food-drink.

Ladies, accept this challenge

Expert Dry Cleaning at Home or Double Your Money Back!

What a guarantee! What a chance to discover Renuzit, America's Largest Selling French Dry Cleaner! It's so - o - o easy, just "Dip and Rinse" and you get expert results! Like millions of other homemakers you're sure to like this safe, modern way to save time, work and money by dry cleaning at home. It's an opportunity too good to miss — and remember, you just can't miss with Renuzit!

DOUBLE MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE

Buy the 2-gallon, 1-gallon or quart size — use it according to directions — if not completely satisfied return the unused portion to Renuzit Home Products Company, Phila. 3, Pa., and receive double the purchase price.

1 gal. . . . 79c
2 gal. . $1.55 Slightly Higher West of Rockies

Everything Comes Clean With

RENUZIT

FRENCH DRY CLEANER

Dresses	Sweaters	Rugs
Blouses	Skirts	Curtains
Slacks	Fabric Gloves	Drapes
Neckties	Slip Covers	Upholstery

For Hard to Remove Spots!

NEW! RENUZIT SPOT AND STAIN REMOVER

Fruit, Chocolate, Lipstick, Grease and almost all other oil and water soluble spots!

(Continued from Page 138)

Konopka because he might possibly come into the good fortune which they thought should be theirs.

"He's leaving town next Tuesday," he argued. "Come on, be a sport!"

"How can I listen to that man and enjoy it?" she asked. "I'll be thinking all the time is he after our job or isn't he?"

"It isn't his fault if he is. And if he was offered it, it wouldn't be his fault either, even if he said yes."

"I don't want to meet him."

"If he plays very well they may offer him a job in the Music Department." It was no time to joke, and Sam realized it after it was out. "Come for Jenny's sake," he urged, being serious again. "She'll be disappointed if you don't."

"Leave me alone," Catharine screamed suddenly and then buried her head in the cushion at the end of the davenport.

Never in her life had she behaved like this. Sam was overwhelmed. He comforted her, apologized for worrying her about a trivial matter, and before he went he made her a pot of coffee by way of a special treat. She sipped the coffee slowly in the loneliness of the dingy apartment.

It seemed odd that Jenny and Konopka were performing together. They almost formed a subtle league against her contentment. She wondered what Jenny looked like this evening. Her thought drifted to Konopka. She admitted to herself that in her obstinacy about the concert, in her determination not to see this man lay a strong desire to meet him and satisfy her curiosity. But she dreaded the first time and she hated the thought of people looking at her, nudging each other and saying, "I wonder what she thinks about it?" and "Look! There's Catharine Forester talking to the man who's after the job her husband wants. I wonder which of them will get it?"

THERE must be no one around when she met him, not even Sam. After her behavior the night of the telephone call and Sam's impatience and quick forgiveness this evening, there would be a self-consciousness about meeting Konopka. She would have to do it alone. It would not be difficult. He was in Sam's department and it would be the most natural thing in the world. Well, now was her chance. If necessary she could explain it to Sam afterward. The main thing was to go to the house and see him and get it over with.

She took a second cup of coffee. This was all very silly, she mused, and she was behaving like a high-school girl. No wonder Sam had been irritated. She was ashamed of herself and angry with Sam for forgiving her so readily. What would he say if she dressed and went along now? She put down her cup and started to her feet. No, she decided. Too late for that. Besides, she wanted to see Konopka alone.

Feeling calmer now, she began to reason with herself. Perhaps Sam was right. After all, he might be a decent-enough fellow, this Konopka. He might have no idea of asking for a job in Creston. The whole thing might easily originate in Creston itself. It would be just like Creston, knowing how much it meant to the Foresters, to put the idea of asking for a job into Konopka's head and to conceal from him the fact that the job was almost promised already.

Perhaps the Smithtons — Now her anger flared against this gentle, mild-mannered pair, but smug in their mildness as Catharine saw them now. They knew all about Sam, and Konopka was merely the instrument of their guile. Perhaps they had deliberately invited him there, and it might even have been in their minds to give him the job before they ever set eyes on him. The Art Department would be put on the map with a name like Konopka, but Forester would hardly boost the registration anywhere.

She was exhausted with anger and it angered her still further that it was all useless. Nothing had yet happened to arouse her resentment, but her resentment had started up in anticipation. It had pulsated in her throat, had misted her eyes, and weakened her hands so that they were limp and wet with grasping nothing but each other. She sat facing the buff wall until Sam came home from the concert.

"How was it?" she asked.

"It was fine," said Sam. "Jenny was disappointed .hat you weren't there."

Catharine asked no more questions about the concert and Sam made no further reference to it. He made no comment about the coffee cup and the percolator, and when she took them to the kitchen to wash them he followed in silence and dried them for her. After that they went to bed.

Jenny came home from the concert in a daze of delight. Everyone had been so kind to her she hardly knew how to express her appreciation. The whole day had been packed with pleasure and success. It had started well in the morning when Jenny, suddenly feeling grateful to Mrs. Cornish for the rehearsal afternoons, went downtown and bought her a dozen yellow roses. Mrs. Cornish was touched and of her own accord embraced her. Then she took her upstairs and showed her the white dress she had bought her especially for the concert. It was Jenny's turn to burst into tears and embrace Mrs. Cornish. That was the kind of day it was.

When, in the late afternoon, a corsage of red roses came for Jenny from Doctor Konopka, her first impulse was to hide them. The sweetness of the new and rather strained understanding might so easily be soured, and Mrs. Cornish had never concealed her disapproval of the rehearsal teas. But today of all days Jenny was ill-prepared for deceit. So she sought Mrs. Cornish out immediately and showed her the red roses.

Mrs. Cornish smiled and told her how nice Doctor Konopka had been about it. He had written to her, asking her permission before sending flowers to her son's wife, and when Mrs. Cornish granted him the permission he had called her on the telephone to thank her and to ask, in such a pleasant voice, what color and kind of dress Jenny would be wearing.

Jenny decided never to deceive again and went back to the full enjoyment of her day, which was one of the loveliest she had ever lived. Only one thing was missing, and that was Roger's presence. Up in her room she sang a little to his picture as if to give him the first of her voice just as she gave him the first of everything.

It all went so fast: the drive to the Academy Club, the crowd at the entrance, the handshakes, the silence, and then into the air above the white still faces the lovely familiar songs. Far too soon for Jenny it was all over. People were applauding generously and some were standing. Jenny could see Mrs. Cornish smiling proudly six rows back, and two rows behind her Sam Forester.

Then tables at the back of the room were set with coffee and cakes and people talked and laughed and praised, and Jenny's eyes were very bright. She could feel that they were.

JENNY had only a moment to speak to Sam, who apologized for Catharine's absence, and then she was whisked off to meet two elegantly dressed ladies, a Mrs. Lawson and a Mrs. Patten. Mrs. Patten was accompanied by a plump daughter who had fidgeted in the middle of Dafydd y Garreg Wen. But Jenny was in no mood to carp and she even smiled at the little brat.

Ellen had come to the concert and hurried home at the end. She opened the door for them, said she had never heard such beautiful singing and reported that the girl who had been hired for the evening said she had never seen a finer-looking baby than Roger. Ellen's shining face seemed to reflect the warm glow of the whole day.

The next morning the sky was gray and a little rain fell. Jenny decided to put off her walk with the buggy until the afternoon. After the excitement it was rather dull sitting in the living room.

"Let's have a fire, Ellen," said Mrs. Cornish. "It's the first of November and it's a gloomy-looking day."

Ellen set the logs over the andirons, stuffed paper and kindling beneath them, and as soon as the flames caught and rose everything seemed more cheerful and interesting. Jenny hummed over her knitting and Mrs. Cornish began to tidy her writing table, shuffling papers and pausing between the rustling sounds she made to read a letter through or to examine an ancient receipted bill.

It was then that the news came. The door chimes echoed softly in the hallway, the vacuum cleaner whirred down and into silence somewhat sooner than Jenny expected, as if Ellen had seen the man from the telegraph office as he turned into the driveway and anticipated him. Jenny did not glance up as Ellen came into the room. She felt her standing by Mrs. Cornish and waiting for an answer. Messages, letters, menus, they all came into the living room in this quiet and genteel way.

Mrs. Cornish was silent. She seemed to be taking longer than usual to reply or give an order in her careful, decided, ladylike voice. Jenny glanced at her. Mrs. Cornish was staring at the paper in her hand. Her face was strangely taut. Then Mrs. Cornish drew in her breath with a long and fearful sob. Jenny let fall the yellow wool and the needles.

"What is it? What has happened?"

Mrs. Cornish could not speak, but she held out the paper and there it was, clear and cruel, and Jenny read that Roger had been killed.

(Continued on Page 142)

". . . now please try to make a good impression on my mom!"

Magic Chef

has everything a woman wants to make cooking easier-faster-better

YOU'LL ENJOY 48 ADVANTAGES in your new Magic Chef . . . We know the average woman has to prepare a thousand meals a year. So we've put into Magic Chef every possible improvement to make the cooking of these meals as delightfully easy as modern science can make it. Before you choose a range see your Gas Company or Magic Chef Dealer. Let them show you the 48 advantages of having a new "CP" automatic Magic Chef in your kitchen.

WHEREVER YOU LIVE, you can enjoy Magic Chef Cooking. Perfect results with "Pyrofax" or other LP (bottled or tank) gases.

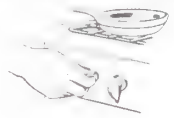
WE WARRANT to the original purchaser for use that all burners of a Magic Chef Gas Range will not burn out or lose their efficiency for the life of the range.

AMERICAN STOVE COMPANY, Dept. L-1, St. Louis 2, Mo.

Here are 4 of Magic Chef's 48 outstanding features

RED WHEEL REGULATOR
Accurate and automatic. No guesswork. Assures perfect baking every time in Magic Chef's high speed dependable oven.

SWING OUT BROILER
High-level, no stooping, smokeless. Better for broiling, barbecuing and food warming. Wonderfully easy to clean.



AUTOMATIC LIGHTING
Any heat you want instantly and automatically with this famous Hi-Lo, non-clog burner. No matches needed—thrifty.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE
More women cook on Magic Chef than on any other range . . . because they prefer Magic Chef's 48 cooking advantages.

YOU CAN COOK IT BETTER WITH Magic Chef

THE GAS RANGE WITH THE FAMOUS RED WHEEL

©1947, The American Stove Co.

See this name to get cream cheese

Guaranteed Fresh!

Copr. 194 . by Kraft Foods Company

CREAM CHEESE RING WITH CLING PEACHES. Get three 3-oz. packages of genuine Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese—the brand made only by Kraft and always fresh and rich in flavor! Into this delicious cream cheese blend ½ cup orange juice and 1 cup of juice from a can of Cling peaches. Add 2 teaspoons of grated orange rind and ¾ teaspoon of salt. In 1 cup of cold water soften 2 tablespoons gelatin; dissolve over hot water. Cool and add to cream cheese mixture. Blend well. Pour into 6½-inch ring mold and chill until firm. Unmold on round chop plate; fill center and garnish outer edge with curly endive. Surround the ring with canned Cling peach halves, cut side up, and fill hollow of each with red currant jelly.

PHILADELPHIA Brand
CREAM CHEESE is made only by KRAFT

(Continued from Page 140)

Ellen turned and ran to the kitchen. Jenny put her arms around Mrs. Cornish, who was sobbing without tears, and the great, racking sobs seemed to run through her whole body.

At first an uncomprehending bewilderment supported Jenny and she was able to comfort Mrs. Cornish. She could not cry, though her eyes were hot and tears would have relieved them. The words she had read danced before her vision. Could it be possible that the sender had made a mistake? Sometimes things like that happened. She picked up the paper again and read, hoping to see something different, an error, a loophole for a tiny desperate hope. It was almost a minute before she spoke.

"It says killed." She spoke the words with dry lips. Then the merciful tears were upon her. She walked slowly out of the room and up the stairs. She shut the door of her room and without looking at the picture or at the roses beside it, she threw herself on the bed and gave herself up to grief.

It was afternoon when Ellen telephoned Catharine and in a voice that was shaken with crying told her the news. She said something about a train that had been derailed near Freiburg, but after that Catharine heard nothing until she was conscious of Ellen saying, "Are you there, Mrs. Forester? Can you hear me? Are you still there?"

"Yes, Ellen, I heard you. Tell Mrs. Cornish I'll come to see her."

She put down the receiver and walked back to her chair. She had been having tea by herself when the message came. Now she pushed the cup away from her and stared at the wall. Roger was dead. Poor Jenny!

Beyond her pity was a fearful questioning. A woman could not fail to be shaken by such news, but even while she bit her lower lip and stared, unseeing, at the wall of the apartment, she could not tell whether her grief was for a friend or for a man she loved.

She rose mechanically, cleared the table and washed the dishes. She had to be doing something, and for once the menial, dreary tasks of the horrid little apartment were blessed. Moving briskly from one thing to another, it was as if her eyes and hands forced her brain away from every thought of the man who had died.

When she went into the bedroom to change her dress she paused to look at herself in the mirror. She smiled and her face creased normally except for a slight trembling of the mouth. Roger dead! She could not bear to stay in the apartment now that the work was done.

She walked quickly down the street and turned north toward the bridge that led into the Triangle. Sam had an evening lecture and would not be home to supper. She would have Ellen telephone him at the university and he could fetch her from the Cornishes'.

Ellen opened the door for her and she went straight into the living room to Mrs. Cornish. In silence she put her arms around the older woman and they clung to each other without crying.

When they separated, Mrs. Cornish said, "It was sweet of you to come. You'll have dinner with us, won't you?"

Catharine accepted the invitation gladly. The grief that she was staving off was less likely to engulf her if she were in company, but she was afraid to be left alone with it.

"Where's Jenny?" she asked.

"Giving Roger his bath. She's been wonderful, Catharine."

"What is she going to do?" asked Catharine.

"What do you mean?"

"She came over here for Roger's sake," Catharine said.

"And for Roger's sake she'll stay and raise his boy."

"Have you asked her if she will?"

"What else is there for her?"

"She might be homesick. She might want to go back to Wales."

Mrs. Cornish rose from the davenport and faced Catharine, who thought she had never seen her look so determined. "Roger's son growing up in some remote and barbarous Welsh village—a shopkeeper's grandson! Surely she must realize that for the boy's own good ——" She broke off, as if there were no argument to refute this statement.

"She may not see it that way," said Catharine.

"But if she loved Roger—if she loved him at all ——"

"She did," said Catharine.

"Then," decided Mrs. Cornish, "she must want to do as Roger would have wished. Why, we've spoken of it together and there are Roger's letters with all the plans. How can he go to Princeton if Jenny takes him to Wales? He's my grandson. Surely I have a right ——"

"Jenny is free to choose," said Catharine quietly.

"But you say she loved Roger. She'll devote herself to his son, won't she? Oh, Catharine, if she leaves me, if she takes him away from me, what shall I do?"

Catharine felt sorry for her now. "Perhaps she'll want to stay," she comforted. "Give her a chance to decide for herself. I think she'll do what is best for Roger."

From above, in a little voice, sweet to listen to but frail with sorrow, came the sound of Roger's lullaby.

"Listen!" said Mrs. Cornish. "Everything just the same, as if nothing had happened. Has the girl no feeling?"

"That's the best way," said Catharine. "But she told me once that she sometimes wanted to sing when she was sad."

The two women listened, their heads raised a little, as Jenny's lullaby floated softly beyond the walls of the nursery and came down the staircase.

As Catharine listened she envied the girl who could sing her sorrow out of her and who had Roger's child to sing to. Her own hurt was like a well of poison, and although she could hear herself saying comforting things in a voice matching the mood of quiet and controlled grief, she knew that beneath it all there was something that gnawed furiously at her heart and turned what there was of love in it into the blackest hate. The ugly apartment, the struggle to be well dressed and well fed on the miserable allowance that Sam could give her, the fear that Sam was never destined for success, the pleasant affluence of the Cornish house, all these had betrayed her into a traitorous envy of Jenny.

She reddened, as if Mrs. Cornish could read her thoughts on her face. She thought of Sam as second-best, and it was a shameful thought. He was worthy of better. She wanted to start up immediately and do something to help him, something practical, something he would never think of doing for himself. Roger was dead. From now on there must be no straying from the path she had chosen for herself, not even in thought.

By the time Jenny's song had ceased, Catharine knew what she must do.

Mrs. Lawson, Mrs. McCarroll and Mrs. Norkas called on Doctor Konopka together. The ladies were on their way to their club meeting and had no more than half an hour to spare, and at the precise moment they rang the bell at the door and set their faces for a welcome, Jaroslav Konopka was stepping into a freshly drawn tub of hot water.

"Why do they have telephones in America," he growled through the bathroom door, "if they won't use them?"

"I'll tell them you'll be right down," said Mrs. Walsh firmly.

"If he has to dress," said Emmy Norkas, "I guess I have time for a dozen rows." She opened her sewing bag, without which she

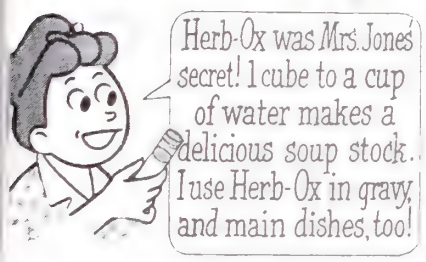
Two rural ladies of one of the hill counties of Tennessee were discussing their domestic affairs and marital life. One of them said to the other: "Don't ever say your husband whupped you; say 'we fit.'"

—F. T. WILSON:
Select After Dinner Stories.
(The Lebanon Democrat, Inc.).

IE SMITHS SAID— "No Soup"

ust don't feel
ke soup tonight,
guess.
It's sissy stuff, anyway!
I don't see why you never eat soup! I'll get Mrs Jones' recipe; her family loves soup!

'IL MRS. SMITH DISCOVERED THIS FLAVOR SECRET!



WHEN FOOD TASTES BETTER —IT'S BETTER FOR YOU!

o "flavor up" our meals with

Herb-Ox

Write for FREE menu booklet, illustrated in full color!

BOUILLON CUBES

The PURE FOOD COMPANY, Inc.
Mamaroneck, N. Y.

FOR A TASTE THRILL!

Ellis TAMALES SMOTHERED WITH CHILE

AT YOUR GROCER'S

THE ELLIS CANNING CO. Denver, Colo.

was seldom seen, and drew out half a pink baby jacket.

"Wouldn't it be marvelous," said Mrs. Lawson suddenly, "if the Art Department could get Doctor Konopka to stay permanently?"

"He certainly has a wonderful background," said Mrs. McCarroll. "All those years in Europe with all those art galleries!"

Mrs. Lawson suddenly leaned forward and lowered her voice. "Did you know that since he came to America his life has been threatened? He's very outspoken, you know, and he's made a lot of enemies. You mustn't breathe a word of this to anyone—it's very confidential."

Mrs. Norkas clicked her needles rapidly. "If he's outspoken it can't stay confidential long," she observed.

While Mrs. Lawson was thinking up a suitable reply, Doctor Konopka appeared. He had lost his irritation and was now in a very smiling mood. Mrs. Lawson glanced at her watch and decided that they had exactly fifteen minutes.

"Does my knitting bother you?" asked Emmy Norkas.

"Not at all," said Konopka, staring at the pink wool. "I was a baby myself."

The conversation suddenly lagged. Mrs. Lawson realized that, having met him at the lectures, she had already asked him how he liked Creston and he had answered that he thought it a charming town. The beauty of the campus had been thoroughly discussed, together with the color of the leaves in the fall, the topography of Creston, and its advantages over other cities of its size. Mrs. Lawson plunged with something that could not be too often repeated.

"Doctor Konopka, we want to tell you how much we are enjoying your lectures."

"Thank you very much."

"We don't know what we're going to do when they're over," added Mrs. Lawson.

The conversation flagged again and was only restored to brightness when Konopka, modestly shifting off the subject of his lectures, praised Professor Maxwell and his generosity. "A gentleman," he said, "who not only gives me his house to stay in, but who also provides it with a housekeeper to make life easier for me, is a gentleman indeed."

"We Americans are a funny lot, Doctor Konopka," said Mrs. Norkas. "We do things to death."

"Do things to death? What do you mean?"

MRS. NORKAS laughed at the look on his face, and when she saw the looks on the ladies' faces she laughed again. "Oh, it isn't as unpleasant as it sounds. To do a thing to death is to make a big fuss over anything that's novel. When your kind of foreigner isn't novel any longer you can expect to be dropped like a hot potato."

Mrs. Lawson and Mrs. McCarroll both started to protest at once, but Doctor Konopka laughed and his laugh stopped them.

"You have picturesque expressions. A hot potato. I like that."

"We really must be going," said Mrs. Lawson, and all three women rose immediately. While Emmy put her knitting in her bag Mrs. Lawson produced a little jar of strawberry preserve and put it into Konopka's hand. "I know you have only a week left with us," she murmured, "but I'm sure you can get through this."

"This is nothing at all," said Mrs. McCarroll, pushing a small envelope into Konopka's other hand. "Just a few herbs from my garden, but they're nice in soups."

"You're very kind. Mrs. Walsh will be delighted."

Emmy Norkas smiled apologetically. "I'm embarrassed to admit I'm empty-handed," she confessed, "but you find a wife and have a baby and I'll knit you the cutest pair of soakers you ever saw."

"What are soakers?" asked Doctor Konopka.

But Mrs. Lawson and Mrs. McCarroll swept Emmy Norkas away and down the front steps and into Sycamore Lane.

a few of many reasons why millions now use — and more millions want

NATIONAL Presto COOKERS
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

UL

PRESTO COOKERS are made in two models, MODEL '40' (illustrated) is cast from special, extra durable, finest quality Simalloy. MODEL '60' is pressed from extra heavy, finest quality aluminum. PRICE, either model, $13.50 (Western Zone $13.95) (In Canada, Model '40' only, $15.95). WHEREVER QUALITY HOUSEWARES ARE SOLD!

The Most Remarkable Utensil Ever Invented For Hi-Speed Cooking and Safe Canning!

Unexcelled for quality of construction, mechanical perfection, simplicity of operation and beauty of design, PRESTO COOKERS are the crowning achievement of almost 30 years of pressure cooker development, manufacturing experience and constant leadership.

PRESTO COOKERS are so easy to use and so easy to clean. Only PRESTO has the patented HOMEC Seal. Just place the cover on the cooker. Then bring the handles together, and you're all set to perform cooking wonders you never thought were possible. The HOMEC Seal is simplicity itself!

Hi-speed PRESTO Cooking retains more of the natural vitamins and minerals, colors and flavors in foods. It provides more nourishment for the entire family.

REMEMBER, all pressure saucepans are not PRESTO COOKERS! Be sure to look for this name-plate on the cover when you buy . . .

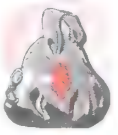
Presto COOKER

COPYRIGHT 1947 N.P.C.CO.

With the extremely clever indicator-weight, showing 5, 10 and 15 pounds pressure, you can use your PRESTO COOKER for safe canning as well as hi-speed cooking. No jiggling. No listening. No loss of food juices due to escaping steam. (Now available for use with earlier PRESTO models.)

PRESTO Cooked foods are ready to serve, not in hours, but in mere minutes. For example, with proper temperature reached, PRESTO Cooking time for asparagus, peas, spinach is only 1 to 2 minutes. A 4 lb. pot roast is deliciously tender in 35 minutes. Soups and desserts, too, are ready in a "jiffy."

This most modern cooking method is highly economical. Saves cooking fuel cost. Kitchens are cooler and cleaner.



GIVEN! With your PRESTO COOKER, you will receive, at no extra cost, a highly colorful 128-page book of recipes, time tables, and easy-to-follow instructions... a valuable manual on PRESTO Cooking and Pressure Canning.

National PRESSURE COOKER

(Model No. 7)

Canning capacity, 7 quart jars or 9 pint jars. Liquid capacity, 16 quarts.

Equipped with inset pans, rack, wire canning basket, and a copy of the recipe and instruction book, "The Modern Guide to Home Canning and Cooking."

Leading food authorities and the U. S. Department of Agriculture recommend pressure cooking as the ONLY SAFE METHOD for canning all non-acid foods, vegetables, meats, fowl and fish.

Presto DIVIDER

FITS ALL FOUR QUART PRESTO COOKERS

For cooking two or more foods at one time . . . No intermingling of foods . . . Simple to adjust . . . Easy to use and clean . . . Easily attached to standard PRESTO COOKER rack. Price $1.25 at PRESTO Dealers. (West Zone $1.30)

NATIONAL PRESSURE COOKER CO., General Offices and Factory: Eau Claire, Wis.
World's Largest Manufacturers of Pressure Cookers and Canners Branch Factories: Menomonie, Wis., Los Angeles, Calif., Wallaceburg, Ontario, Canada

Rector's MOR Recipes

Pan-fried MOR and Eggs

Cut one can of MOR into ten slices. Melt 1 tbsp. fat in a skillet, add MOR slices and brown on both sides. Serve with fried eggs. Serves 5.

MOR Cheeseburgers

Pan-fry MOR slices. Serve with cheese between halves of toasted buns. Serves five.

So Simple—

AND SIMPLY DELICIOUS

To put a meat back in "taste tempt o' t' breakfasts and lunches, just try "MOR and." And for a snack in a hurry or a tasty "bite," whip up some quick MOR cheeseburgers. These simple recipes are here for your convenience.

George Rector

Food Counselor to Wilson & Co.

Wilson's MOR is the handy meat for many tasty and convenient dishes. Made of fine pork shoulder meat with nothing added to change the delicate ham-like flavor—it's processed and seasoned the exclusive Wilson way. You always have meat in the house when there's MOR in the pantry . . . for breakfast, for lunch, for dinner. Only Wilson makes MOR—first in flavor. IT'S DIFFERENT.

Wilson's Quickie Shelf of quality meat products

The Wilson Label protects your table

Konopka handed the preserve and the herbs to Mrs. Walsh.

"Aren't you ashamed now for what you said in the bathroom?" she demanded.

"They're very attentive to me," he admitted, but there was a hint of satirical stress on the word "attentive" that Mrs. Walsh did not like. She spoke severely.

"You had a promise of blueberry muffins and ice cream from Mrs. Obendorf, her own making, and I have to call for them at five-thirty. I'll go over there now."

Konopka glanced downward at the bulging ankles. "How are your feet?" he asked.

"My feet?" Mrs. Walsh looked surprised.

"You walk as if they hurt you."

"It's my arches. They're all right." Mrs. Walsh prodded the silver-gray curtains into two graceful folds. "There's another of them," she said suddenly.

"Another what?"

"Another woman to fuss over you." Mrs. Walsh stood behind the curtain and watched the visitor walk up the pathway. "I don't know this one," she said as she went to open the door. "She looks as if she's going to ask you to speak someplace."

Konopka groaned.

Catharine had seen the three club ladies leave the house, cross Sycamore Lane and turn the corner into Oak Street. It was a stroke of luck that had delayed her, waiting for a bus to the north bridge, and prevented her from walking in on Mrs. Lawson and her friends. When she reached the steps a nervous excitement seized her and she paused to steady herself. It was too late to change her mind. She would have to say something, even if she did not have the courage to ask him what she came to ask.

"Mrs. Forester," she told the housekeeper. "Don't let me disturb him if he's busy."

"Mrs. Forester to see you," announced Mrs. Walsh, and the next moment Catharine was in the living room. She had expected someone bigger, fiercer, more determined-looking, with attributes to match her resentment of him, and for a moment she had no words to greet him. He was a little under medium height, with a round face, brown eyes and rather thin lips. He welcomed her in, indicated a chair for her to sit in and left for a moment to recover while he listened to Mrs. Walsh. "I'll get the muffins and the ice cream now," she was saying. "It's ten after five."

"Will you have a cigarette?" asked Konopka, turning to Catharine.

"No, thanks."

HER mind was a blank and she could see that Doctor Konopka thought her very odd.

"You know the Maxwells?" Doctor Konopka asked.

"I know them by sight, but they don't know me."

Konopka smiled a little. It was like a parlor game in which her job was to bring all conversation to a stop. She was winning. This time he waited to see if she would say something on her own account, but she stayed silent, only fingering her purse, running her fingers across the alternate strips of rough and smooth material until she saw him looking at her hands; then she stopped.

"Were you never in this house before?" he asked.

"Never."

"It's very handsome, don't you think?"

Catharine looked around. "It's beautiful," she said.

"I really think it is most kind of Professor Maxwell to let me stay in this lovely house." Konopka went on quickly, as if determined not to let this shred of conversation be cast out after the others. "Ever since I landed in this country you Americans have been so kind to me. I am not finding it hard to m my home here."

Catharine saw how this might lead what she wanted to say. "You are going make your home in America?"

"Yes. My whole family is here."

"My husband tells me that the wh Konopka family is very distinguished."

Konopka smiled again, not teasingly t time, but warmly. "He must be a specialis

Catharine felt insulted. He did not ev realize that she was Sam's wife. "He's assistant in the Art Department here," s said quietly, though she was raging. "I do suppose you remember him."

"Mr. ——" Konopka started vaguely.

"Forester," said Catharine and closed h lips tightly. She hated him for making h explain to him who Sam was.

"Forester!" echoed Konopka hearti "Oh, excuse me, please! He is my very go colleague and of course I know him we This Mrs. Walsh, she swallows her words thought she said Foster."

CATHARINE forced a smile, but she was n entirely convinced. This Konopka looked t kind to talk his way out of anything. "Y like Creston?" she asked, knowing as s did so that every woman he had met mu have asked him the same wearisome que tion.

"Very much. The campus is beautif especially in the fall, I understand."

"We like it," sa Catharine, and th added, "I don't su pose it's the kind place you would enj after all the cities you' lived in." A loopho presented itself, a co ardly one. Perhaps s could get him to a mit, without knowi it, that he had no i tention of staying Creston.

"I wouldn't sa that," said Konopk with a tolerant smile.

"But cities are muc more satisfying, don you think?"

Konopka looked a her as if she were a eager student wanting to be an actress an asking what to do about it. "If you like th more exciting life, why do you stay in Cre ton?" he asked.

"I have no choice."

"Of course. Your husband's job is here."

Catharine pounced. It would have to b the direct question before she could be satis fied. "We hope it will be," she said. "H isn't permanently appointed yet." It wa out. It should be clear now to anyone tha she had come for a purpose.

"Oh! Indeed!" Konopka was watchin her keenly, and the cold way in which h spoke and drew his lips in against his teeth told her that she might expect a struggle.

"Doctor Konopka, may I ask you a very straightforward question?"

"Certainly."

"Has Doctor Smithton asked you to stay in Creston—on the staff, I mean?"

Konopka showed no surprise at her question, nor did he avert his eyes in embarrassment. "No. Not yet."

"But you expect him to."

This time her eagerness confused him. "My dear young lady, I can hardly ——" he began.

"I'm sorry," Catharine interrupted. "I didn't mean to embarrass you."

"May I ask why you are putting these questions to me?" he asked, and his voice was cold and businesslike.

"There is so much talk going around," explained Catharine. "So many people are saying how wonderful it would be for Creston if you accepted a position in the Art Department."

Konopka's face relaxed into a slight smile as if in acknowledgment of Creston's appreciation of him. "That is very gratifying to me," he said.

The celebrated poet and professor, Buschin, who was very careless in his dress, went out in his dressing gown, and met in the street a citizen with whom he was acquainted. The gentleman, however, passed him without even raising his hat. Divining the cause, the poet hastened home, and put on a cloak of velvet and ermine, in which he again went out, and contrived once more to meet the same citizen, who this time raised his hat, and bowed profoundly. This made the poet still more angry. He hastened home, threw his cloak on the floor, and stamped on it, saying, "Art thou Buschin, or am I?"

A Luncheon Favorite

FOR BUSY HOUSEWIVES everywhere

Just heat and eat this delicious treat

WHIZ through busy-day luncheons . . . just serve Morton's Noodle Chicken Dinner! Takes only seconds to heat—and children love it; everyone does. It's delicious chicken with rich egg noodles and real chicken broth, seasoned just-right. Try it! Keep several jars on your "handy" shelf.

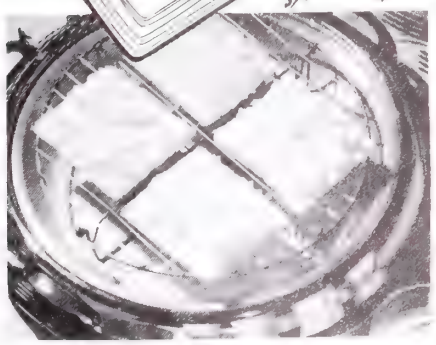
TRY THIS MENU
Morton's Noodle Chicken Dinner • Vegetable Salad • Sliced Fruit • Tea

MORTON'S OTHER QUICK-FIX DINNERS
Chicken a la King
Noodle Chicken
Giblet Dinner

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Morton's
QUICK-FIX DINNERS

MENU CUES



TOASTED CHEESE SANDWICHES

1 cup grated American cheese; 1½ teasp. Colman's (dry) Mustard; 6 slices white bread (¼" thick) toasted on one side.

Mix cheese with mustard, spread thickly on untoasted side of bread. Put under broiler at moderate heat until cheese is melted and begins to turn brown.

FREE! NEW RECIPE BOOK
"Mealtime Magic"
Write to Atlantis Sales Corp., 3659 Mustard St., Rochester 9, N. Y.

Name _____

Address _____

Catharine eyed him steadily. "The position here. There are many Americans who would be glad of it."

It was done now and the barb had struck home. Konopka's eyes narrowed and a little furrow of displeasure appeared between them. "That must be true of any position," he said.

Catharine hesitated for a moment. Good taste and good sense hung in the balance. She could still give the impression that she was speaking for young Americans as a whole.

Konopka rose to fetch the packet of matches that lay a few feet from his chair. Instead of sitting down again, he remained standing, and this tacit invitation to make her excuses and go filled her with anger. He stood expectantly, looking at her with unfriendly eyes; behind him were the rich curtains of silver gray, smirking at her as if to call attention to his good fortune and their own voluminousness.

Catharine thought of Sam's face as she saw it very often, outlined against the raspberry-colored curtains at Foxy's. Her anger welled into a fury.

"Of course it's true of any position," she said. "But of this one in particular."

"Why in particular?"

She drew pleasure from the resigned way in which he went back to his chair and sat down, acknowledging her right to go on. "Doctor Konopka, I will be quite honest with you."

"Very well."

"We are very poor. As a graduate assistant my husband earns seven hundred and fifty dollars a year. That job in the department my husband has worked for years to fit himself for. The war set him back two years, but this last year and a half we've planned on it, because we have been led to expect it. Doctor Smithton said so almost in as many words. He even stopped my husband from taking a job in South Dakota."

Konopka looked doubtful. "You say Doctor Smithton promised your husband a position here?"

"The heads of departments never commit themselves, but he did say he wanted Sam to stay, and everyone knows that there's to be an opening in the Art Department soon."

Konopka leaned forward. "Then what difference will it make if they offer me a job too?"

"The department can't make two appointments. If they ask you to stay and you accept, my husband is out. And he's counted on it so, Doctor Konopka, he's counted on it."

KONOPKA watched her a moment, and his look was uncomfortably keen. "But what if Professor Smithton and the Board of Regents think otherwise?"

Then Catharine's anger blazed out. "They'll only think otherwise because you've come to a small town with a name that carries an international reputation. You have a chance of a hundred jobs in this country, and yet you have to come to Creston and try to take ours."

"Yours?"

"Yes, ours! It was ours for certain until you wrote here and used influence to get an invitation here and then impressed them all with your background and culture, all the things you've done, the people you've known, and the places you've lived in. How can we compete with all that?"

Konopka had put his pipe down and now he left his chair and stood by the piano, looking out the window. For a moment or two he did not speak; then, without turning, he asked, "Why doesn't your husband go to Professor Smithton and ask him what he intends to do?"

"My husband doesn't know I've come to see you," answered Catharine.

"When you go home, will you tell him you came? Or don't you think he would approve?"

Catharine looked up at him. Her anger had carried her along with it, but now that it was spent she felt foolish and ashamed.

"Why don't you go to Professor Smithton?" suggested Konopka. "He knows the whole situation and it is he who will have to make the decision."

Sparkling
STRAWBERRY PIE
... to shine on spring menus
No sugar, no eggs . . . and no trouble to make this dessert dazzler! In a scant five minutes you can whip up luscious Ann Page Sparkle Pudding. And that's the whole story of turning out as smooth and rich-tasting pie filling as ever you put a fork into!
Ann Page Sparkle Pudding comes in creamy-smooth vanilla flavor . . . as well as rich butterscotch and tempting chocolate. They're all in the "best ever" class . . . and so thrifty.
Try Ann Page
Ann Page foods are produced to A&P's high standards of quality under rigid supervision and exacting laboratory control. They are economical in price because many unnecessary marketing expenses have been eliminated and you share in the savings.
Serves 6 for only 62¢*
SPARKLING STRAWBERRY PIE
Prepare pudding according to package directions. When cool, put into pastry shell. Place strawberries around edge of pie.
It pays to choose
ann page foods
A&P
Made to A&P's High Quality Standards. Sold and Guaranteed by A&P
*Recipe cost based on average prices of ingredients in A&P Super Markets at press time.

and . . . an extra Vacation Treat when you ride the Denver Zephyr!

• Mail the coupon and let us send you a beautifully illustrated booklet which shows the thrilling adventures which await you in Colorful Colorado this summer. Mile-high Denver and its mountain parks—picturesque Colorado Springs—majestic Pikes Peak—the breath-taking beauty of Rocky Mountain National Park.

• You'll take a new lease on life as you hike, ride, fish, golf, camp, or just laze in this vacationland of mountains, forests, lakes and streams.

Travel in Air-Conditioned Luxury!

• Ride either the famous streamlined DENVER ZEPHYR which speeds you from Chicago to Colorado just overnight—or the popular EXPOSITION FLYER. Your vacation enjoyment begins the minute you board either of these luxurious trains. There's speedy service from St. Louis, too. And remember—there's no extra fare on any Burlington train!

• Mail the coupon today for complete information about Colorado vacations. Whether you travel independently or join a congenial escorted tour, this mountain paradise will bring you scenic thrills you'll cherish forever.

Way of the Zephyrs

Burlington Route

BURLINGTON TRAVEL BUREAU
Dept. 604, 547 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago 6, Illinois

I am interested in a vacation in Colorful Colorado this summer. Please send me complete information.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....Zone.....State.....

"I couldn't go to him. If Sam found out he'd never forgive me; and even if he didn't, it might spoil his chances for another job."

She was so spent now that the very thought brought tears to her eyes and she dabbed them again with her ridiculously tiny handkerchief. She had made an utter fool of herself. Somehow she must make him understand that her outburst was not as cheaply envious as it sounded. When she had brooded on it at home, her anger had possessed a dignity and a universal quality. There were hundreds of others, thousands, just like Sam, just like herself. She must speak for them, too, and then he would understand and perhaps not despise her so much.

"Mrs. Forester," said Konopka gently, "I honestly see no reason why I should give up a position before I am offered it because you think your husband needs it more than I do. You have not consulted your husband, and you admit that you think he would disapprove if he knew of your coming here. Nobody has consulted Doctor Smithton."

Catharine rose to her feet, despairing of finding the right thing to say. "If you need a job," she said bitterly, "why should you care who else is disappointed?"

"Sit down!" Konopka spoke so sharply that Catharine stopped still on her way toward the door. His voice was so quiet and his eyes so serious that Catharine obeyed. "I am determined that you shall understand why I came here and why it is important to me, too, to have security and a salary. When people are curious I avoid talking about my troubles, but I am going to tell you some of them, so that you can see that other people have disappointments too. I shall make it very brief. There are four of us in America. Of the other three, my two youngest brothers were students in Prague. They were both killed. My sister, the older one, killed herself soon afterward. The four of us here are my brother Jan, the artist, my father, my widowed sister and myself. Jan was the first to get a job, and for a while he kept us, but I could not be a drag on my younger brother all his life. As an art historian, I am not known at all, except to a small circle, and therefore it is harder for me to get ahead. I am also rather old to be starting afresh, as it were. I am thirty-eight. Jan, the famous one, is thirty-four. I wish I did not have to tell you all this. Somehow it seems unfair, as if I were begging for your sympathy. But I want you to know that with a broken family and no way to earn a living except by teaching, an offer from Professor Smithton would come as a new hope in life, a chance to build on the wreckage, to forget the terrible past and look to the future. Can you wonder that we do not want to go back to Europe? You Americans, even now you do not realize how very fortunate you have been."

People always fancy that we must become old to become wise: but in truth as years advance it is hard to keep ourselves as wise as we were. Man becomes in the different stages of his life a different being, but he cannot say a better one: in certain matters he is as likely to be right at twenty as at sixty. —GOETHE.

The art of conversation consists of the exercise of two fine qualities. You must originate and you must sympathize; you must possess at the same time the habit of communicating and the habit of listening. The union is rather rare, but irresistible. —DISRAELI: Quoted in The Public Speaker's Scrapbook, Wm. G. Hoffman (Whittlesey House).

Positiveness is a most absurd feature. If you are in the right, it lessens your triumph; if you are in the wrong it adds to your defeat. —LAURENCE STERNE.

FOR a moment Catharine said nothing. Then the words seemed to sort themselves into fluency and Konopka's story made it easier for her to tell him hers.

"I think you're right when you say you are unfair—unfair to win my sympathy," she told him. "I have no story like yours. Mine is so commonplace and shared by so many others that no one thinks it a very sad story. I have never been prosperous and my husband has always been poor. We live in a poky little apartment, we eat cheap food and we wear cheap clothes, doing without this, cutting out that—and hating it, longing for the day of freedom from poverty, the day that we've been thinking might come for us in September."

"But you and your husband," protested Konopka, "surely you have every chance of another position."

"Sam stood a good chance here, the best he's likely to have. He's well known and well liked. He grew up in this town and it's his home. Now, just for the sake of security we'll have to take the first job that's offered to us, whether it's good or bad. We can't even move more than fifty miles without borrowing."

"If they're looking for an older man," Konopka went on, "a man with a broader background, they'll find one, even if they don't ask me. I shan't be changing their minds."

"I suppose there are others to be had just now, just like you, for very little money, people who have been rich and famous."

"Yes, there are others," said Konopka.

"AND because they have no money any more they're taking jobs that ten years ago they would have laughed at, little jobs at two thousand a year—just enough to be safe and comfortable on—people who used to be rich."

"We didn't want to be made poor."

"Oh, it's not your fault," said Catharine. "But what about the young Americans who've never been rich, who've never had the chance to travel and see things and pick up this precious background? What are they going to do when their jobs are taken from them?" The tears came to her eyes and she could see that Konopka was embarrassed by the exhibition she was making of herself. "I can't help it. I want to give my husband and child a chance."

Konopka seemed surprised. "You have a child?" he asked.

"We shall have one in the spring."

He looked at her thoughtfully and she could see what he was thinking. There was her way out. "I think I understand better now," he said.

Catharine gained control of herself immediately. This was the right time to leave. She could not tell whether she had failed or not; but if she had failed, she was leaving him now with the feeling that it was just an emotional lapse of the sort to be expected in pregnancy, and he might take a generous view of it. She brightened.

"I'm sorry I embarrassed you by crying. I don't know what got into me today. I don't behave like that often, really I don't." She looked quite different now. She could tell it by the surprise and relief on his face. It would be good to go, leaving this more favorable impression. "I've used up too much of your time. I'm so sorry it happened. Look! There's your housekeeper coming back."

"I am sorry if I seem unsympathetic." He held out his hand and she took it for a moment and held it.

"Doctor Konopka, if they offer you this job, you will think, won't you, before you take it?"

Konopka did not flinch from her pleading and he did not smile as he replied. "Yes. I promise you that. I will think before I take it."

"And would you be kind enough not to tell anyone of this? I shouldn't have come here at all this afternoon. You must think I behaved very badly. Sam would be horrified."

He smiled now, rather kindly, Catharine thought. "I shall say nothing to anyone. You may trust me."

An enormous load fell from her shoulders. "Thank you," she said; and then, "Don't come to the door."

(Continued on Page 148)

HOW TO MAKE A HIT!

"fresh up" WITH Seven-Up.

JOIN IN THE CHILDREN'S FUN BE A "FRESH UP" FAMILY!

Wherever family fun is found . . . at home or away . . . it's a good bet that cheerful, chilled 7-Up is in the picture! Because 7-Up, with its clean taste and friendly good nature, is truly America's family drink.

Be a "fresh up" family! Enjoy life together. And let sparkling 7-Up be a happy part of your happy times. Order where you see the colorful 7-Up signs.

YOU LIKE IT · · · IT LIKES YOU!

"Ah-h-h! There it is!"

"Thought for a moment Mom forgot that big bottle of silky, soothy Golden Oil! Mom says it's so good for me. But I like it because it makes me feel so good."

Of course that Golden Oil is MENNEN . . . the only well-known Baby Oil that's Antiseptic!

Most Doctors, Hospitals, Nurses know the great value of "Antiseptic." That's why they recommend Mennen Antiseptic Baby Oil* as the best preventive against urine scald, diaper rash, impetigo and many other irritations to baby's delicate, sensitive skin. Mothers prefer Mennen because it helps keep baby's skin so satin-smooth and clean-smelling. Start today to give your baby's precious, tender skin the extra protection of Mennen Antiseptic Baby Oil after each diaper change, after every bath.

If you're going to have a baby, Mennen has a FREE gift for you . . . a BABY BUNDLE of: golden-smooth Mennen Antiseptic Baby Oil, a book of 2000 baby names and their meanings, a Baby Care Guide, a layette sachet card, a helpful shopping list. Write to P.O. Box 1192, the Mennen Company, Newark 4, N. J. with your name, address and when you expect your baby. Offer good in U.S.A. only. Expires Dec. 31, 1947.

*Acc. to Surveys

Mennen

Baby Oil.. Baby Powder

(Continued from Page 146)

Catharine felt curiously elated by her experience. Konopka had clearly been telling her the truth when he said that they had not yet asked him to stay in Creston. She had embarrassed him and herself, but now she felt the partial satisfaction of one who has dropped the seed of scandal, confident that it will sprout.

She began to think that she had not done so badly after all. She had broken down and pleaded her case lamely. And yet, walking down Collins Street, her heart pounding with excitement, she had the sense of having done better than she had planned. Her stammering even had lent an air of spontaneity and genuineness to the scene. She had noticed the solicitousness with which he treated her after she told him about the baby. Unwittingly, that had been her trump card.

"I think I understand better now," he had said, and that was after his refusal and his protestations. It was significant the way he had said, "I am sorry if I seem unsympathetic"; or was it, "I am sorry if I seemed unsympathetic"? It might, indeed, have been the second, with its clear message of retraction. Either she had failed to hear the d or he, being a foreigner, had not been able to make clear the distinction between the two meanings. And he had smiled at her kindly. His whole manner had changed. His relaxed smile made him seem better-looking and younger than he was.

SAM came home soon after Catharine had started cooking their supper. She explained to him that she had been out for a walk. To be sure of not being caught, she said she had taken the bus to the edge of the Triangle and walked along the winding wooded roads there.

"It certainly was a swell afternoon."

Catharine tried to recollect just what the afternoon had been like. She had been so excited she had barely noticed, except that it was mild and sunny.

"Don't you love Creston?" she asked Sam at supper. "Wouldn't you hate to have to leave it?"

"It would be almost like losing a part of myself," said Sam. "I hope we never have to go."

"Something tells me that we never shall," said Catharine.

She hugged her secret to herself and a week later the burden slackened and she felt more cheerful than she had felt in months. It was the day of Konopka's departure from Creston. Nothing had been said about his staying, and now, according to schedule, he was departing. Sam had told her, and although they said little about it, Catharine could see that he was enormously relieved.

It was a day of blustering wind and driving rain. She went shopping for groceries, and it seemed to her that the white market was cleaner and more gleaming than usual. She even spent a dollar more than she had planned, adding three items to her regular requirement for the week end, items that were luxuries and unnecessary: a can of clams for chowder, a small ham steak, and a box of some favorite sandwich cookies.

As she stepped out of the market and turned her face into the wind she heard a screaming whistle from the railroad station and in a moment or two the great engine moved slowly across the street.

Catharine never forgot the pure joy of that moment. The cars on the street slowed down and waited, their windshield wipers moving from side to side, the smoke from the engine swirling down and about their wheels and up again. Everything, it seemed to Catharine, was paying tribute to that triumphant moment.

The last coach passed, the warning lights went out, the cars honked impatiently at the foremost one of their number, who was in no hurry to start.

Catharine stayed on the sidewalk, savoring the moment, while the rain spattered her groceries and the wind worried her hair over one eye. Then, when the sound of the train was drowned, she crossed the street and went happily home, planning to give Stomach acting up a bit, seeks relief in vain.

EMPTY!
Not a tablet in the house, to ease an ache or pain.
Hates discomforts of a COLD: Has no Quick Relief.
An EXTRA package on the shelf could save a lot of grief.
Be Wise—BUY AN EXTRA PACKAGE!
That EXTRA package means you're looking ahead—being prepared for relief if your stomach upsets or an occasional headache comes along. Yes, it's wise to keep 2 packages of Alka-Seltzer on hand: One at home, the other in your car, grip or where you work. And don't forget Alka-Seltzer for those other everyday ailments: muscular aches and pains, and the discomforts of a cold. "When your tablets get down to 4, That's the time to buy some more."
Alka-Seltzer
Alka-Seltzer
At All Drug Stores

RENGO BELT FOUNDATIONS have become famous because of the outstanding values they long have offered. This is true of Rengo Belts for all figures, but it is especially true of those for the heavier types. A typical example of this leadership is Style 345, illustrated above. This is a 16-inch front-clasp-girdle, made of brocade, with side panels of knitted elastic, rubber top, well boned. Six hose supporters. Sizes 28 to 44.

Made by the Crown Corset
Company
775 Fifth Avenue
New York

Sam an extra-special lunch and dinner so that the day might always be remembered with pleasure.

Sam, too, was happier now that Konopka had left Creston. He found it easier than Catharine to thrust aside unpleasant thoughts, and since the wet and windy morning when Konopka's train had steamed out of town hardly anyone had mentioned the man's name. It was odd, he mused, how quickly people forgot. One week Konopka's name was to be heard in every living room in Creston, in every gathering of faculty. Even students of the intellectual sort discussed him airily over morning coffee and afternoon Cokes. Now, a few days after his departure, it was as if he had never been there. By the following Monday Sam was whistling as he stopped at the faculty mailboxes to pick up his mail.

The little penciled note on blue paper from Doctor Smithton's secretary asking Sam to step into the office that afternoon after class was placed casually between an insurance-company blotter, decorated with autumn leaves and flatteringly printed with Samuel Forester's very own name, and a sharp request from the library that the same Samuel Forester return immediately (second request) the copy of Post-Impressionism borrowed six weeks ago and now urgently needed by one of his own students.

At first the note did no more to him than the blotter or the library notice, but half-a-dozen paces from the box he was struck with

A little chap who thinks a watch is the one thing which makes life worth living was told that a watch could not be given to him. He continued to tease for one until the whole family was wearied. Then his father, after explaining that he should certainly have a watch when he was older, forbade him to mention the subject again. The next Sunday, the children repeated Bible verses at the breakfast table. Richard astonished everyone by saying: "What I say unto you, I say unto all: Watch!"

a sudden disagreeable thought. He had a fleeting vision of Catharine standing in front of her chair, her mouth contorted, her hands pressed anxiously together, and he knew that what he was about to hear in the academic serenity of Doctor Smithton's office would either strip off that anxiety like an unwanted skin or tighten it about Catharine and himself. If only it could be himself alone! He could bear anxiety and uncertainty. There would be other jobs, better ones perhaps, even though he had set his heart on Creston. Well, many other people had set their hearts and many had been disappointed. It was as easy as that for Sam, but for Catharine it was not so easy.

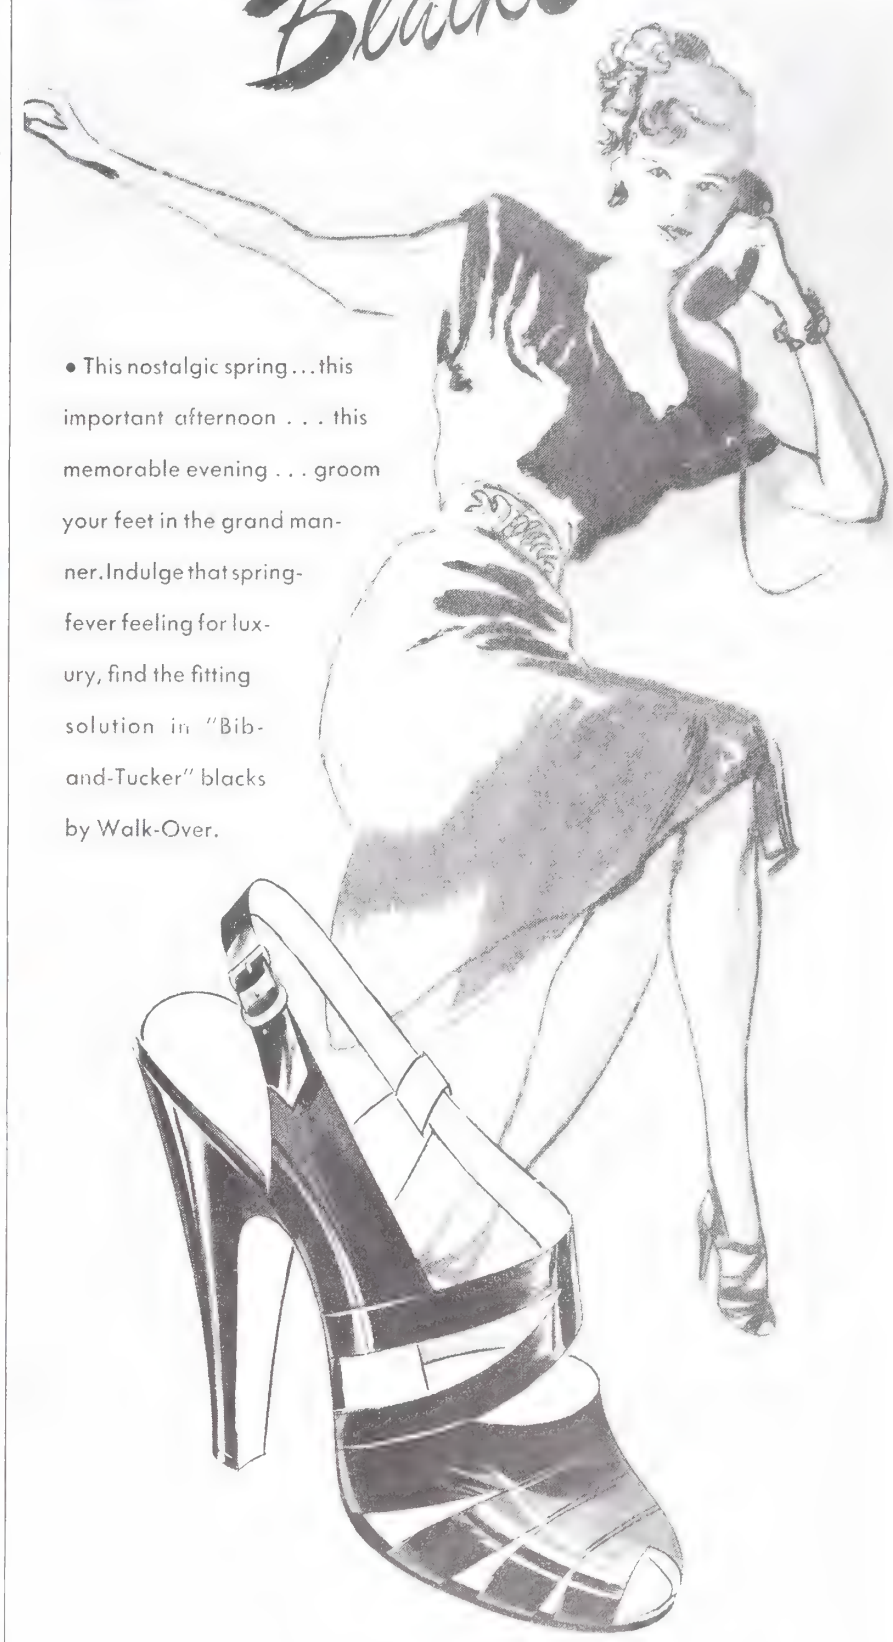
Sam was thinking of her as he knocked at the office door and heard Doctor Smithton's genial "Come in." Catharine was probably at Doctor Prescott's now. It was her appointment this afternoon.

Sam's anxiety was not dispelled by the older man's warm smile. These turned-on smiles were familiar and by no means guaranteed promotions or encouragement. He took a chair in silence and his heart was beating so fiercely that he felt it pump somewhere beneath his throat. A drop of sweat trickled out of his left armpit and lost itself in his undershirt. Doctor Smithton was speaking, but his eyes turned toward the cold and passive radiator, and his fingers, lightly holding a letter opener, were tracing figures on a green blotter pad. Sam moistened his lips and tried to look as if he were paying close attention. A second drop of sweat coursed after the first.

"It's an opportunity we can't very well afford to pass up," Doctor Smithton was saying. "But we don't want to lose you and we shall see that you have something to do for us. Your present position is one that

(Continued on Page 151)

"Bib-and-Tucker" Blacks



• This nostalgic spring . . . this important afternoon . . . this memorable evening . . . groom your feet in the grand manner. Indulge that spring-fever feeling for luxury, find the fitting solution in "Bib-and-Tucker" blacks by Walk-Over.

Walk-Over

Geo. E. Keith Company, Brockton 63, Mass.

THOUSANDS OF MILES of inland waterways are your invitation to a gay, restful holiday.

YOU'LL PICK UP colourful handicrafts — shop for exciting woollens and unusual gifts.

GOOD LUCK! Canada's endless lakes and streams breed fish that are extra big, extra battling.

NO PASSPORT NEEDED

"LUCKY PEOPLE"! (they're headed for Canada!)

It's time to plan your family holiday in friendly Canada. Just picture yourself . . . amid the scenic beauties of lake, mountain or seaside . . . enjoying your favourite sports at an unspoiled resort . . . seeing new sights in Canadian cities . . . Canada offers unlimited holiday horizons. And wherever you go you're never a stranger, always a guest — always at home in this great vacationland.

Millions of visitors went exploring in Canada last year. Soon this year's northward trek to Canada will begin. So better hurry and reserve your accommodation!

For information about Canada's beauty spots and other points of interest, write:

Canadian Government Travel Bureau
Department of Trade and Commerce

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON, Minister — D. LEO DOLAN, Director

CANADA
Vacations Unlimited

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT TRAVEL BUREAU
OTTAWA, CANADA

Please send me literature on Canada — Vacations Unlimited (Please Print) C-472

Name . . . . . .

Street and No. . . . . . .

Town . . . . . State . . . . .

(Continued from Page 149)

would ordinarily lapse with Doctor Konopka's appointment, but the president was most co-operative. And between you and me, I doubt if we shall keep Konopka more than a couple of years. Other institutions are sure to compete with us for him."

So that was it. Sam wondered why he thanked Doctor Smithton, smiled slightly and went out calmly. He supposed it must have been because it seemed natural to say thank you at the end of an interview with an older person; thank you for sparing your valuable time, he supposed.

Downstairs in the lower corridor there suddenly flooded over him the memory of all his hopes and plans, of the house set upon the green lawn, of Catharine and the baby. His eyes suddenly filled with tears so that Miss Gadd and her favorite student, emerging from a classroom, looked like four people.

Ashamed that he, a full-grown man, had tears in his eyes, Sam turned in the other direction and walked down the cement pathway toward the river. At the flagpole at the edge of the sunken garden he paused for a moment and looked down at the water. On the Maxwell lawn a sprinkler was turning slowly and a fountain of spray drifted slowly eastward. At each half revolution the sunlight caught the blade of water beneath the mist of drops with a tiny radiant flash.

Sam watched it for a dozen revolutions, and as he watched, the campus carillon began to beat a tune into the afternoon air—Fight on, Creston; win that game. Sam turned and started down the long hill that led to the Hollow, his feet unconsciously keeping the rhythm which the practicing player beat out three times.

Schirer's grocery store at the bottom of the hill had a stone jar set in front of the potatoes, and in the jar were white and yellow daisies. Sam hesitated, made up his mind, and went in to buy a dozen, white and yellow mixed, to give to Catharine. It was very little, but it might serve to dull the sharpness of disappointment and in some way make the life ahead of them seem to promise pleasure of a modest sort.

Mrs. Schirer, a red-faced peasant woman, smiled a Lithuanian smile and said, "Mrs. Forester will like them. They are so gay."

"Yes," said Sam, and smiled back. Life wasn't so bad when people were friendly and kind.

In the little living room at 931, Charlotte and Fred Garrity had been waiting only a few minutes when Catharine came in.

"Been here long?" she asked.

"Ten minutes," said Fred.

"Mata Hari let us in," added Charlotte.

"Who? . . . Oh, Lulu!"

"She sure has a taste for the sensational," Charlotte went on. "She was on that phone telling her boy friend a long story about a woman who poisoned the father of her child. I think the boy friend took it personally. He got off the wire in an awful hurry.'

CATHARINE smiled slightly and Charlotte, sensing confidences, got rid of Fred. "Darling," she said, "I want a woman-to-woman talk with Catharine. Would you be an angel and go down to the drugstore? We need toothpaste, talcum and cod-liver oil."

"Why bother to be subtle?" said Fred and went to the door.

"Keep an eye out for Sam," said Catharine. "He ought to be on his way."

"Now tell me," said Charlotte, the instant the door was closed. "I noticed it the minute you came in."

"Noticed what?"

"You look depressed. What's the matter?"

Catharine hesitated for a minute, though she longed to be comforted. "There's something wrong with me," she said. "It may not be easy."

"Did he say that or are you just making it up?"

"Of course I'm not making it up. He as good as told me it would be hard. It isn't that I'm a coward. It's the money I'm thinking of."

Charlotte pushed Catharine's head from her impatiently. "Quit worrying about money. To hear you anyone would think you were the only needy couple in the world."

"It's Sam I'm thinking of," said Catharine miserably.

"It's Sam you're thinking of," echoed Charlotte. "It's money you're thinking of. Think of yourself for a change, why don't you? You do more worrying over things that don't happen than anyone else I know. It wouldn't surprise me if you worried all night wondering if the sun was going to rise the next morning."

CATHARINE smiled a little at this, though she knew that Charlotte was exaggerating just to cheer her up. "Do you know how much a Caesarean costs?" she asked, as casually as she could.

"No," said Charlotte.

"Betty Niemeyer had one. It was two hundred dollars on top of all the rest and she didn't get out under a thousand."

Charlotte took her hands between hers. "It's worth it," she said. "It's worth it every cent. The money always comes from somewhere—somehow. Dozens of times we thought we were at the end of our rope, but we came through, and here we are! It's the way you look at it."

Catharine cheered up then and they spoke of other things until Charlotte had her laughing with a story of Elsie the maid's stupidity. Elsie, it seemed, was away sick. "Probably scared sick," Charlotte said. "Why, the other day, she left the door of Fred's lab unlocked, and there was Jimmy sitting in the middle of bottles and test tubes, wrecking everything. Even I got sick when I thought of what Fred had up there. Some of those plant drugs will kill an army." After this, it came out that Charlotte had hoped to go to bridge tea the following afternoon, and Catharine immediately offered to come again and sit with Jimmy. Charlotte demurred and protested, but it was so obvious that that was precisely why Charlotte had come that Catharine laughed again and said that it would do her all the good in the world to come.

By the time Sam came in with Fred, Catharine felt that she had allowed Doctor Prescott to depress her too readily. She caught sight of the flowers immediately. Perhaps it was news of the job. Sam would want to wait until Charlotte and Fred had gone. Then she would take the flowers and kiss him for them and they would hold each other very tightly and talk about everything delightful that was in store for them. Instantly she put away the thought of the Caesarean. Sam's good news must not be spoiled.

She flashed a warning glance at Charlotte, but Charlotte was saying "Hi" and looking at Sam.

Then Fred spoke. He had gone out smiling, but now it seemed as if something were the matter. "We've got to be going, Charlotte."

Sam put his hand on Fred's arm. "Stay a minute, will you, Fred? It's easier with you here."

"What's easier?" demanded Charlotte, looking from one to the other.

Sam brought the white and yellow daisies to Catharine and she took them with her hands, but said nothing, and her eyes did not leave his face.

The popular belief, that however careless a man may be while in health, he is appalled at the prospect of dying, is erroneous. I have careful records of about 500 deathbeds studied particularly with reference to the sensations of the dying. Ninety suffered bodily pain or distress of one sort or another, eleven showed mental apprehension, two positive terror, one expressed spiritual exaltation, one bitter remorse. The great majority gave no sign one way or another; like their birth, their death was a sleep and a forgetting.

—SIR WILLIAM OSLER The Student Life and Other Essays (Constable & Company, Ltd.).

What if you can't get to Paris this Spring?
Coty brings you the heart-stirring warmth of its fragrant air, the vibrant charm of its bright-hued flowers... in a series of lovely make-up aids, color-related in Springtime shades and fragranced with Coty perfumes. This smooth and glowing make-up enlivens your spirit as well as your looks. When you know you look warm, alive and lovely... you feel that way, too.

'SUB-TINT' Cream-Powder base, $1.
FACE POWDER your choice of L'Origan, L'Aimant, Emeraude, "Paris" $1.
'SUB-DEB' ROUGE, 75¢
'SUB-DEB'LIPSTICK, $1.
(All prices plus tax)

Coty

Compounded and copyrighted by Coty, Inc. in U. S. A.

RIN-SO WHITE
RIN-SO BRIGHT
Margaret and Marcella Heyd are lively, party-going twins. They live in Chicago, Ill. Mrs. Heyd says, "I feel real proud of Margaret's Rinso White dresses and Marcella's Rinso Bright ones.

RINSO'S TRIPLE-ACTION SUDS GETS OUT STUBBORN DIRT—FAST!

says Mrs. Albert E. Heyd of Chicago, Illinois

RINSO'S FORMULA GIVES YOU ALL 3—

1. SOAPY-RICH BASE —makes suds that drive deep-down — gets out stubborn dirt fast, with no hard rubbing.

2. SUDS-BOOSTER — even in hard water you get heaps of hard-working suds—and FAST!

3. GREASE-CHASER — goes after grease and grime, but it's easy on the hands — helps prevent yellowing of clothes, too!

Big family washes! Extra-dirty washes! Depend on Rinso's [illegible] to get them spanking [illegible]. Whether your clothes, linens, washable colors all give up their dirt fast to soapy-rich Rinso suds.

You, too, will be proud every time you hang out a wash that's Rinso White—Rinso Bright. Since there's no need for hard scrubbing, clothes stay new-looking longer when they're washed the safe, easy Rinso way.

THE ONLY SOAP RECOMMENDED BY MAKERS OF 33 LEADING WASHERS

A PRODUCT OF LEVER BROTHERS COMPANY

"Consolation prize, honey," he said; and then, "Can you take it, darling? Konopka's been appointed."

Catharine neither cried nor laughed hysterically. She sat with the daisies against her breasts, and as she breathed, the faintly bitter fall scent of the simple flowers was all around her and inside her too.

The others were talking. Sam was explaining how it had happened, and how Konopka was to be recalled from just a hundred miles away. Fred and Charlotte spoke in low, sympathetic tones, and soon said they must go. Catharine felt for them. There was nothing they could say that would really do any good.

So Konopka had taken the job! She wondered if he had thought for an instant of her and Sam before he decided. Or had he forgotten her visit to him altogether? A great wave of hate poured into her, and her heart pounded with rage. It pounded so hard that something in her throat and something else in her head pounded, too, until she could have screamed aloud. But instead, she sat perfectly still, smelling the flowers, and the smell of them reminded her of the end of summer sweetness and the unmistakable coming of winter and cold and death.

"I guess we don't have to pretend with each other," said Sam.

"No."

"It's pretty serious, honey."

She looked at his worried little-boy's face and in that instant she determined to help him, whatever it might cost her. She did not know how she could possibly keep her own bad news from him, but she would find a way—somehow.

She put the flowers aside and stroked his head. "We'll get through," she said softly.

"It's good to have you feel this way, funny, sort of."

"Why funny?" Sam's head was in her lap and her hand moved rhythmically over the wiry brown hair.

"You worry so much about little things and I'm easygoing about them," he said. "Then, when it comes to the big things, you're the one that has the strength."

Catharine's hand stopped in its motion. "The strength," she said, and as she spoke she began to tremble. Fearful that Sam would feel her trembling and worm out of her the fierce and dreadful thought which had come to her, she resumed her stroking of his hair; then, when she could bear it no longer, she lifted his head and kissed him.

"You're a great gal," said Sam, "and we're not going to brood about this. We're going to act as if nothing had happened to us. I'm free tomorrow between two and five and we're going out together. To blazes with Konopka!"

"I can't tomorrow," said Catharine. "I promised to go to Charlotte's and look after Jimmy. She's going downtown."

"Couldn't you put her off?"

"No," said Catharine. "I promised. I've got to go." She did not mean to betray her resolution, but now, in her excitement, she came near to doing so. When she had had time to think it would be easier.

Sam looked at her in surprise. "Okay," he said. "If it's as important as that."

Catharine fetched water for the flowers and began to dip the stalks into it, one by one.

"I just thought," added Sam, "that she might be able to get a girl if she tried, but that's all right. We'll make it the day after tomorrow instead."

"That will be lovely," said Catharine; then, coming to him, "It was sweet of you to bring me the flowers. I don't feel nearly so let-down."

Sam kissed her again.

Then, when she thought it must be out of his mind how she had insisted so firmly that going to Charlotte's was important, she asked, "When is Konopka coming back?"

"Next week." And as an afterthought Sam added, "Smithton says he's going back into Maxwell's house until the spring."

The carpeted room, the rich draperies and the dimly glowing pictures flowed into her vision, although she was standing at the window looking onto the bleakness of Collins Street.

"Isn't Creston good to him?" she said jealously.

"Yeah! He's a lucky guy," said Sam, and there was no rancor in his voice.

Catharine turned to look at him and in that moment she knew that what she had to do she must do alone, absolutely alone.

Catharine walked to the Garritys' house with the full knowledge that the opportunity was there for her to take, if she dared. In a few days Konopka would be back, standing between Sam and his future. Every time she recollected the afternoon she called on him, humiliation overwhelmed her. How could she bear to meet him now? She had detested the thought of meeting him in someone else's presence before that day; now the detestation was ten times stronger. She knew that she would redden and give everything away at once and it would be clear to everyone that there was something between them, something of which they were both ashamed. Konopka might sense that, and in his own defense he might tell someone what she had said to him, and the news would spread through Creston like cackling through a farmyard.

She thought as she walked how absurd it was that she should redden and betray her secret when she had in mind far greater secrets that she knew she could keep. The improbability of it would be her greatest help. Things of the kind she contemplated now were not expected to happen in Creston, and if they did, surely people of her type were the last to be suspected. All it needed was a certain technical dexterity. She was clever enough and secret enough. The only other thing she needed was ruthlessness. Without a thought for the man himself, but viewing him only as an object in her way, she must sweep him aside at one cunningly contrived stroke. But to deal that stroke she must call upon all her reserves of strength and determination.

She found herself nearly two blocks beyond the Garritys' house. Turning around, she sought to invent an excuse in case Charlotte had seen her from the window. The mailbox, of course! She had gone the extra blocks to mail a letter. Charlotte made no mention of having seen her pass the house and Catharine discarded the invention with a little touch of regret.

She was alone in the house except for the three-year-old Jimmy, who was happily occupied. Catharine sat for a while and watched him, wondering whether he would notice if she went into the lab. He had been punished for going into it himself, and her going there might register strongly with him.

Jimmy put down the beads and began to bring her all his toys and books from a corner, and it looked as if he expected her full attention for the rest of the afternoon. He was showing off like every child of his age with a stranger. She read him a story, she played with a circus of cardboard clowns, and she made him half a dozen paper darts.

But beneath her thinking, stirred only slightly by the demands of these trivial activities, there lay the temptation, like an uneasy pain that was waiting to be assuaged.

The afternoon was half over when she suddenly rose to her feet with determination. After all, what she was going to do now was

(Continued on Page 155)

She was tumbled early, by accident or design, into a spacious chest of good old English reading, without much selection or prohibition, and browsed at will upon the fair and wholesome pasturage. Had I twenty girls, they should be brought up exactly in that fashion. I know not whether their chance in wedlock might not be diminished by it; but I can answer for it that it makes (if the worst comes to the worst) most incomparable old maids.

—CHARLES LAMB.

Have a THOR Clothes Washer

Have a THOR Dishwasher

Or have BOTH combined in ONE THOR AUTOMAGIC WASHER!

With the Thor Automagic you actually have three choices—a clothes washer, a dishwasher or an Automagic Combination which uses both Clothes Washer and Dishwasher units interchangeably in one streamlined machine. Each has features you've wanted for years.

YOU'VE YEARNED FOR A CLOTHES WASHER LIKE THIS

Click a dial and Thor's famous super-agitator action goes after the dirt—two kinds of rinses search out soap and soil—an effortless spin whizzes clothes better than wringer-dry. There's no lifting heavy, wet clothes. No stooping, either. Clothes go in through a tub-wide opening at the top—can be added during the washing cycle. Capacity??—a big 8-pound load.

YOU'VE DREAMED OF A DISHWASHER LIKE THIS

Instead of spending half the evening "washing up," you'll wash and rinse china, glassware, silver—a service for six—in just 5 minutes with a Thor. It uses only 4 to 6 quarts of hot water (a teakettle full!), provides plenty of space and ample power for washing pots and pans. Your hands never touch water, yet you couldn't be gentler with your dishes. Only the water moves in the Thor!

AND IMAGINE THE JOYS OF THE COMBINATION

With a simple change of tubs (1½ minutes) the Thor Automagic Combination gives you the advantages of both clothes washer and dishwasher. Streamlined, compact, it brings the laundry upstairs for easier, pleasanter washdays—then seven days a week takes over the dishwashing chores.

Whichever unit you start with—the Thor Clothes Washer or the Thor Dishwasher—you can always add the other unit later and have the Thor Combination to handle both duds and dishes for you!

Thor AUTOMAGIC WASHER

You get more with THOR ...however you buy!

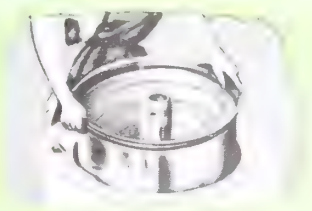
HURLEY MACHINE DIVISION
Electric Household Utilities Corporation
Chicago 50, Illinois

Thor-Canadian Company, Ltd., Toronto, Canada
Plants in Chicago, Ill.; Bloomington, Ill.; El Monte, Calif.; Toronto, Canada; London, England

Lucky You! You Can Change Your THOR From Clothes Washer to Dishwasher in 1½ Minutes

On its way—
A Thor Automagic Sink with interchangeable clothes and dishwasher units. Watch for it.

1. Lift the clothes tub and attachments from your Thor Automagic. The power unit below is now ready to serve the Dishwasher day after day . . . efficiently and silently.



2. Slip in the dish drum and racks and in 1½ minutes the Thor is a Dishwasher to revel in 7 days a week. No part of the machine that touches clothes ever touches dishes.

3. A 2-foot square of floor space in kitchen or laundry is all that's needed for the Thor Automagic Combination. No bolting down, no excessive weight because there's no vibration.

NEW! ANGEL FACE

by POND'S

Heavenly new make-up!

Goes on without water

...and stays!

New!
Not a cake make-up—
No water! Not drying!

Easier to apply! No water with this new make-up! Just circle the velvety puffet over Angel Face. Then smooth it over your face. At once, little skin imperfections hide beneath smooth, heaven-soft color!

New!
Stays on longer than powder

A smoothing "cling" ingredient is blended into Angel Face under terrific pressure. This pressure-fused "cling" ingredient makes Pond's new Angel Face go on evenly—and stay on angelically!

New!
Can't spill in your handbag

Angel Face is so tidy! It won't spill in your handbag—doesn't "snow" over your clothes. It's always ready to give you a fresh, perfect new make-up—anytime, anywhere!

Choose from 5 angel-sweet shades!

With luxurious puffet.

At better beauty counters—
89¢ plus tax.

Society Beauties say:

"Pond's Angel Face is the cleverest make-up I've ever tried—flattering as can be, and so easy to use. And the case is a darling to tuck right into your handbag!"
THE DUCHESS DE RICHELIEU

"To me, Angel Face has all the virtues of other types of make-up—with none of the handicaps—no water . . . no greasiness! It's a perfect delight—smooth, soft-toned, clinging!"
MRS. ERNEST L. BIDDLE

"I really never expected to find a make-up as completely satisfactory as Pond's new Angel Face! It's a wonderful complexion flatterer—and so easy! With just a flip of the puffet, my skin is tinted with heavenly soft color—that clings for hours and hours!"
MISS THEODORA ROOSEVELT

Copyright, 1946, Pond's Extract Company, N.Y.

(Continued from Page 152)

nothing compared with what she hid in the depths of her secret thought. All she had to do was to steal the stuff, and if she changed her mind she could throw it away. It was easy to get rid of a tiny bottle and no one need ever know. If she had no resolution now she could hardly hope to have enough for the moment of real and desperate action.

Jimmy was throwing paper darts in every direction, squealing with delight, pouncing on them to hurl again. He seemed to have forgotten her altogether. She stepped out into the hallway and waited a moment to see if he would notice that she had gone. The squeals continued. She grew bolder and walked into the kitchen. She drew herself a glass of water and noisily replaced the glass, so that Jimmy might show her whether he could be relied upon to play by himself for a while. He seemed content to be alone. She slipped the key off the hook by the sink and started toward the lab door. In the hallway she saw her gloves on the table. They reminded her that she must think of everything now and she quickly put them on. She went back into the kitchen, rubbed the key with a damp cloth, opened the lab door and closed it softly behind her.

The little room was a model of neatness, and as she looked along the shelves she marveled that so much danger could twinkle so innocently. In the corner by the window she saw a copy of the same book she had consulted in the stacks of the library. She had not been so foolish as to draw a book out in her own name. Instead, she had stood between the shelves during the noon hour when most of the students were at lunch. She knew the three deadliest poisons and half-a-dozen adequate ones if Fred's lab should be limited in its offerings. She looked along the shelves, reading each label. There was one—nux vomica, a horrible name but a most potent poison. As she stretched out her hand for it she saw another. She had read about this one, too, and it had a more agreeable name—aconitine. This was the bitter-tasting one, she recollected, and a very little sufficed, very little indeed. She drew from her pocket a tiny perfume bottle which she had fitted with a strong cork. It was no easy matter to pour from the larger bottle into the little one without spilling some of the liquid, but her hands were steady and she poured carefully. She was thankful that Jimmy did not call out and that the telephone did not ring while she handled this delicate operation. She cleaned the side of the larger bottle with her handkerchief, and after checking to be sure the bottom was dry, she returned it to its place on the shelf. She washed out the sink, using the same handkerchief to dry the porcelain so that it would not look as if it had been used. The place looked exactly the same and only the most negligible reduction had been made in the aconitine bottle. She locked the door and returned the key to the kitchen. The kitchen clock informed her that the entire process had taken six minutes.

JIMMY had torn one paper dart into tiny pieces and was starting on a second. He grinned at her and went on tearing. She went to the bathroom and flushed the handkerchief down the toilet. Then she put the little perfume bottle in her handbag and went into the living room again.

She was pleased with the way she played so gaily with Jimmy, so that he gave Charlotte the impression when she came home that the nice lady had played with him all the afternoon.

"You didn't have to play with him, but it was sweet of you," said Charlotte, and Catharine, keeping her triumph secret, smiled and said she had enjoyed it.

She walked home excitedly. Now she must think of a place to hide the poison, a cunning place that nobody else would ever think of. She hit upon a place before she reached Collins Street, and it seemed to her that her brain was whirling along at a keyed-up speed, and yet she was in full control. It was an exhilarating feeling. She had always liked to have a secret all to herself.

SAM was not in, so she went straight to the closet where behind everything else were kept the dreary pictures that Sam had insisted on taking down. When she was thinking of little tiny spaces big enough to hold the deadly perfume bottle, she remembered that in the dry heat of the apartment the corner of the paper back in one picture was coming unstuck. She now opened the flap. She tore out a piece of the newspaper stuffing, wrapped part of it around the bottle and slipped the bottle into the picture frame. Then, with a touch of Sam's paste, she stuck the paper back firmly down and replaced the picture at the back of the closet.

The elaborateness pleased her more than anything else, and she began to think of her project as something in a highly intricate pattern. She must, like any artist, see each tiny detail and forget nothing, but she must see it whole, too, and never let a trivial piece of decoration draw her from the main purpose. She knew instinctively that after today's activity there would be a lull. One did not rush things.

She scrubbed her hands before she started to prepare the supper, and when Sam came home he commented on the brightness of her eyes.

"I played all afternoon with Jimmy Garrity," she said.

Jenny needed friends now. When Roger was alive she had been willing to wait until his coming home, and because she thought always of their life together in Creston beginning with his coming home, she had intentionally kept herself free of entanglements. It was going to be so much more fun for Roger if her social life were not fully organized by the time he came. And now she was left with no real friends at all. She had received many notes of sympathy from Mrs. Cornish's friends, but they were worded cautiously and aloofly and she knew that their writers would be embarrassed if she flung her arms around them or cried on their davenport cushions.

Jaroslav Konopka had written her a brief and friendly note and she felt sure that he would be glad to see her. They had something in common. They were both foreigners, both new to Creston, and they both liked to sing and play the piano. Feeling that this, together with personal thanks for his note,

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Windflower and Boulder

By Ethel Romig Fuller

O my beloved, in the shifting silt
  Of once dear certitudes, you are a rock,
A steadfast verity, whereon I've built
  The windflower structure of a life. I mock
Both man's and elements'
    inclemency
  Because you bear their brunt, and still you stand
Impervious in your integrity. . . .
  What if, instead, I'd put my faith
    in sand?

Too, as the fragile wildling, where it's creviced,
  Must drink stone-hoarded rain
    for blossoming,
My fissured roots tap love from spring to spring—
  In you; all joy, all song, all beauty, chaliced—
So I, in April, petaled at your shoulder,
Am life-sustained, a windflower on a boulder.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

"Soaping" dulls hair—
Halo glorifies it!

Yes, even finest soaps and soap shampoos hide the natural lustre of your hair with dulling soap film

- Halo contains no soap. Made with a new patented ingredient it cannot leave dulling soap film!
- Halo reveals the true natural beauty of your hair the very first time you use it, leaves it shimmering with glorious highlights.
- Needs no lemon or vinegar after-rinse. Halo rinses away, quickly and completely!
- Makes oceans of rich, fragrant lather, even in hardest water. Leaves hair sweet, clean, naturally radiant!
- Carries away unsightly loose dandruff like magic!
- Lets hair dry soft and manageable, easy to curl!

HALO REVEALS THE HIDDEN BEAUTY OF YOUR HAIR!

Lily-the perfect Easter flower!
Beau Brummell -
the perfect tie!

Pace the Easter style parade! Radiate the confident, well-dressed air inspired by a Beau Brummell Tie. Hundreds of brilliant designs in striking new spring colors...fabrics that are distinctively luxurious. New Beau Brummell Ties for spring are now featured at better men's shops and department stores. Up to $7.50.

all America is saying
BEAU BRUMMELL
Ties the best

Beau Brummell Ties

AS BEAU BRUMMELL TIES GO SO GOES THE FASHION

made a good-enough excuse to visit him, she started out, leaving Roger with Ellen.

"Where are you going, dear?" called Mrs. Cornish from her writing desk.

"Just for a breath of air," answered Jenny, feeling a little ashamed but all the same not wanting to tell. Jenny had a shrewd notion that she would disapprove of this visit to Konopka.

Konopka seemed genuinely pleased to see her and at once she felt that she had come to the right person. Konopka's Creston background was even slighter than her own, and although his work at the university brought him into closer contact with more people, his reactions were still fresh and there were people she knew about that he had never heard of.

They talked of Creston for a while and of Creston people, and Jenny mentioned Sam Forester. Konopka spoke eagerly of him and Jenny was delighted that they knew each other. Then, like a sudden shadow, the thought of Catharine came to her. Even here, she mused, the woman haunts me. It was silly of her to mind because Catharine, being Sam's wife, must have met Konopka, but she had to admit to herself that she did.

"You have met Mrs. Forester, I suppose?" she asked, certain that he would say, "Oh yes," and perhaps he would add how pretty she was, or at least she would see him thinking it.

"No. I have not met her," he answered, looking at her a little more intently than was really necessary. She wondered about that look, but she quickly forgot the wonder in the pleasure she felt that here was a house in which Catharine had extended none of her influence.

He started for the kitchen to put the kettle on the stove for tea.

"Where's Mrs. Walsh?" Jenny asked.

"She goes to her brother's on Wednesdays. It's her day off."

"I shouldn't have called today."

"I'm glad you did," Konopka told her. "Don't bother about tea, then."

"I think it will be very nice, just the two of us."

He said it in such a natural, friendly way that she, too, felt that it was pleasant. Mrs. Walsh gave tea a formal air, wheeling it through the archway on a mahogany wagon with large smooth wheels. Konopka merely carried it in on a tray and set it between them on a low table.

THE loveliness of the room, the comfort of the hot tea, and Konopka listening gravely to everything she said loosened Jenny's tongue. She said nothing about Catharine, but she found herself talking a great deal about Roger and finding an immense relief in doing so to a sympathetic listener who had never known him. Konopka did not seem in the least uncomfortable or embarrassed when she told him how deeply she had loved Roger and how she missed him now. Everything she said he seemed to understand, and although he spoke little, what he said was sensitive and right.

Then she told him of her difficulties with Mrs. Cornish, of how at first she had resented her and criticized her, of how they had suddenly come closer at the time of the concert, and of how after that Mrs. Cornish had become more and more possessive, as if she feared that Jenny would leave her and take little Roger with her.

"Are you thinking of leaving her?" asked Konopka.

"No."

"You're not going home to Wales, then?" he asked.

Jenny smiled and shook her head.

"But I thought you were so homesick," said Konopka.

"I am getting over it as time goes on."

"I would have expected it to be worse now than before."

"It comes over me now and then until I can hardly bear it, but if I do something it goes off again."

Konopka smiled. "Why don't you go home for a holiday? Take Roger with you and let Mrs. Cornish get used to being alone again."

Jenny hesitated and then, unable to hold it in any longer, she burst out, "I can't go home. They'd be ashamed to have me."

Konopka opened his eyes the merest shade wider, but he said nothing.

JENNY went on quickly, to be sure of beating caution. "Nobody in Creston knows anything about it, and it's right that they shouldn't, but you don't belong here. Do you mind if I tell you everything?"

"If it makes you feel better, tell me."

"You'll think badly of me," she warned, but Konopka shook his head with a smile. "It seems so funny here," she said. "Everyone looking at me as if I was something Roger Cornish had picked up, nice enough but a bit of a mistake just the same. At home, you see, it was Roger who was the mistake."

"I can see how that might be," said Konopka.

Jenny was delighted with his sympathy and understanding. Somehow he made everything seem more dignified than it was. And he had said, "Anything I did not want known," taking it as a personal responsibility instead of a tiresome duty which had been imposed on him against his will.

They spoke of other things and then Jenny rose to go.

"When will you come again?" asked Konopka.

"I'd like to. May I?"

"Why not next Wednesday? That is Mrs. Walsh's day off."

"It's nice, isn't it, without her?"

She smiled at him and went. On her way back along Walnut Street she wondered whether Konopka had guessed that Mrs. Cornish did not know of this visit. Was that why he had suggested next Wednesday, to make it easier for her? It would be just like him. Roger would have liked Konopka.

But by Wednesday, there was a fog so thick in Creston that it disrupted the traffic, and everyone was talking about how in some places you could hardly see ten yards ahead. Students came late to classes and blamed the fog, and lights were on in houses and stores and offices from early morning through the whole day. The phenomenon carried a little extra bustle and laughter and excitement with it until an occasional reminder of the dangers of fog came with the clanging of the ambulance bell along Main Street.

Jenny realized by noon that she would have to forgo the afternoon visit to which she had looked forward all week.

It would have to be next week, she decided. For a little while after lunch she stared gloomily out the window at the fog, but the firelight swirled in the windowpanes and she was too exuberant to be disappointed for long. Jenny would have liked to phone Konopka, but the only telephone was in the hallway and Mrs. Cornish was too near and too unoccupied. He would understand, she assured herself, and she was so certain that he had guessed her secretiveness in the Cornish house that the thought of his telephoning her never occurred to her.

Late in the afternoon Mrs. Cornish decided to change for dinner, and at last Jenny had her chance to telephone. Jenny called Konopka's number and waited. There was the rhythmic, impersonal on-and-off-ness of the buzzer and nothing else. Even the operator was too interested in something else to make the stock announcement that she is sorry but no one answers. Jenny put the receiver down quietly and went back

(Continued on Page 158)

A small girl owned a canary, and when it died she insisted on a proper funeral. Her father therefore dug a hole in the garden and, comfortably packed in a cigar box, Timmy's body was reverently interred. Then, as Mary returned up the garden path, hand in hand with her father, she said, "Daddy, wouldn't you like to see St. Peter's face when he thinks he's got a box of cigars and finds it's only Timmy?"

—The Methodist Recorder.

Since Nassau...It's "We, Us & Co."

I was breakfasting alone my very first morning and you asked if you might join me. You weren't very talkative, darling. "My heart was doing the talking" you say. "It said look at these feminine, soft little hands." How smart I was to have Jergens Lotion with me! . . . The most attractive women care for their hands with Jergens Lotion.

Sailing – one heavenly day. "For an Old Salt, sweetheart" you whisper, "you have the softest hands."...Jergens-cared-for hands feel even smoother and softer now. Because Jergens Lotion is more effective than ever—a result of wartime research.

Dinner-dance Wednesdays at the Royal Victoria—a girl can't go without a man. "I'll be your man, sweet," you said, "tonight—and always, if you'll always have such holdable hands." Of course I will, darling. We'll have Jergens Lotion in our house. . . .Your hands are protected even longer by this finer-than-ever Jergens. Two ingredients many doctors use for lovely skin-smoothing effect are part of its service to you.

The most delightful women prefer Jergens Lotion hand care.
Hollywood Stars use Jergens Lotion, 7 to 1.
Young Marrieds vote nearly 4 to 1 for Jergens.
Models in New York prefer Jergens Lotion nearly 5 to 1.

You, too? Feel even surer, now, of dear-to-hold hands. Use Jergens Lotion—now more effective than ever. Still 10¢ to $1.00 (plus tax).

FREE! YOUR CHANCE to see that Jergens Lotion is now finer than ever.

Mail coupon today for 9-fl. bottle.
(Please use penny postcard if you will.)
Mail to: Box 27, Cincinnati 14, Ohio
Dept. LHJ

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Sales offer good in U. S. A. only

For the Softest, Adorable Hands, use

JERGENS LOTION

I felt so "dowdy" IN MY OLD FUR COAT

Honest-to-goodness, it looked as if I'd been in a dog fight with a couple of very muddy dogs. The fur was matted, dull, actually dirty-looking. I was ashamed to be seen wearing it on the street.

UNTIL I HAD IT Hollanderized

My favorite store told me about Hollanderizing — how it treats each individual fur as a special cleaning and rejuvenating problem, using the very same methods Hollander has found best for the original pelts. My coat came back looking for all the world like new again — even the lining was shimmeringly lovely.

ASK to have your furs or fur-trimmed cloth coats Hollanderized when you bring them to your furrier, department store or specialty shop for storage.

Cleaning is not enough!
Your furs need

Hollanderizing

Unless you see this tag sealed to your coat, it has NOT been Hollanderized

(Continued from Page 156)

into the living room. Doctor Konopka must have guessed that she had no chance to leave the house.

Sam came home from his Tuesday classes coughing and sneezing and looking miserable. Catharine made him a hot lemon drink and put a couple of aspirins in it. But by morning he had not thrown off the cold, and telephoned the university that he would not be teaching any classes today but would certainly be back tomorrow. Then he settled down in the living room, dressed in a pair of old pants, a thick blue sweater, bedroom slippers and a woolen bathrobe.

A flickering excitement had possessed Catharine all morning, but for an hour or two she was too busy with Sam to understand the gradual shaping of her plan, as if it were something apart from herself over which she exerted only a partial control. The fog that clutched at the windows isolated them, wrapped them around mysteriously and separately and made a tiny world of the fog-colored apartment, a world into which no one else could see. All over Creston the fog hung today, making separate little tiny worlds of every house, hiding, smoothing, cloaking in mystery.

Then she knew that the day had come, the day for which she had been waiting. It was easy and she was well prepared. She had thought out every step of it from the beginning to the end a dozen times, but now her thinking was clear and hard, and she knew what she had instinctively been waiting for. It was fog. It was concealment.

Toward the middle of the afternoon Sam felt sleepy.

"You had a bad night," she said. "Why don't you go to bed and take a nap? You'll feel a lot better for it."

Sam obeyed without protest.

Sam went to the bathroom and it took Catharine only a minute to take the little bottle out of the picture frame. Within half an hour Sam was asleep and Catharine put on her hat and coat and went out into the fog.

It was exciting. She could hardly see across the street and people coming toward her looked large and unreal. She bought six lemons at Schirer's, took a bus across the bridge into town, transferred into a crowded bus going west and was thankful for the crowd. She had to stand near the front of the bus between two men, and if there had been anyone on the bus who knew her they would scarcely have had an opportunit of glimpsing her.

She walked across the north bridge an turned east along Pine Street. Two blocks t the south was Mrs. Cornish's house, an Catharine wondered what Mrs. Cornish wa doing now. Having an early tea perhap And Jenny! Something made her try not t think of Jenny.

Once she had turned into Pine Street sh did not meet anyone. A man had stepped o the bus behind her and had crossed and gon west along Pine, but this section of a doze blocks, the most elegant section of the Tri angle, was silent, remote and lifeless. Th trees dripped and once or twice she half felt half heard a plop of water on her hat. As she neared the end of Pine Street the humiliation of her last visit to Konopka surged into he consciousness and she grew warm and angry with the thought.

Even now she might fail. He might not be at home, or someone might be visiting him and she would have to rely on her quick invention. Without a glance to left or right she walked up the driveway and rang the bell. She hardly had to wait at all.

Konopka came to the door eagerly, and after the merest fraction of the surprised pause, "How do you do? Come in!" he said.

"Only for a little while," Catharine told him.

He shut the door and she listened to hear if there were voices in the living room. She heard none. But there still might be one person there to spoil her plan.

"Isn't it gloomy today?" said Konopka. "Do you often have this kind of weather?"

"No," said Catharine, "it's unusual." She saw to her satisfaction that there was no one in the living room. "I've come to apologize, Doctor Konopka, for my last visit to you."

Doctor Konopka looked relieved. "Put it out of your mind," he said.

"It was silly and hysterical of me. One should always keep perfect control."

"There are times when it feels good to blow off a little steam," he said with a smile.

Catharine let the statement alone. She must do it and do it quickly. She must do it and get back to Sam. "It's quiet here this afternoon," she observed. "Is your housekeeper away?"

"Mrs. Walsh? Yes, she has Wednesdays off. I thought all Creston knew that. She goes to visit her brother." Konopka glanced toward the window, a glance that might have

(Continued on Page 160)

"We decided he should have complete freedom in choosing his own career."

EXPERIENCE IS THE BEST TEACHER!

1945 NEWS ITEM
Cigarette Shortage Still Acute
Crowds Queue Up... Millions Try Different Brands...Smoke Whatever They Can Get.

EXPERIENCE TAUGHT MILLIONS THE DIFFERENCES IN CIGARETTE QUALITY!

Your "T-Zone" will tell you...
T for Taste...
T for Throat...
That's your proving ground for any cigarette. See if Camels don't suit your "T-Zone" to a "T."

Result: Many millions more people found that they liked Camels best.

IT'S ONLY a memory now, the war cigarette shortage. But it was during that shortage that people found themselves comparing brands whether they intended to or not.

Their "T-Zone"—that's T for Taste and T for Throat—tested more different brands than they'd normally try in a lifetime.

And millions more people found that the rich, full flavor of Camel's superb blend of choice tobaccos suited their Taste to a "T." And that their Throats welcomed the kind of cool mildness Camels deliver.

Thus the demand for Camels... always great... grew greater still... so great that today more people are smoking Camels than ever before.

But, no matter how great the demand, this you can be sure of:

Camel quality is not to be tampered with. Only choice tobaccos, properly aged, and blended in the time-honored Camel way, are used in Camels.

According to a recent Nationwide survey:

MORE DOCTORS SMOKE CAMELS

than any other cigarette

When three independent research organizations asked 113,597 doctors—What cigarette do you smoke, Doctor?—the brand named most was Camel!

It beats the Band

how grand it is to walk

the RHYTHM STEP way

in spanking-new

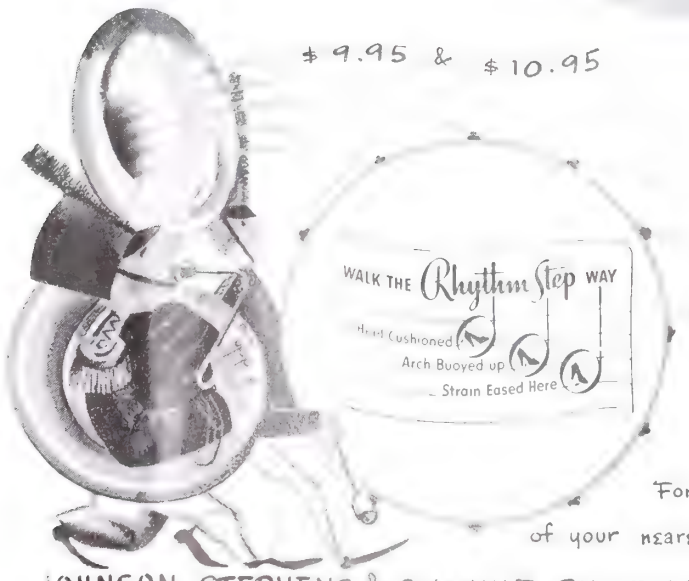
Brown & Whites

with Invisible Rhythm Treads

to make YOU

the Big Attraction!

$9.95 & $10.95



For the name of your nearest store, write

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE CO., St. Louis

(Continued from Page 158)

been self-consciously illustrative of his statement, but Catharine had to make sure.

"You aren't expecting anyone, are you?" she asked.

"No one at all," he answered briskly.

"Will you tell me one thing, Doctor Konopka? You didn't tell anyone that I came to see you that other time, did you?"

"I promised you, didn't I?"

"Yes."

"I keep my promises."

Catharine felt like a berated schoolgirl. She could see now that she had a sharp and determined rival.

"It's silly of me to be so fussy," she apologized. "But I'm rather sensitive. I wouldn't want my husband to know."

"Naturally."

"I acted on a foolish impulse."

Konopka raised his eyebrows a little and there was a half-smile on his face. His head was a little on one side. "I don't think it was exactly that," he said.

"How do you know?"

Konopka's gaze was penetrating, but Catharine looked back at him steadily. "You are not the sort of woman who acts upon a foolish impulse."

"No?"

"No! You are like me. You are not easily thrust aside when you are after something you want."

For a moment Catharine thought that he had guessed her purpose. Perhaps her hatred showed too clearly in her face.

"The only trouble was that we were after the same thing," said Konopka lightly, and Catharine knew that he had not guessed.

SHE thought rapidly how it must be managed. She had refused whisky, but he had made no attempt to offer her anything else, something for which he would have to go into the kitchen. He had played into her hands by telling her his favorite drink. Over his shoulder she could see the cabinet, its edges gleaming in the firelight. But he sat perfectly still as if he expected her to make her excuses and go. It flashed into her mind that there was a chance in this for her to put her determination from her, to run into safety.

She pressed her free hand against her body and thought of Sam at home, deep asleep in the dimness of the horrid little apartment. If she did not do it now she would never forgive herself.

"Doctor Konopka, I understand you've been sketching down by the railroad tracks."

"Yes, it amuses me."

"I'm not a connoisseur, but I've always been interested in drawing and painting, and having a husband who ——"

Konopka rose. "Would you like to see a few of them?"

Catharine's heart suddenly began beating loudly. "Is it convenient? I'd be very interested."

"They're in the study upstairs. I use it as a studio."

This was the moment. She looked at him with an expression that bore a slight smile, half teasing, half reproving. She could see that its implication was understood.

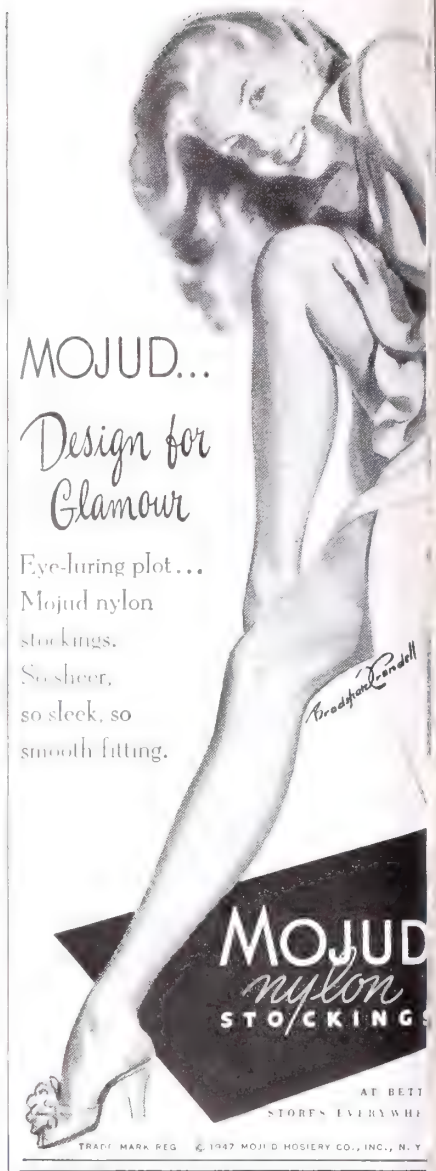
"Excuse me," he said. "I'll bring them."

She watched him go out into the hall, turn the light on for the upper landing, and she gave him three seconds once he was out of sight. Then, swiftly, but with the minutest precision, as if she had rehearsed it to the ticking of a clock, she rose, opened her bag, took out the little bottle and put her bag down. Then she went straight to the cabinet. It was gin he had said. Gin and tonic. She unscrewed the top of the bottle, uncorked the aconitine and poured it into the gin. It was colorless and made no change in the appearance of the gin. She was back in her place a full minute before Konopka returned with a handful of sketches.

"I think I'll change my mind and have a drink," she said. "Then you can have your favorite."

"That's really noble of you," he said, handing her the sketches.

"Just whisky and a little soda," she directed.



MOJUD...
Design for Glamour
Eye-luring plot... Mojud nylon stockings. So sheer, so sleek, so smooth fitting.
Bradford Crandell
MOJUD nylon STOCKINGS
AT BETT STORES EVERYWHE
TRADE MARK REG. © 1947 MOJUD HOSIERY CO., INC., N. Y.

FEEL HEAVENLY IN A Starlight BRA
with the patented
INNER-CONTROL
Skillful designing and quality fabrics combin to enhance your figure and give you tha heavenly feeling of freedom from restrain
There is a Starlight Bra for every figure typ including long line and teen age. Also wire bras with detachable straps
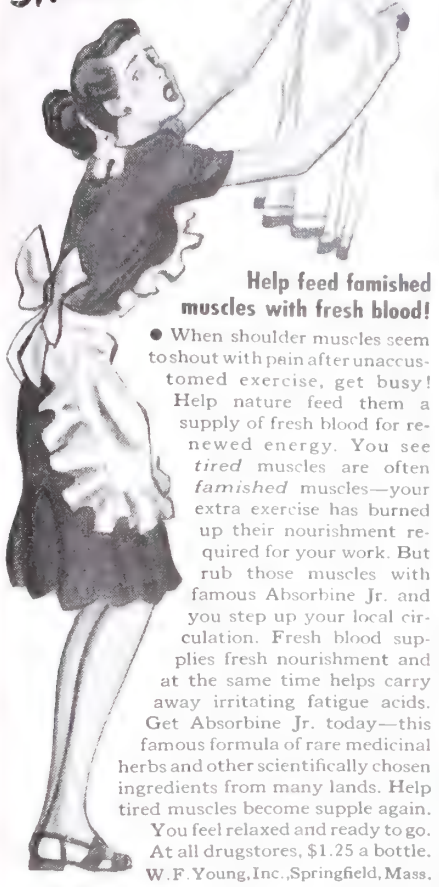
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
At leading store
everywher
L. & W. BRASSIERE CO., NEW YORK 10

Oh! my aching shoulder!



Help feed famished muscles with fresh blood!

• When shoulder muscles seem to shout with pain after unaccustomed exercise, get busy! Help nature feed them a supply of fresh blood for renewed energy. You see tired muscles are often famished muscles—your extra exercise has burned up their nourishment required for your work. But rub those muscles with famous Absorbine Jr. and you step up your local circulation. Fresh blood supplies fresh nourishment and at the same time helps carry away irritating fatigue acids. Get Absorbine Jr. today—this famous formula of rare medicinal herbs and other scientifically chosen ingredients from many lands. Help tired muscles become supple again. You feel relaxed and ready to go. At all drugstores, $1.25 a bottle. W. F. Young, Inc., Springfield, Mass.

-ah! my Absorbine Jr

GOOD MONEY IN WEAVING

Earn money at home weaving rugs, carpets, etc. from old rags or new yarn—in your community! No experience necessary. 31,000 doing it with easy running Union Looms costing less than $50.00! Send for our free booklet today. UNION LOOM WORKS, 44 Factory St., BOONVILLE, N. Y.

NO DRY BRITTLE NAILS

When You Use This Amazing NEW

Non Acid

Polish Remover

WITH NAIL CONDITIONER

1. Helps prevent dry-brittle nails
2. Helps prevent nails from splitting
3. Helps prevent polish from chipping
4. Helps prolong the lustre

INSIST ON 25¢ at all cosmetic counters

TRIMAL

NON ACID

POLISH REMOVER

Demanded by millions of smart women everywhere

Contains no acetone
No offensive odor
Delicately Perfumed

She could feel the pulse at her throat hammering as she looked over the sketches and watched him pour her drink first and set it aside while he made his own.

She was dizzy with the triumph and terror of that moment. There could be no turning back now. The first step had been so long ago it seemed years, and all her plans had been laid for this one instant. She knew that the hard part was to come and that everything beyond this moment would be utterly and agonizingly different from all that had gone before.

Konopka came toward her and handed her a glass. She took it and watched him closely. With a smile he raised his glass and drank. Immediately she put her own glass down on the little table in front of her, and what she saw then filled her with horror.

Konopka dropped the glass and it bounced on the carpet and spilled its contents but did not break. His face was contorted and both hands grasped his throat. She caught one glance from his eyes at her and she quickly averted her own. He was trying to speak. She put her hands over her face and let her breath come and go so that it made choking noises in her throat. She hardly knew which sounds were hers and which were his. She crouched against the back of the love seat and she dared not look again until the convulsive thumping noise was over and she sensed rather than heard that the sounds that continued came from herself alone. She silenced them, waited a moment, and then looked. The creature she had destroyed was twenty feet away from her, and he lay twisted and noiseless and fearfully still.

> Infinite power might as easily blow this whole earth up and dissipate every part of it into the first atoms, from which it may be supposed to have been made, as He could, by the power of His word, form this beautiful figure from the unshaped chaos: but this, we say, is out of the present question.
>
> —DANIEL DEFOE The Destruction of the Isle of St. Vincent.

She stared at what she had done, then the thought of what she had to do galvanized her into action. Feverishly she threw the sketches on the fire. With her gloved hands she smoothed out the cushion of the love seat she had sat in. She looked at the glass of whisky and soda and decided to leave it alone. Then she picked up her purse, looked inside to see if she had the little bottle there, took up the brown-paper bag, and without another glance at Konopka's body, she stepped around the wet patch on the carpet and went out into the hallway.

She opened the door and faced it as she closed it quietly. Then she turned to walk down the driveway. She stood stock-still with fear when she saw a car drawn up at the curb and between it and her was a man, a tall thin man wearing a raincoat and coming toward her. She was caught. She heard the car chugging quietly and she could see its front door hanging open.

The man stopped a yard or two from her and it was a second or two before he spoke. What would he do? What would he say? How could she prevent him from going into the house and seeing that horrible thing on the great luxurious carpet?

"Excuse me," said the man, "I'm completely lost. I was coming into Creston from the west and this seems to be a dead end."

He stuttered on "seems" and "dead" but he did not want to enter the house. He was lost. He was a total stranger. The relief was so great she nearly burst into tears.

"I'll show you the way," she said. "I was going to take the bus."

The man did not even know what part of Creston he was in.

As she climbed into the car Catharine was afraid that he would see, not her fear, but her excitement. They drove west along Pine Street, and although he drove slowly because of the fog it seemed to Catharine that he sped.

LUXED stockings last twice as long, strain tests show

When you Lux your stockings, it's like getting an extra pair every time you buy one pair. That's because Luxed stockings last twice as long.

Strain tests proved this! Stockings rubbed with cake soap or washed with a strong soap went into runs very quickly.

Whether you wear nylon, rayon, silk, cotton—be thrifty . . . Lux stockings after every wearing.

A product of Lever Brothers Company

THIS DIFFERENT

Face Powder

GLORIFIES YOUR OWN

INDIVIDUAL COLORING

FOR BLONDES

BRUNETTES

BROWNETTES

REDHEADS

Smart, new, artistic powder box—beautiful white and gold plastic design.

ARE you blonde, brunette, brownette or redhead? Now you can add to the natural loveliness of your own individual coloring with this unusually different powder in your own Color Harmony Shade. And just consider these exceptional qualities in this different face powder:

1..It imparts a lovelier color to the skin
2..It creates a satin-smooth make-up
3..It clings perfectly...really stays on

Try Max Factor Hollywood Face Powder...a beauty secret of the famous screen stars ...now created for you to bring a surprising new loveliness to your make-up. $1.00

Max Factor Hollywood

COLOR HARMONY MAKE-UP ... Face Powder, Pan-Cake Make-Up, Rouge, and the New, Sensational

She thanked him for the ride at the corner of Collins Street and he thanked her for directing him. Halfway to Foxy's she opened her bag without stopping, took out the little perfume bottle and threw it into a clump of bushes. Then she let herself in quietly and listened at the bedroom door. How safe and remote it seemed here! She wondered if Sam had been asleep all the time. She thought once again of Konopka and then forced the thought out of her mind. For a few days, weeks even, that recollection would haunt her, but it would fade with time. At first it would be hard, but she had already done two hard things. She hung up her coat and left her hat on the bamboo table with the bag of lemons. Then she went to the bathroom and scrubbed her hands.

Sam awoke and called her. "How long did I sleep?" he asked.

She could see at a glance that he had not wakened before. "Most of the afternoon," she answered.

"You must have been very quiet," he said.

"Not the way you sleep," she mocked. "I went out and got the lemons for you."

Sam sat up and scratched his head. "I think I feel better," he announced. "I'll be all right tomorrow"; and then he added, "How's the fog?"

"Still there," said Catharine.

It was a strange evening and it seemed endless. Sam did not want to go to bed early because he had slept so long in the afternoon. After the rush and terror of the hour and a half there was a ghastly peace in the apartment, and Catharine told herself that this was the hardest part of all. Once the hue and cry was raised there would be the distraction and wonder, horror and excitement for those around her, and for her the fearful joy of cunning and deception.

She took out her week's mending and marveled at the steadiness of her hands. It might never have happened at all, the quiet way they were sitting there. Her alibi was almost perfect and her behavior exemplary. Sam was honest and easily deceived, and if he believed that she went no farther than Schirer's grocery store, it would help her to believe it too. Besides, when people like Sam gave testimony, everyone believed them. She had been lucky, wonderfully lucky. If that man with the car had been a visitor She shuddered, not daring to think what would have happened.

Sam, concentrating on his book, did not even look up at her when she moved. In the distance over the Tenth Street crossing, she could hear the slow and melancholy bell of the eastbound train. Catharine glanced at the clock. It was five past ten. The tram was over an hour late.

She thought of Mrs. Walsh sitting on the dark green plush of the coach seat, glancing idly at the familiar lights of Creston. In less than half an hour she would be walking along Pine Street, anticipating a little chat with Doctor Konopka about the thickness of the fog in Harlan Center and the lateness of the tram. Then she would walk up the driveway and turn along the path to the front door. Did she have a key or did she ring the bell? Or did she perhaps use the back door? At all events there would be the discovery, the shriek or the calling out of his name, a running to the door to cry for help or a breathless, uncontrolled telephone call. Then Creston would know.

THERE would be the difficult moment of the dreadful news impinging on the little apartment at Foxy's, and after that it would grow steadily easier. She had left no trail and the fog had enveloped her actions with secrecy. Even the horrors of the death convulsion were wrapped in a vague sense of remoteness, as if they were news of a distant battle in which thousands had been killed.

> In most affairs the successful man is the one who has the happy faculty of deciding right three out of every five questions, and of not letting the other two keep him awake even if he has decided them wrong. The insistence that all questions must be decided right only defeats, as a rule, its own end. For the persistent fusser over trifles I recommend the inelegant but forceful maxim: "This rag is not worth chewing."
>
> —From Peg Along, by George L. Walton. Copyright 1915, 1943, by Alice Walton. (Published by J. B. Lippincott Company).

Catharine went to bed in the same mechanical way, brushing her teeth, wriggling her toes when she got them out of her shoes, doing the usual dull, insignificant things, just as if she had spent all the afternoon reading a book in the living room. She said a poem to herself to help her lose consciousness quickly. She was confident that she would sleep soundly and have no dreams.

CATHARINE awoke to find sunlight on her face. Had there been a fog? The memory of yesterday rushed to her mind before she opened her eyes, but when she opened them and found that the light on her lids was real sunlight, she wondered whether she had dreamed the fog, the killing and the long slow evening. And yet she clearly remembered going to bed and saying to herself over and over, I shall sleep soundly. I shall have no dreams, and then the poem about gathering rosebuds. But the moment had come to begin living the day ahead. If only by shutting her eyes again she could sink back into unconsciousness! With a quick, determined movement, she slid out of bed and sat for a moment on the edge of it, peering out at the sun itself shining clearly in the eastern sky.

It was a good beginning. The phenomenon of the fog and its sudden disappearance set a mark to yesterday's dark activities. A trace of the fog today would have depressed her, but the brilliant sunshine made this day belong to another life altogether.

She dressed quickly and quietly. She wanted a few minutes to herself before Sam awoke. She set the coffee percolator on the stove and put a cloth on the small table by the living-room window. Just another working day with Sam off to a ten-o'clock class!

Sam heard the preparations for breakfast and walked sleepily to the bathroom.

When the shower was turned off Catharine called out, "How's your cold?"

"It's better. The lemon fixed it."

Catharine thought briefly of the journey the lemons had taken yesterday and of the other draught she had mixed for Sam's sake.

They sat down to breakfast in the ordinary way and Catharine decided that Sam would hear the news when he reached the university. By then she might have heard it too. She might even pretend she had heard it and she could call him up and ask if it were true, this dreadful rumor that was going about the neighborhood. Then she suddenly thought how foolish that would be. Suppose Mrs. Walsh had been delayed. Suppose she had not been on last night's train at all. What a stupid, fatal thing it would be if she called Sam up and told him about the rumor, just because she wanted to ease into the uncomfortable subject over the telephone! She could wait and simulate shock and surprise over the telephone, but it would be easier if she knew by the time he called her, and it would help if she had some idea how people were taking it. Why not go down to Schirer's grocery store as soon as Sam had gone? The Schirers would be sure to have heard, if anyone in Creston knew. The radio was always on in the little living room behind the store, belching soap operas, concerts, talks and news broadcasts with impartial hollowness. Her going there and perhaps making some remark about Sam's cold being better would remind them that she had just run out for a few minutes yesterday afternoon in the thick of the fog.

When the doorbell rang, Catharine jumped. It was with exaggerated calm that she went to the door, neither hurrying nervously nor hanging back timidly. She felt that she was doing rather well.

"Hello, darling!" said Charlotte. "Isn't it terrible! Did you hear?"

(Continued on Page 165)

re's no other brush like this—

The Squibb Angle Toothbrush is bent like a dentist's mirror to reach more places ere's no other dental cream ike this

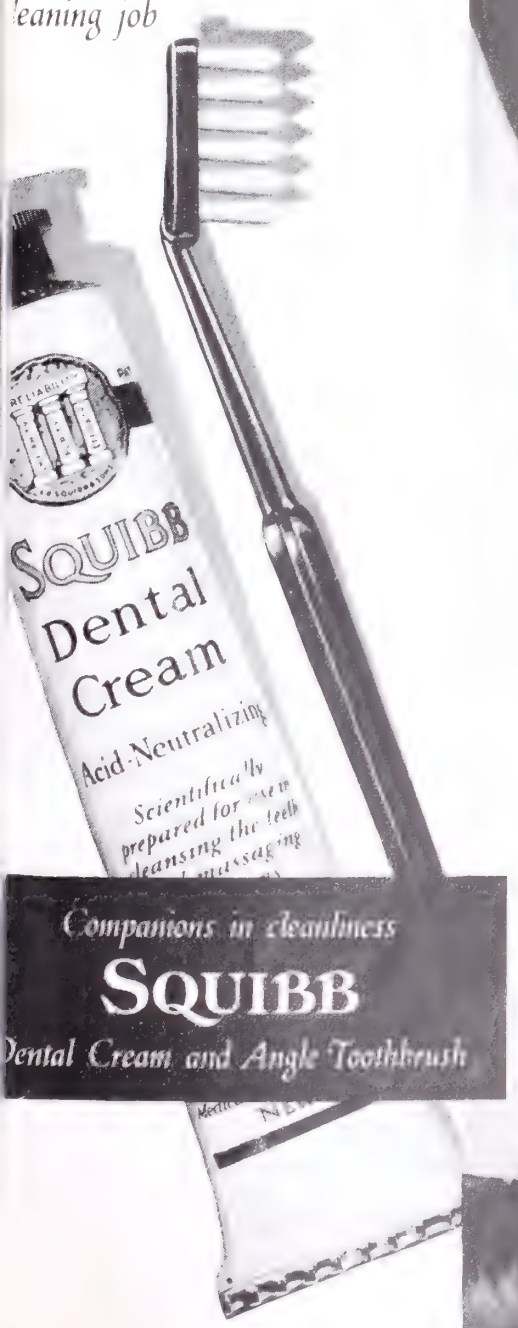
Squibb Dental Cream leaves your mouth clean and sweet with refresh-mint

* * *

u need both to do the best leaning job



Companions in cleanliness

SQUIBB

Dental Cream and Angle Toothbrush

You feel on top of the world

. . . with your teeth so clean . . . mouth so fresh!

You do more than brush your teeth when you use Squibb Dental Cream—you leave your whole mouth delightfully refreshed.

Use it with the Squibb Angle Toothbrush. It's bent like a dentist's mirror to reach places that ordinary brushes too often miss.

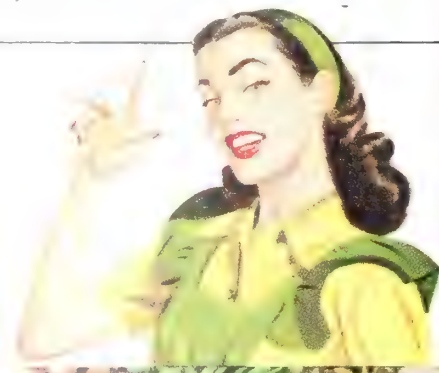
Together they make cleaning your teeth a pleasure instead of a task.

SQUIBB

A name you can trust

It can be done—with Wear-Ever aluminum! It's an amazingly simple, simply amazing experiment. It sheds light on why you can turn out such delicious cooking and baking with Wear-Ever utensils. As you can see from this photo—completely unretouched—the heat from one candle can actually bake a perfect cake. That's because whether you use a saucepan, baking pan or any other Wear-Ever utensil, even if the heat is not uniform—it spreads so fast, so evenly, the whole utensil cooks the food.

WHAT! ... BAKE A CAKE WITH A CANDLE!



With this new Wear-Ever Corn Stick Pan you can turn out golden brown corn sticks! And, together with the pan, come a number of kitchen-tested recipes for other party favorites such as banana fingers, chocolate longies! See it at your dealer's—today.

The name Wear-Ever "Juice-Saver" Pie Pan means just what it says! Special Alumilite finish for ideal heat absorption. These light-but-durable aluminum pans spread heat so fast and evenly, bottom crusts are deliciously browned and flaky.

Cakes light as thistledown . . . that's what you want . . . every time. Wear-Ever's bright aluminum cake pans give right heat distribution—cakes are baked right through to the center . . . and are evenly browned outside. You'll want several of these!

Want more free time—and more praise The new Wear-Ever Pressure Cooke reaches temperature fast, then cooks, sa string beans in 2½ minutes! Meats a juicier, vegetables fresher! Patented Sna Tite cover can't come off while pressure on. Simple, one-hand operation—a chi could use it!

Keep aluminum gleaming the easy way. Use WEAR-EVER CLEANSER PADS. At all stores.

Made of the metal that cooks best . . . easy to clean

WEAR•EVER Aluminum utensils

THE ALUMINUM COOKING UTENSIL COMPANY, NEW KENSINGTON, PA.

©1947, T.A.C.U.C

(Continued from Page 162)

id we hear what?" asked Catharine.
ou haven't heard a thing about it?" ex-ed Charlotte joyfully. "Where's Sam? up? I must tell you two together."
e's having his breakfast," said Cathaarlotte walked into the living room and up a position in the center, facing the She was tremendously excited, and Sam saw immediately that she was the r of important news.

/hat is it?" he asked. "Don't keep us in nse."
onopka," said Charlotte. "Found dead axwell's house last night."
lo!" cried Catharine, but Sam said ng. He was looking at Charlotte and ce was a perfect blank, showing neither ishment nor concern. Catharine won- whether her own reaction was too , but Sam and Charlotte were too con- d to notice it.
t was on the eleven-o'clock news," lotte went on. "His housekeeper found Poison, they said. Suicide or mur-

Ve didn't listen to the news last night," arine explained. "Sam was reading and de him a hot drink for his cold and we in bed before eleven."
he town's buzzing with rumors," said lotte. "People say there was a car ing along Oak Street and that it turned ycamore and around Pine and Cypress at the people in ast block on Oak t twice."
low could they see r in yesterday's ' asked Catharine.
guess they'd e a car yesterday," Sam. "There prob- weren't so many nd."
But the fog was so ," Catharine said. ely they couldn't clearly."
He was threatened ne East before he e out here," Char- put in. "It looks dirty business."
t couldn't be sui-
He was such a cheerful guy," said Sam. Around four o'clock they said about the ' said Charlotte.
Only the day before yesterday at lunch- I saw him," said Sam. "I was blowing nose and he grinned and said, 'Take care nat cold now.' He was perfectly well and by and unsuspecting!"
I called Peg Anderson," Charlotte went "You know, she lives on the corner of and Cypress. She saw the car and she she noticed it specially."
I don't suppose the car even stopped," Sam. "That going around twice is the keep-moving trick."
It did stop," said Charlotte, and Catha- pulled the napkin that lay in her lap and eezed it tight.
How do you know?" asked Sam.
Peg Anderson had been calling the Pat- and Eva Patten's little girl says she saw oman come out of the house."

THARINE'S tongue suddenly seemed to tract in her mouth and she could not have ken if they had turned to her and asked a simple question. She clenched her ds tight and endured.
Eva tried to argue her out of it, but oline insisted. She was looking out the dow at the fog and she saw a woman come of the Maxwells', and she and a man got the car and drove away."
The child saw all that in yesterday's ?" Sam sounded incredulous, wonder- y and comfortingly incredulous. Catha- forced saliva from her jaws and mois- ed her tongue and her teeth. Sam turned n Charlotte and looked at her. "You ld hardly see across the street, could ?" he asked.
'Were you out in it?" asked Charlotte.

"I just went to the grocery for lemons," said Catharine. "It was very thick around here."

"Maybe it wasn't as thick in the Triangle," suggested Charlotte. "Peg said Eva said Caroline didn't sound as if she were imagining things."

"So what!"

"Doesn't it make it all twice as exciting? A strange woman coming out of the house and stepping into a car all ready and waiting for her? They were experienced killers. That's what!"

"Charlotte, you've been steeping yourself in crime stories from the library. It's written all over you. Garrity the amateur sleuth!"

"You can laugh," returned Charlotte good-naturedly. "But I wouldn't let an art historian do my detection for me."

"It's not much in my line, I admit," said Sam; and then added in a different tone, "Poor fellow!"

"But this case ought to interest you," she said with a knowing smile. "It's an ill wind ——"

Catharine knew in an instant what she meant, and it was something that would be sure to occur to many people in Creston. The patness of it! There lay the almost incredible boldness of the whole scheme.

"What do you mean?" demanded Sam.

"Now don't tell me you haven't thought of it!" mocked Charlotte.

"Charlotte, what are you getting at?"

Charlotte's expression turned to one of admiring surprise. "I guess you haven't, at that," she said. "Well, the first thing I thought of when I saw the paper was here's the job that was to have been Sam Forester's going right back to where it belongs—to Sam."

Sam's face hardly changed, but Catharine could see that Charlotte's words had struck him like a blow between the eyes. Even Charlotte sensed something of the enormity of her levity.

"What's the harm?" she said, trying to sound undismayed. "It's natural. It's nothing to be ashamed of." Embarrassed by her own protesting, she turned on Catharine. "I'll bet Catharine thought of it," she said with a touch of defiance.

"Catharine never saw him," said Sam, and his voice sounded as if he had been hurt. "I didn't think of him as the fellow who got my job. I'll never have the background he had. I liked him too."

Catharine felt nearer to an outburst of tears then than at any time since she heard of Roger's death, and the tears, if they had come, would have been for envy of Sam's unenvious nature. He was naturally good, just as she was naturally evil.

Charlotte made a recovery from her embarrassment. "Even so," she said, "now he's dead you can't help wondering what Smithton will do about the job. And I don't think it's indecent, either. Just practical!"

But neither Sam nor Catharine answered her. Catharine sat perfectly still. Surely it would soon be time for Sam to say he had to go. She had endured this much and now she wanted to be by herself again. The thought of having Charlotte in the apartment half the morning was unendurable. Catharine wished she would go. There she was talking again.

"I know what's bothering you," she was saying. "You're afraid of what people will say. If you seem to be too sorry about it they'll say you're putting it on, and if you're not sorry enough, they'll say you're glad it happened. You know how small-town people love to talk."

"We have a rough idea," said Sam, but Charlotte missed the prod and went on:

"But you'll come through it all right. You two are so dignified. You can carry off a

---

A man and his wife used to have an occasional friendly fight. One night after an unusually warm session the man was sitting on one side of the fire and the good wife on the other. Between them lay the cat and the dog, lazily blinking at the fire. After a while the wife ventured to remark:

"Now, dear, just you look at that cat and dog. See how quietly and peacefully they get along together—why can't we do that?"

"That is all right," said the man, "but you just tie them together and see what will happen!"

—L. O. DAWSON

Light Spots (Weatherford Printing Co.).

This ONE stands out...

the one with Tender BEEF Added!

INDIVIDUAL MEAT LOAVES. Cut whole Prem loaves into halves. Top with orange marmalade and bake in oven (400° F.) about 20 minutes. Serve with asparagus or other green vegetable.

Stands out in FLAVOR! Fine pork or beef alone tastes good. Combined, the flavor is doubly good . . . really extra fine eating—as these individual Prem loaves will prove.

Stands out in NUTRITION! Gives you the important nutrients of both pork and beef . . . high quality proteins, minerals and B complex vitamins.

Stands out in TEXTURE! Prem is firm, tender and juicy. Cuts cleanly and evenly—cold or hot—slices, or individual loaves as shown.

3 TO 1 PREFER BEEF ADDED! Tender, flavorful beef has been added to Prem because homemakers wanted it—by better than 3 to 1. From their experience, they knew that beef and pork combined was bound to be better. So try Prem soon . . . see how much better you like it.

A SWIFT QUALITY FOOD

It's SWIFT'S..

Say PREM!

"RUG MAGIC" by OLSON

Your OLD RUGS, CLOTHING Save up to 1/2

You, too, can have lovelier broadloom rugs this fascinating, saving way! Try it!

It's All So Easy! Write today for the big, beautiful, FREE Olson Catalog and Decorating Guide in colors that tells all about . .

Our FACTORY-to-You Way of cutting rug costs in Half—and tells how . . .

Your Material Can Be Sent at Our Expense to the Olson Rug Factory, where . . .

. . . by the Famous Olson Process, we shred sterilize, sort, merge and reclaim the good usable wools and other materials in discarded carpets, rugs and wool clothing of all kinds; then picker, card, bleach, spin, redye and weave into lovely, colorful, deep-textured

New Reversible BROADLOOM RUGS

. . . that will give double the wear and luxury.

Sizes for All Needs up to 16 feet wide, seamless and any length, in:—

Solid Colors 18 Century Florals
Two-Tone
Tweed Blends Ovals
Early American and Oriental Designs

Read praise from editors, women everywhere. Over 2 Million Customers.

Our 73rd Year. We guarantee to please, or pay for your material. Only from Olson Factory can you get genuine Olson Rugs. We do not employ agents or sell through stores.

WRITE for this beautiful 40 page Olson Book of rugs, decorating helps and model rooms.

Chicago New York S. Frisco

FREE RUG BOOK Decorating Guide in Full Colors—

MAIL COUPON OR 1c POST CARD

OLSON RUG CO., E-37, Chicago, 41

Mail Big RUG BOOK in Colors FREE to:-

NAME

ADDRESS

TOWN STATE

situation like that. I couldn't. Fred and I have no dignity. Only this morning, just after I'd been talking to Peg, we got into a terrific argument as to whether a murder on the campus boosts the student registration or cuts it down. What do you think?"

"I think you should go home and do your morning's work," said Sam, getting up from the table.

"Talking of work, did I tell you that Elsie is leaving me?"

"No."

"She wasn't as sick as she gave herself out to be. I met her down in the market—then she told me she was leaving me. So you drop in on me for a change. I shan't be getting out of the house for a day or two. Fred's taking the noon train to Chicago. The pharmacologists are having a convention and all that stuff is right up Fred's alley. What he really wants is to get away from me and Jimmy."

Catharine did not know how they got rid of Charlotte, but after minutes that seemed like hours she was saying good-by and going down the steps into Collins Street, her nose tilted upward in the sunshine.

Sam was almost ready to go to his ten-o'clock class. When he had a minute or two to spare he usually helped her a little, and now he piled the breakfast dishes on a tray and started to carry them to the kitchen.

"Catharine," he said, picking up her crumpled napkin, "your napkin's all wet."

"I spilled some water on it."

Sam went out into the kitchen. Catharine steadied herself against the archway and wiped her hands on her skirt.

The news reached Jenny and Mrs. Cornish a little before noon. Mrs. Cornish shook her head, murmured something about Europe and presently left Jenny to herself. It was a horrible shock to Jenny, made more horrible by the memory of the telephone call she had made. The mere fact of calling the house when Konopka must have been lying dead in it made the whole thing seem terribly close to her. She shuddered.

She blamed herself for telling Konopka so much of her troubles last week and giving him no time to tell her his. Perhaps if he had talked he would have given her information enough to put the police on the right track. Then she would not care about Mrs. Cornish. She would go and tell them immediately. But now, with nothing to offer, the temptation to remain silent was too strong. Her only connection with the man was through the concert and the rehearsals necessary for it. She had visited him once since the concert, and there was nothing remarkable in that. The only risk was the faint possibility that Konopka had written down in some diary or notebook the Wednesday call or the following Wednesday's invitation, or both. It was so slight a risk that Jenny resolved to take it and remain silent.

For a day or two she experienced a flutter of agitation each time she opened the newspaper or heard someone discussing the murder, but no one seemed to have discovered any evidence of the invitation for tea, and no one came to the Cornish house to ask any questions. But while the thought lay uneasily in her mind, she gained an insight into the feelings of the person who had committed the murder. How horrible to have done something like that, she thought, and to be watching for the first rustle of suspicion! Better to confess immediately than suffer the slow torture of watching, bit by bit, the truth asserting itself, a jigsaw puzzle gradually taking shape, being transformed from a set of disconnected pieces into a total, meaningful picture.

All the people in Creston were excited and full of conjecture. A couple of university instructors started an argument at the Academy Club by saying that Konopka had committed suicide but had wished to give the appearance of murder. The majority thought it a clear case of murder and referred knowingly to Konopka's difficulties in Europe. Caroline Patten was regarded as somehow remarkably intelligent because she happened to be looking out the window at the time. She stuck to her story and all Creston buzzed with talk about the mystery woman, the car that cruised around the Triangle as if it had lost its way in the fog—a cunning device—and the man who had driven the woman away.

Now that a month had elapsed since the news of Roger's death, Jenny and Mrs. Cornish went visiting together more frequently, and wherever they went, someone was sure to mention the Konopka case. He was a foreigner and on that account it was easier to speak of his misfortune objectively. His life had been threatened before, so it was really not such a dreadful shock to most of them. Some even went so far as to criticize the president, the Art Department and the Board of Regents for bringing him there. It was asking for trouble, they said, and some of the very same people who had hailed his appointment most enthusiastically now said that they had felt all along that there was an element of risk in it.

During the two weeks following that foggy Wednesday, Jenny came home with Mrs. Cornish at least six or seven times, able to conceal her emotions only as far as the house. After that she would run up to her room, throw herself on her bed and cry without restraint. After crying she usually felt better, and then she would play with Roger until he had to have his supper and go to bed.

Sam and Catharine seldom mentioned the Konopka affair to each other. Sam supposed that Catharine felt even more shamefaced than he, especially when she remembered her foolish behavior at the time of the concert. So, to spare her feelings, Sam refrained from mentioning Konopka's name except when it was necessary, and to spare his own he started no discussion of his future at Creston. What Charlotte had said that Thursday morning in her poking, irritating way made sense, but it bothered him to speak of it. It was unnatural that he should feel this way with Catharine, but he supposed that her resentment of Konopka had something to do with it.

There was no lack of other things to talk about, and Catharine had plenty to say when he came home after his classes. She had always been fond of reading, but of late she was bringing home four or five books at once. She read them very quickly and then exchanged them for others. She was looking pale and tired. He suggested that she visit her parents for a few days at Henrichs. At home she would derive some benefit from the change of scene, and when she came bac refreshed, it would be only a week or tw until Christmas.

Catharine agreed at once and Sam w certain then that she needed the chan badly. A suggestion of this sort usually i volved them in a protracted argument, b this time there was none at all and Catharir agreed to go the following day.

Sam took her to the bus station. "Have good time now," he said, "and don't wor about anything."

She smiled and waved, and in a few mi utes the bus was gone.

It was the first time she had left him ove night since they had been married, and h was certainly going to miss her. He an Catharine had plenty to be thankful fo They were living peaceably in their nativ land and their life stretched before ther pleasantly like gentle countryside. Ther would be some disappointments ahead, an sorrows, too, but in compensation ther would be the quiet joys of family life an daily work. He wondered whether Konopka during the few weeks of his life in Crestor had envied him. He thought of that fogg Wednesday afternoon and marveled at th difference in their fortunes. The dimness tha brought comfort to him had brought stealth and death to Konopka. The peculiar quality of the day drifted back into his senses, an he felt once more its closed-in heaviness, th blurriness of the lights and the intens pleasure of dozing and knowing that Cath arine was close to him, moving about in th kitchen making him a hot lemon drink o sitting quietly in the living room waiting fo him to wake up. Poor Konopka!

Sam walked up the cement path and int the Arts Library Building. There was a not in his mailbox asking him to step int Doctor Smithton's office sometime during the day. He tried to tell himself that it wa about Friday's assignment for the art-appreciation course or about the three students who had been absent from the examination in Renaissance painting. But even while he busied himself collecting reasons why Doctor Smithton should want to see him he knew, just as he had known before, what Doctor Smithton was going to tell him. Three of his students passed him on the way to the office and he tried to look unconcerned as he greeted them.

Doctor Smithton was all smiles in his mild, unobtrusive way, and it seemed an

(Continued on Page 168)

"Maybe I like it. How much did it cost?"

So many reasons why you'll want this new

FRIGIDAIRE ELECTRIC RANGE

SO FAST! Surface units start heating instantly. Oven reaches baking heat in 5½ minutes.

SO CLEAN! No smoke or soot to dirty pots or pans—or walls. All-porcelain finish, inside and out.

SO EASY! Automatic time, temperature signals. Clock control cooks oven meal while you're away.

SO SURE! Radiantube Surface Units have definite cooking heats—no guesswork. Big Even-Heat Oven.

SO THRIFTY! Oven roasts, bakes with part-time current. Thermizer (deep-well) cooks meal for 2¢ or less.

Frigidaire made only by
General Motors

I just saw the new

FRIGIDAIRE COLD-WALL

It was love at sight! So many wonderful things. I knew I'd never remember them all, so I made some quick notes. . .

Why called "Cold-Wall" — because walls are cold . . . have built-in chilling coils. (Scientific reasons why "no moisture-robbing air circulation.") Foods don't dry out . . . never need be covered.

Super-Freezer Chest holds up to 35 pounds of frozen foods. Quickube Trays for instant ice service.

Roomy food compartment — all parts easy to reach . . . 16 shelf arrangements.

For fresh fruits, vegetables — Frigidaire Hydrators . . . glass-topped . . . extra-moist cold keeps everything fresh.

Meter-Miser is simplest cold-making mechanism ever built . . . uses less current than ordinary light bulb.

You're twice as sure with two great names

Frigidaire made only by
General Motors

Listen to "HOLLYWOOD STAR TIME" on CBS.
See newspaper for time and station.

See your Frigidaire Dealer about Frigidaire Electric Ranges, Refrigerators, Home Freezers, Water Heaters, Kitchen Cabinets, Automatic Washers; Commercial Refrigeration, Air Conditioning Equipment. Find name in Classified Phone Directory. Frigidaire Division, General Motors Corp., Dayton, O. Leaside, Ont.

How to run a home without letting it run you!

One good "feeding" polish job will outlast many quickies, experts say. Apply O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish sparingly, and let it clean, polish, and nourish the wood, all at once. (Many women let this rich polish "feed" into the wood for 15 minutes before polishing. It helps prevent cracking, and gives a super gleam!)

Dust the "dustless" way. Treat a clean, slightly damp cloth with a few drops of O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish. Then dust with straight "gather-in" strokes. The O-Cedar Polish keeps dust from scattering—cleans and polishes at the same time. (Hint: Always dust last, after you've finished your rugs, floors, and tidy-ups.)

Prompt first aid for accidents will save a lot of work later. A quick rub with O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish will often wipe out fresh alcohol rings, water marks, minor scratches. It's one more reason why more homemakers use this all-purpose polish than any other brand. For deeper scratches, use O-Cedar Touch-up.

Genuine O-Cedar

ALL-PURPOSE POLISH

CLEANS – POLISHES – PROTECTS

IF YOU PREFER A CREAM POLISH, say O-Cedar, too! Quick—easy—no rubbing—to make refrigerators, venetian blinds, woodwork and other surfaces gleam! O-Cedar Corp'n, Chicago, Illinois; Toronto, Canada.

O-CEDAR—"THE GREATEST HELP IN HOUSEKEEPING"

(Continued from Page 166)

hour before he came to the point, though it was only a minute or two. "A dreadful thing to have happened," he said, shaking his head and wiping the smile off his face. "I suppose we might have known."

Sam murmured something about Konopka and how gratified everyone was when he first came to the campus and Doctor Smithton went on:

"After the publicity has died down we want to continue the work we had in mind for him to do. I think it would be to our advantage to go ahead quietly with our program and make no attempt to get anyone with a name. I have spoken to President Fuller and he feels as I do: that perhaps now is the logical time to advance one of our own young instructors, one who knows our methods and who can, in his own way, do just as good a job of teaching as someone from another institution."

The preamble continued for a while, then Doctor Smithton smiled and offered Sam an instructorship at $2175 a year.

Sam was conscious of grinning widely, of shaking Doctor Smithton's hand and of greeting once more the three students in the corridor who were returning from their business just as he was returning from his. They passed in the same place as before and smiled a little more broadly.

He was glad that the news would not be out until the day Catharine planned to return. He would meet her at the bus station, but would say nothing until they reached the apartment. They would celebrate. He would have a drink waiting for her and they would eat steaks at the Gateway, and come home afterward to a discussion of where they would move to, and when. And after that they would go to bed. It seemed a long time to wait, but he could help to make it pass quickly by sticking to his painting of Westover Creek.

This pleasant train of thinking bore him over the tedium of cooking his own supper and eating it by himself. After washing the dishes he decided to call Mrs. Cornish and ask whether it would be convenient if he came over for an hour or so. She seemed to welcome his offer, and a little after eight o'clock he started out in the snow, which was falling thickly now.

THEY talked in platitudes of how good it was to see each other, of how long it had been, of how busy they had been what with one thing and another, and Mrs. Cornish seated him beside her in front of the fire. Jenny sat to one side and was rather quiet.

How pretty she was in her piquant, unusual way, with the firelight shining on one side of her face and a flickering shadow on the other. It was Jenny's simplicity that made her attractive. When she was lively and excited she was like a child, but in repose there was a dignity and restfulness about her that made her seem almost ageless.

Jenny looked so calm. Sam wondered if in a year's time Catharine would look as calm. Repose gave beauty to a face, and lately there had been little repose in Catharine's face or body. He supposed that no woman looked forward to childbirth itself with eagerness and that many dreaded it. Somehow he felt that everything came more easily to Jenny than to Catharine.

They spoke of Catharine because she was not there and they all agreed that it would do her a world of good to have this brief vacation.

Sam felt pleased at having thought of it, and then, unable to keep it any longer, he swore them to secrecy and told them about the job. They congratulated him. Sam glowed under their approval and Mrs. Cornish said it was a pity he came so seldom. As soon as Catharine returned they must both come. Would they? Sam said that they would and presently he rose to go. It required an effort to leave the cozy, handsomely furnished room for the lonely little apartment on the other side of town. But he had pleasant thoughts to cheer him as he walked, and the softness and the mutedness of the roads were somehow conducive to hugging these thoughts to himself.

Don't be a Rubbit!

Don't rub a messy oatmeal pot with a flabby dishrag! Give that gooey pot a quick Brillo workout! Easy! Fast!

Be BRILLO wise!

Faster'n a wink, Brillo cleans gummy pots! A square metal-fiber Brillo pad licks off crust! Use Brillo every day. The special shine ingredient in Brillo soap keeps pans sparkling!

GREEN box—soap & pads

RED box—soap pads

Shines aluminum fast!

HERE IT IS! THE NEW PIOMAR Iron the automatic iron with the one year GUARANTEE

9 BIG FEATURES

• "Second to None" guarantee with each iron • 5-way automatic control • weighs 4½ pounds—not too heavy, not too light, but just right • even heating over entire ironing surface • tip-up heel plate • modern streamlined design • molded handle stays cool • built-in 7-foot cord • evenly distributed heat ranges up to 1000 watts.

PIONEER PRODUCTS, INC.

MAIN OFFICE 5224 FAIRLAWN AVE BALTIMORE 15 MD.

Electric ROTO-ROOTER Razor-Kleens SEWERS AND DRAINS

At the First Sign of Trouble

Call YOUR LOCAL ROTO-ROOTER MAN

BETTER, FASTER, SERVICE FOR LESS

FREE Sewer and Drain Handbook showing causes of stoppages and how Roto-Rooter removes them. Write for your free copy . . . we'll also send the name of your local Roto-Rooter Operator.

ROTO-ROOTER CORP.

Dept. 747 Des Moines 14, Iowa

KLIPS EASIER, FASTER

NEW Doo-Klip

GRASS SHEARS – LAWN TOOLS

HEDGE SHEAR

Non-slip rubber grips absorb cutting shocks!
Spring-tension washer and inner lubrication make for fastest, easy clipping action.
PRICE $4.50
Escalloped edges on both blades speed cutting ... hold twigs firm, prevent bunching.
WEIGHT IS BALANCED SO ARMS WON'T TIRE

Other Doo-Klip Tools

LONG-HANDLE GRASS SHEAR $3.00

STANDARD GRASS SHEAR $1.75

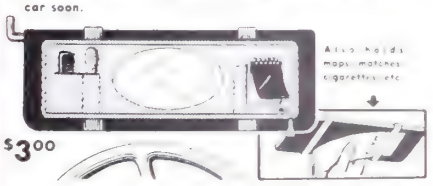
All Doo-Klip Shears have self-adjusting rust-proof blades and pinch-proof grips.

Buy Doo-Klips from your favorite hardware dealer. Or send your order with check to us.

LEWIS ENGINEERING & MANUFACTURING CO.
DEPT. P, ALLIANCE, OHIO

YOU'LL WANT THIS UNIQUE PHOTO VISOR VANITY FOR YOUR CAR!

A miracle of convenience! Designed for women . . . appreciated and constantly used by men. Install one in YOUR car soon.



Easily installed . . . simply slide on the sun visor of your car. Contains good sized Mirror, Comb, Fingernail File, Notebook and Pencil. Fits ALL autos. Genuine heavy grade Leatherette. If your dealer cannot supply you, send check or money order. We pay postage. Only $3.00 complete.

INTERNATIONAL MFG. CO.
712 BEACON STREET · BOSTON, MASS.

REPAIR DAMAGED TOILET SEATS with Plastic Wood

EASY! No skill required. Handles like putty . . . and hardens into wood.

WON'T CHIP OR CRACK

PLASTIC WOOD

A CELLULOSE FIBRE FILLER

KVP Shelf PAPER

The apartment felt very lonely without Catharine, and he took off his clothes slowly and thoughtfully. Gay curtains, plenty of room for the youngster to play, window boxes and a flower bed for Catharine, and the unflaunting vegetable plot for himself! Friends would drop in on them, and instead of the hot little apartment, there would be a cool porch where they could all drink coffee on summer evenings. Jenny would come with Mrs. Cornish and they would get to know her better. The poor girl seemed lonely and strange now. Lonely was how Sam felt now, this first night without Catharine. Jenny must feel like this every night.

The bus from Henrichs was an hour late, and when it came it splashed muddy slush from its wheels. A dozen nondescript people stepped from the bus and gathered at the rear for their suitcases. Then Catharine stepped out and came to him. He could feel the softness of her body through her black winter coat, and it made him tingle with pleasurable excitement. His voice trembled a little as he spoke the commonplaces he used as substitutes for what he wished he could say:

"Did you have a good rest? How are the folks?"

Catharine answered him with similar commonplaces, but she was smiling as he took up her suitcase with one hand and seized her arm with the other.

"Anyone from town on the bus?" he asked casually.

"Not a soul I knew," said Catharine.

He squeezed her arm and they trudged across the street. The South Side bus station

One of the good things that come of a true marriage is that there is one face in which changes come without your seeing them; or rather there is one face which you can still see the same, through all the shadows which have gathered upon it.

—G. MACDONALD: The Golden Treasury of the World's Wit and Wisdom, Edited by Norman Lockridge (Black Hawk Press).

was only four blocks from Collins Street and it was unlikely that they would meet anyone who would spoil everything by congratulating him before he had a chance to tell Catharine. Sam was nearly choking with pride and excitement as he opened the door and let her pass him in the hallway.

"Look over here!" said Sam, enjoying the elaboration of his surprise for her. Catharine looked at the gin bottle and her face darkened for a moment. "Yes, I've been extravagant," said Sam. "Scold me."

She drew her breath sharply and Sam did not quite understand why her face, smooth and rested after her holiday, was suddenly pinched and strained again. Poor kid, he thought. Just buying a bottle of liquor starts her counting her pennies again! Well, there'll soon be an end to that. She let out her breath and tried to smile.

"It's a celebration," she said.

Sam walked over to her and held her by the shoulders. "I got my job, honey," he said, "I got my job."

Catharine's eyes widened, and for a moment she seemed to be struggling with her rising emotions, not knowing whether to laugh or cry. "Sam, darling!" came out in a high, excited voice, and she pressed her face against his chest.

He could feel his heart beating not more than a few inches from where she sobbed and breathed and made strange little inarticulate noises. He felt especially protective at such moments because Catharine was usually so poised and controlled. Now and again a fellow likes to feel himself a pillar of strength.

Catharine withdrew and looked up at him. She was smiling now and more controlled, but for all her attempts at quiet dignity he could sense her suppressed excitement and he loved her for it.

(Continued on Page 174)

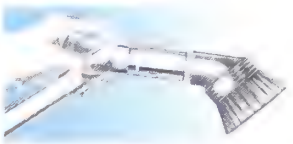
Apex Cleaners

ARE BUILT TO GET THE DIRT

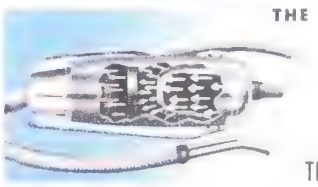
An abundance of time-saving, energy-saving convenience is yours when you buy a new, top-quality Apex home cleaner. But most important is the wonderfully thorough way your Apex cleaner will remove dirt from rugs, upholstery, drapes and other furnishings...help you to enjoy the satisfaction of a really clean home. And—after all—isn't this what you really want?

APEX "WIND TUNNEL" ACTION—powerful straight-flow sealed suction combines with motor-driven forward-revolving brush for effective cleaning of even deep-nap carpets. Special low-speed is ideal for cleaning small "throw" rugs.

"LOCK-TIGHT" CONSTRUCTION of Apex home cleaning tools is so simple that a child can put tool together, yet so secure that they will not come apart in use. New-design Apex tools will help speed you through cellar-to-attic cleaning.



EXCLUSIVE APEX SWIVEL ADAPTER enables every home cleaning tool to swivel or turn in all directions, for maximum convenience in cleaning upholstery, crevices and other hard-to-reach places.



THE CYCLONIC SUCTION of today's new Apex cylinder-type cleaner relentlessly pulls in dirt, deposits it in easy-to-remove dust bag. Ask your Apex dealer to show you the many ways Apex cleaners will help you do a sparkling home cleaning job.

THE APEX ELECTRICAL MANUFACTURING CO. • CLEVELAND 10, O.

The Peak of Quality

FOR MORE THAN THIRTY YEARS

Apex

IRONERS

WASHERS

SOON...NEW AUTOMATIC WASHER

Two . . . in a world of music . . .

two . . . in a world of their own . . .
two who have discovered each other . . . for keeps!
For Keeps, too — through all their days — the two will treasure the sparkling, hospitality-inviting beauty of their gracious Community.
Here's silverware of great distinction,
in good taste for any home,
classic in line, fine-balanced, true-proportioned.
A thoughtful overlay of extra solid silver gives lifetime protection where there's wear.
You'll find Community dinner services for eight places, pleasantly priced to fit your budget.

Community

THE FINEST SILVERPLATE

*CORONATION

*LADY HAMILTON

*MILADY

If it's Community . . . it's correct

* TRADE MARKS OF ONEIDA LTD. COPYRIGHT 1941

(Continued from Page 169)

'It's lovely, Sam. I'm so pleased and ud of you."

'I knew it would be a relief to you."

'Why didn't you call me? Or wire me?"

'I wanted to see your face light up—here, ere we longed for it so much. It nearly st me to keep it from you at the bus tion, but I held together."

Catharine was actually trembling with itement. Sam led her to the buff chair d she sat down and looked at him. "Everyng will be wonderful after this, won't it?" said.

He supposed that she was so tensed with asure and excitement that she could not herself go. That was how Catharine was. e tightened up and nothing could make let go of herself.

'Now we'll have a Martini," he said, sying himself at the table and letting tharine uncoil at her leisure. He must ve her alone and not try to push against nature. The drinks and dinner at the teway and a long evening together would ax and mellow her.

Just as they were about to sip their drinks doorbell rang and Sam went to answer it. 'ou can take over tomorrow," he said. t's still holidaytime you."

It was a woman Sam ly half knew at the or. For a moment he istered, hoping that would remember o she was, but nothg came.

"I've only brought u a parcel, sir," the man said as she en- ed the living room. Then Sam remembered who she must be. Mrs. Walsh is Profes- Maxwell's housekeeper," he said to atharine, who had en and was standing front of her chair. Mrs. Walsh, this is y wife."

"How do you do?" id Catharine.

"How do you do?" plied Mrs. Walsh, id added, "We've met fore, haven't we?"

"Oh, have you?" id Sam. Probably atharine had met her downtown or seen r helping at some function or other. "Sit wn, Mrs. Walsh," invited Sam.

"It's just some of these I have to give u," said Mrs. Walsh.

"Make yourself comfortable for a minute two," said Sam.

"Well, maybe I will take the load off my et," said Mrs. Walsh, sitting down and gging at the string. "I have some things re for other people, too—borrowed things all these are for you."

Sam took the prints and a box of slides id stood awkwardly with them. Catharine t down and took up her glass. "Thank u," Sam said. "It was good of you to ing them. I could easily have called." Mrs. Walsh looked as if she were going to ake her excuses and go, but instead she miled at Catharine and said, "Remember iat afternoon you called, Mrs. Forester?"

IT WAS a surprise to Sam that Catharine ad ever called on Konopka, and it was clear iat Catharine found the revelation a disgreeable one.

"I don't know whether he told you," Mrs. Walsh went on, "but three ladies—Mrs. orkas was one of them—had been in with ings to give him, and I had to go to Mrs. bendorf's the same afternoon to fetch some lueberry muffins for him. That's the sort of an he was."

"Everyone liked him," said Sam.

"It's going to be a great loss to the uniersity," lamented Mrs. Walsh. "There's obody who can quite take his place, is here?"

"That would be difficult," said Sam, and when Mrs. Walsh was not looking he winked at Catharine. It ran through his thoughts that it bothered her to have Mrs. Walsh tell something she must have wanted to keep hidden, but what did it matter?

"In Creston of all places," said Mrs. Walsh. "You'd think a man could find peace and quietness and safety in Creston, wouldn't you?" She creaked to a standing position. "What is the world coming to is what my brother says, and I think he's right."

WITH this remark Mrs. Walsh made her departure and Sam came back into the room. He could feel Catharine bracing herself for his question and it disturbed him that she thought it important enough to worry about. It was secretive and a little silly of her not to tell him, but if that was the way she felt! There was nothing serious in it.

Sam said, "I didn't know you knew her."

"I don't," said Catharine. "I just saw her once. That's all."

"You went to the house, then?"

"Just that once—yes."

"You never told me." There was no hint of reproof in his voice, but he tried to convey the idea that if she had told him at the time they would not be having this foolish and embarrassing discussion now.

"There was nothing to tell," said Catharine. "It was just a casual visit. Everyone else was doing the same."

"Was it curiosity?"

"Partly that, I suppose," she admitted.

"Why did you hide it from me?"

"I wasn't hiding it." She stressed "hiding" as if she despised the word. "I just didn't think it worth while telling you," she explained.

"But why?" persisted Sam. "What harm was there in it?"

"I had no special reason."

"Were you ashamed of going to his house?"

"Of course not." She looked up and faced him. "Yes, I suppose I was ashamed," she said frankly. "He was a foreigner and all the women in town were making a fuss over him. I guess I'm just as silly as the rest of them." Her assumed frankness was not entirely convincing.

"You can't fool me," said Sam. "You're not silly. You never were. You never made any stupid fuss over a foreigner, especially one you took a dislike to from the first."

"I didn't," protested Catharine, and then remembered.

"You disliked him before you saw him. He was taking our job away from us, you said. I'll never forget the night of his concert, either." This last was a cruel jab, but she had asked for it. There were times when a fellow could be too gentle. "Did you go with someone or alone?"

"I went alone." Catharine surprised him by not fighting back. Her eyes looked as if they were about to brim over with tears. "I shouldn't have done it. I felt ashamed afterward and I didn't want you to know I'd been so foolish."

It was so unlike Catharine to be meek and apologetic that Sam had the notion that she was still lying to him. It irritated him that she thought he was foolish enough to be deceived by a third-rate display of histrionics.

"I still don't think you're telling me the truth," he said.

"But I am. I am. What can I say to prove it to you?"

"You've done things before you've been ashamed of," said Sam, "but you always saw the funny side. If you did as harmless a thing as go to see Konopka and take him a

"Remember this," wrote Marcus Aurelius, "that very little is needed to make a happy home."

Any home can be happy, if—

1. The husband will avoid faultfinding.
2. The wife will avoid faultfinding.
3. The parents will respect the right of their children.
4. The children will respect the right of their parents.
5. Everyone will speak in a soft voice.
6. The husband will appear for dinner on time.
7. The wife will serve dinner on time.
8. Each will do his duties cheerfully and promptly.
9. Nobody will abuse his telephone, bathroom, automobile or radio privileges.

We trust the foregoing proves how "very little is needed to make a happy home."

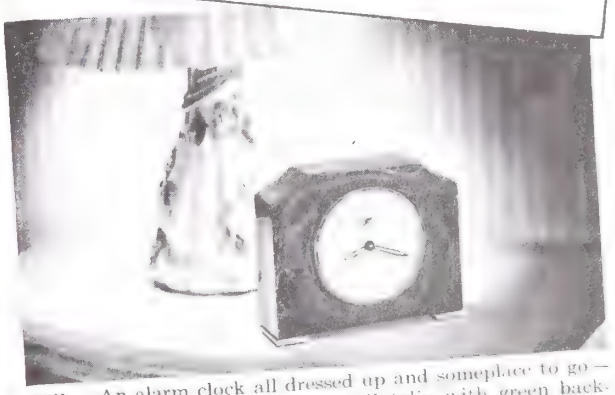
Through The Meshes; Volume 38, Number 6; The W. S. Tyler Company.

At the heart of your home...

"THE FINEST NAME IN CLOCKS"

CAPSTAN . . . For a house—or a room with a nautical air! The Seth Thomas Capstan has a case and ship's wheel circles of solid mahogany—spokes and sash shine golden bright. It's an electric! $12.50 (tax extra).

SHARON . . . A clock as Early American as soft candlelight and pewter—it belongs on your mantel! Sturdy birch cabinet in mahogany finish. Strikes hours and half hours. Electric or spring-wound. $35.00 (tax extra).



PAM . . . An alarm clock all dressed up and someplace to go—your bedroom! Encased in solid Catalin with green background and marble-like veins of green and white. Luminous dial. Spring-wound. $8.50 (tax extra).

Seth Thomas

"The finest name in clocks"

ELECTRIC OR SPRING-WOUND

A product of GENERAL TIME Instruments Corporation

"I protect my vegetables
DOES YOUR GROCER?"

CRUSHED ICE
KEEPS VEGETABLES
GARDEN-FRESH, VITAMIN-RICH!

It is a startling fact that most of our favorite vegetables lose vitamins at an alarming rate while they are in the store—unless they are constantly protected with ice.

Let this fact—established by extensive scientific research—be your guide to more satisfactory marketing and better meals.

Don't waste good money on wilted, dried out, vitamin-starved vegetables. For the sake of your family's health, buy only at progressive stores where vegetables are given modern protection with pure, sparkling crushed ice.

Such stores are making sure that their customers get their money's worth in garden-freshness, flavor and nutrition.

Drop a postcard today for your FREE copy of "Nature's Treasury of Health"—it will help you plan vitamin-rich meals. No obligation.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ICE INDUSTRIES, 1706 L Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

"Snow" ice, blown all around the crates, protects vegetables as they travel in refrigerator cars or trucks . .

Reaching the modern market, they are placed on iced displays to keep them garden-fresh and vitamin-rich . .

And in the home, the modern ICE refrigerator gives vegetables and other foods complete, scientific protection.

box of cookies or something, you'd have laughed at it a week later. What's behind it all?"

"Nothing—except that I ——" Catharine's voice broke a little. Then she gained control of it and went on. "Oh, what difference does it make that my sense of humor wasn't working? With the baby coming and all our anxiety, I haven't taken anything as a joke in the last three months."

Her reference to anxiety suddenly made Sam think of what she could have said to Konopka if, as she claimed, her sense of humor had gone and she was desperate with worry.

"What did you talk to him about?" he asked, trying to sound casual.

"About the usual things," said Catharine. "Creston—his background—painting."

"There's nothing to be ashamed of in that," said Sam. "What else?"

"Nothing that I remember."

Sam waited a moment and Catharine looked at him frankly. "You went alone," he said sharply. "When was it?"

Catharine looked vague. "I don't clearly remember," she said, as if the visit had not occupied an important place in her mind.

"Was it just a few days before he died?"

"No," said Catharine quickly. "It was when he was here before."

"Two days before he died I mentioned you to him. I told him I'd like him to meet you. That must have been after he'd already met you, unless you met him the very day before he was poisoned or ——"

"No," interrupted Catharine. "No, I didn't." Then, as if she were afraid she had sounded too excited, she took up her glass and drank a little.

Sam watched her hand and he saw that it shook. "Why did you ask him not to tell me that you'd called on him?"

Catharine opened her hands with a little gesture of defeat. "Did he tell you?"

"No, but isn't it obvious?"

"Sam, I'll tell you everything."

"That's better."

He sat back and listened to her confession. Why did it have to happen this afternoon, when he had wanted everything to be gay? Humiliation overwhelmed him as he listened to her. She had gone to him with a sob story. Konopka, of all people! They would never know what troubles he had suffered before he came to Creston. Why couldn't she have left the man alone?

Catharine began to sob a little as she went on with her story, and her tears only angered him.

"Don't you realize what you've done?" he stormed. "If I thought for one moment that he told anyone what you said I'd leave Creston."

"He didn't tell. I'm sure he didn't tell anyone."

"No," said Sam, "if he said he wouldn't, he didn't. You could trust him."

CATHARINE leaned forward eagerly. "No one knows, Sam. No one knows what I said to him."

Sam wondered a moment. It seemed an awful thing to admit, but he was glad Konopka was dead. He looked at Catharine and his anger gave way to a great pity. It was partly his own fault. He had been spending too many evenings away from home and the girl was lonely and worried. It was all very well for him to have his mind on his work but even his work had its place.

"Let's say no more about it. Let's put it out of our minds," he said, getting out of his chair and taking her glass. "Let me give you another."

"No. No more, thanks," said Catharine but the relief in her eyes reassured him.

"Let's get back to celebrating. It's time to go to the Gateway."

The clock of the church in the next block began to strike six. The dismalness of the day outside, Catharine's silence and the dull clanging brought back to his mind with startling clarity the day he had stayed at home with a cold.

THE week before Christmas was unusually cold for Creston and no more snow fell to cover the grayish packed ice and the speckled snow that was hard and thick on the streets. The traffic lanes were clear, but the sides of Main Street were heaped and across the dirty heaps were passageways of frozen foot prints. Wreaths of great red ribbons hung on the lamp standards and at the main intersection, festoons were arranged from building to building and every store had something festive in its windows.

Jenny enjoyed Christmas shopping. The country and its customs were still new to her, and there were so many things in the stores which she never saw at home that she had more energy and enthusiasm for her tasks than any Crestonian.

It was in the book store that she met Jake Small. He called her over to help him choose books for his grandchildren. His attitude was so different from Mrs. Cornish's that Jenny was delighted and she carefully chose three books for him and they chatted while they waited for the salesgirl to attend to them.

"And now," said Jake Small, "you are coming across the street to have coffee with me. Or, if you must be insular—tea."

Jenny accepted the invitation readily. They found a table tucked their parcels under their chairs, and settled down to chat. It was not long before they were talking about Konopka, and Jenny found a great relief in telling him that she had been to tea with Konopka a week before the dreadful day of fog. She said nothing about the second Wednesday or the telephone call.

Professor Small cocked his head on one side and looked at Jenny thoughtfully. It was a mannerism she remembered from the day she first met him. "I saw Sam Forester a week or two ago," he said. "He was on his way out to your place."

"That must have been the evening he came when Catharine was visiting her parents."

"It was snowing. I remember that."

"It was a lovely night—everything soft and white. I remember how happy Mrs. Cornish was to see Sam. She's very fond of him, you know. He was Roger's best friend."

"Sam is a fine young fellow. What do you think of his wife?"

The question came so abruptly that Jenny was startled into a moment's pause.

"You don't have to tell me if you don't want to," said Jake.

"I don't feel I know her," said Jenny. "I don't feel I know the first thing about her."

"That's interesting," said Jake. "I've known her slightly ever since she came

VERBAL LAPSES

Most of the classic examples are attached to Doctor Spooner, the Oxford don famed for putting the cart before the horse in his speech. How he delighted to ride "a well-boiled icycle"; how he carried "two rags and a bug" with him on train journeys; how he greeted the servant when he called on the Dean of Christ Church with the remark, "Is the bean dizzy?"; how at the station refreshment room he demanded a "bath of milk and a glass bun"; how when visiting a friend who had built a country cottage, he congratulated him "on the nosey little cook he had secured"; how when accosted by the verger while searching the aisle of the church he explained his actions by saying he was looking for a "glutton dropt from above"; and so on. It was Doctor Spooner who asked the congregation to sing with him "From Iceland's Greasy Mountains"; and who referred to the "tearful chidings" of the evangelist. To the goodly company of which he is head belongs the curate who informed an astonished congregation that "Rabaras was a bobber"; the vicar who in a funeral sermon described a confrere as one who had been a "shoving leopard" to his flock; the archdeacon who hoped that the congregation would be filled with "fresh veal and new zigor."

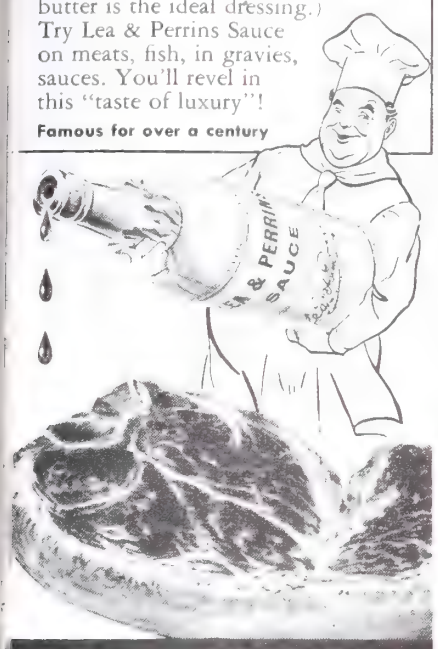
—Manchester Guardian

STEAK TIP

MAKES STEAK ZESTIER EATING!

Porterhouse or top round—the flavor's twice as rich when you add Lea & Perrins Sauce! (One part L. & P. to 3 parts melted butter is the ideal dressing.) Try Lea & Perrins Sauce on meats, fish, in gravies, sauces. You'll revel in this "taste of luxury"!

Famous for over a century



LEA & PERRINS Sauce
THE ORIGINAL WORCESTERSHIRE

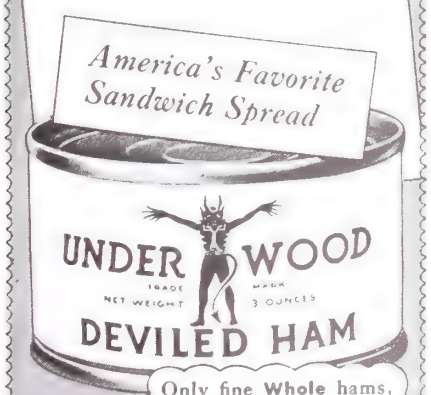
FREE Recipe Book. Write Lea & Perrins, Inc., 241 West St., New York 13, Dept. L4.

Quick! Easy! Delicious!

UNDERWOOD DEVILED HAM

with Scrambled Eggs

Scramble the desired number of eggs in your favorite manner and just before they are done, mix in the contents of a can of UNDERWOOD DEVILED HAM.



Only fine Whole hams, minced and blended with rare spices, are used in UNDERWOOD DEVILED HAM... a nutritious food ingredient that gives superb flavor to sandwiches, rarebits, croquettes and sauces. Keep several cans on hand!

Creston as a high-school freshman, and I never could make her out. There seems to be a tremendous drive about her. I was watching her the other day, that day there was the thick fog. She was on my bus and she got off ahead of me. She was walking very fast, as if she was late for something."

Jenny, reminded of that afternoon, stiffened a little, but Jake seemed not to notice. He went on:

"Her purposefulness interested me. I wondered what social engagement was so important that she had to put her head down and hurry the way she did. At first I thought she was going to your house, but she went along Pine instead."

"She knows quite a few people in the Triangle," said Jenny, but as she said it, although it seemed the most natural thing in the world for Catharine to be visiting along Pine Street, a strangely uncomfortable feeling possessed her and all through tea she could not get rid of it. The very faintest curiosity was aroused in her. Where was Catharine going in such a hurry that foggy afternoon? The day was associated in her mind with such gloom and terror that she found it hard to contemplate a pleasant and ordinary social call. And yet it was precisely a call of this kind that she herself had intended to make. Again she felt the horror that crept close to her whenever she thought of her contact with the house in which Konopka lay dead.

Jake began to ask her questions about Welsh songs, and with an effort Jenny thrust the unpleasant thoughts aside and chatted with him. They went home on the bus together and separated at the Pine Street crossing.

Jenny thought once or twice in the next few days of what Jake had said about Catharine, and each time her uneasiness grew easier to dismiss until Christmas Eve, when Sam and Catharine called at the Cornish house with a toy dog for Roger. There was no Christmas party this year, but all Mrs. Cornish's friends were calling on her, most of them with gifts, and all were brought into the living room to sit before the fire.

All four of them went upstairs to observe Roger's reaction to the dog. He liked it immediately and hugged it. Sam and Catharine looked pleased and Jenny laughed aloud. Ellen came upstairs to call Mrs. Cornish to the telephone and the others stayed in the nursery. Sam sat on the floor and put his hand between the bars of the crib. Every now and then he would make the dog jump and Roger was delighted with the proceedings.

They talked of Sam's new job and of the house Sam and Catharine were going to live in. Jenny was conscious of a certain eagerness and excitement in Sam, but Catharine looked tired. She did not mean to mention Konopka, but it seemed to her poorer tact to avoid his name when everyone knew that Sam was taking his place at the university.

"You knew him fairly well, didn't you?" asked Sam.

"I went to the house once or twice to practice for the concert," said Jenny.

Catharine laughed suddenly as Roger hugged the dog so high that it stuck between the back of his neck and the headboard of the crib. "Isn't he funny? I love to watch them."

"Everybody's pretty sure now," said Sam, picking up the conversation again. "It was a carefully planned job. They couldn't have planned the fog—they're too rare in these parts—but I guess the opportunity was too good to miss. People stay home in weather like that."

Jenny glanced at Catharine, who, unless Jake had mistaken someone else for her, was visiting that Wednesday afternoon in spite of the weather. "Not everyone," said Jenny. "Most people had their work as usual and I dare say some went visiting their friends, fog or no fog."

"It cleared the streets," insisted Sam. "People didn't go out that day unless they had to."

"Did you two stay at home?" asked Jenny directly.

NOW! Pour this golden health-giving California Orange Juice with the Tree-Ripe
Flavor!
Real
Gold
Pure California
VALENCIA
ORANGE JUICE
Pure..unsweetened juice from finest
California Valencia
Oranges
Imagine! Just punch open a can and get delicious orange juice the very same color and flavor as juice squeezed from fresh fruit! Yes, now it's easy. Real Gold Orange Juice is packed by the growers themselves from tree-ripe Valencias — the finest, sweetest oranges produced in sunny California. What's more — these oranges are the richest in precious, health-giving Vitamin C. Buy several cans of Real Gold Orange Juice today. Keep them chilled — ready to serve instantly. Saves you money, time, effort! And how the family will love it every day!
OTHER MONEY SAVERS!
Try Real Gold Pure Lemon Juice, and Real Gold Orange Base.
FREE! "Uses For Juices" — a colorful booklet with 100 exciting new juice recipes. Write: Southern California Citrus Foods, Redlands, California.
Real Gold
Pure California
ORANGE JUICE
PACKED FOR YOU BY THE GROWERS THEMSELVES

Never has a coffee offered all this!

1. Finer flavor—or your money back! "That Borden flavor is right out of this world" is the way some folks describe it. We'll just say this: If you don't like Borden's better than any coffee you ever tasted—ground or instant—we'll give you your money back!*

2. Magic convenience—no pot, no grounds! You hardly have to lift a hand to make a cup of Borden's. Just drop ½ to ¾ of a level teaspoonful in a cup, add hot water. No pot to wash. No grounds. No waste. That's why Borden's is perfect for breakfast.

3. And, half again as many cups! Most users tell us they get half again as many cups from a regular jar of Borden's as are usually obtained from a pound of ground coffee. Remember Borden's isn't half coffee. It's all coffee—no dextrins, dextrose, or maltose added. That's why it goes so far.

HOW ELSE COULD YOU GET ALL THIS IN A COFFEE? WHY NOT SERVE BORDEN'S EVERY MEAL, EVERY DAY?
100% PURE COFFEE
Borden's INSTANT COFFEE
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
© THE BORDEN CO.

*Use at least half a jar of Borden's. Then, if you don't agree it tastes better than any coffee you ever used, send us the jar with the unused contents, and we'll refund your money. The Borden Co., 350 Madison Ave., N.Y. 17, N.Y.

"Sure," said Sam. "I didn't even go to classes."

"Sam was sick in bed and I stayed in and looked after him," said Catharine.

They both looked at her because until then she had seemed oblivious of them. Two thoughts spun oddly in Jenny's mind. Catharine had been listening to every word, even though she had seemed to be watching Roger with all her attention. And how was it possible that Catharine had looked after Sam when Jake had seen her in the Triangle?

"Didn't you go out at all?"

Catharine looked at her calmly. "I went to get some lemons for Sam's cold."

Jenny let the statement alone. She could have queried it. She could have wondered aloud why Catharine chose to go two miles for lemons to a suburb instead of two blocks to Schirer's. It was not worth it. If Catharine had reasons for visiting the Triangle without telling Sam, that was her business. But Sam was hardly so naïve as to accept the lemon story for a trip that, when the weather was clear, took three quarters of an hour without counting the length of time she must have stayed where she visited. Jenny was almost certain now that Jake Small had been wrong. He was probably nearsighted. And yet the uneasiness rose up in her again, and to quell it she suggested that they go downstairs.

At the foot of the stairs Ellen was showing Mrs. Patten and her daughter Caroline in, and Mrs. Cornish was coming out of the living room with an outstretched hand and a welcoming smile.

It seemed to Jenny as if Catharine drew back sharply when Caroline sat down. It was only a momentary withdrawal, but Jenny noticed it and so did Caroline, who looked at Catharine doubtfully and flushed a little. The look on Catharine's face arrested Jenny. For a moment so brief that it was scarcely perceptible Jenny saw unmistakably a look of fear.

She chatted with Caroline, hoping to restore the child's confidence and ease, but a part of her thinking was still concerned with the infinitesimal fear she had discovered in Catharine. Presently Catharine entered the conversation with animation, as if she were eager to be friendly, but it was clear that Caroline was not ready to forgive her.

It was just as Catharine was preparing to go that a startling thought occurred to Jenny. She cast it out, but it returned again and yet again with increasing force as she watched Catharine leaning forward to kiss Mrs. Cornish good-by. Jenny remembered now that Caroline was the girl who had spoken of seeing a woman come out of the Konopka house on the Wednesday afternoon she would never forget. And there was only one woman who had reason to fear to meet Caroline. Jenny thought of what Jake Small had said and added it to the testimony Catharine herself had unwittingly given as Caroline seated herself in front of them.

"Good-by," Catharine called as she went out toward the front door.

Jenny looked at Caroline, but there was not a flicker of recognition or recollection on the stolid round face. Then she went back over what Sam had said about that Wednesday afternoon and of Catharine's story of the lemons.

Jenny began to see a path of action, not entirely a clear one, but at least a continuous one, and the more she considered the evidence the more certain she was that Catharine was the woman who went to Konopka's house that afternoon.

And now it began to dawn on her how Catharine must have suffered since that day. Like herself, Catharine had been caught in the meshes of this dreadful thing, but caught more deeply and more dangerously. She could even fear a little, too, for herself. Just as she had concealed her visits to the house, so Catharine had been concealing too. Doubtless she had as good reasons for being secretive as Jenny herself, but Jenny could not help wondering what Catharine was doing at Konopka's that afternoon.

The Pattens rose to go and Jenny was left with Mrs. Cornish. She began to think that

Home Made Lemon Pie that's My-T-Fine
For a special treat, delight your family with a luscious lemon pie made with My-T-Fine Lemon Pie Filling. So quick and easy . . . just follow the simple directions on the package. They'll love it!
5 delicious My-T-Fine desserts
Lemon Pie Filling
Chocolate
Butterscotch
Vanilla
Nut Chocolate
MY-T-FINE
LEMON
MY-T-FINE
LEMON PIE FILLING

MONEY QUICK
Sell GREETING CARDS AND PERSONAL STATIONERY
FREE SAMPLES PERSONAL STATIONERY
ELMIRA GREETING CARD CO., Dept. M-216, Elmira, N.Y.

perhaps her own anxiety was making her imagine fantastic things.

"Did you notice anything odd about Catharine this afternoon?" she asked.

"No, I can't say that I did," said Mrs. Cornish. "Why?"

"I don't know," replied Jenny.

"I think she's pleased and excited about Sam's job," said Mrs. Cornish. "But who wouldn't be?"

"I suppose that's it," said Jenny.

It was one of those brilliant January days with a flaunting sun and a crusty whiteness of freshly fallen snow to dazzle the eyes. Jenny longed to walk, and after lunch she asked Mrs. Cornish whether she would mind looking after Roger. She said, "Of course not, dear." Jenny changed into her warmest clothes and went out the back way so that she might pass between the Douglas firs and take a short cut to Chestnut Avenue. She glanced back once at Roger's nursery window and her breath steamed deliciously in the cold air. What fun they could all have had if the other Roger had come home! She thought of Roger a great deal of the time, not mournfully or sentimentally, but as a precious thing which had been taken away from her. She thought of him more on joyful days than on depressing ones, and she judged that this must be because all that was joyful in her life she owed to him.

She walked for two hours and then turned north toward the highway where she knew she could get an approximation of tea. Tea alone was not as comforting as tea with someone you liked, but hot tea was good on a cold day and she recollected dozens of teas and friends and comforts and surrounded her lonely half hour in the Turkey Dinner Tavern with them. Then she walked home the same way, and in some places she mechanically put her feet in her own outward footprints. She found herself going back between the Douglas firs and toward the back door.

The hallway seemed as dark as a tunnel after the blinding snow of the roads and the roofs, and the house was silent except for a muffled noise that came from the direction of the living room, a noise that sounded like sobbing. Jenny opened her eyes and went into the living room to fling her arms around Mrs. Cornish. It was natural for the older woman, denied the activity of the younger, to grieve aloud occasionally when she was left alone

The figure on the sofa started up as Jenny entered, and Jenny could tell by the briskness of the movement that it was not Mrs. Cornish, and in a moment she saw that it was Catharine. Neither of them had a word to say.

EYES IN THE DARK

Everyone who has driven along country roads at night has had the experience of seeing the eyes of a cat or dog or deer glow like twin coals when struck by the beams of a headlight.

These eyes are equipped with a crystalline layer at the back which functions much like the polished reflector of a locomotive headlight. It reflects the rays that strike it so they pass twice through the lens of the animal's eye. This enables the creature to see dim images with greater distinctness. The glow we perceive is the light sent back from this crystalline layer.

Research in connection with the varying colors with which eyes shine in the dark shows the wide variety of hues to be found . . . the animal world. They range from dull orange to amber, ruby red and brilliant lemon. —Edwin Way Teale.

JENNY was reminded of once before when they had faced each other without words, of the time in this same living room when she had felt drawn into an emptiness where Catharine's eyes looked into her deepest feelings and tried to draw out her secrets. This time it was Catharine who held a secret, and Jenny saw no power in the sharp eyes - only fear again. And now it was Konopka's face that flashed before her vision, and the empty, disappointed feeling she had had when she tried to telephone him that foggy Wednesday came back to her.

Catharine spoke and her voice was tense. Mrs. Cornish had remembered after Jenny's departure that Mrs. Fuller, the president's wife, had asked her to pour tea with her. Mrs. Cornish was put into a flutter and immediately telephoned Catharine to look after Roger.

As Jenny watched and listened, the thought of Konopka and the horror of the telephone ringing unanswered in the house pounded through her brain. It was as if she were on the verge of realizing something she had only partly understood before.

She could never forgive herself for what she did then. Instead of saying a word to Catharine, instead of smiling at her or thanking her, Jenny turned and ran upstairs to the nursery. Roger had been asleep, but he awoke as she ran to his crib and looked at him. As he raised his face toward her and smiled, Jenny clutched the white knobs of the crib and then slid to the floor. For the first time in her life she was fainting.

SAM and Catharine chose a house on Marigold Street, two blocks south of the long hill running between the campus and the hollow. It was a fresh and joyous little house, with pale-tinted inside walls, a built-in bookcase, a fireplace that looked as if it might work, an attached garage, gleaming light fixtures, and a kitchen lined with pale green cupboards decorated with oranges and tomatoes. Sam borrowed a vast sum of money, and felt as he did so that he had committed himself to Creston forever and that he would not be free of debt until the hair had departed from his head and the teeth from his gums. It all happened so quickly that they had very little chance to show the new house to their friends before the day came around for them to move.

"We'll have a housewarming party," said Sam. "We'll get the place all fixed up first and then we'll ask all our friends in to admire."

"The house won't hold all our friends," argued Catharine. "Besides, a party's going to cost so much, and with what we owe ——"

"Forget it," said Sam. "A party will be only a drop in the bucket, we owe so much."

They disagreed about some things and they argued hotly, but Sam enjoyed the preparations and he felt that the activity was good for Catharine too.

Their last evening at Foxy's had a feverish quality of excitement, as if they felt that the evidences of moving were so great that they could hardly believe that tomorrow evening would find them actually settled on Marigold Street.

"Are you sure you're putting enough paper around those dishes, dear?" fussed Catharine.

"It's only thirteen blocks," said Sam.

"You can break a set of dishes in thirteen feet."

Sam whistled as he packed dishes and cups and saucers in the last six weeks of the Creston Chronicle, and he thought of the summer with lettuces and radishes and tomatoes in his vegetable garden, cosmos and petunias in Catharine's flower border, and a row of diapers fluttering on the washline.

"When we're through I'll make some coffee," said Catharine.

After this Sam and Catharine packed with greater zest than ever and were almost at the point when they could say with a clear conscience that the packing was finished and only the tidying up to do when the doorbell rang and Charlotte appeared. Sam wel-

Watch 'em eat!
It's eggs and Treet

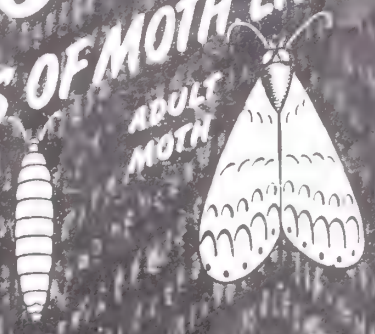
You'll want these in your pantry, too!

The best and nothing but the best is labeled
ARMOUR ★

Expello

KILLS ALL FORMS OF MOTH LIFE!



Expello vapor penetrates every fabric and every fur—every seam and nook in a garment! And Expello is absolutely deadly to all moth life—so you can be sure of its protection the year around. Harmless to human beings and sweet smelling . . . leaves clothes fresh as a breeze after quick airing.

- For Closets—Choose the easy-to-refill Expello Hanger No. 1.
- For Garment Bags—Ask for handy Expello Hanger No. 5.
- For Vacuum Cleaners—Expello Large Crystals are recommended.
- For Chests and Drawers—Select small Expello Crystals.

JUDSON DUNAWAY Corporation

Main Office: Dover, New Hampshire

Also manufacturers of Vanish, the NEW toilet bowl cleanser and deodorant comed her and for a moment he did not notice how serious she looked.

"We've finished the last drink," he said, "and if we hadn't we'd have packed it. But Catharine's going to make some coffee."

"What's the matter?" asked Catharine, and Sam followed her eyes to Charlotte's face.

Charlotte told them. It was about Elsie, the girl who used to work for her, the girl who pretended to be sick and never came back to the Garrity house after the day Jimmy got inside the lab and broke Fred's crucibles. Charlotte had met her in the market and Elsie had behaved shiftily, as indeed any girl pretending to be sick and being caught at the market might behave. Sam wondered why Charlotte made such an elaborate story out of a negligible domestic mishap and was on the point of saying so when Charlotte slowed down her account and said:

"Now this is where it all ties up and makes sense. This morning Fred was checking on his materials and he found more than a fluid ounce of aconitine was missing."

Catharine's hand moved up toward her face and Sam glanced at her, but she was only smoothing her hair.

"You know how methodical Fred is. He never fails to check his materials. He writes down weights and volumes in a little book and he knows he's right."

"Well?" asked Sam.

"It was almost that amount of aconitine that was found in the bottle on Konopka's table."

"Good heavens!"

Charlotte went on to say how she believed that Elsie was in the pay of the men who murdered Konopka, how she must have taken the poison to them or let them into the house to take it themselves. She pointed out that no one else had access to the lab, not a soul, except Catharine herself, when she looked after Jimmy.

Catharine faced them with more defiance than Sam thought necessary. Charlotte was not accusing her. She merely mentioned the fact that, apart from Elsie, the only other person with access to the lab was Catharine herself.

"Have you reported it?" asked Sam.

CHARLOTTE reddened a little and looked embarrassed. Then the truth came out.

Fred had called the police and told them of his discovery. The inspector had come to the lab and asked a number of questions. One of them was who had been in the house, and Catharine's name was mentioned. Another was, assuming that someone in Creston was involved, who in the town stood to gain anything by Konopka's death. And Sam's name had come up. Even if Charlotte and Fred had said nothing about it, the police would have ferreted it out of somebody else, but Charlotte had felt so unhappy about the whole thing that without Fred knowing where she was going she had come over to tell them, so that at least they might be prepared.

Sam was not much troubled by the thought of the police, though he was grateful to Charlotte for preparing them. It was absurd to trace any connection between him and Konopka's poisoning, but it was not going to be comfortable to know that people were linking them in theory and hypothesis, if not in actual suspicion or accusation.

"They've got no right," said Catharine angrily. "Besides, Fred might have made a mistake."

"He didn't. He knows he didn't," said Charlotte.

"Anyone can," Catharine went on. "It isn't fair to drag Sam into a horrible thing like this."

Catharine was badly upset. Sam could see that. Catharine was thinking of the consequences, of what it would do to his reputation, of how they would live it down.

"I've done nothing," said Sam. "The clue won't lead to me."

"Why didn't you tell us first instead of going to the police?" demanded Catharine.

Charlotte looked hurt. "You talk as if you wanted the whole thing hushed up," she

YOU'RE WISE TO CLEAN THE GARBAGE CAN WITH CLOROX!
YES, WHY TAKE CHANCES? CLOROX MAKES IT FRESH, SANITARY!
CLOROX PROVIDES HYGIENIC CLEANSING OF GERM "DANGER ZONES"!
CLOROX

LADIES, watch out for germs! No, you can't see them . . . but they're there! Where? In garbage cans, on drainboards, in sinks, washbasins, on floors, to mention a few home germ "danger zones." Health authorities urge hygienic cleansing to protect family health . . . and Clorox provides hygienic cleansing. To disinfect, deodorize and remove stains, use Clorox in routine cleansing of tile, enamel, porcelain, linoleum, glass, wood surfaces. Directions on the label.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE BLEACH AND HOUSEHOLD DISINFECTANT

CLOROX

FREE FROM CAUSTIC

Years of unsurpassed quality and performance have made Clorox the choice of millions . . . it's always uniform . . . it's always dependable!

BE A HOTEL HOSTESS

ENJOY YOUR WORK! Fascinating Positions in hotels as Hostess, Executive Housekeeper, Manager, Social or Food Director. Grade school education plus Lewis Training qualifies you. Lewis National Placement Service Free of extra charge. One student writes: "Offered three positions by Lewis School, I selected this one as Hostess-Assistant Manager of a famous resort." Write for Free Book. VETERANS: Course approved for Veterans' Training.

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL Sta. LD-501, Washington 7, D. C. 31 yr. SUCCESSFUL YEAR

CORNS HURT? JUST RUB ON MOSCO

HOME-TIES Clothes Lines Are Stronger!

Buy No. 128 for outdoor use. Guaranteed strength! Thin diameter prevents clothes pins from splitting. At all leading 10¢ stores.

JANUARY & WOOD CO. Maysville, Ky

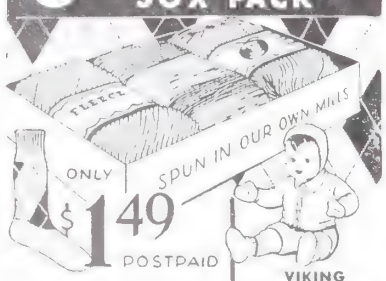
LEARN MILLINERY AT HOME

Design and make exclusive hats under personal direction of one of America's noted designers. Complete materials, blocks, etc., furnished. Every step illustrated. You make exclusive salable hats right from the start. We teach you how to start a profitable business in spare time. Low cost and easy terms. Expert milliners are in demand. Free National Placement Dept. Send for free catalog.

LOUIE MILLER SCHOOL OF MILLINERY
225 N. Wabash Ave., Dept. 34, Chicago 1, Ill.

—CLIP THIS ADV. AND MAIL TODAY—

Order Direct AND SAVE! VIKING ARGYLE SOX PACK



ONLY $1.49 POSTPAID

So Easy to Knit 100% Virgin Wool

Complete instruction pair at A—6 ox. 2ply 10 to 12 inch wool of solid or Pat-Tern knit easily by [illegible] Ribbing, heel and toe also.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

5 ARGYLE COLOR ASSORTMENTS

☐ send me FREE color chart booklet of all Viking Yarns.

Enclosed find [illegible] for sox as checked (No C. O. D.) Dept J-4

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

VIKING Jack & Jill BABY SET PACK

100% virgin wool baby fleece yarn soft and warm. Enough to make bonnet, sweater, booties and mittens, up to 1 year size. Includes complete easy to follow instructions.

White Pink
Yellow Blue

$1.79 Postpaid

YARN headquarters
718 CHESTNUT ST. PHILA. 6, PA.

Shiny, Clean WINDOWS in a Jiffy

Do Windows in your home or car need attention? The RITZ WINDOW CLOTH does the job in half the time! Just think, no chamois, no soap, no mess. Use the "RITZ" moist, wipe off, and presto! Your windows sparkle. Comes in a pretty white and gold box suitable for a welcome gift to friends. On market for over 20 years. 15¢ each at Hardware Stores, Linen, and Housefurnishing Depts., Drug Stores, or write:

JOHN RITZENTHALER
75 Franklin Street New York 13, N. Y.
Makers of the famous "RITZ" Cloths for Cleaning
EST. 1892

your man's first choice

When it comes to meals, he likes 'em zipped up with the spirited tang of Frank's Red Hot Sauce! For this expert blend of choice Louisiana peppers and spices has the flavor men favor. Add 5 to 10 drops to soups, gravies, meats, fish, cooked vegetables, spaghetti, and egg dishes.

A 10c Bottle Flavors 108 Meals

FREE! 32 Man-favorite recipes in New Booklet, "The Way to Your Man's Heart." Write for copy today. Address . . . . . The Frank Tea & Spice Co., Dept. J, Cincinnati 2, Ohio.

Only 10c on most grocers' shelves and meat counters

Frank's RED HOT SAUCE

I know why Powder-ene will . . .

keep your rugs Clean!

SPRINKLE ON

• Carbon from smoke and automobile exhausts floats in through windows and doors and is tracked in on shoes. Each tiny particle clings. It holds dust and dirt and your rugs become dingy and dull.

Powder-ene loosens carbon and dirt, enabling your vacuum cleaner to remove both and bring back like-new beauty and freshness.

BRUSH IN

Powder-ene is easy to use. It saves work. No liquids! No suds! No scrubbing on hands and knees. Just sprinkle it on. Brush it in. Let it stand. Then vacuum as usual to remove the sooty carbon and the dirt it has held.

VACUUM OFF

Use Powder-ene often where shoes track in dirt. It does not leave rings—does not fade colors—does not remove twist. It cannot harm any floor covering.

Get Powder-ene right away . . . in bright blue cans at department, furniture, hardware, 5-and-10 stores.

THE THREE LITTLE WOMEN OUR TRADEMARK SINCE 1921

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Powder-ene

RUG CLEANER

VON SCHRADER MANUFACTURING CO.
RACINE • WISCONSIN • U.S.A.

lovely colors

costs but little (See classified

color card or write

LUMINALL PAINTS, CHICAGO 9.

LUMINALL PAINTS

EXCELL-O RIBBON

Made of Du Pont Cellophane

Lustrous and colorful ...a wonderful value!

At Chain, Stationery, Gift and Department Stores.

said sulkily, and Sam saw Catharine draw back.

"I don't want us to be dragged into it, that's all," Catharine said, and it was clear that she sensed that she had gone too far. Swayed by an emotion, she expressed herself with brutal violence.

"It won't hurt you any more than it's hurting us," Charlotte was saying. "How do you imagine Fred felt explaining why on earth he didn't check on his materials as soon as he read in the papers what caused Konopka's death?"

"Why didn't he?" asked Catharine.

"He didn't think of it. It was the day he went to the convention in Chicago."

Catharine looked scornfully triumphant. "If he's so careless," she asked, "why do they believe him now?"

"His measurements are right," insisted Charlotte. "I know it sounds silly to say that it didn't occur to him at the time, but it didn't. If someone in Creston was murdered with an ax, would you go right down cellar to see if the murderer had used yours?" Even at her most earnest, Charlotte could not help sounding flippant.

Sam interposed and helped Charlotte to ease herself to the door. She must understand that Catharine was upset and did not mean to sound ungrateful. It came as a shock, however, especially this evening, when they were looking forward to tomorrow and China's old music was of most ancient origin—it dated back to the year 2600 B.C., when a Chinese emperor established a scale for instruments which has retained a cast-iron hold on Chinese music up to the present, preventing the free development of Chinese music along Western lines. Only five tones were used: The major notes do, re, mi, sol, la. Ancient prototypes of modern instruments such as the harmonica, two-string fiddle, guitar and lute were used.

the new house on Marigold Street. Charlotte squeezed his hand in understanding and went out quickly. They sat for a while among the boxes and packages.

"Are you afraid?" asked Sam presently.

Catharine looked at him and, without lowering her eyes, said, "Yes."

"They won't question you," Sam reassured her, "except about that afternoon. That's simple enough, isn't it?"

"I suppose so," said Catharine. "If they believe me."

"Is there any reason why they shouldn't?" Sam asked.

Catharine stood up, and her hands were clasped together and her fingers worked nervously. "Oh, Sam! Suppose they come and accuse us—what shall we do?"

"Who's talking about accusing us?" asked Sam. "They only want to ask a few straightforward questions."

"I don't want to be questioned, the way I am," she pleaded. "I want to be left alone. Something might happen if they worry and upset me."

"You can answer a simple question, can't you?" Sam asked shortly.

"You're always fussing over me. I want to be left alone. I don't want anybody to question me." She turned away from him and fought to control herself.

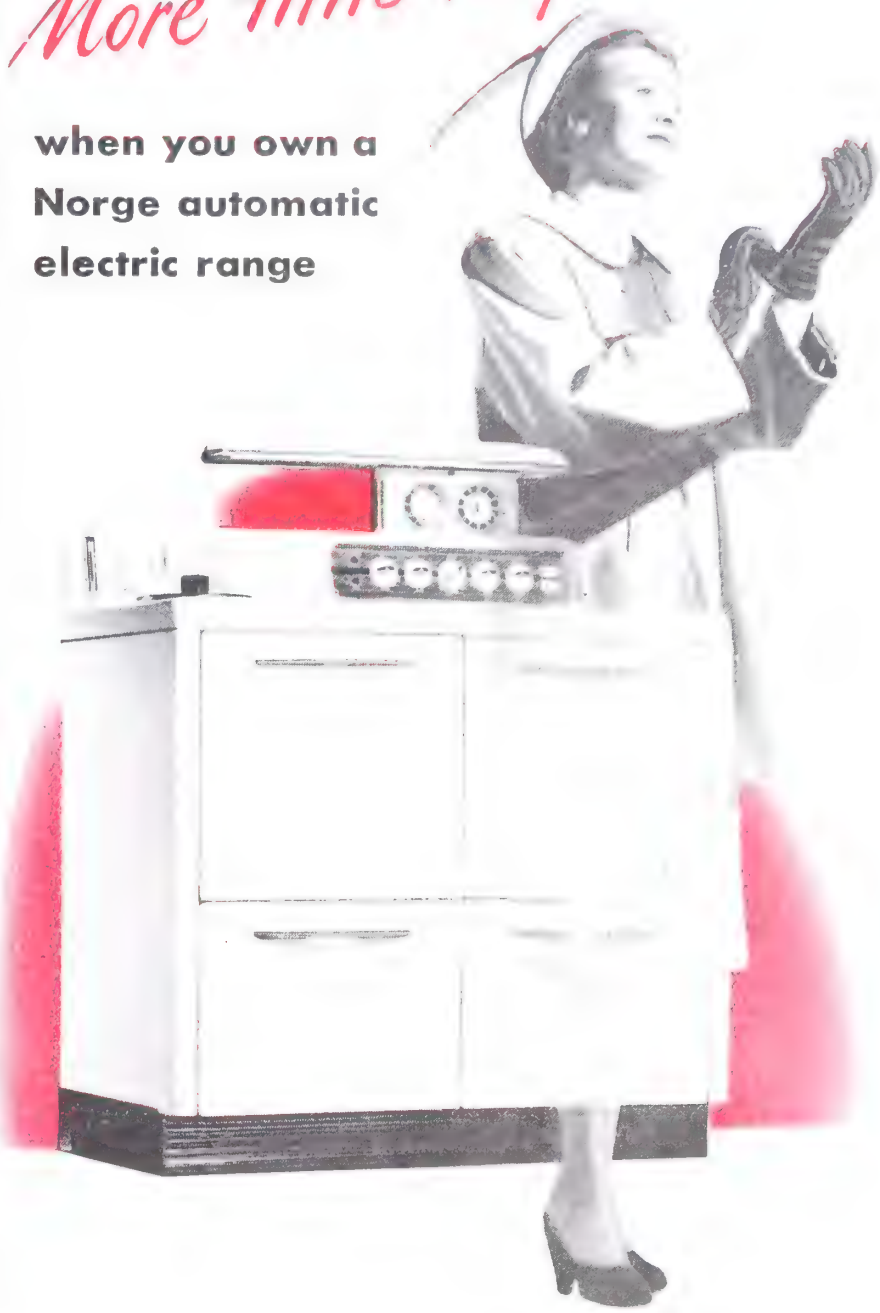
What was she making all the fuss about? Sam wondered. To be questioned, to endure unsavory publicity for a week or two! Surely they were little things. They had no reason to be worried.

He told himself this twice, but the third time he began to sense the fear and the doubt beneath his protestation. Had Catharine any reason to be worried? She acted as if she had. Indeed, for several weeks she had behaved as if she were afraid of something. Something was wrong. He had tried to make allowances, but she had been so strange. Ever since that day she had lied to him about Konopka.

(Continued on Page 179)

More time to yourself

when you own a Norge automatic electric range



The deep-well cooker, the oven, or any appliance you plug in, will be turned on and off at any time you select—and you can be miles away! Or you can disregard the automatic feature of the new Norge and still enjoy regular electric cooking at its best! Everything necessary for greatest convenience, efficiency and safety is provided. Your Norge dealer (he is listed in the phone book) will be happy to give you the full story . . . on this and the other Norge products which contribute to better living.

A BORG-WARNER INDUSTRY

Norge is the registered trade-mark of Norge Division, Borg-Warner Corporation, Detroit 26, Michigan. In Canada: Addison Industries, Limited, Toronto, Ontario.

SEE NORGE BEFORE YOU BUY

Refrigerators Electric Ranges Washers Gas Ranges Home Heaters Home & Farm Freezers

Betty Crocker suggests

"6 EASY DINNERS"

FOR BUSY HOMEMAKERS

MONDAY

CORN SAUSAGE PIE

FRIDAY GOLDEN DREAM CHEESE SOUFFLE

SATURDAY

CRUSTY HOT DOGS

TUESDAY

SAVORY STEW WITH "WHEATIES" MOLASSES MUFFINS

THURSDAY

SOUTHERN CHICKEN UPSIDE DOWN DINNER

WEDNESDAY

CHICKEN FRICASSEE WITH NEVER-FAIL DUMPLINGS

At your Grocer's... FREE! *

Recipes for "6 Easy Dinners"

BETTY CROCKER comes to the rescue of busy home executives with recipes for Six Easy Dinners! Each recipe developed and perfected by General Mills' Betty Crocker Staff . . . each especially tailored to complement the superb qualities of Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour.

Easy Dinner recipes are Betty Crocker Silver Anniversary "specials." Get these 6 proved, practical, thoroughly tested recipes at your grocer's today. Try each one with superb, snow-white Gold Medal . . . the flour American homemakers prefer by nearly 2 to 1! With the Betty Crocker recipes in every sack, it is your simplest, surest way to baking success.

General Mills

* If your grocer is out of these recipes, write Betty Crocker, Dept. 260, General Mills, Minneapolis 2, Minnesota

WASHBURN'S Gold Medal ENRICHED FLOUR "Kitchen-tested"

Eventually WHY NOT NOW?

YOURS FOR ONLY 50¢

GET THIS SATIN FINISH ALUMINUM

Picture Frame Tray

PLUS the words "Gold Medal" cut from any part of sack

Not on sale in stores! Comparable trays we found retailed at over $1.50

Tray measures 7½ x 11 inches . . . holds 8 glasses easily

Here's a super-value for Gold Medal fans! While supplies last we offer you this lovely aluminum Picture Frame Tray—at an amazing price—only 50c! Rush 50c plus words "Gold Medal" from any part of sack of Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Flour to General Mills, Inc., Dept. 264, 623 Marquette Ave., Minneapolis 2, Minn. (Or send sales slip with 50c.)

Tray is stunning "satin-finish" aluminum! Handles of crystal-clear plastic. Protective coating prevents tarnishing, staining, fingermarks, etc. You also get illustrated brochure telling about famous artist Dale Nichols.

Tray is adorned by full-color reproduction of DALE NICHOLS' beloved painting "COMPANY FOR SUPPER"

Copr. 1947, General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn.
"[illegible] tested" and "Wheaties" are reg. trade-marks of General Mills.

Betty Crocker

Golden Dream Cheese Soufflé

(with Meat, Sea Food, and Vegetable variations)

Melt . . . . . 4 tbsp. butter

Blend in . . . . . 4 tbsp. GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour, ½ tsp. salt

Remove from heat.

Stir in . . . . . 1 cup milk

Cook over low heat until thickened (about 5 min.), stirring constantly.

Stir in until melted. . . . . 1 cup grated mild American cheese

Remove from heat.

Stir in slowly. . . . 3 egg yolks, beaten until thick and lemon-colored

Beat until frothy . . . 3 egg whites

Add and continue beating until still enough to hold a point . . . . . ¼ tsp. cream of tartar

Fold in carefully . . . the cheese mixture

Pour into a well greased 8-in. casserole (1½ qt. capacity). Set casserole in pan of hot water (having water reach well up on casserole).

Bake 50 to 60 minutes in moderate oven (350°). The soufflé will puff way up, and become golden brown on top. When done, a silver knife thrust into the center comes out clean. Serve immediately . . . preferably with cream sauce to which sautéed mushrooms, shrimp, cut-up green or ripe olives, capers or chopped chives have been added.

Serves 6.

Note: The addition of a little mustard or Worcestershire sauce (about ½ tsp.) gives a piquant flavor to Cheese Soufflé.

Meat or Sea Food Soufflé. Use 1 cup finely ground, cooked meat (chicken, lamb, veal, etc.) or sea food (shrimp, crab meat, salmon, etc., seasoned with 1 tbsp. lemon juice) in place of cheese.

Vegetable Soufflé. Substitute 1 cup finely cut, well drained, cooked vegetables, seasoned to taste, in place of the cheese.

Clip . . . file in loose-leaf notebook sudden cold fear ran through him. Sup- e she had —— Suppose in some way —— Catharine!"

(Continued from Page 177)

he turned, and he could see that she had ght for control and won.

You didn't meet that man, did you?"

What man?" Her voice was firm. She ld lie. She would say anything to keep secret. It was almost useless to ask her. The man who got the poison out of d's lab."

I never met any man. I don't know any- g about it."

You tried to bluff your way out when I id out that you had seen Konopka. It's ise, Catharine. I know you too well."

There's nothing to find out," said Cath- e.

If you know something, tell me and tell police. Be open about it."

atharine moistened her lips, and Sam d see that she was struggling between and the longing for relief.

Tell me the whole thing. I'll help you," aid.

atharine moistened her lips again. "It that dreadful afternoon at Charlotte's. an came to the door. It all happened so kly. A car drove up and the man came He said he was a friend of Fred's." She sed a moment and her eyes were anxious, f she were wondering whether he would ve her.

Yes?" he said, encouraging her and try- to keep the rising ation out of his e.

We talked a while then he asked if he ht go inside the It seemed a funny g to ask, but you w how you never k of those things at time. He said he l to be at school Fred; they worked a lab together. I ved him in and then my fell down and d out. I ran out of room to Jimmy then I came back in time to see him." Catharine's voice ered. She looked away from Sam, put her ds to her face and sobbed, "Oh, it's hor- e!"

was pitiful to watch her. For a moment forgot that she was his wife. He saw a an of keen intelligence resorting in her eration to a pathetic imitation of horror, n the greater horror she tried to conceal k out and showed up her imitation as a n.

Go on," Sam said.

He was pouring something into a little le," Catharine said. "I asked him what as doing. He caught me by the arm and he'd kill me if I told anyone he'd been e. It's the most fearful thing that ever pened to me. I was terrified. I looked at bottle and it said 'aconitine.' I'd heard conite and I looked up the alkaloid in of Fred's books. It will kill a man in a seconds."

You went through this and told me noth- '" asked Sam.

I was too frightened. It was something I to keep to myself. I knew my life wasn't if they got to hear of it. And then, when news about Konopka came out, I was ified again. It was too late to tell the ce then. Oh, it's all a horrible, horrible ıtmare, but I'm not to blame, Sam! I'm to blame!"

I said nothing for a moment or two, nor he go over to comfort her. A most dread- hought had come into his mind. He was id to go on, but he knew there could be urning back. That evening Mrs. Walsh called he had turned back, refused to see ond, thrust the whole thing from his d as well as he could. But the recollec- of his unwillingness to probe out the h had prodded him at unexpected mo- ıts, and covered his contentment with an uneasy film of doubt. This time he must go through with it.

"Now tell me the truth," was all he said.

Catharine looked shocked at his unwillingness to be deceived. "I swear that what I ——" she began.

"You'd swear anything, you're so frightened," said Sam. "You've been in a state of terror ever since Konopka died."

"Haven't I reason to be frightened?" she argued. "When the man threatened me ——"

"There was no man."

"There was! There was!" cried Catharine desperately. "I could describe him to you if you'd only listen. And the car! There was the car too!" Her haste was betraying her. "It was the car that stood outside the house in the fog. It was the same car ——" She broke off, knowing that she had plunged too far already.

"How did you know? Did you see it?"

CATHARINE tried again, facing him and lying hopelessly. "Yes. Yes, I saw it. I didn't tell you because I was afraid. It passed me at Schirer's corner when I was getting the lemons for your cold. And when I heard the next morning that it had been standing outside the house ——"

Sam seized her by the arm and shook her. "Stop thinking up these lies. They wouldn't deceive a child. What did you do?"

"I told you."

His fingers were biting into the soft flesh of Catharine's arms, and she whimpered.

"You're hurting me," she told him.

"I want to know the truth—the whole truth," he insisted.

A great sob convulsed her whole body and he knew that she would tell him. He had brought her to the point of confessing the truth and now that she was ready to tell, there was no need of it. He knew. Vague premonitions had disturbed him weeks ago, and it seemed to him that what he was about to hear was not an utterly new thing.

"You did it yourself," said Sam, in a voice that was ludicrously calm for the terrifying substance it carried.

Catharine was calm, too, now. She looked at him, and although her face was still contorted, there was a relief coming back into it. "Yes," she said.

Without realizing that he was doing it, Sam began to withdraw from Catharine. At once she started up, her calm dispersed, her fear giving place to anger.

"It was for you I did it—for you," she told him. "You never cared or worried. I had to do it for you. I was desperate. I saw you let them take your job away from you without a fight. We had nowhere to turn and you weren't doing anything. I saw our debts grow heavier all summer long. I saw the baby born in poverty and you without a job."

She was out of her mind. She had given him no time to get a job. She had murdered a man for this job of his. Because he was in their way she had snuffed him out. She had planned it cunningly and deliberately, and luck had been with her. Charlotte had left her alone in the house. Fred had gone to Chicago. The fog had come. He would never know what she had suffered in her poor mistaken blindness for his sake. And now she was arguing and defending herself.

"What's the life of one man worth? Hundreds and thousands were slaughtered in the war and you never turned a hair."

"There's no comparison," Sam argued. "That was in Europe and they were our enemies."

"This is America and he was my enemy," blazed Catharine. "I fought him and I won."

Won! Did she think she would never be found out? Did she think he could stay in Creston now, knowing how he had come by

(Continued on Page 181)

No sensible or self-respecting cat recognizes any obligation in return for saucers of milk, plates of fish and our praise, beyond cleanliness and good behavior . . . a cat does not ask to be petted and treated indulgently. Indeed, to patronize a cat with superficial endearments is more likely to offend than gratify him. . . . All cats are possessed of a proud spirit, and the surest way to forfeit the esteem of a cat is to treat him as an inferior being.

—MICHAEL JOSEPH Cat's Company. (Michael Joseph, Ltd.)

You've never tasted franks so tender! Made the modern SKINLESS way, every bite's a meat treat—savory, flavory, without skin!

How The Frankfurter lost its Skin!

Your packer stuffs us - not in skins—
In Visking casings pure.
He knows they keep our tenderness
And flavor most secure.

While smoking in these casings clear
The modern SKINLESS way,
Our meat its own good surface forms—
No juices go astray.

Your packer takes the casings off
When we are cooked to taste—
All tender and delicious, too—
No skins, no peel, no waste.

SAY Skinless WHEN YOU SAY FRANKFURTERS

THE VISKING CORPORATION, 6733 W. 65th St., Chicago 38, Ill.

YOU SHOULD SEE THE CROP OF SMILES I RAISE WHEN MUFFETS ARE PLANTED IN THE FAMILY'S CEREAL DISHES!
THERE'S NOTHING LIKE 'EM - SO TASTY AND TENDER SPRINKLED WITH SUGAR AND CREAM!
WHO IS THIS 'MUFFETS' I HEAR YOU HAVE A DATE WITH EVERY MORNING?
I LIKE SUSIE
I LOVE MUFFETS
WHY, SUSIE! MUFFETS ARE THE ROUND, ALL-OVER-TOASTED SHREDDED WHEAT!
YOU LOVE-BIRDS THINK YOU'RE TENDER!.... YOU SHOULD TASTE MUFFETS!
UM-M-M- SEEDS!
I'D RATHER HAVE MUFFETS!
Stina

If you Like shredded wheat...you'll Love Muffets the Round Shredded Wheat

FIRST thing you'll notice about Muffets is that they're round to fit your cereal dish...the only round shredded wheat.

"Look toastier, too!" you'll say.

And you're right! Muffets are toastier, Muffets are "all-over toasted"—"deep-toasted" to a crisp, golden brown to bring out the rich tantalizing flavor of healthful whole wheat!

Muffets are tastier, too. That extra deliciousness you taste is the full flavor of whole wheat brought out by the Muffets exclusive toasting method.

So start the day the Muffets way and you too will say "If you like shredded wheat you'll love Muffets." Get Muffets at your grocers today!

DON'T MISS

Muffets

THE ROUND SHREDDED WHEAT

The Quaker Oats Company

(Continued from Page 179)

his job? Even now she did not realize the enormity of her deed, nor understand its consequences. He could see the whole pattern of her thinking and feeling from the beginning. She never meant him to know. And then her strength began to fail. From never meaning to let him know she had come to wanting to share it and yet fearing to tell. To her this confession had brought relief. She did not recognize it as a step toward her destruction. She was ready to bluff it through, even though they knew now where the poison came from and that she was alone in the house.

"I'll answer all their questions," said Catharine. "I shan't weaken or tremble or faint—you shall see. They can take me to the house—put me in the very room, stand me where he fell ——"

The telephone bell rang and Catharine screamed. Her nerves were all in pieces. Sam looked at her for a moment before answering, and in that moment they both knew it was no good going on with it.

When Catharine heard that it was the police inspector, she sat down slowly. Sam put the receiver down and went over to her. Kneeling beside her and knowing how everything was closing about her, all his love for her surged into him. He could not speak, and in his agony he pressed his face against her breast.

Mechanically, as she had often caressed him before, her hands moved slowly and gently over his head. Her fingers were light and delicate and he could hardly believe that these were the hands which had fulfilled what the poor tormented brain had commanded.

"It's not so dreadful," she was saying, and now she sounded spent and sincere. "It was worse when no one knew. When do they want to see us?"

"Tomorrow."

"Tomorrow!" echoed Catharine.

There was a silence and each knew that the other was thinking of the new life they were to have started, of the red-and-white house on Marigold Street.

The crowding sunny thoughts seemed to press Catharine to a decision. She made as if to rise.

"Let's get it over with."

"Tonight?"

CATHARINE looked into his eyes and for the first time she smiled a little. "Now."

Sam rose to his feet and gently pulled Catharine up. He took her into his arms and held her.

"Will you come down with me?" she whispered.

"I won't leave you until I have to," said Sam.

"Let's go—now."

In the entrance, standing by the bamboo telephone table, Sam saw her look back into the little room and then, because she was accustomed to saving and cutting down the light bill, she stepped into the room and switched off the lights.

It was over in a few minutes. Mary Cooper, next door, called to them from the sidewalk.

"Wait a second if you're going out! I want to get rid of these." She was on her way to them with a mixing bowl and three books. "I don't want to lug them over to Marigold Street," she said.

By instinct Sam and Catharine smiled at her as if suddenly everything were normal and safe and ordinary once more. It was then that Catharine took a pace forward and fell, face downward, on the steps.

THEY called the ambulance and Sam saw the Coopers like bewildered walk-ons forced into a play they did not even know the story of, standing on the sidewalk of Collins Street, their faces drawn and anxious, as if it were their fault that the accident had happened, as if they, with their mixing bowl and their three books and something else that Sam never bothered about which they had borrowed, were somehow responsible.

The ambulance shrilled along the streets and turned into the dimly lighted courtyard of the hospital. Catharine looked up at him as the ambulance slowed down, stopped, and backed toward a door in the great red brick wall.

A nurse, accustomed to bodies in pain, supervised with detached efficiency the carrying into the hospital, and Sam was allowed to follow. A woman at a desk insisted upon asking questions and writing words and figures on a white card, and when she had finished with him, Catharine was gone.

Sam looked around, bewildered. A nurse led him into a small square waiting room. "When may I see her again?" he asked.

"I'll come and tell you. It may be a few hours."

She gave him a slight smile and walked briskly away. The sound of her footsteps echoed on a section of tiled floor and then stopped suddenly. There were long silences, then small sounds, and then more silences. He wondered where Catharine was and what they were doing to her. He prayed that it would be brief. If Catharine were determined to die, they had no hope of making her live.

In all the hours of waiting in the bleak square room it never occurred to Sam that she might live. If only they would let him see her before she died. They said that as death approached there was an end of pain, that numbness took hold and relieved the racked body, that features were relaxed and even eased into smiles again. He did not want his last glimpse of her to be the look of pleading through pain that she had given him in the ambulance. He wanted to see her just once more as she was in the old, gay life that seemed so long ago, before anyone in Creston had ever heard of Konopka.

Sam let his head rest in his hands and in the loneliness of the little room he cried. Then he wiped the tears from his eyes and sat still, staring at the brown wall.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Song for a Four Year Old

By Eunice Mildred Londoske

Oh, I had long forgotten many things,
Which she has now made known
again to me.
We breathless watch a whirring
flash of wings
Caught in the white flame of the cherry tree.
I see her stare in sudden disbelief
At tadpoles swimming in a large round glass;
She leans to touch a snail upon a leaf,
To find a fairy forest in the grass.
Oh, all the world is luminous for her;
Fresh-made as on creation's first bright morn.
She finds a miracle in soft gray fur;
In silver wimples tied to tasseled
corn.
Oh, she has found that something
I have lost
And knew not I had lost it . . .
until now,
In frail and delicate etchings of
the frost;
In sticks and stones; in apples
on a bough.
And I may walk with her so far . . . no more;
For I am barred forever from the wild
Sweet raptures, locked behind a rose-red door,
Which opens only to a little child!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

a Wealth of garden goodness in every delicious sip!
V-8
Cocktail
VEGETABLE JUICES
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
There's a bracing freshness in the flavor of chilled V-8* Vegetable Juices that wakes up your taste for breakfast; there's a tempting cocktail goodness that keens the appetite for any meal. And in taller glasses of V-8 there's a mother's answer to the quest for something wholesome and good with children's sandwiches and snacks. For, remarkably, V-8 has only a whisper of added seasoning—the right combination of many fresh-vegetable juices creates that distinctive wealth of garden flavor. So for this abundance of vegetable goodness, as tasty as it is nourishing, keep extra cans of V-8 on ice. Serve it often—and generously.
Juices of LETTUCE
BEETS
TOMATOES
CELERY CARROTS SPINACH
WATERCRESS
PARSLEY
Deliciously Combined
CONTAINS VITAMINS A, B1, C, AND CALCIUM AND IRON
ASK FOR V-8 VEGETABLE JUICES AT YOUR FOOD STORE, FOUNTAIN AND RESTAURANT
*V-8 is a trademark owned in the United States by Standard Brands Incorporated, in Canada by Standard Brands Ltd

Sometimes—YOU CAN'T HELP YOURSELF—

It's a perfect day . . . and there you are, looking your romantic best . . . in a swirling frock just made for garden-partying. Then—imagine getting your hair caught in a rosebush! Embarrassed? Perhaps . . . and perh. ps you can't help perspiring. But no need to be embarrassed by tell-tale under-arm stains. Let Kleinert's Dress Shields guard all your lovely clothes . . . because sometimes you can't help yourself!

Pin-in Shields . . . made of soft, absorbent mushroom, with pin, included. "A minute to pin it!"

Bra-form . . . uplift bra with dress shields attached. Perfect for all deep sleeves . . . woolens and sweaters.

Kleinert's

"T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

GUARANTEED PROTECTION SINCE 1871

The nurse came back and stood in the dim light, looking like a frail ghost. "You may come now," she said.

She led him along a corridor, past rows of tall brown doors, and the faint hospital smell of the waiting room grew stronger and fresher. The door of a small room at the end stood open and the nurse showed Sam into it.

"Only a minute or so," she whispered. "She's very weak."

Sam stepped to the side of the bed, and it was as people had said. Catharine lay quite still with her eyes closed. He had seen her hundreds of times looking just like that.

She opened her eyes, and to save her having to turn her head he leaned over and looked down at her. The pain had gone, and the fear and anxiety had gone too. There was a great tiredness and a great sorrow in her eyes now.

"Sam," she whispered, and once more, "Sam!"

He bent down and kissed her and his hand stroked her forehead and her hair. She seemed to smile a little but she said nothing more and her eyes were closed again.

They brought the news of Catharine's death and of the child's death at half past six in the morning.

The new house on Marigold Street was a lonely place without Catharine. Sam took care of it and found the unaccustomed work a help in putting out of his mind the memories of the last dreadful night at Foxy's, of the hospital, and of the blurry dawn of the next day.

He worked hard at the university and had no time to brood when he came home. He read at all the meals he ate alone, and when he ate in the campus cafeteria the noise and bustle were a comfort even when he sat alone, and when students or colleagues joined him he was happier still. At first people avoided him. They were self-conscious and did not know what to say once the stumbling condolences had been expressed. But after a week or so they were all able to converse naturally and Sam found, to his surprise, that it came easily to him too.

Marriage should combat without respite or mercy that monster that devours everything—habit. —BALZAC.

He thought seriously once of unburdening his conscience and telling Inspector Nodler the whole truth, but then he began to wonder what use it would be. It would make wretched until they died the lives of Catharine's mother and father. It was not a question of keeping his job. He meant to leave Creston and change his mode of life entirely. And no amount of confession or truthtelling could wipe out the wrong Catharine had done. If only they did not arrest some stranger and charge him with Konopka's death. Then Sam would have to come forward and declare the truth. With this reservation in mind he held back and told what he knew up to the last night at Foxy's.

Inspector Nodler was embarrassed at having to question Sam so soon after his wife's death, but they were simply following every lead they had. The Garritys had told about the missing aconitine and very unwillingly mentioned Catharine as one who had been in the house, and Sam as the person most likely to benefit by Konopka's death.

Doctor and Mrs. Mackenzie came for the funeral and stayed five days. During their stay Sam went to the Cornish house with them, and at one time in the evening found himself with Mrs. Cornish while across the wide room Jenny was showing Mrs. Mackenzie a sweater she was knitting for Roger, together with other little things treasured and admired by mothers young and old.

"Sam," said Mrs. Cornish suddenly, "I must tell you, because it worried me at the time. Inspector Nodler was here, asking questions."

"Yes?" Sam did his best to look and sound unexcited, but his heart was suddenly loud and his fingers moist.

"I don't know what he was after, except that he was trying to find out about Konopka and the dreadful thing that happened."

"What did he ask you?"

"To tell you the truth, I was so upset he hardly asked me a thing, but he asked Jenny a great deal because you know she had gone there to practice once or twice."

"She couldn't give him any help, could she?"

"Of course not. She only saw him those few times. And then he asked about Catharine."

"About Catharine?"

"Yes. That's what struck me as so odd. I couldn't see what she had to do with Doctor Konopka at all. She never met him, did she?"

Sam shook his head. "He knew, just as everybody else in Creston knew, that we benefited greatly by Konopka's death, and he had to find out where we were the day it happened to him."

"You mean he —— Oh! It's absurd!" Mrs. Cornish's eyes were indignant as they searched Sam's face.

"Yes, he had to know for sure."

"I'd no idea. I never realized. In a way I'm glad I didn't. I don't suppose Jenny did either, or she wouldn't have remembered so clearly."

"Remembered what?"

"Everything that happened that foggy day. She remembered everything. It must have shown him beyond a doubt that you and Catharine ——" Mrs. Cornish broke off and looked keenly at Sam.

"What did Jenny tell him?" he asked, not caring whether he sounded calm or not.

"She told him about the telephone conversation she and Catharine had at half pas four and how she knew it was half past fou because Ellen was in the kitchen making tea and I'd gone up to my room. She says she told me about it when I came down to tea, but then I'm so forgetful these days. Did Catharine tell you about it?"

The question came so suddenly that Sam had to blurt out like a badly lying schoolboy, "Yes, of course. I remember she did say something about it. That was the day I was sick in bed."

"That's what Jenny said to the inspector. Catharine told her you had stayed home from classes and that she had been looking after you. She said something about getting lemons for your cold."

"Yes, she did get lemons that day. I remember."

Sam did not dare look across the room at Jenny. It was impossible that she should have guessed the truth, and yet she could not have helped him more if she had been an accomplice. Could Catharine have telephoned from Doctor Maxwell's house in order to establish an alibi? That tortuous cunning was not beyond her, and it was later that she had begun to go to pieces.

Then he remembered Christmas Eve and how he had been sitting on the nursery floor watching Roger play with the toy dog he and Catharine had brought him. He could hear her now saying that they had stayed at home all day, except for the lemons. Had Jenny been asking simple questions or had she at that time harbored suspicions that ——

Suddenly it struck him with all the force of the obvious that if Jenny had conversed with Catharine that afternoon, there was no need for her questions at the crib on Christmas Eve. Jenny knew! Knew enough, at least, to have willfully misdirected the inspector in what must have been a conscious effort to furnish Catharine with an alibi. But surely Jenny had no suspicions of the whole truth! How could she have? She must have lied in her naïve, impetuous way only to spare him pain. He wished that it was something she had done for which he could thank her. He felt like going right over to her and putting his hands out, raising her to her feet and telling her what she had done for him. He became conscious again of the loneliness of secrecy. When he went away that evening he took Jenny's hand in his, but

(Continued on Page 184)

Be young...be bright...be lovely
...the gladness in the air is irresistible when you're wearing the gay-hearted fragrance—
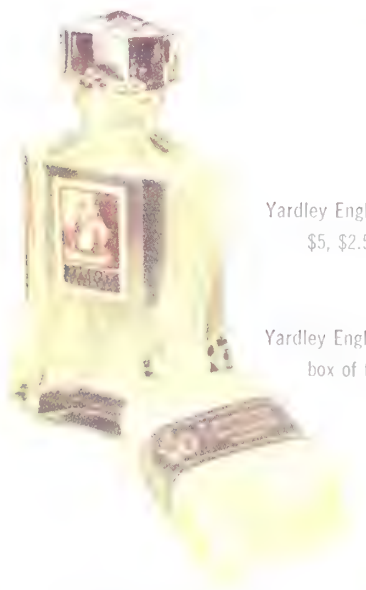
YARDLEY English Lavender.



Yardley English Lavender,
$5, $2.50, $1.50, plus tax.

Yardley English Lavender Soap, 35c,
box of three tablets, $1.

Yardley products for America are created in England and finished in the U. S. A. from the original English formulae, combining imported and domestic ingredients. Yardley of London, Inc., 620 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C.

Baby, pick a sugar plum!

A dreamy, beautiful bodiced nightie. A short "pajam" that ties its shirttails for a sash. Both of Munsingwear's new, exclusive knit rayon in "Sugar-Check" or "Sugar-Diamond" design...and in "Sweetshop Colors" that seem to make this fabric's incredible softness look more melting. At better lingerie departments.

MUNSINGWEAR
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Underwear • Sleeping-and-Lounging Wear • Foundation Garments • Hosiery

(Continued from Page 182)

he did not dare let her know that Mrs. Cornish had told him of her lie.

On the way home he discovered that Mrs. Cornish had had the good sense to say nothing to Mrs. Mackenzie about Nodler's inquiries, and a day or two later the Mackenzies went back to Henrichs. It was harder in some ways to be alone, but it was with enormous relief that Sam saw them off at the bus station.

People were good to him. The Smithtons had him to dinner, then to lunch a few days later, and then to dinner again. Mrs. Cornish sent Jenny to Marigold Street with good things. It cheered him greatly to see the baby buggy standing on the square plot of grass while Jenny, making excuses to stay a little longer, brewed tea for him and never failed to stay and have it with him.

If it had not been for the secret, he could have lived like this forever, but it was time to begin a new life with fresh contacts, to get to know different people, to put Creston as far out of his memory as it would go. He knew that it would never go utterly, but new sounds and sights would diminish the frequency and pain of his recollections.

The melancholy with which he wrote one evening to a decorator's establishment in New York was mingled with a stirring curiosity that almost amounted to pleasure. He was young enough to begin life over again and he wondered with active interest what sort of life it would turn out to be.

He went out to mail the letter before he went to bed. It was a cold night and the frozen snow crunched as he walked down the unswept driveway and along the three blocks to the mailbox. Sam felt terribly lonely for Catharine when he thought of all the untroubled couples in all the tiny, respectable houses. It eased his loneliness a little to plan for the future, and he had acquired the habit of working out in the greatest detail the things he might do in a city, even to what he might read in the morning paper and what he would eat for lunch. To conquer the feeling of loneliness that had assailed him, he busied himself, as he crunched over the snow, with imagining a trip to a house that was full of nineteenth-century ornaments and which the owners had suddenly decided to redecorate in Elizabethan style, with copper warming pans and refectory tables and mullioned windows. By the time he had argued them toward a modern style and they had compromised on Edwardian opulence, Sam was back in the house and half undressed for bed.

THE Academy Club exhibit had been postponed to late February and three judges from the great world beyond the Creston city limits came to look the pictures over. When they had decided on the winners, little colored plaques and contrasting rosettes were placed beneath the works which had impressed them most. After that the pictures hung for three weeks so that Creston might view and discuss them.

Jenny came often to the exhibits by way of escape from the heavy Cornish house. Once again Creston was stifling her and this afternoon, before she looked at any of the pictures in the exhibit, she sat in a corner to think things out.

After a while Jenny began to think about Sam and Catharine. The last time she saw Catharine was the day she fainted. She had murmured something about the dazzling light on the snow and it had satisfied Mrs. Cornish. She never knew whether it satisfied Catharine.

Why do women seem to put on good looks with good clothes? Dressing her up has a more marked effect upon her face than it does on a man. It kindles the soul behind it.

—THE HEART OF JOHN BURROUGHS' JOURNALS Edited by Clara Barrus (Houghton Mifflin Company).

Why are so many stingy with affection? Is it because we are like the old Vermonter who said to his wife, "When I think of all you mean to me, it's almost more than I can do not to tell you?"

—DR. DONALD A. LAIRD: The Technique of Personal Analysis (Whittlesey House).

One part of the science of living is to learn just what our own responsibility is, and to let other people's alone.

—HARRIET BEECHER STOWE: Flowers and Fruit From the Writings of Harriet Beecher Stowe Compiled by A. H. Fairfield (Houghton Mifflin).

At first Jenny half feared that Sam ar Catharine had plotted Konopka's death t gether. Then she decided, more by instin than by logic, that Sam knew nothing of until that last night in the apartment.

She remembered how she herself ha longed to share her closest secret and ho she had gone to Konopka with it and ho much better she felt afterward. If only sh could let Sam know in some way that sh knew it too! If she could just give him tha much comfort and understanding! She ha been to the Marigold Street house thre times in the past two weeks, but she had n dared to tell him. In the late afternoons, sh knew, he often came up the stairs in th Academy Club for a glance at the pictures.

"Hello," said Sam.

"Oh, I'm so glad to see you."

THE smile of greeting was still on his fac and it shocked her to see how much older h looked than at Christmas. It was hard fo him to keep silent all he knew. He hated i but it was wiser, so he kept silent, and it wa as if part of him were shut away from th outside world altogether. But Jenny kne that she would have to open that secret roor and help him to bear the horrid burden.

"I'm leaving Creston," he told her.

"You are? When?

"At the end of th semester. I got a jo in New York."

"A good one?"

"It's all right," h told her. "It's with decorating firm."

"I hope it will b something you get t like very much."

"I think I shall lik it. It will be quite dif ferent from the worl here, and that is how want it."

"Yes, I suppose.' Jenny took hold o Sam's arm and led hin toward the stairs. "Ma I have dinner with you or would you rathe be by yourself?" sh asked.

"Sure! I could d with some company.'

"You're not working again tonight?"

Sam had turned west with her across the campus. "No. I'm playing hooky with you."

On the way home later, they passed the sunken garden and the place where in summer the flagpole stood. Jenny remembered the bench where only six months ago she used to sit and unfold the soft thick letters that came to her from Roger. She remembered, too, the day she found Catharine sitting there in a pretty patterned dress. It was too snowy to sit on now, but they stood in the moonlight, looking over the river. Below them, edged with gleaming wet ice, was the Maxwells' house, dark and empty, only its roof and its windows catching the gray light of the moon.

"Sam," said Jenny suddenly, "I've got to talk to you. I've got to tell you something."

"What is it?"

"You're lonely, Sam. I can see the loneliness all around you like a great mist. You've lost Catharine and you never had the baby you looked forward to. You think your life is nearly over, the happy part of it, that is ——" She broke off and looked at him, to see how he was taking it, to see if she dared go on. But she could read nothing in his face. He was simply staring at the frozen river. "I thought my life was over when I lost Roger, but I know now that he would want me to go on and be happy, and if it only made you happy too, what a blessed, blessed thing it would be!" The words came tumbling over one another excitedly, so excitedly that she left out the climax of her speech and went on passionately: "We could go away from here and never see Creston or any of the people here again. You could be Roger's

(Continued on Page 187)

STUBBORN FILM ROBS YOUR SKIN OF Half its Beauty!

You can't see or feel this stubborn film . . .
and ordinary cleansing fails to remove it

BUT

once you try this treatment you will instantly see and feel the amazing difference!

JUST ONE TREATMENT with unique Lady Esther Cream shows how much clearer, fresher, younger your skin can look. Try it tonight, and see!

Every woman's skin has this insidious enemy . . . a stubborn film, caused by your natural skin oils mixed with cosmetics and dirt.

You can't see or feel this stubborn film. That's the danger! You think your skin is clean, when it isn't.

Ordinary cleansing fails to remove this stubborn, invisible film. Day after day, it clings . . . dulling the true freshness and beauty of your skin . . . encouraging blackheads and blemishes!

Here's the safe, sure way to get rid of this stubborn, clinging film!

1. Smooth over your face and neck my unique Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream. Wipe it off thoroughly.
2. Immediately . . . and this is the important part . . . apply Lady Esther cream a second time. Wipe it off.

This second cleansing, with Lady Esther, really removes that stubborn film. Now your skin is really clean!

Instantly, you see and feel the difference! Your skin looks so much clearer, fresher, younger! It feels so much softer, smoother. And now, your skin has a real chance to build new loveliness for itself!

My Cream is Unique!

The very texture of Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream is different . . . so soft, so effective. And remember . . . every time you use my unique cream, it does four of the things your skin needs most: 1) cleanses thoroughly; 2) softens your skin; 3) helps Nature refine your pores; 4) leaves a perfect powder base.

Get Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream today. Let this unique cream work its beauty wonders on your skin!

Lady Esther

4-PURPOSE FACE CREAM

Needs No Help From Any Other Cream

If you like to Mix Colors on your Hat... Why not in your Bathroom Towels?

The newest, smartest trend in fashion leads away from monotones and into mixing colors. Look at the wonderful spring hats. They're gay with color! The Martex idea is to mix color in towels. It gives old bathrooms new excitement! You simply buy your towels in matched sets as usual, your favorite colors and his. Then put them up side by side! Try Sunlight (yellow) for him with Shell Pink for you—or Sand Dune (beige) with Surf (light) Green—any combination that piques your color sense. There are ten new Martex colors, colors planned for mixing. See them at your favorite store now. Stack them in your linen closet—then mix them boldly on your bathroom racks.

Martex

Martex Towels

A Product of West Point Manufacturing Company

(Continued from Page 184)

her and we'd have children of our own and spend the rest of my life making you ppy."

Sam was looking at her, a half smile of wilderment on his face, and she could see it the barrier was still there. Before he uld tell her that things could never be the y she imagined, that she could never fully derstand, that he was going away alone, e gathered up all her courage.

"I want to help you with your secret," e said. "I'm the only one who knows what atharine did. Don't be afraid. I've kept y own secret and I'll keep yours. Let me lp you!"

Sam was still looking at her, and even in e faintness of the moonlight she could see at his eyes were shining with tears and his s were trembling. Fearful and ashamed, e turned and ran down the winding road d she did not stop until she reached the idge that led into the Triangle. She had ne it. She had either spoiled everything or e had crashed open that awful barrier be-veen herself and Sam.

She clung to the rail of the bridge until she ıd regained her breath. Then she straight-ıed and walked toward the Cornish house.

Jenny made her announcement to Mrs. ornish that very evening. "You've been ery kind to me," she said, "but I want to ad a different kind of life. I have enough live on, and when Roger is old enough to to school I'd like to work."

Mrs. Cornish burst into tears. "Oh, Jenny, nny, you mustn't!" she cried.

"I shall be happier that way," said Jenny.

"But what about Roger? Will he be appy? Aren't you being selfish, Jenny?"

Jenny had to admit that in a way she was eing selfish. Roger was not old enough to ay whether he preferred going away with is mother to staying in the Cornish house ith three women to look after him and atisfy his whims.

"How can you say such a thing?" Mrs. ornish went on. "Where else could he have ıe care and attention and love that we can ive him here?"

"Maybe he gets too much with the three f us," suggested Jenny.

"My son had his grandmother and me and llen to raise him. What was wrong with im?" demanded Mrs. Cornish, her beauti-il mother's eyes flashing as she spoke.

Naturally Jenny found it difficult to sug-est that there had been anything at all wrong with Roger, especially as she had to admit that for a spoiled only son Roger had turned out exceptionally well.

"Don't let me hear any more of such talk," said Mrs. Cornish; then, looking fixedly and tenderly at Jenny's mutinous face, "Aren't we making you happy here, my dear? We're doing our very best, Ellen and I."

It was true. They had done their best and Jenny felt ashamed. But now that Roger had not returned, there was a great deal that was missing from her life. She thought of what she had said to Sam earlier in the evening and she reddened.

Mrs. Cornish was still looking at her and Jenny saw a satisfied look on her face. Jenny's blush had pleased her. Jenny almost laughed when she realized what Mrs. Cornish was thinking and how little she really knew of what was going on inside her daughter-in-law's head.

Jenny said no more about leaving Creston, and presently Ellen came in with a tray of cocoa and tiny crackers on a plate. The cocoa smelled good and it was pleasant to nibble the crackers. The spacious room looked especially handsome in the firelight and Jenny was drowsy enough to feel the pull of security.

Mrs. Cornish smiled at her as if she guessed that Jenny was thinking how peaceful and luxurious and tasteful these evening occasions were. Jenny smiled back, but in her secret heart she saw night after night of solemn cocoa drinking, with good black dresses and tender smiles and spiraling steam and shining cups in firelight. Years of this could turn a girl of flesh and blood into a cup of cocoa herself.

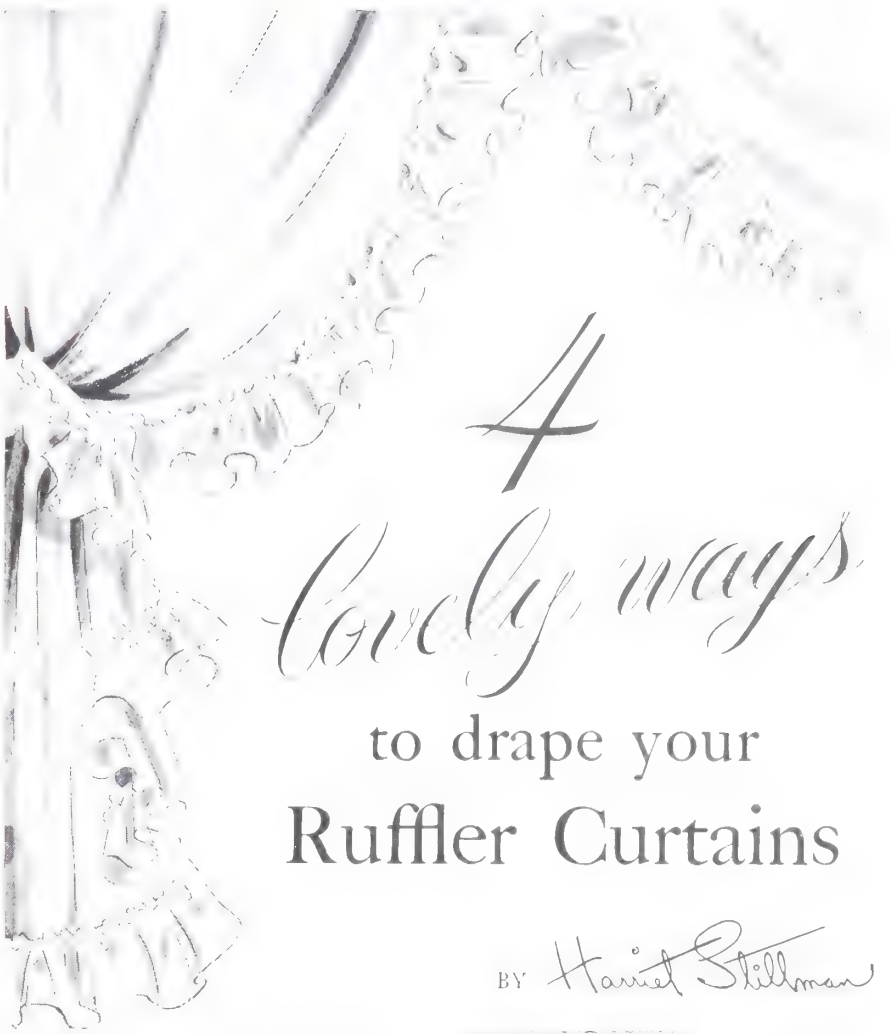
"Well, don't you think it's time we went to bed?" said Mrs. Cornish in her soft sweet voice.

She even sounds like cocoa, thought Jenny, but she rose without a word and the two women kissed each other good night on the upper landing.

Jenny went into the nursery and took Roger to the bathroom. Granny wants to have you, she thought as she held him. She wants you to stay here with her so that you can take your father's place and do everything she meant him to do. Only, she added, she didn't mean him to marry me.

She laughed a little and Roger, sensing that he was not the immediate center of her attention, began to wail. "Oh, come on," she scolded, "don't be silly. Finish what you're doing and get back to bed."

"It's a farewell party for Hamilton—he's running away tomorrow."



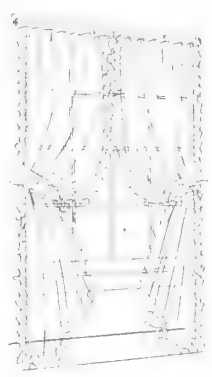
4 Lovely ways to drape your Ruffler Curtains

BY Harriet Stillman

I'm one of those artistic people, like most decorators, just crazy about ruffled curtains . . . especially when they're Vogue Ruffler Curtains . . . for their Ruffler style can be used in so many attractive ways.

Draped Swagger — two pairs

Sometimes, to make a lavish, dressed-up look, I like two pairs of Vogue Rufflers draped swagger fashion. See how graceful this can be.



Draped Priscilla style

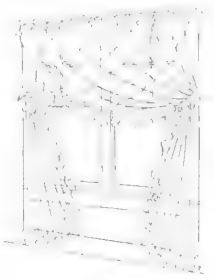
Here it's draped Priscilla style—crisp and dainty—a natural for informal decoration — inviting every ray of sunshine.

Then, there is the really simple and beautiful Ruffler hung straight, especially useful at French doors. If sewn to the bottom rod, it will open with the door like a straight hanging panel.

Watch for these Vogue Ruffler Curtains advertised by your favorite store in your choice of lovely fabrics — Bridal Veil, Clearweave, Cloudspun and Sheer-delite Marquisettes; Organet, Shadownet, Chifonese, Crown Tested Rayons, and Hathaway Dots.

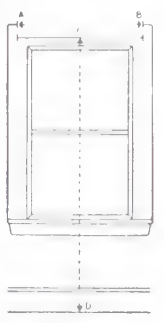
Draped Crisscross

In the wide widths, the Ruffler hung crisscross—in sheer, billowing folds—is a dream for picture windows, and just as charming across two small, side-by-side windows.



HOMEMAKERS, SEND FOR MY BOOKLET!

My booklet, "How to Curtain Your Windows," is chock-full of bright, easy-to-do window decoration ideas. Send 10¢ in coin and your name and address (please print) to Harriet Stillman, Robertson Factories, Inc., Department L-4, 321 Fifth Avenue, New York City.



ALWAYS THE DECORATOR'S FIRST CHOICE....

MEASURE YOUR WINDOWS BEFORE YOU BUY YOUR CURTAINS!

For length: Hold your tape measure one inch above the top of the rod, and measure to the sill for sill length curtains; to the bottom of the apron for apron length; to the floor for floor length. For width Measure the length of your curtain rod. Then be sure the width of each curtain in your pair measures the entire length of the rod. Note! Each crisscross curtain should be twice the length of rod.

Vogue Curtains

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ROBERTSON FACTORIES, INC. • 321 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

10 FACTORIES COAST TO COAST: Atlanta • Cincinnati • Cleveland • Detroit • Pittsburgh Los Angeles • Portland, Ore. • San Francisco • St. Paul • Taunton, Mass.

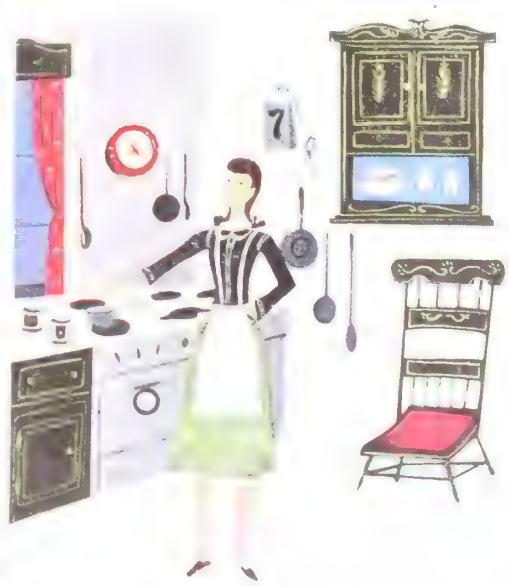
This kitchen clock starts to shout
When what's cooking should come out
It's a Telechron

The Telechron Minitmaster is a kitchen timer, as well as an electric clock. With a flick of the finger, you can set it to time anything you're cooking, for a single minute, or for sixty. Then it goes off to tell you when the time is up . . . and it's loud enough to be heard rooms away. Mighty handy for boiling eggs, and doing vegetables just right.

Minitmaster is perfect for keeping tabs on [illegible] too. And you can count on it to bring you right-up-to-the-minute time to work by. The electric Minitmaster never needs winding, or [illegible]. It brings you the [illegible] winning fame for the world's best buys in electric clocks. Red, green, white, and ivory. Sorry, no mail orders—see your Telechron dealer. $6.95 Plus Tax



Prices and specifications subject to change without notice.

Telechron
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
ELECTRIC CLOCKS

Telechron Inc., Ashland, Massachusetts

But Roger was enjoying the sensation of opening his mouth, and on their way back to the bedroom, Jenny saw Mrs. Cornish at her door.

"What's the matter, honey?" Mrs. Cornish called, and Roger, bawling even more, went to her, the tears popping out of his half-shut eyes.

Jenny waited while Mrs. Cornish patted Roger and drew him into her room for a funny little rhyme he always liked to hear. By the time Roger was back in his crib, Jenny had made up her mind.

In the morning after breakfast she went downtown, called at the bank, withdrew two hundred dollars, and made arrangements for transferring her account, after which she went to the station and bought her ticket. Then she ordered a taxi to come for her at four o'clock and went home, highly pleased with herself.

She thought it only fair to let Mrs. Cornish eat her lunch before she told her. She was determined to get the bank and station and taxi business all settled so that only packing stood in the way, and she could easily go on packing while Mrs. Cornish talked. She had cast out the temptation to wait until Mrs. Cornish was out for a full afternoon. It was the cowardly way out to run away, she decided. She would go away, but she would do it openly.

She had managed, a little before lunch, to pack some of Roger's things, and there was plenty of time to pack the rest. She waited until Ellen had brought the coffee, then she spoke.

"Mother Cornish, I've decided to go away for a while."

Mrs. Cornish's face puckered with annoyance. "Jenny darling, please don't start that all over again."

"I've got to tell you. I can't just go," Jenny said.

"We'll talk about it later on. You upset me quite enough last night."

Jenny began to lose patience. "There won't be time to talk later on. Roger and I are going today."

Mrs. Cornish looked at her sharply, as if she sensed the determination in Jenny's voice and everything it boded. "Where are you going?"

"New York."

"You're not going to take Roger with you!"

"Yes indeed I am. I wouldn't think of leaving him behind."

"To New York! You must be crazy."

"Why? Don't they allow babies in New York?"

Mrs. Cornish put down her coffee and came to sit by Jenny. "Jenny, you must put this silly notion of taking Roger to New York with you out of your mind. I know exactly how it is. You're tired and restless and it is a strain for a young girl like you, especially after everything that's happened, living in a house with an old lady. Go to New York, Jenny, or anywhere else you please. I'll give you any kind of holiday you want. Just send your bills to me. But please, please, don't take Roger with you. You won't have anything like a holiday with him to look after. Take several weeks, take until the spring if you like, and when you come back ——"

Jenny wrested herself away and walked over to the window. It was gray and cheerless outside. The half-thawed snow was dirty and the patches of grass were not yet the strong, pushing green of April.

"We're not coming back. Roger and I are going away to live. It may not be in New York, but that is where we shall start."

"I forbid it."

"You can't forbid me. I'm getting on for thirty."

"Oh! What would Roger have said?"

"Someday I've got to learn to look after myself. This life is too sheltered for me."

The foreman of a logging camp where 100 men and two women were employed was inclined to write lengthy reports. When some well-directed hints did not reach the foreman, the manager issued orders:

"Pat, I am a busy man. I haven't time to read long reports. Boil your reports down. Give me the facts in percentages."

Thus in the next report the manager read the following significant story:

"Last month 1 per cent of the men married 50 per cent of the women."

"It's the life you asked for when you married my son. He would have expected his own son to have his chances in life, his background. You don't understand what those things mean."

"I understand more than you think, Mother Cornish. You've been kind to me while I've been here, but lately I've felt that you've begun to expect me to stay here always, and that won't do. Someday, I might want a different kind of life. I might even want to marry again. We've got to be free to choose of our own accord."

There seemed to be nothing more to say at the moment, so Jenny walked out of the room and went upstairs to pack her suitcases. When she looked into the nursery and saw the white crib and the gay curtains looking so oddly out of place in the somber mansion, she cried a little for Mrs. Cornish's sake. It would be easy to soften and stay another year or two, but then it would be harder still to get away. There was no reason at all why she should feel obliged to stay in Creston.

She went on with her packing. Presently she heard Mrs. Cornish coming up the stairs, and in a moment she saw her standing in the doorway.

"I suppose everything is arranged," Mrs. Cornish said tonelessly.

"Yes, I did everything this morning," Jenny told her.

"You don't need any help then?"

"No, thank you. I really don't. The taxi is coming at four."

"Do you have anywhere to stay in New York?"

"I'll try the only place I know. I stayed there one night when I got off the boat."

"You'll let me know where you are?"

"Of course. I'm not running away from you. I just think it will be better for me and Roger to be independent."

"You realize that it is only because my son left you comfortably situated that you can afford to be so independent?"

"Yes indeed, although I like to think of him as my husband."

Mrs. Cornish came into the room and sat down. "Jenny, you hurt me terribly when you spoke so glibly of marrying again."

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean to hurt you, but you made me so angry."

Mrs. Cornish looked at the picture of Roger that still stood on the dressing table. "Do you think he would have liked to hear you speak as you did?"

Jenny took the picture in her hand and looked at it. "Mother Cornish," she said, "I loved Roger as much as I believe he loved me. If he had come back to me I would never have spoken or thought of other men like that. But just as a woman can have another child and not rob the first of any love, but have the love in her doubled for the two of them, so I believe I could love another man, now that Roger has been taken from me, without losing my love for Roger. If I had died when my baby was born, I believe Roger would have felt the same toward me. And yet, wouldn't it have been wrong for me, being dead, to expect him never to love another woman in the least?"

But Mrs. Cornish was hardly listening to what Jenny was saying. "We'll have tea a little earlier today so that you can have a last cup with me," she said, and she went downstairs to tell Ellen what had happened.

Jenny never forgot the somber, guilty quality of that last tea in the Cornish house. Ellen, the impeccable domestic, sniffed as she set down the tray, and Mrs. Cornish, bravely attempting to speak of other things, stabbed Jenny with every smile and every gracious handing of cup and plate and cake. It was so sorrowful and wearing that Jenny's heart seemed to leap for excitement when she

(Continued on Page 190)

"Want to see something New in furniture?"

A beautiful piece? My dear, you're looking at four separate pieces, grouped . . . two commodes and two shelf units. I simply chose units I wanted to combine. Mengel Furniture made it easy to express our ideas.

Now, look at this! See something familiar? Right . . . the two commodes again! But here they frame a chest with a shelf unit on top to make a buffet. I can separate these units to adapt them for almost any room.

Here again . . . in the bedroom . . . see what I mean! Two commodes, joined by a table and plate glass mirror, give me this lovely vanity. We chose these from a big variety of pieces that Mengel makes in this design.

On this side of the bedroom we combine two chests (you saw one in the dining room) to give us roomy "Mr. & Mrs." dressers. We can re-group if we want to . . . a dresser can become a buffet; a vanity, a desk.

E your own furniture designer. You can create many combinations from the 16 ces in this smart, modern grouping. Cool, tful Maltese gray solid oak; *Permanized Mengel to last a lifetime.

rmanized?" Why . . . haven't you heard? ngel has discovered a way to keep furni- e joints and veneered surfaces from coming art . . . regardless of climate. No matter w damp or dry . . . hot or cold!

So look for the "Mengel Man" trademark when you buy. It means modern ideas in furniture . . . and modest ideas in cost. In the meantime, use the coupon to get your free copy of our new booklet, "Let's Dress Up Your Bedroom."

The Mengel Company, Department 129, Louisville 1, Ky.

Please send me your free booklet "Let's Dress Up Your Bedroom."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____

The Flavor's All Yours...

when you smoke

PHILIP MORRIS!

CLEAN, FRESH, PURE

America's

FINEST Cigarette!

Any time you light up a PHILIP MORRIS—the flavor's ALL yours! And here's why . . .

There's an important difference in PHILIP MORRIS manufacture that lets the FULL FLAVOR of the world's finest tobaccos come through for your complete enjoyment — clean, fresh, pure!

That's why PHILIP MORRIS taste better—smoke better—all day long!

CALL FOR PHILIP MORRIS

ALWAYS BETTER...BETTER ALL WAYS

(Continued from Page 188)

heard the taxi draw up at the front gate. She sprang to her feet. Ellen was in the hallway, trying to smile a cheerful good-by and not succeeding very well. Jenny had a sudden vision of the first afternoon she had come into this house, of Catharine, of Sam! She had made a fool of herself last night. Sam was not likely to come near her any more. She wished it might have been otherwise.

The cab driver was carrying her suitcases. She turned in the hallway to kiss Mrs. Cornish good-by. For the first time it struck her now how very like the older Roger she was. She had noticed the resemblance before, but never so intensely. She gulped a little. It was, however, only a moment, and then it passed, and then she was down the steps and across the sidewalk into the cab, clutching Roger tightly. The great house slid back out of view and a whole part of her life seemed to go with it. She was suddenly older and yet in a curious way she felt more buoyant than she had felt for months.

She saw no one she knew as she followed the porter to the train and there were no more good-by's to say. She looked out the window at the gray-and-white street, just in case Sam might be there. But of course he had no idea that she was leaving, and after last night ——

Last night it had seemed so necessary that she tell him that she knew his secret. Today it had seemed not such a good idea. At least, she decided, her going away would be a relief to him. He would not have to see her again, unless he particularly wanted to, and after her stumbling offer to him it was more than likely that he would do his best to avoid her.

"Your mother's a clumsy idiot," she whispered to Roger. "She rushes at everything and blows it over before she can get it."

The train spurted a derisive whistle and Roger jumped. Then it started across the street lined with waiting cars and then behind the dingy houses of Collins Street, over the Tenth Street crossing, and presently into the thin dark woods on the outskirts of the town.

Roger fell asleep and Jenny sat and gazed at the darkening countryside, wondering what the life ahead of her would bring.

SAM pondered most of the night and all next day over Jenny's confession. There had been gladness and fear and relief in his first reaction, and it took him a while to sort it all out and separate his real feelings from the numbness of surprise.

By the late afternoon he had come to his decision, and after a dinner alone downtown, avoiding the Academy Club, he took the westbound bus to the Triangle, crossed the bridge and walked to the Cornish house.

Ellen told him in the hallway of Jenny's flight, and Sam was not surprised to find Mrs. Cornish in an aggrieved and indignant mood.

As Sam came into the room she rose to greet him. "Oh, Sam! I'm so glad you've come," she said. "The most dreadful thing has happened."

"Ellen told me."

"Why did she do it? What mistake did I make? Wasn't I kind to her?"

Sam tried to comfort Mrs. Cornish and at the same time reason independently Jenny's thinking and feeling and purpose in giving him no chance to tell her how he felt.

"She's so irresponsible," Mrs. Cornish went on. "There's no knowing what she'll do or what dreadful people she'll get mixed up with, and when I think what could happen to poor little Roger ——" Mrs. Cornish's lips quivered and Sam felt sorry for her.

"Jenny can take care of herself better than any other person I know. Remember that day she first landed here with that odd little fellow she picked up at the E... Station?"

"That's what I'm afraid of," said M... Cornish. "There's no knowing what s... might encourage in New York."

"I tell you what I'll do," said Sam, su... denly making up his mind. "I'll call and s... her just as soon as she lets you know wh... she is."

Mrs. Cornish stared. "But you are... going east until June."

"I have to go there about my job," Sa... lied. "I was thinking of going next week er... I'd have to miss a couple of classes, that's al... Then Sam, beginning to understand h... Jenny must have felt, trod cautiously a... with cunning. "I think," he said slowl... "that when you get over the shock of h... leaving so suddenly, you'll see the wh... thing from her point of view. This w... where she expected Roger to come for h... and complete their life together. Oh, ... know you have associations and memori... too, far more of them than Jenny, but you'... seen him here, you raised him in this hous... It's different for her. She never saw hi... here at all and every time she looks at y... she's reminded of her loss."

Mrs. Cornish nodded sympathetically, ... if she partly understood what he was driving a...

"This afternoon when you let her go... Sam went on, "you did the most sel... sacrificing thing you have ever done, a... I'm sure Jenny will always remember that."

Mrs. Cornish looke... surprised and there wa... a hint of pleasurab... appreciation in her fac... Sam felt encouraged.

"I can't help think... ing of the days lon... ago when you gav... those wonderfu... parties. That was be... fore I knew you, bu... people talked abou... them and about ho... you made yourself g... through with them, fo... Roger's sake, eve... though it hurt. An... now you're doing some... thing that hurts again... for Roger's wife, an... for his son."

By ten o'clock, over steaming cups o... cocoa, Mrs. Cornish was patiently and beau... tifully resigned to Jenny's desertion, an... Sam was triumphant and mildly surprise... that his conscience was not bothering him a... much as he expected.

It was a mild, windless night, and San... walked home to Marigold Street by way o... the south bridge, the winding road past th... lookouts, and the silent buildings of th... campus. He had kept Mrs. Cornish up a... hour or more later than her usual bedtime... and as he reached the sunken garden th... Arts Library Building clock struck twelve... The twelfth stroke clanged and diminishe... on the air, marking the close of the old lif... and the beginning of the new. It shocke... him how easily he had transferred his loneli... ness from Catharine to Jenny, but it was... natural enough, he argued. Catharine be... longed to the old life he longed to forget,... Jenny to the new, of which he longed to... be a part.

His impatience would protract this slum... berous winter into a dozen dragging years... before the stirring spring and fully awakened... summer came to release him from the bonds... of things done, the irrevocable things that... had enmeshed him and from which only... Jenny could take him far, so that he might... not be deeply hurt by them again.

In the motionless air every twig was still... and black, but against this wintry melan... choly Sam's visions danced gaily and... brightly. Yesterday and today had set a seal... upon the past. The last flourish had been put... to a pattern that was now finished and done... with. He could look to this past, but no... longer did he and Jenny belong to it. To... night he was cutting them wholly free.

(THE END)

NOTHING IS EASIER THAN—

Misunderstanding people.
Putting the worst construction on whatever anyone says.
Attributing imaginary and altogether wrong motives to the words and deeds of others.
Assuming that we are right.
Putting two and two together to make five.
Finding fault.
Jumping to wrong conclusions.
Forgetting what we have told everyone else to remember.

—H. L. GEE Another Cheerful Day (Methuen & Co., Ltd.).

Radiance is spelled: C-O-L-O-R... for the NEW "2-O-8" EVENING IN PARIS FACE POWDER enlivens your skin with a vivacious radiance of color.

Allure is spelled: P-E-R-F-U-M-E...

for this new face powder brings you, in an INTENSIFIED, more lasting form, the alluring perfume of EVENING IN PARIS!

and—
it covers and it clings and it covers and it clings!

"2-O-8" is the sensational new face powder process developed by the House of Bourjois! A modern miracle of jet-propulsion infuses every tiny powder particle with color and perfume at the rate of 2,048 miles a minute!

Covers so well it hides tiny surface flaws . . . and as for cling, you've never seen a powder stay on the way this does! It's moisture-resistant, too . . . which means the radiant color stays true on the skin.

$1 plus tax

NEW

Evening in Paris

Face Powder by BOURJOIS

NEW Clear-Base Box . . . it's transparent!

NEW true color . . . it's moisture-resistant!

NEW truer scent—it's intensified!

NEW long-clinging texture—it's vitalized!

NEW "2-O-8" process—it's exclusive!

IN YOUTH PREPARE FOR OLD AGE

Old age can bring with it pleasures • By George Lawton, Ph.D.

Consulting Psychologist, New York City

AT six, Johnny balks at eating rice pudding, makes a face and pushes away his plate. At 70, grandpa snorts, "Rice pudding!" flings down his napkin and stamps from the table. Threescore years apart, Johnny and grandpa are brothers. Years ago, the problem of raising a suitable crop of granddads wasn't important. Old age was rare. But Johnny has a life expectancy of 60, and in the year 2000, when he reaches that age, if present trends continue, there will be 30,000,000 persons over 60 in this country. Johnny will have plenty of company, and his behavior and that of other grandpas will be important.

If we do something about it now and help Johnny get emotionally in gear for smoother and happier going over life's rough road, we may hope to keep him from becoming like grandpa.

There is a story told about Aristotle: that a mother brought her child to him with a view of obtaining the benefit of his wisdom as to its upbringing.

"How old is your child, woman?"

"Three" was the reply.

"Alas," said Aristotle, "you are two years too late!"

Today psychologists are agreed that undesirable patterns of feeling and behaving, set up very early and reinforced by later childhood experiences, will show their effects over the entire life span, even sixty or seventy years later. It is in childhood, when we are most plastic, that we must do whatever we can to insure the proper adjustments later on.

Mrs. Peterson, faced by the immediate task of getting her Johnny fed, clothed and educated, may feel that the year 2000 is a long way off. It requires an immense effort of the imagination for her to think of what Johnny may be like at the age of her own father, and to speculate on whether some particular training he is getting now will be a hindrance or a help to him as a parent or grandparent. She is apt to feel all will be well once he is in high school, or when he goes to college, or once he is married. But life is a continuous experience, a succession of situations to be met. And Johnny is being equipped for this task, well or badly—now.

If it is hard for Johnny's mother to imagine what he will be like in old age, think of Johnny himself contemplating it. Ask him, "Have you ever thought of what you might be doing at sixty?" and he will laugh, "Oh, go 'way! That's a million years from now." To Johnny old age starts at that incredibly remote period of age 30. In fact, most of us, even Johnny's mother and father, regard later maturity as something that generally happens to other people.

What situations in old age, what problems of adjustment can we prepare for? Old people, in order to be healthy, physically and mentally, need to be active, and activity is best if it is a definite vocation, or an interest pursued seriously and systematically. Johnny will be fortunate if he has a trade in which his skills improve as he grows older, and where age will be an asset instead of a handicap. If he is trained for a profession or craft, he is not likely to find age a vocational bugaboo.

But most young people, as is perfectly natural, think of a job in terms solely of wage and of interest, and not about the obsolescence rate of skills used in a particular vocational field or whether or not it has a hiring-age dead line.

Psychologists talk about two different kinds of abilities: speed and power. We can consider a task solely in terms of the time necessary to complete it (speed), or we can think only of its completion regardless of the time it may take (power). Now we find that as a rule older people do not do so well as younger ones on speed tests. On power tests, older workers do almost as well as and sometimes even better than younger ones. Most work in this world is of a manual character, precisely the kind requiring abilities that decline rapidly with age. For this reason, every boy or girl who learns a trade the success of which depends mainly on speed, like a job on the assembly line, should be trained in one or two auxiliary occupations where power is the chief factor.

If economic conditions and American folkways remain in 2000 A.D. what they are today, we can expect most older men and women at that time to have even more leisure than they do at present. Since it is not easy to acquire new hobbies after 60, we should come into the homestretch equipped with devices for our spare time appropriate to our physical and mental needs.

No one now living can predict what kind of world Johnny will face in 2000. Nor can anyone tell what he himself will be like at 60. Yet there is one ability we know he will need, and that is the ability to face changes. We have to prepare not only for what is likely to happen, but for what now seems most unlikely.

It is fine for Johnny to play tennis. It also is fine if he can keep chasing around the courts even in his 40's or 50's. However, the years may present Johnny with arthritis, or proneness to back strains, or a heart condition. He may suffer a considerable impairment of vision and hearing. Changes like these will mean that if Johnny is to have an adequate recreational life, he must be willing and glad to learn new interests. If Johnny quite properly likes strenuous games in early maturity, he will most certainly have to replace them later on with less taxing ones, say golf. He may even be reduced to such a very tame and innocent sport as croquet, horseshoe pitching or shuffleboard.

THERE are penalties attached to the good fortune of having lived long, just as there are penalties connected with being alive at all. Perhaps they are not penalties; merely consequences. But whatever our attitude here, think of what it means for the solitary or incapacitated older person to know how to entertain himself. The man or woman over 60 is unusually fortunate who finds inside himself a means of contact with the world, some way of securing for himself a sense of achievement and personal worth. The older person who has no sedentary hobbies is poorly prepared for all those periods in which he may not be able to get about. If we are to anticipate all our needs as older people we must plan for this "bedtime" story, however hard it may be to render it heroic or adventurous.

Young people need to work off energy in strenuous sports. They also should join in games of a group nature. But over and above this, they should learn some hobbies and sports which require little bodily exertion and involve few or no other persons: walking, hiking, shuffleboard, horseshoes, quoits.

Knowledge of simple handicrafts such as weaving, carving, potterymaking proves useful, as does an acquaintance with card games and games like checkers, chess, solitaire, anagrams. Photography is another hobby which the older man can pursue with pleasure and which he can learn when he is young.

Though the aging process may bring severe losses of many kinds to us, imaginative and creative ability shows relatively little decline. If we look at this from the side of interest, the need for self-expression remains as keen over the life span as the need to love and be loved.

There is one legacy we can leave Johnny. We can equip our son with different devices for creation and (Continued on Page 195)

Reprinted from George Lawton's Aging Successfully. Copyright, 1944, by Columbia University Press.

lf-projection, and develop in him whatever fts he may have for performance and ap-eciation in music, painting, and so e can teach him to find beauty in nature, books, in people. He can learn to appreate dawns and sunsets, sand dunes and leaf tterns. The life of the imagination is as portant as any real one we can lead. It is nen we are young that the full resources
our imagination should be developed.
Only the old man dreams dreams who has en visions in his youth."

An old proverb holds: "Beware of the ung man who cannot cry and the old one o cannot laugh." It is good to encourage interest in the humorous programs on the dio and in humor generally, since this will
a great outlet in old age.

The more flexible Johnny's skills, the der his interests, the better able will he be face the world when he is older. But xibility in emotional reactions and attitudes
ll be equally important to him later on.
What makes a mind youthful? Princilly, it is the love of a new experience for its vn sake, a love strong enough to render all it major hazards worth facing. The young rson is curious, and it is this curiosity nich gives him his flexibility of mind and notion. Johnny turned adolescent, and sappointed in love, may vow never to look another girl as long as he lives. But then sees a new girl at school and his resolution es by the board—all because of his imagiation and investigatory
ipulse.

The youthful mentality
so judges each day in its vn terms. Here is Johnny bbing his sleep out of s eyes in a sunny roomg and all set to visit the each with some friends. If he is normal, he oesn't waste any time comparing this visit ith his previous ones. Nor will he stay ome because he is sure that the trip can't ossibly measure up to the others which he as taken.

This search for novelty, this pleasure and st in new and present experience, is what e mean by the youthful mind. With age, ne love of a challenge, the impulse to take o a scent and follow it no matter where—is mostly disappears. In one way, such a ss of mental bounce-and-go is desirable.
therwise we should never know the equally eat pleasures of stability and maturity.

BUT this preference for comfort instead of ovelty, and safety instead of adventure, is ten overdone. There are men and women, ren at 80 and 90, of whom we all say, "They ill never grow old." These are people who ways will retain the thrill that comes with scovery and exploration. If a person can o through life saluting each new situation
e faces, his mind and spirit will never grow d, no matter how weak and wasted his hysical frame may become.

On the other hand, we find some teen-age
oys and girls whose minds are prematurely
d, for they greet a new experience with,
This is going to be terrible. I wish I were ome other place."

In raising Johnny, Mrs. Peterson should m to encourage fixed attitudes where fundaental principles of living and basic in-grities of the person are involved. But to sist on conformity in less major matters of rsonal regimen and habits of daily routine ill unfit him for later life, since aging in self tends to make us more rigid and unelding.

Mrs. Peterson should teach Johnny to ugh it and to like roughing it. He should e able to sleep in beds other than his own
d to eat and enjoy cooking not like "mother ed to make." Johnny should be able on casion to watch calmly his daily routine go smash. Mrs. Peterson, of course, may ass out at such a critical moment, yet ven she will agree that grandpa would be uch more bearable if he realized there an be many different ways of doing a thing ell.

Life is full of detested rice pudding, and ohnny can do one of two things. He can take and like it or he can say "No"—provided he does not lose more by this refusal than he gains.

Johnny, in the pantaloon stage, may be living with his daughter-in-law. And suppose she is a normal, kind person busy with her own home, husband and children, and simply hasn't the time to cater to all her father-in-law's caprices or even legitimate likes and dislikes? Many a child goes from a doting mother to a wife who, in order to avoid constant squabbles, gives in to all the whims of a domineering husband. When the mate goes, he expects whoever replaces her as his caretaker to behave the same way.

BUT that is asking too much of nonmothers and nonwives, and so Mr. John Xavier Peterson (our Johnny, now age 6) in 2000 is hurt and confused by his daughter-in-law's neglect. He will continually face situations where things are done differently from what he had been accustomed to. There will be times when he should speak up in defense of his likes and dislikes, and times when group living or practical necessities do not allow any individual to be catered to. Mr. Peterson would be wiser to adapt himself to reality than to sulk. He should have learned that years before.

A complete preparation of Johnny for grandparenthood must include a philosophy of life to help him assimilate his later experiences. It will prove a great help to him if he learned as a very young child that life is a series of episodes the nature of which is unpredictable. "Time takes away these things and replaces them by other things." Whether one's present experience is happy or not, there is a fifty-fifty chance that it will be followed by one of an opposite kind. As a little poem, author unknown, put it:

> Humility is to make a right estimate of one's self.
> —C. H. SPURGEON.

This emotional flexibility is extremely important in the second half of life, since startling changes in [illegible] occur then.

There is one man ready for the worst old age can do. Disappointments and demotions cause him pain; they may even throw him off balance temporarily. But he survives and learns to accept each defeat as it comes, once he is sure that struggle is unavailing. This man always has believed his importance lay in what he is as a person and not in what he owns or whom he can impress. Some of us are born with such a philosophy, some acquire it, and some of us had it thrust upon us, but it is best if this attitude is bred in the bone when we are young.

While any particular problem we face in later life may seem quite different from those of our early years, the way we handle it often remains unchanged. Meet Mrs. Turner, age 67, upon whose judgment and resourcefulness every member of her family depends. Mrs. Turner is always glad to assume responsibility, but she was that way even as a little girl.

Now turn to Mr. Martin Robinson, 74, who is just as eager to avoid responsibility as Mrs. Turner is to assume it. Mr. Robinson has been doing this "getting from under" act for seventy years. At 4, when he let every other kid get at the sand pile and stood by watching helplessly, little Martin already had started making excuses for his defeats instead of learning from them.

Johnny today will never fight his own battles if he can get his parents and other grownups to extricate him from a difficult situation.

Let us press the button that will shift the scene ahead threescore years. Before us we see John X. Peterson in all his crotchety grandeur. Note how he enjoys the comforts of "life with his daughter-in-law." But he is taking his pleasures sadly and grudgingly.

Sometimes we face experiences in the same way at both ends of the life span; sometimes we repeat the very same experience. We saw that in the case of food prejudices. It is true

April Showers
PERFUME
The fragrance of youth!
Discover the new secret of April Showers . . . a dash of recklessness, a murmur of mystery, a breath of romance. Enchanting fragrance for enchanted hours!
Eau de Toilette $2.00
Dusting Powder $1.00
Perfume $7.50 $4.50 $1.25
—plus tax
CHERAMY frolic
PERFUME
PERFUMERS TO ROMANCE
It's for . . . the young . . . at heart, like you!
There's fresh bright magic in this gay perfume. Frolic whispers to you of night-hearted moments—joy that lingers in your heart and his!
Eau de Toilette $2.00 Dusting Powder $1.00 Talcum Powder 50c Perfume $7.50 $4.50 decorative size $1.25 —plus tax

Fashions for Kitchens

One glance at Daystrom's new kitchen sets will set your heartstrings a-strumming! Plastic table tops decorated with original Walter Dorwin Teague designs—each as gay and colorful as an ice ballet. Plus an exciting new decorating idea—a free kit of decals to match your table top motif—so you can be your own decorator and custom-style your kitchen.

Daystrom sets are heavily chrome plated. The tops are decorated laminated plastic—chip-proof, heat and stain resistant, washable. Set consists of extension table and 4 chairs luxury-upholstered in red, green or blue Duran.

Swedish Peasant Design Shown—a sophisticated interpretation of a provincial theme. Also, Strawberry Festival, Trojan, Nightingale, Floral Lace.

SEND FOR—"Fashion For Kitchens" New Free Booklet showing Daystrom sets in model kitchens, in full color. Write to Dept. LHJ-D.

DAYSTROM

TUBULAR CHROME KITCHEN Sets

DAYSTROM CORPORATION, OLEAN, NEW YORK

also of fears, temper tantrums, and so on. [illegible] Grandpa Peterson may have as great trouble in keeping himself occupied as does Johnny during the week ends and summers.

The chances are that any problem we leave unsolved in our childhood will remain unsolved until the end—however late this may come. Johnny, afraid of other boys and ready to attack them with words when he is safe out of reach, may turn into a sarcastic old man still using words as weapons.

Each stage of our life requires certain experiences for emotional growth and development. If we don't have them at the proper time, we will try to substitute similar experiences later on when they are entirely inappropriate. Grandpa Peterson is a good example.

Tom Peterson, as a child, had lost his mother and the kind of love that is all-accepting and all-forgiving. Thenceforth he lived among strangers. As an adult man he sought to get this uncritical lavish maternal love from a series of women he married. Unfortunately for men like Peterson, the love of a mate is not the same as the love of a mother. Mate love is the relationship of equals, it makes demands and sets standards. It is not all-accepting and all-forgiving. Unable to earn love by the giving of himself or by his kind acts, Peterson tried force and power instead. When we meet him battling with the rice pudding, he has been reduced to using petty situations to express resentment that "no one loves me" and to channel off his aggressive impulses. In old age, Peterson is still trying to enjoy an experience and satisfy a need that belonged to his childhood.

> Courage is not the absence of fear, but its conquest.
> —REV. JOSEPH DEGEN.

Children need to have their questions answered satisfactorily. They also need as tiny tots to have certain real experiences. The persistent search for answers and experiences belonging to our earliest years occurs not only in the sex field, but in other areas of human behavior as well. For example, our religious attitudes, the way we face death and what lies beyond the grave, are to be explained by what happened to our questions and our attempt at experimentation when we were very young.

A SURPRISING fact about human development is that the childhood of any particular person is mirrored more closely by his old age than by the years 20-60, though the latter are nearer to it in time. In a sense, maturity is a detour on the road from childhood to old age. There is profound truth in the saying, "Old age is a second childhood." Indeed, it is a first childhood over again.

Here is Helen, age 12, lonely, living almost entirely in her daydreams and achieving all her successes in that twilight zone. Helen wants friends, not only as comrades, but as subjects of the Queen. Alas, her kingdom contains none of these.

Certain people are what we call "isolates." Throw them into the very center of a group, and through some sort of social centrifugal force they soon end up on the side lines; they have no apparatus for taking hold in group situations and hanging on. Other people, placed in a strange environment, soon send out feelers and become a definite part of the new little world.

Helen is an "isolate" at least until she reaches 21 and she marries. Then for the next twenty-five years, Helen undergoes what seems to be quite a transformation. "You would never know Helen," her former schoolmates exclaim to one another. "She seems so secure and happy." Because Helen receives the homage of the world, her husband and three children and is so busy raising a family and entertaining the friends and business associates of her husband, she never notices her essential loneliness.

But the children grow up and leave the kingdom. The royal consort passes away, or the royal exchequer is not what it used to be.

At 65 or 70, Helen is back where she was at 12. Once again she is a lonely little queen. If you look hard, you will discover, underneath her gray hair, the scared little girl of fifty years before. Thrown back upon her own inner resources, something she never had, Helen leads an empty, bitter life. Though she tries to extract some strength and glory from her memories, these offer little nourishment.

The life of man resembles very much the familiar comment on history, "The more it changes, the more it remains the same thing." Helen should blame her loneliness, not on the years she has lived, but on the kind of person she is and has always been. We are personalities, strategies, philosophies facing the world—not hourglasses or calendars.

WE all have met dramatic examples of the "all-or-none" type of person who won't "play" unless every condition he lays down is granted. There is no objection to moral heroes. They have their time and place, and it is a fine and noble thing that people should be willing to sacrifice and, if necessary, die for certain ideals. But the well-adjusted person economizes on the number of things he will die for. Otherwise, he will always be living beyond his moral budget. No one can afford to do that.

The happiest old person is one who can take hold or let go of situations quickly as the need may arise. His emotions and interests are strong and relatively permanent when going full force, but they can be regulated in a way to make for satisfactory relationships with people. When no tremendous principle is at stake, the well-adjusted person is willing to compromise and follow a "live and let live" philosophy. This ability to discriminate between issues on which we may yield, and those on which we should stand firm, is one of the gifts of maturity in many people. But it is an ability which parents and adults might try to cultivate in the young.

Two thirds of the people over 65 in this country are financially dependent, and the same number also suffer from some chronic illness. The great problems of old age, therefore, are economic and medical. It would be impossible to anticipate all the medical needs we may have as old people. Proper dietary and living habits, as well as regular medical and dental examinations throughout the life span—these represent a minimum of preparation.

As for the economic requirements, it is easy to tell people to save for their old age and in that way avoid dependence on children, private charity or public assistance. Building up an adequate reserve is enormously difficult even though we try our hardest. Man proposes; our economic system disposes.

Children and young adults should have as good a time as possible, and we must be moderate in all things—even in preparing for old age.

Yet consider this: Johnny is only 12. By the grace of God and the life-expectancy tables, he should live a long time. He will still want some fun and comfort when he is 40, and he will want the same thing when he is 70. The saying, "Eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die," might be worth following if the prophecy really were fulfilled. Generally, we don't die. We merely suffer or enjoy, and what we hope for but don't expect actually happens: we live long. Without any real preparation we have reached later maturity.

For centuries we have repeated, "If youth only knew and age only could."

Perhaps if we were to study the situations which we face as old people and then see how certain childhood experiences either help or hurt our chances of meeting these situations successfully, age might be a period in which we not only "knew" but also "could."

From the poets come two messages for youth. The first is none too certain:

To One Yet Young

How can I tell you what you wish to know
My youth, my hopes, the way my parents had me grow?

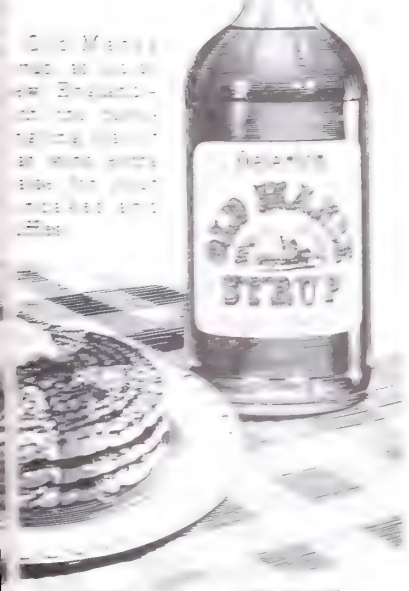
true MAPLE TASTE!



OLD MANSE
SYRUP

THE CHORE GIRL

Got a Cat?
CATS MAGAZINE

EARLY VARIETIES

TOMATO-AND-CLAM CONSOMME

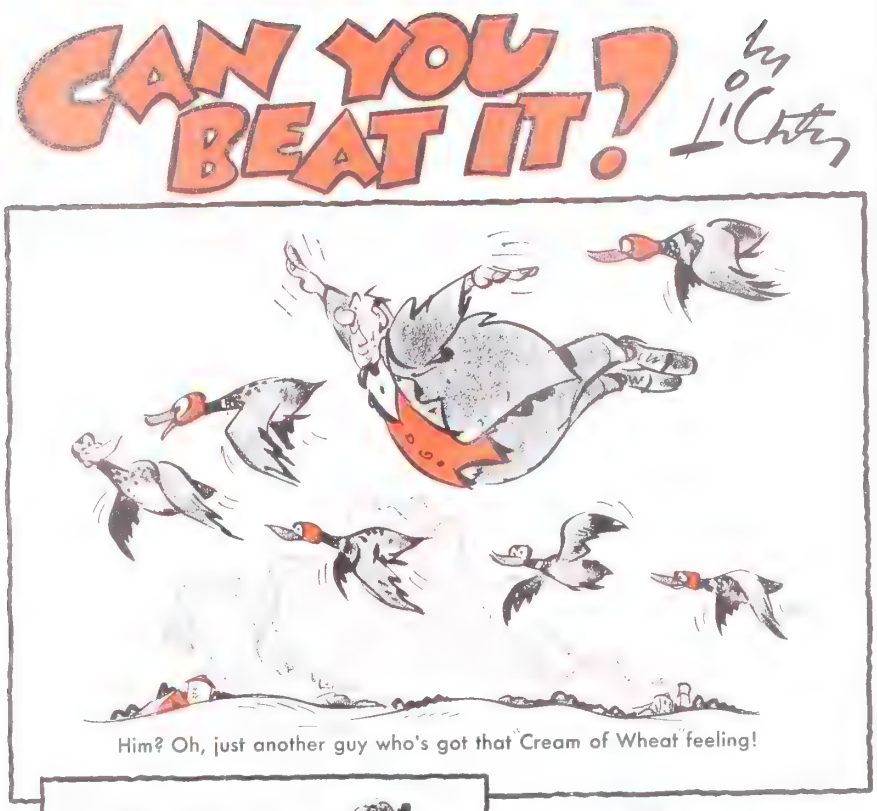
BROILED STUFFED
LAMB PATTIES

Ever Bake a Picture Cake?

TRY THIS RECIPE FOR EASTER. IT'S FUN WHEN YOU DO IT ALL WITH SPARKLING PYREX WARE

Sift flour once, then measure. Sift flour and dry ingredients together. Add egg yolk to sugar. Now mix well. Pour boiling water over shortening in PYREX measure. Add to mixture and beat . . . POUR into greased PYREX CAKE DISH and bake.

"PYREX" IS THE REGISTERED TRADE MARK OF CORNING GLASS WORKS IN THE UNITED STATES AND IN CANADA OF CORNING GLASS WORKS OF CANADA LTD.



CAN YOU BEAT IT?
Him? Oh, just another guy who's got that Cream of Wheat feeling!
It's the only way Pop can get some Cream of Wheat for himself!
Sorry, Snodgrass—must be the Iron in your "Enriched 5 Minute Cream of Wheat!"
BIG BOWL GIVES YOU ALL THE BLOOD-BUILDING IRON NEEDED IN EACH DAY'S DIET
PLUS EXTRA CALCIUM, PHOSPHORUS AND VITAMIN B1
PLUS HEAPS OF "GET-UP-AND-GO" FOOD-ENERGY!
—AND ALL FOR LESS THAN 1¢ A SERVING!
YOU CAN'T BEAT IT... GET THAT
CREAM OF WHEAT
FEELING!

ready to broil. Peel and separate 2 oranges for garnishing the platter.

Not special—but good. I don't care what teacher says, I think potatoes are top-flight. Cook them most any way, and if they're cooked right, you can't make me mad. Why, do you know that not so long ago the governor of Idaho, himself in person, sent me a box of Idaho's gift to a better world? Each potato weighed at least a pound, all done up in their paper Mother Hubbards, scrubbed and just screaming to be baked. They were—and eaten. It was a present to make the eyes shine, and I guess Idaho must be a pretty wonderful place, with a wonderful governor.

The cream does it. No potato is better than the way it's cooked. Take a baked potato now. (Take two, but not two Idahos—you'd fail on the second round.) When it is baked so a fork goes in like a knife through butter, you should split it lengthwise—up and down, you know, for no baked potato does as well cut open crossways. Now take a silver fork and break up—not mash—the meat inside the crackling shell; but break it lightly and firmly and apply a large square of sweet butter or margarine, salt and pepper it. Then pour in a tablespoon or so of hot heavy cream. Mix with the fork once more. Reheat for five minutes. That, dear friends, is a baked potato.

This is not that. To go with the lamb patties, serve the new and very young potatoes creamed. Don't hesitate. Done well, they're delicious, also they supply that very necessary sauce. But—when there's a steak coming up, or a loin of pork or pork chops, get out my few words on the baked potato—and go thou and do likewise!

CREAMED NEW POTATOES WITH CHIVES

Allow at least 3 small new potatoes for each service—might have a few extra too; don't do too much counting. Scrape or peel them thinly. Cook in boiling salted water until just tender. Drain and add 1 quart rich well-seasoned cream sauce, of the light kind. Let's not have any paste. You know how I feel about that. Add 2 tablespoons finely minced chives. Oh, by the way, the smaller the new potato, the better it is. Little immature things, they have much to commend them. They must never be baked. It goes to their heads and they become totally uninhibited.

There was a time. Quite some years back I embarked on a regime of dieting. You see, I had purchased at great agony of mind and pocketbook a perfectly divine evening dress. It was a honey. It still is. One of those gowns that are never out of style, one to steal the show and attract the spotlight as Edison's invention gets the moths spinnin of a summer evening. That sort of dress.

Shutting my eyes to consequences. Well, naturally with such a dress I also em barked on a splurge of dinners and partie and goings on that involved rich food an plenty of it. And the day came, creeping u on me all unawares, the awful day cam when bursting from the seams, an unsightl bulge appeared where no bulge was intende And dieting loomed like a specter out of haunted house. And that meant salads. N the salads we know, just greens with salt an pepper and hot-foot it to the scales. Bu finally it worked; I grew the other way, bu fast. Out of the drawer came my dress an lo, it fitted! Ups and downs have come upo me since, but I can still wear that gow When I get a chance. I felt you should kno how close I am to your problems and how have shared them through the years. You understand, don't you?

An early salad. This is a salad right i season—and good at any time. But to g along with our story, let's call it somethin Let's call it ——

EARLY VARIETY SALAD

For the salad use the Boston lettuce (I yours ready yet? If not, use lettuce tha isn't Boston. It all has leaves), slice radishes and chopped scallions. Plenty o lettuce, a bunch of radishes and a bunc of scallions ought to do it. Season wit salt and pepper and toss with French mushroom dressing: ½ cup finely choppe raw mushrooms added to 1 cup Frenc dressing. As usual, the salad has to be col as icicles and dressed the last thing. Bu you know all that.

Someday I shall discuss it. I mean th question, hard-cooked versus hard-boile eggs. A hard-cooked egg might be a fried egg yes, I know about that—a poached egg, a omelet or a scrambled egg. Would you pl any of these unfortunate things in anythin especially in a dish of greens? No, it has be hard-boiled, and on that premise I tal my stand and stand like the minuteman Concord. (Or is it Lexington?) Anywa that's the stand I take.

BEET GREENS WITH EGGS

Wash 2 or 3 pounds young tender be greens. Never spare the water—they co lect sand like spinach. And I guess y know about that. Cook in a small qua tity of boiling salted water until just te der. They take just a little longer tha spinach, so keep an eye on them. Remen ber this is their first time out and they' flighty. Drain them very well indeed. Se son with salt and pepper and 2 tablespoo vinegar. Slice 2 or 3 hard-boiled eggs a garnish the greens.

"The one with the bow tie—he's chapter ten in my diary!"

OR COFFEE WITH THAT "Master Chef" Flavor
E SURE YOU BREW IT IN Vaculator
T.M. REG.

h the
F.C.
TOMATIC
VOR
NTROL
thless ilter

nous chefs from coast to coast
Make GOOD coffee, and proudly boast:
o make your coffee rich in flavor,
Always brew it in VACULATOR!"

Vaculator
CHICAGO 6, U. S. A.

Many a time and oft. How many times I've strung my lyre and warbled a piece about rolls. I admire always the maker of first-rate rolls. It's curious that so many people think they're hard to make, take forever, are fussy and frivolous, when they are about as simple as anything I can name. And from the "setting" to the eating, among the most delicious things to come out of the oven. Quick too. The secret is in using enough yeast. And there are one or two other secrets too. But, as I said, I've told you about all I know, over and over again. However, here's another version, and may all good luck attend you.

CHEESE REFRIGERATOR ROLLS

Break up 2 cakes fresh yeast. Add ¼ cup sugar. Let stand 20 minutes. Scald 1 cup milk. Add ½ cup butter or margarine and 1 teaspoon salt. Cool to lukewarm. Add the yeast mixture and 3 well-beaten eggs. Add 1 cup dry grated sharp cheese. Work in 4½ cups flour. Mix thoroughly. This is quite a stiff dough, and that's all right this time. Turn out on a lightly floured board and knead until satiny. Place in a greased bowl. Cover and let it rise until twice the bulk. Keep it in a warm room. Punch down. Form into a smooth ball. Grease the dough with butter or margarine. Cover with a cloth and a cover and put the dough in the refrigerator. When wanted, take a piece out of the refrigerator and let it stand, covered, in a warm room about an hour before shaping into rolls. Make them in any shapes you like. Let them rise until twice the bulk. (That's an old bread-making cliché. It means twice what they started out to be.) Bake at 375° F., about 15 minutes. This receipt gets you around fifty rolls, so figure how much you need to cut off each time, for this dough will keep a week in the refrigerator. But keep it covered.

Flowers and flowerpots. Just what you transplant those tiny seedlings into, those are what the dessert has shown up in, and a very smart idea it is too. Right in line with spring and everything. Be sure to buy brand-new and small flowerpots. They ought to hold a sherbet glass of ice cream. Then a nice idea is to cover the ice cream with stiff whipped cream, sweetened and flavored, then go ahead with a real layer of chocolate "shot" or grated chocolate. Vanilla is the best ice cream for this, I think—goes best with chocolate. What do you think of it? Dying to know.

FIRST FLOWERS DESSERT

Scrub the flowerpots and dry them inside and out. Line them with paper linings bought or made by you. Fill with ice cream and sprinkle tops with grated unsweetened chocolate. And sprinkle it thick; don't skimp on this. Make flower cookies from any good sugar-cooky dough. Stick the stems of the cookies in the ice cream. To make the cookies: Roll out the dough; cut in the shape of a flower with a strip for the stems. Lay on a greased cooky sheet several inches apart. Cut a little of the dough for leaves. Stick to the stems. Cut out by hand or with a scalloped cutter for the flowers and attach stem strip and leaves. Use pieces of candied cherries to make the centers of the flowers. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., until barely brown and very crisp.

Happy April to you. It does seem that to keep "happy" bottled up for New Year's is just too silly. April's a lot more exciting than any old January first. As for me, I'm in favor of starting a new year whenever I see fit. If I want to say "Happy April Fools' Day" that's my business. Or isn't it? I think so.

I've started you off on your seed packages and seed beds and flowerpots in great shape, so now all I have to add is—"Happy gardening!" Have fun showing up with the things you like best, cooked as you like them. Boast all you want to—I'm with you. An old hand at it—and at nothing do I do a better job than when I get my hands on half a pound of early peas, some string beans and that midget corn from my own garden. Then watch me go. Hear me brag. See the cutworms run.

THE END

fish THAT'S delish

French's
WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE
gives wonderful flavor

For Baked Fish: Pour off all but 2 tbs. of the drippings from the fish and blend in 1 or 2 tbs. flour. Add slowly 1 cup hot stock or bouillon. Season with 3 tsp. French's Worcestershire Sauce.

TOP-NOTCH QUALITY AT half the price

Summer Sunshine for your Winter Breakfast

It took months of warm summer sunshine to bring this dish of prunes to your breakfast table. Months of summer sunshine that packed them full of wholesome goodness . . . made them rich in sweet prune flavor.

For these are SUNSWEET Prunes!

They were not picked like other fruit, but were allowed to hang in the sunshine until so plump and heavy with juicy goodness they dropped from the trees of their own weight.

Prunes like these make a great start for a grand day . . . a regular day . . . for prunes really DO something for you.

SUNSWEETS are "Tenderized" for quick-cooking and better eating, sealed in foil for perfect protection, packed and guaranteed by the growers themselves. For free illustrated Recipe Book, address SUNSWEET, Box R, San Jose 5, California.

SUNSWEET TENDERIZED PRUNES
Also "Tenderized" PEACHES and APRICOTS and SUNSWEET (the original) PRUNE JUICE
Packed by CALIFORNIA PRUNE AND APRICOT GROWERS ASS'N
San Jose, California

CAPE COD crystal ... is unsurpassed in beauty ... expresses faithfully the charm of traditional ... home distinction. Open stock pieces in the most extensive ... hand-engraved by skilled workmen of

IMPERIAL GLASS CORPORATION, BELLAIRE, OHIO

ONCE AND FOR ALL

... got to be the one to take care of him. You'll ... have to be the one to train him to stay at ... leg drop awkwardly. It must be uncomfort- ... able." She looked down at him tenderly. ... "If you hate ... you must ... and "like the Wil- ...

No, he was not there. She stood irreso- ... lute in the roadless, green-walled triangular ... pasture, wondering what to do next.

Then before she knew what thought had ... come into her mind its emotional impact ... knocked her down. At least her knees ... crumpled under her. The Wilsons had, last ... Wednesday, brought their sheep down from ... the far upper pasture, to the home farm. ... They were—she herself had seen them on her ... way to school, and like an idiot had not ... thought of Rollie—on the river meadow.

SHE was off like a racer at the crack of the ... starting pistol, her long, strong legs stretched ... in great leaps, her pigtails flying. She took ... the short cut, regardless of the brambles. ... Their thorn-spiked, wiry stems tore at her ... flesh, but she did not care. She welcomed ... the pain. It was something she was doing ... for Rollie, for her Rollie.

She ... in the next words ... rushing ... down the steep, stony path, tripping over ... roots ... recovering herself just in ... time, ... slackening her ... speed. She burst out on ... the open knoll above the ... river ... calling ... wildly. "Rollie, here, ... Rollie, here, boy! Here! ... Here!" She tried to ... whistle, but she was cry- ... ing too hard to pucker her ...

There was nobody to ... see ... Twi- ... light was ... over the ... bare, grassy knoll. The ... sunless evening wind slid ... down the mountain like ... an invisible river, engulf- ... ing her in cold. Her teeth ... began to chatter. "Here, ... Rollie, here, boy, here!" ... She strained her eyes to ... look down into the mead- ... ow to see if the sheep ... were there. She could not ... be sure. She stopped ... calling him as she would ... a dog, and called out his ... name despairingly, as if ... he were her child. "Rol- ... lie! Oh, Rollie, where are ...

The tears ran down ... her cheeks in streams. ... She sobbed loudly, ter- ... ribly; she did not try ... to control herself, since ... there was no one to ... hear. "Hou! Hou! Hou!" she sobbed, her ... face contorted grotesquely. "Oh, Rollie! ... Rollie! Rollie!" She had wanted something ... to cry about. Oh, how terribly now she had ... something to cry about.

She saw him as clearly as if he were there ... beside her, his muzzle and gaping mouth all ... [illegible] the ... [illegible] But he didn't know it was ... wrong!" she screamed like a wild creature. ... [illegible] It was my ... fault. I should have made better ... him ... I will now, I will!"

But ... she screamed she ... could not make herself heard. In the cold ... gathering darkness, she saw him stand, poor, ... guiltless victim of his ignorance, who should ... have been protected from his own nature, his ... beautiful soft eyes looking at her with love, ... his splendid plumed tail waving gently. "It ... was my fault. I promised I would bring him ... up. I should have made him stay at home. I ... was responsible for him. It was my fault."

But she could not make his executioners ... hear her. The shot rang out. Rollie sank ... down, his beautiful liquid eyes glazed, the ... blood spurting from the hole in his head— ... like the Wilsons' collie. She gave a wild ... shriek, long and sustaining, frantic. It was ... the scream at sudden, unendurable tragedy ... of a mature, full-blooded woman. It drained ... dry the girl of thirteen. She came to herself

Moon Lost

By Patricia McDonald

... Lady of the Snow, ... [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible]

COLBR CROALE PUP CRN BOX 1 PEATHER JAMES ROBINSON NO ANTIQUE COLLECTION

More than a century of incomparable craftsmanship

WALLACE STERLING

All Sterling is silver clear through—but there must be genuine artistry in its "working" to make a Sterling truly precious. Look for things like carving in complete contour, delicacy of detail, perfect balance—both in weight and in line. These are qualities which in their epitome of projection spell that exclusively Wallace Third Dimension Beauty which sight alone can fully describe. Wallace is unchallengeable in terms of craft as well as great design. From left to right these exclusively Wallace patterns with third dimension beauty: Rose Point, Stradivari, Sir Christopher, Grand Colonial, Grande Baroque. Six-piece place settings (luncheon knife, luncheon fork, teaspoon, cream soup spoon, salad fork, butter spreader) about $25 to $30.

Ask for Wallace Sterling Silver Polish—saves effort, preserves beauty.

Wallace Silversmiths, Wallingford, Conn. • Since 1835 • R. Wallace & Sons of Canada, Ltd., Toronto, Ontario

THE CHOICE YOU MAKE ONCE FOR A LIFETIME...THAT'S WHEN NOTHING LESS THAN THE FINEST WILL SATISFY

FRESH AS A FIT AS A
THAT'S THE Sealy
FEELING
SLEEP ON A Sealy MATTRESS
You feel fresh... and look fresh... when you wake up rested and relaxed. Enjoy that supremely soothing SEALY feeling.
SEALY Innerspring Mattress
SEALY Air-Woven Tuftless Mattress
Your dealer now offers both of these fine mattresses. Choose either for truly refreshing sleeping comfort.
Sealy INC.
666 LAKE SHORE DRIVE CHICAGO 11, ILLINOIS
Sealy
Sleeping on a Sealy is like sleeping on a cloud

(Continued from Page 200)

She was standing on the knoll, trembling and quaking with cold, the darkness closing in on her.

Her breath had given out. For once in her life she had wept all the tears there were in her body. Her hands were so stiff with cold she could scarcely close them. How her nose was running! Simply streaming down her upper lip. And she had no handkerchief. She lifted her skirt, fumbled for her slip, stooped, blew her nose on it, wiped her eyes, drew a long quavering breath—and heard something! Far off in the distance, a faint sound, like a dog's muffled bark.

She whirled on her heels and bent her head to listen. The sound did not come from the meadow below the knoll. It came from back of her, from the Wilsons' maple grove higher up. She held her breath. Yes, it came from there. She began to run again, but now she was not sobbing. She was silent, absorbed in her effort to cover ground. If she could only live to get there, to see if it really were Rollie. She ran steadily till she came to the fence, and went over this in a great plunge. Her skirt caught on a nail. She impatiently pulled at it, not hearing or not heeding the long sibilant tear as it came loose. She was in the dusky maple woods, stumbling over the rocks as she ran. As she tore on up the slope she knew it was Rollie's bark.

She stopped short and leaned weakly against a tree, sick with the breathlessness of her straining lungs, sick in the reaction of relief, sick with anger at Rollie, who had been here having a wonderful time while she had been dying, just dying in terror about him.

For she could now not only hear that it was Rollie's bark; she could hear, in the dog language she knew as well as he, what he was saying in those excited yips: that he had run a woodchuck into a hole in the tumbled stone wall, that he almost had him, that the intoxicating wild-animal smell was as close to him—almost—as if he had his jaws on his quarry. Yip! Woof! Yip! Yip!

Carlyle says, "My father had one virtue which I should try to imitate—he never spoke of what was disagreeable and past, and my mother was the same: she turned her back at once upon the last months, which she put away forever like a sealed volume."

—AUGUSTUS HARE: The Story of My Life: Quoted in Character and Conduct (Henry Young & Sons).

The wild, joyful quality of the dog talk enraged the girl. She was trembling in exhaustion, in indignation. So that was where he had been, when she was killing herself trying to take care of him. Plenty near enough to hear her calling and whistling to him, if he had paid attention. Just so set on having his foolish good time, he never thought to listen for her call.

She stooped to pick up a stout stick. She would teach him! It was time he had something to make him remember to listen. She started forward.

But she stopped, stood thinking. One of the things to remember about collies—everybody knew that—was their sensitiveness. A collie who had been beaten was never "right" again. His spirit was broken. "Anything but a broken-spirited collie," the farmers often said. They were no good after that.

She threw down her stick. Anyhow, she thought, he was too young to know, really, that he had done wrong. He was still only a puppy. Like all puppies, he got perfectly crazy over wild-animal smells. Probably he really and truly hadn't heard her calling and whistling.

All the same, all the same—she stared intently into the twilight—he couldn't be let to grow up just as he wanted to. She would have to make him understand that he mustn't go off this way by himself. He must be trained to know how to do what a good dog does—not because she wanted him to, but for his own sake.

She walked on now, steady, purposeful, gathering her inner strength together, Olympian in her understanding of the full meaning of the event.

When he heard his own special young god approaching, he turned delightedly and ran to meet her, panting, his tongue hanging out. His eyes shone. He jumped up on her in an ecstasy of welcome and licked her face.

But she pushed him away. Her face and voice were grave. "No, Rollie, no!" she said severely. "You're bad. You know you're not to go off in the woods without me! You are—a—bad dog."

He was horrified. Stricken into misery. He stood facing her, frozen, the gladness going out of his eyes, the erect waving plume of his tail slowly lowered to slinking, guilty dejection.

"I know you were all wrapped up in that woodchuck. But that's no excuse. You could have heard me, calling you, whistling for you, if you'd paid attention," she went on. "You've got to learn, and I've got to teach you."

With a shudder of misery he lay down, his tail stretched out limp on the ground, his head flat on his paws, his ears drooping—ears ringing with the doomsday awfulness of the voice he so loved and revered. He must have been utterly wicked. He trembled, and turned his head away from her august look of blame, groveling in remorse for whatever mysterious sin he had committed.

She sat down by him, as miserable as he. "I don't want to scold you. But I have to! I have to bring you up right, or you'll get shot, Rollie. You mustn't go away from the house without me, do you hear, never!"

Catching, with his sharp ears yearning for her approval, a faint overtone of relenting affection in her voice, he lifted his eyes to her, humbly, soft in imploring fondness.

"Oh, Rollie!" she said stooping low over him. "I do love you. I do. But I have to bring you up. I'm responsible for you, don't you see?"

He did not see. Hearing sternness, or something else he did not recognize, in the beloved voice, he shut his eyes tight in sorrow, and made a little whimpering lament in his throat.

She had never heard him cry before. It was too much. She sat down by him and drew his head to her, rocking him in her arms, soothing him with inarticulate small murmurs.

He leaped in her arms and wriggled happily as he had when he was a baby; he reached up to lick her face as he had then. But he was no baby now. He was half as big as she, a great, warm, pulsing, living armful of love. She clasped him closely. Her heart was brimming full, but calmed, quiet. The blood flowed in equable gentleness all over her body. She was deliciously warm. Her nose was still running a little. She sniffed and wiped it on her sleeve.

It was almost dark now. "We'll be late to supper, Rollie," she said responsibly. Pushing him gently off, she stood up. "Home, Rollie, home!"

Here was a command he could understand. At once he trotted along the path toward home. His plumed tail, held high, waved cheerfully. His short dog memory had dropped into oblivion the suffering just back of him.

Her human memory was longer. His prancing gait was as carefree as a young child's. Plodding heavily like a serious adult, she trod behind him. Her very shoulders seemed bowed by what she had lived through. She felt, she thought, like an old, old woman of thirty. But it was all right now. She knew she had made an impression on him.

When they came out into the open pasture, Rollie ran back to get her to play with him. He leaped around her in circles, barking in cheerful yawps, jumping up on her, inviting her to run a race with him, to throw him a stick, to come alive.

His high spirits were ridiculous. But infectious. She gave one little leap to match his. Rollie pretended that this was a threat to him, planted his forepaws low and barked loudly at her, laughing between yips. He

"I should Worry I should care"

Even a millionaire can't have more perfect toilet bowl sanitation than you can. Sani-Flush gives you complete clearliness and odorless freshness by its thorough, disinfecting chemical action. Cleans away stains and film where germs lurk . . . is quick, easy, sanitary. There's no work. Just sprinkle Sani-Flush.

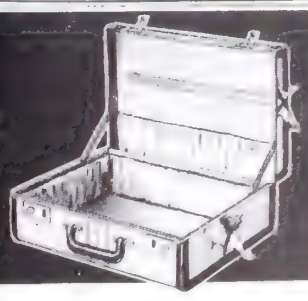
Safe with septic tank systems. Effective in hard or soft water. Sold everywhere. Two convenient sizes.

Sani-Flush

USE TWICE A WEEK

IF YOU HAVE A SEPTIC TANK

You'll be interested in a free, scientific report that proves Sani-Flush will not injure septic tanks or hinder their action when used to clean toilet bowls. Address The Hygienic Products Co., Dept. 201, Canton 2, Ohio.



FIXES

LUGGAGE, FURNITURE, DISHES, TOYS & BOOKS

It's transparent, waterproof, flexible and durable. Get a tube today.

DUCO CEMENT

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

TRY IT FOR DELICIOUS FLAVOR

GRAVY MASTER

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

NOT JUST A COLOR

was so funny, she thought, when he grinned that way. She laughed back, and gave another mock-threatening leap at him. Radiant that his sky was once more clear, he sprang high on his steel-spring muscles in an explosion of happiness, and bounded in circles around her.

Following him, not noting in the dusk where she was going, she felt the grassy slope drop steeply. Oh, yes, she knew where she was. They had come to the rolling-down hill just back of the house. All the kids rolled down there, even the little ones, because it was soft grass without a stone. She had rolled down that slope a million times—years and years ago, when she was a kid herself. It was fun. She remembered well the whirling dizziness of the descent, all the world turning over and over crazily. And the delicious giddy staggering when you first stood up, the earth still spinning under your feet.

"All right, Rollie, let's go," she cried, and flung herself down in the rolling position, her arms straight up over her head.

Rollie had never seen this skylarking before. It threw him into almost hysterical amusement. He capered around the rapidly rolling figure, half scared, mystified, enchanted.

His wild frolicsome barking might have come from her own throat, so accurately did it sound the way she felt—crazy, foolish, like a little kid, no more than five years old, the age she had been when she had last rolled down that hill.

At the bottom she sprang up, on muscles as steel-strong as Rollie's. She staggered a little, and laughed aloud.

The living-room windows were just before them. How yellow lighted windows looked when you were in the darkness going home. How nice and yellow. Maybe mother had waffles for supper. She was a swell cook, mother was, and she certainly gave her family all the breaks, when it came to meals.

"Home, Rollie, home!" She burst open the door to the living room. "Hi, mom, what you got for supper?"

From the kitchen her mother announced coolly, "I hate to break the news to you, but it's waffles."

"Oh, mom!" she shouted in ecstasy.

Her mother could not see her. She did not need to. "For goodness' sakes, go and wash," she called.

In the long mirror across the room she saw herself, her hair hanging wild, her long bare legs scratched, her broadly smiling face dirt-streaked, her torn skirt dangling, her dog laughing up at her. Gosh, was it a relief to feel your own age, just exactly thirteen years old!

IS GRAN'PA REALLY DEAD?

(Continued from Page 57)

him queerly when he entered the kitchen. They didn't say anything, and that made him feel worse. His mother was washing the dishes, and she was wearing—he frowned—a black dress, just like the kind Mrs. Horton wore. She didn't look pretty this morning, either. She had her hair all tight under a white cap. And her eyes weren't bright and blue. They looked as if she had been crying. She didn't smile at him the way she always did. He saw her try, and then he tried. But it didn't work. So he sat down quickly in his place at the kitchen table. Mrs. Horton was sitting at the other end, an empty coffee cup in front of her. She had a big brown coat on, and a black shawl over her head. Her mouth was twitching and she had her eyes all screwed up as though she were going to cry too. He didn't like her at all, and he couldn't understand why gran'pa had been sorry for her—why he had done so many chores for her.

Mother put a steaming dish of porridge in front of him. There was more than usual, as much as father had. "'Morning, son." She kissed the top of his head lightly. He felt something wet drip on his forehead. It

"Even if I don't wear pink satin negligees—"

. . . and even if high heels and fancy clothes don't belong in her down-to-earth wardrobe . . .

Mrs. Edward Normand of Lakeside, Oregon, is just as fussy as any city gal about the niceties of living.

The Normands live up in Coos County, in a cabin surrounded by tall timbers and rhododendrons. And for a rugged life like that, she writes, you've "just got to have good things."

Good sheets, for instance.

Now it's only to be expected that her tall, outdoorsy husband, to quote Mrs. Normand:

". . . sleeps like a log, and requires sheets that are strong, durable, and long enough to tuck 'way under each end of the mattress."

Nor is it surprising that "this logger's wife demands daintiness along with sturdiness."

So what sheets are the answer to her two-point prayer? Pequots, and no others! Because, quoting Mrs. N. again:

"They are dignified as a Douglas Fir, strong as Paul Bunyan's Blue Ox, and durable as my blue jeans and woolen shirts. They give dignity and graciousness to the simplicity of my life."

We couldn't have said it better ourselves. Dignified, dainty, durable and gracious . . . smooth, close-woven, snowy-white muslin sheets! If that's the kind of sheets you like, ask for Pequots. They're America's most popular sheets.

Pequot Mills, Salem, Massachusetts.

PEQUOT SHEETS AND PILLOW CASES

Pronounced "PEE KWAT"

PEQUOT SHEETS

so good-looking so long-wearing

Top-of-the-Stove Dinner!

JELLY-GLAZED VEAL SAUTÉ

1½ lbs. veal steak
Salt and pepper
Flour
1½ teaspoons dry mustard
3 tablespoons Wesson Oil
¼ cup currant jelly
1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce
4 tablespoons lemon juice

Cut steak into 1-inch cubes and roll in flour seasoned with salt and pepper. Sauté in sunshiny Wesson Oil until golden brown. Cover and cook slowly 20 minutes, turning frequently. Add mustard, Worcestershire sauce, jelly, and lemon juice. Continue cooking, stirring constantly, until veal is coated with a glaze of jelly. Try this savory dish for supper some night soon. You'll see why famous cooks all over the land say there's nothing like America's favorite salad oil for frying meat or fish! Serves 4.

Add to baking, whenever the recipe calls for melted shortening, fry clear, pure Wesson Oil. Far more convenient. Just pour to measure, pure to use. If you haven't discovered how much easier, quicker all cooking is with versatile Wesson Oil—do so today! Yes, discover today why more American women buy Wesson Oil than any other brand of salad oil!

TIP: For many flavorful foods always fry in clear, pure Wesson Oil. So handy. Economical, too. Pours just what you need into the pan. Never any waste!

Wesson Oil

FOR SALADS & COOKING

NEW ORLEANS

AH! SHRIMP SALAD A LA NEW ORLEANS

4 tablespoons Wesson Oil
2 tablespoons lemon juice or vinegar
1 tablespoon prepared mustard
Salt, pepper to taste
1 can (7 oz.) shrimp, or 1 lb. fresh shrimp, cooked, peeled, cleaned
½ stalk celery, minced
2 young onions with green tops, minced

Put all dressing ingredients in a jar and shake vigorously. When thoroughly blended, pour dressing over the shrimp, celery, and onions. Mix salad gently, but thoroughly, with two forks so that each piece is lightly coated. Put in refrigerator and allow to marinate for 2 hours. When ready to serve, arrange on fresh, crisp greens and garnish with tomato quarters. Note what a deliciously flavorful dressing this is with shrimp or other seafood. But all dressings are flavorful, taste just right, when made with light, delicate Wesson Oil...because unobtrusive Wesson Oil never drowns delicious seasonings under a heavy, oily taste. Serves 4.

made his throat choke up again, and he swallowed the hot porridge fast so it would burn out the choking feeling.

Mrs. Horton leaned over and patted his cheek. "Poor little tyke!"

He shrank to one side and ate his porridge faster and faster.

"Would you like to stay with me a few days, Adam?" she asked eagerly.

He turned toward his mother. She had her back to him, cleaning the coal stove, but she turned at the question and he stared at her. She understood.

"I think Adam would like to stay here and take care of gran'ma," she said. "Gran'ma won't feel like getting around much and there will be chores to do."

Gran'ma! Adam's heart doubled its beat again. She was upstairs now with gran'pa—a dead person.

There was the sound of milk pails in the barn.

"Guess Aaron's back from the undertaker," said his mother, glancing out the window. "He's got to milk now, and—and bring in the wood."

Adam felt his face get hot. The wood was his job, and fetching water from the well too. "I'll go," he mumbled, getting up quickly and rushing to the door.

"Wait, Adam!" His mother's voice was strangely shrill. "Get your jacket. You mustn't get cold, the way gran'pa did!" He stopped short.

Mrs. Horton nodded at him solemnly. "It was just this time of morning, Adam, when your gran'pa got the pneumonia," she admonished him. "He went milking without his coat on."

His mother half sighed, half wept. "That was just it. You'd think he had to milk those cows. Aaron kept telling him to stay in bed these cold mornings. But gran'pa thought Aaron had too much to do, what with the farm getting bigger, and more cows to milk, and only one strong man on the place ——" She shook her head.

> Neither great poverty nor great riches will hear reason. —SPANISH PROVERB.

"It will be hard this summer," Mrs. Horton said slowly and sadly. "Only Aaron to do all the haying and the vegetables, and the cows."

Adam stared at both of them. "Is—is that how gran'pa . . . died?" he whispered.

His mother came over to him and put her arm around his shoulder. Her eyes were tired and troubled. "Yes, Adam. That's why I keep after you to dress warmly these winter days. Gran'pa went out to the barn to milk without his coat and caught a bad cold. You remember, Adam, it was that blowy morning two weeks ago ——"

He broke away from her and ran to the back stairs. Tears poured down his white cheeks. "It's my fault!" he sobbed, stumbling up the steps. "Gran'pa's dead, 'cause it's my fault!" His voice rose to a scream.

"Adam!" his mother's frightened voice trailed after him.

"It is it is it's my fault!" he cried over and over again.

He sped up to his room and slammed the door. There on the rumpled bed he poured out floods of tears in heartsick despair. He wished he could die himself for what he had done, all because he was so scared. Maybe if he had gritted his teeth and tried real hard gran'pa would be here today, and father wouldn't have to work so hard and mother wouldn't be so pale and sad, and that awful Mrs. Horton wouldn't be around to touch him.

He was sobbing so violently that he didn't hear his mother come in, didn't even feel her touch him until she began to shake his shoulders.

"You'll be sick, Adam; you mustn't give way like this!" she exclaimed.

"Go away! I don't want to see you or anybody!" he moaned.

"But Adam, we all feel badly, only we've got to keep going, keep working and doing things. It won't do any good to carry on like this. What kind of a little man are you? What will your father think? He expects you to be down there helping him, and here you are bawling like a baby. Shame on you!"

She talked fast and loud, but Adam knew that her scolding covered up fear and her own sorrow. He didn't look at her or stop crying.

"And you haven't asked for your gran'ma, or been in to help her. How do you think she feels?"

These words stabbed him mercilessly. He stopped crying. He sat up and stared at his mother with such a haunted look that she clutched her throat, terrified.

"I know how she feels!" he whispered. "She hates me! I can't ever see her again!"

His mother dropped on her knees in front of him and put her arms around his small waist.

"What are you saying, Adam! She loves you! How could sweet, old gran'ma hate anyone? And what's all this foolish talk about gran'pa's death being your fault? You're so worked up you don't know what you're saying!"

She looked down and saw that he hadn't buttoned his shoes. As she talked she did them up nervously, her hands trembling as much as his had only a short time ago.

"I think maybe it would be good for you to go with Mrs. Horton until after—until after things straighten out."

"No, I don't want to go. I won't go!" Adam resolutely declared, tears welling up again.

Mother sat back on her heels. Adam saw bewildered exasperation getting the better of her good temper. She stood up and turned to go.

"Then you'd better stay here, out of people's way," she ordered. "Folks will be coming. We've a lot to do."

Suddenly mother was gone. She had left him and quietly closed the door.

As soon as she left he knew he was in the wrong; that he should have obeyed mother and gone to Mrs. Horton's or gone down to help mother and father—and—and—gran'ma. But the thought of gran'ma frightened him all over again. He leaned his head against the bedpost and whimpered softly.

There seemed to be no time in his lonely frightened mind, until the sound of approaching sleigh bells broke through his miserable gray cloud of sorrow. Their cheerful tinkling drew him to the window. Then he realized it was midday—the sun was so high and shone so brightly on the dazzling snow. From a securely hidden spot behind a curtain he watched friends and relatives make their way from their sleighs to the house.

One of the first visitors to arrive was their fierce-looking white-haired minister, whose towering height and angry eyebrows always made Adam quake. A strange man with black hair, black clothes and black hat hurried in: most likely the mysterious undertaker whom father had gone to fetch. His fat aunt from the wonderful rich farm with the ponies and peach trees waddled out of a big sleigh with fur robes. She carried a big basket of food. Wouldn't it be wonderful if she had brought some of those marvelous peach pies! In spite of his troubles Adam's mouth began to water.

The low drone of voices in the downstairs parlor rose and fell as the noon hour brought more guests, more subdued excitement.

As dinnertime approached Adam began to smell enticing odors from the kitchen. Through a cautious crack in the door he caught a whiff of stew—and then the unmistakable fragrance of the fat aunt's peach pies warming in the oven. He blinked back remorseful tears as he thought of his family eating downstairs while he remained in his room, alone, deliberately forgotten. He breathed in all those lovely smells—until the sudden opening of gran'pa's door made him recoil in terror to his bed. Gran'pa's door closed softly. The tap-tap of gran'ma's cane moved by his door, tapped its way down the back stairs to the kitchen.

VERY WOMAN A

Queen

at woman won't feel like a en the day she becomes the d owner of a set of Hasko ys? . . . They add that "regal" h to the simplest luncheon and extra "something" to that ial occasion . . . Gift packaged; ewelry, Gift and Dept. stores.

SKELITE MANUFACTURING CORP
t. 143, 135 S. LaSalle St., Chicago 3, Ill.

Hasko Trays

D ACCESSORIES

efore Buying Your
EW RANGE

rper Center Simmer Burners are erior to all other top burners because n Harper burner is really 2 burners in 1.
shown in diagram, the big outer burner ngs foods to a quick boil. Turn handle il it "clicks" and the big burner goes out, ing only the small, efficient inner burner
o finish the cooking.

Only the separate Harper Center Simmer es you the controlled low heats you need keep foods warm for serving . . . to minate pot watching and boiling dry...
llow cooking with little water, which es time and gas and keeps the average hen 9 degrees cooler. Only the Harper rate Center Simmer can help you so ch in your cooking.

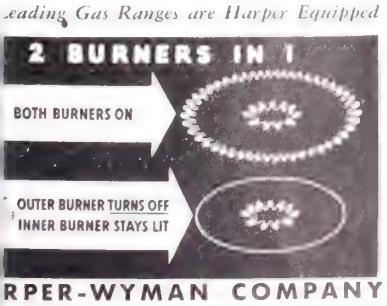
Insist on Harper Burners!

Leading Gas Ranges are Harper Equipped



RPER-WYMAN COMPANY
Vincennes Ave., Chicago 20, Ill.

Adam bit his lip. His face got all hot with embarrassment. Gran'ma was all alone too. Maybe they had forgotten her. Then he remembered that he was supposed to be taking care of gran'ma. He could have brought up her dinner on a tray, the way she had done for him when he had the measles. There might be other things he could do—maybe just talk to her—now that gran'pa ——

He remembered about gran'pa all over again. Was he really dead? Wasn't Adam going to hear gran'pa's funny chuckle—or listen to his Indian stories—or learn to shoot that gun—or pick apples with him—or fish? Pictures of his whole young life with gran'pa went sadly through his mind. Tears began to fall again, and in a minute he was sobbing miserably. The noise of his crying blotted out the sound of all the busy footsteps up and down the stairs, into and out of gran'pa's room.

He did notice the silence when it came, though, a few hours later when the winter sun began to grow pale and weak, and long shadows stretched bleakly from the barns and house. He heard the jingle of milk pails as his father trudged down to the cow barns. The pails' ringing reminded him of how gran'pa died—catching cold, milking. He felt that fearful guilt chilling him all over.

Then gran'ma's cane tapped on the stairs again. It was a soft tapping, and slow, as though she wanted no one to hear her. She was coming upstairs, and carrying something which she was pushing ahead of her, one step at a time. Adam listened, puzzled and fearful. Minutes crept by as gran'ma came closer to his door. There was a pause. Adam held his breath.

First gran'ma knocked with her cane. Then she pushed open the door. Adam's eyes went straight to her hands. She was holding a tray filled with the most wonderful things! There was a dish of stew—he could smell it way across the room—and an elegant piece of pie, and some biscuits, and a pot of jam, and milk, and cookies.

"We just got around to you!" gran'ma said cheerily, walking slowly toward him. "Everybody's been so busy. There's been a great crowd here most of the day. Funny how fast bad news travels. Gran'pa certainly had a lot of friends." She pulled a footstool over to Adam and put down the tray. "There now! Better get at it while everything's hot."

Adam sat down in his little rocker—the one gran'pa made—and eyed the wonderful meal. Then he stared at gran'ma wonderingly. She was dressed in her good Sunday black with little white lace all around her neck, and she had on her best cap, with lace around it, too, and her five white curls pecking out—two on each side, one at the top. Over her arm was gran'pa's best ebony cane. She wasn't crying and her eyes looked bright.

"Cold in here, Adam," she exclaimed, shivering. "I'll light the fire, and maybe you'd like the candles instead of the lamp. Makes it a good sight cozier"

Adam watched her thin wrinkled fingers tuck in scraps of paper between the logs and kindling, and then start little spears of flame to right, left and center. When she had lighted the candles on the marble mantel she sat down in a large rocker and took up a cup of tea from Adam's tray.

"After this I'm going to lie down awhile," she announced, drinking with little sibilant sips. "We've had a hard day, with all this company." She leaned over toward Adam's tray. "Guess I'll take one of your cookies, too, Adam."

Adam ate his stew slowly, completely bewildered by gran'ma's attitude. She didn't miss gran'pa at all! She didn't even act as though he were dead. He stole quick looks at her over his fork. The fire lighted her thin, wrinkled cheeks working up and down as she munched the cooky. Her eyes were on the fire. There was no sorrow or fear in their clear gray depths. She turned quickly and caught his questioning glance. She even smiled!

"Gran'ma," he began timidly, "is gran'pa really dead?"

You'd be surprised what HEMO* might do for you!

IF YOU THINK you're only as old as you feel . . .

Add Hemo to your regular meals for the next 30 days! You may get a wonderful surprise!

Here's why: Two glasses of Hemo made with milk supply a whole day's needs of essential vitamins and minerals—shown on the chart below—which you may require to keep feeling "fit"!

Both young and old love Hemo's rich, milk-chocolaty flavor. Cold, it's so refreshing. Hot, it's so relaxing. Grand at bedtime! Only 59¢ a jar . . . about 2½¢ a serving. Get Hemo today!

JUST ONE GLASS of Hemo gives you:
The Vitamin A in 3 boiled eggs!
PLUS
The Vitamin B1 in 4 slices of whole wheat bread!
PLUS
The Vitamin B2 (G) in 4 servings of spinach!
PLUS
The Vitamin D in 3 servings of beef liver!
PLUS
The Niacin in 3 servings of carrots!
PLUS
The Iron in ½ pound of beef!
PLUS
The Calcium & Phosphorus in 2 servings of cauliflower and 1 serving of cooked green beans combined
HEMO exceeds adult requirements!
Minimum daily needs set by U. S. nutritionists
2 servings of HEMO, made with milk, give
4000 USP units VITAMIN A 4900 USP units
333 USP units VITAMIN B1 400 USP units
2 milligrams VITAMIN B2 3 milligrams
400 USP units VITAMIN D 410 USP units
(Not set) NIACIN 10.3 milligrams
10 milligrams IRON 15.7 milligrams
750 milligrams CALCIUM 950 milligrams
750 milligrams PHOSPHORUS 750 milligrams
Borden's Hemo
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
© The Borden Company

Borden's Hemo

Drink your vitamins and minerals...and like 'em!

STIFF MUSCLES?

G-E heating pad gives even, controlled warmth!

3-HEAT MODEL
$6.50
plus tax

Help relieve stiff muscles—ease soreness—with the soothing warmth of a General Electric Heating Pad.

Just set switch at high, medium, or low (165°, 145°, 125°). Temperature stays where you want it.

Safe, controlled heat flows evenly through entire pad. Absorbent cover easily removable for laundering.

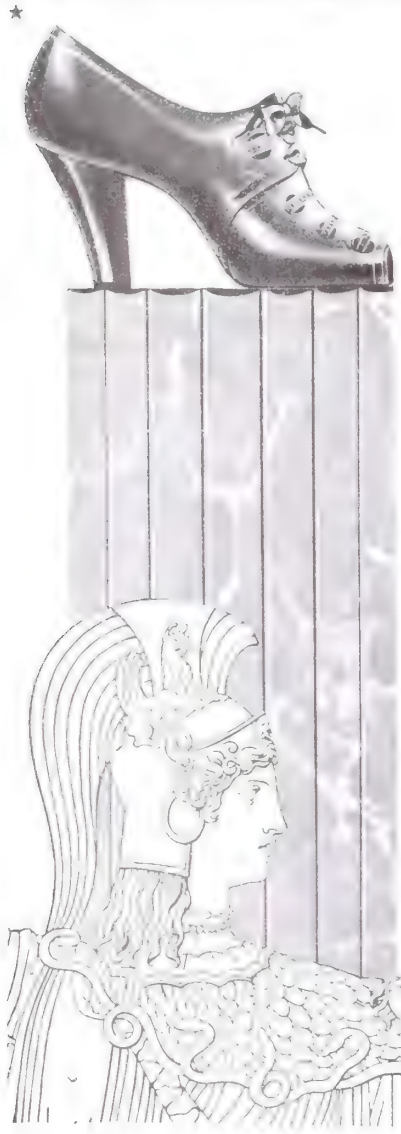
In pink, blue, green—dotted with stars. A-C and D-C. General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

Approved by Underwriters' Laboratories, Inc.

Other G-E Heating Pads as low as $5.40 (plus tax).

GENERAL ELECTRIC

★ ★



A good place to buy shoes

. . . . for extra comfort, extra fashion, extra value. The merchant who carries Style Arch shoes knows how much they do for a woman's feet—hugging her heels, buoying up her arches, giving her toes the room they need. He knows that Style Arch shoes are unusually becoming. He knows, too, that they're priced amazingly low. You'll find it well worth-while to visit the Style Arch merchant in your community. Roth, Rauh & Heckel, Inc., Ripley, Ohio.

Style arch

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

★ ★

Gran'ma reached for another cooky. Then she continued rocking and munching. She looked kindly into Adam's eyes, but deeply, as though she had lost something in them that she wanted to recover.

"It all depends on what you mean—'dead,' Adam."

"But—he's not here, is he? He won't be here to play with me, will he?" Adam asked plaintively.

"He's not here the way you're used to seeing him, Adam. That old, worn-out, wrinkled body isn't any good to him now. He has thrown it away. But he'll be around. Don't you worry about that, Adam! You can't lose gran'pa that fast. He'll be with you when you go to school, and while you're working around here, and playing. Only you won't be able to see him 'cause he's so light and airy now, without that old body! He's like, well"— gran'ma screwed up her mouth so that all the lines showed extra sharp—"he's like a nice soft breeze through the wheat field in the summer, or—or an apple-blossom smell," she told him. "And when he feels extra skittish he'll be like those gusts of wind that sweep all around the tall trees in the back woods." Gran'ma took a long breath. Adam followed everything she said very carefully.

"But—he didn't want to go, did he?" Adam asked.

"God has something to say about when you go, Adam," she reminded him. "It wasn't up to gran'pa to decide."

"Sometimes people . . . get killed, though."

Gran'ma's eyes shot up, startled. "Why, Adam! What put killing into your head? Gran'pa wasn't killed!"

Adam's throat was all tight and dry. His heart began to pound. "How did gran'pa get sick?" he persisted.

"Why, you know, Adam. He caught cold in the barn. He insisted on doing the milking, in spite of your father telling him to take things a bit easier now that he is—was—getting old and frail,"

That settled it. Adam's fear and guilt shot up sickeningly. He bent his head, sobs shaking his small shoulders.

"I did it! I killed him, gran'ma!" he blurted out.

There was a stunned second of silence. The next instant gran'ma's thin arms were around him. "Now, what put that in your head, Adam? I declare, I knew something was going on in that small brain of yours. They all think it's perverseness. Now p up and tell me what makes you think killed gran'pa."

"I did! I did!" he insisted.

"Sh-h, hush," she soothed. "You'll w up your mother. She's trying to nap bef supper. Tell me quietly how you gave pneumonia to gran'pa."

Adam could hardly get the words out enough. "He wanted me to learn to m cows last summer, and I wouldn't, 'ca I'm so afraid of the cows—I can't stan touch them—and I didn't want to get so early, either—and I was afraid he'd w me to! If I'd learned to milk then, I would doing it now every morning and gra wouldn't have gone out and caught col and he wouldn't be dead!" There, it was now. She'd hate him until she was c too.

Gran'ma straightened up slowly. leaned away from him to pick up the cooky on the plate. She went over played a bit with the fire, stirring up embers. Then she sat down again and h her head in her hand.

Adam looked away. It would be awfu watch gran'ma cry. The next minute he amazed to hear her laughing—right loud! He looked up quickly. Her eyes twinkling.

"Oh—Adam!" she exclaimed. "Suc child, such a child! But with such old-thoughts too. Adam, where did you get t fancy ideas about milking? Do you th you have the strength to milk cows? Do really think your gran'pa or your father mother—would have allowed you to those five cows every morning—you, a of eight?"

This was a brand-new idea. Adam tho it over in wonder. "Well, they're al talking to me about growing up and bei little man, and learning new things al time."

Gran'ma's face grew very serious- very old. Suddenly all the wrinkles stoo in the firelight. Her eyes looked all dim misty.

"Adam," she said, after an awfully pause, "growing up is a natural thing. don't have to think about it or work ha it at all. You can't stop growing up." shook her head sadly. "You've got to things as they come along, yes. But can't do things before your age or streng mind are up to it. When you were ready learned to use a knife and fork. You le

LITTLE GUY

"Well, I found out about shaving— it's not so much fun, after all!"

warning!
Dry Skin makes you look older

new Woodbury Special
Dry Skin Cream

- discourages tiny dry-skin lines
- gives a fresher, younger look
- softens weather-dried skin

FOR SPRING . . . give your skin a softer, younger look! Smooth away flaky dry chap . . . soften old-looking lines.

Here's a cream with proven powers to combat dryness. Rich in lanolin's skin-softening benefits. Contains four more rich oils, especially smoothing to dry skin. Apply overnight, or for just 15 daytime minutes.

Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream is a "must" if you're 30-or-over . . . a wise investment for under-30's. See its beautifying benefits yourself. Send for your free sample today.

Free Sample

See beautifying results!

I want to try FREE sample of Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream, and see its softening action on my skin. (Print name, address clearly. Paste coupon on penny postcard.) Mail to Box 45, Cincinnati 14, O.

Dept. 412

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

(Sorry, offer good in U. S. A. only).

to dress yourself. Then you did chores. And started to school. You're learning all the time. I imagine you're learning a lot of things you don't say anything about—like death."

She paused a moment.

"But there are some things you can't do yet, Adam," she said, leaning over and tapping him with the ebony cane. "You can't thresh wheat, or pitch hay—or milk cows. You just got the wrong idea there. You see, gran'pa was going to show you how to do it. Maybe try one cow at the start, for fun. He didn't 'spect you to milk five cows morning and night! Lordy, no! It was just to be fun. You understand that now, don't you, Adam?"

Adam nodded solemnly.

"If you want to know the truth," gran'ma went on confidentially, "gran'pa caught the pneumonia because he was stubborn! Stubborn about milking when he didn't have to do it. Aaron would have done it, gladly. Has to do it now, doesn't he?" She shook her head in exasperation.

Adam took a long breath. It was all so different now! Gran'ma had explained everything. He didn't feel the same about gran'pa dying. Except that he was awfully sorry, and there were a lot of important things he'd miss doing with gran'pa—and he did want to learn to shoot that gun. Maybe father would teach him, though.

THEN he thought of something else that made him ashamed. "I—I made mother sad," he confessed, "and you, too, I guess. I'm supposed to be helping, but I'm not." He stood up. "I guess I'd better go downstairs."

"Wait," gran'ma commanded. "That's another thing I'd better tell you. This place is going to be crowded the next two days. There'll be a lot of people here, helping. Your aunt, the neighbors. I don't know who all." Gran'ma paused. "Know what I think, Adam? Know what your gran'pa would have liked you to do?"

He shook his head.

"Go over to Mrs. Horton's till it's all over."

Adam frowned and stared at his shoes.

"Gran'pa felt very sorry for Mrs. Horton," gran'ma went on. "Her husband's dead, and she hasn't any children—and she loves you, Adam, even though you're never very nice to her."

Adam was silent.

"She'd love to have you for two or three days. You could help her a bit. Doing chores, Adam—but not milking cows! I think she'd let you ride on that toboggan too. Why don't you go down now and talk to mother about it? Tell her you're thinking of going over to Mrs. Horton's."

Gran'ma's picture of life at Mrs. Horton's was not so bad, and if mother wanted it that way, and gran'ma—and gran'pa ——

Evening had fallen when Adam opened the back door. Pale white stars glistened in the deep, winter-blue sky. Dark shadow patches spotted the rolling snow. In the west the horizon was ribboned with red.

He walked around the well, knocking off some icicles from its tin roof as he passed. A cow mooed at him when he walked by the barn. He followed a footpath into the woods. Then he turned to look back at his home. Smoke was sailing skyward from both chimneys. The lamp went on in his room—where gran'ma would sleep till he returned. His mother briefly shadowed the window in the kitchen. His eyes suddenly smarted. He turned away quickly and followed the path.

It was very, very quiet all around Adam. One bird flew in the sky. Adam stopped again. He looked up through the trees into the mysterious heights of heaven.

"Gran'pa!" whispered Adam.

He waited.

"Gran'pa!" he called out loud.

A wind gust blew down through the branches and wrapped itself benevolently around him. Then it took his hat gently from his head and blew it down the path.

Adam laughed and ran ahead, a great lightness in his heart. THE END fitting slip...

following fashion new lines with smooth figure-proportioned fit . . . trimly tailored in luxurious Bur Mil* rayons. At better stores everywhere . . . about $3.

Seamprufe*

figure-proportioned slips

by height—by bust—in figure-proportioned types

* REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

MARVELLA · 383 FIFTH AVENUE · NEW YORK

Either Way...BETTER with BUTTER

Butter It...Or Make This Easy Hollandaise

YES, EITHER WAY, there's golden Buttery goodness in every bit of it—the goodness that only Butter gives so many foods! "Buttered all over" or served with Buttery-tasting Hollandaise, asparagus is so simple to prepare. Here's a tip:

Tie asparagus in a bunch. Stand it up in water covering ⅔ of stalks. Boil 10-15 minutes. Lay bunch flat in water to boil the tender tips just 5 minutes more.

EASY HOLLANDAISE—Cut ¼ lb. Butter in 4 or 5 pieces. Put in top of double boiler with 3 egg yolks, 3 tbs. lemon juice. Let stand at room temperature ½ hour or more. Just before serving, heat over gently boiling water 1½ min., stirring briskly with wooden spoon. Serve at once. M-m-m-m!

...IT'S BETTER WITH BUTTER

ADA

...is an association for nation-wide promotion, advertising and research activities supported by America's dairy farmers.

"Voice of the Dairy Farmer"

AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION

20 N. WACKER DRIVE BLDG., CHICAGO 6, ILLINOIS

NEVER A DULL MEAL

By Mary Lasswell

BACHRACH

Mary Lasswell

Mary Lasswell is the creator of Mrs. Rasmussen, whose prowess with pot, skillet and wilted cabbage leaf is known to thousands of readers of that hilarious book, SUDS IN YOUR EYE.

MY philosophy of food coincides with that of Mrs. Rasmussen, pot-walloper par excellence of Suds in Your Eye and High Time: share whatever food is on hand, from the heart—and without apologies.

I plan meals in such a way that the gastronomical high spots occur over week ends, when the entire family is at home. Sunday dinner is served in the middle of the day to leave a long, lazy afternoon for fun. Sunday-night supper is of such a nature that it can be prepared on Friday or Saturday and left in the refrigerator to be heated up at serving time. This process of one-arm cookery, a book in one hand and a cooking spoon in the other, is accomplished by serving dishes that are simple and can be prepared well ahead of time. Such a technique spares the family and guests the unlovely spectacle of a harassed hostess.

Mrs. Rasmussen says, "It's a poor cook that won't lick her own fingers, so taste, taste, taste!" If the hostess does not enjoy her own food, it is unlikely that her family or friends will.

Mrs. Rasmussen and I believe that one "Stay for supper!" is better than a hundred expressions like "We must have you to dinner sometime."

★ ★ ★ MONDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

*Asparagus Scramble
*Pecan-Topped Gingerbread
Coffee

Dinner

Clam and Tomato Juice
Barbecued Pork Tenderloin
Baked Potatoes Creamed Onions
Hearts of Lettuce—Russian Dressing
Lemon-Meringue Pie
Coffee

Asparagus Scramble: Cut 1 package frozen asparagus into pieces an inch long. Fry in 3 tablespoons shortening or salad oil for three minutes, stirring well. Cover with 2 cups boiling water and cook for five minutes. Beat 6 eggs thoroughly, add salt and black pepper to taste. Add ½ cup fine dry bread crumbs and ½ cup dry grated Roman or Parmesan cheese. Bring the asparagus to a boil and add the egg mixture. Stir gently for about two minutes, or until the eggs are of firm but creamy consistency.

Pecan-Topped Gingerbread: Use a standard gingerbread recipe. Sprinkle ½ cup light brown sugar and 1 cup chopped pecans over batter and bake.

★ ★ ★ TUESDAY ★ ★ ★

Lunch

Lentil Soup
Pumpernickel Bread
Lemon Snow Pudding
Coffee

Dinner

Clear Tomato Soup
Baked Ham Slice Scalloped Potatoes
Dandelion Greens
Pecan Pie
Coffee

Follow the take-home time

Heat...

Eat...

Enjoy

KILL MORE BUGS WITH

AMERICA'S BEST SELLER!

KM
Magik Mist

NEW! IMPROVED!
kills flying, crawling insects listed below
faster, easier, surer!

$2.95
at better stores. Prices slightly higher in Canada.

No wonder Magik Mist is America's No. 1 best seller! It's the modern super-killer that brings death on contact to flying insects (flies, mosquitoes, moths, fleas, gnats, hornets, wasps) and to crawling pests (roaches, water-bugs, bed bugs, ants, silverfish and others). Magik Mist's pushbutton spray combines two deadly insect killers, DDT and Pyrethrins. Safe, sure, easy to use.

KNAPP-MONARCH CO. • ST. LOUIS 16, MO.

For Your Closets —2 Minute Treatment!
MOTH VAPOR
Kills Moths, eggs, larvae on contact!
79¢

THE LATCHKEY

(Continued from Page 54)

happiness that floated inside of him he fished up an old grievance. "Though it sure seems to me it's time I had my own key back."

She shrugged and raised her eyebrows and gestured in the direction of Jeb, who was putting away the car. "I can't help it, darling," she was saying without words. "He's got this notion that you're not ready for a key of your own until you're a man, and I've got to humor him. After all, he's my husband."

There had never been any of that bushwa before mom got herself hitched up with Jeb. He and mom understood each other, and even after two months it was hard to get used to the idea that there was somebody else around all the time, in the family.

"How old does a guy have to be anyway," David inquired, "before His Lordship thinks he's a man? Forty?"

"He says it has nothing to do with age," she answered. "He says when the right time comes he'll know."

DAVID walked up two steps and ran a casual hand along the porch pillar, speaking with his back to her. "It's all right with you, is it, this business of his managing our lives? I mean, you like it this way?"

She spoke in her soft, breathless, girlish voice. "Oh, David, it's so good to have somebody taking care of things again—taking care of me. It's been such a long time."

There were still words that only slid over the surface of his mind like this, as when he had been a little boy listening to adult conversation. He took his mother's key and unlatched the door for her and stood aside for her to go in, and then almost went in after her and shut the door again, forgetting Jeb, who was coming up the walk now.

"Whoa!" Jeb said. "One more."

Yeah, David thought. One more. One too many. He watched Jeb take the steps deliberately, singly, though his great muscular legs could easily have swung up all three at once. He had liked Jeb when they were just neighbors, admired his size and strength and enjoyed his slow, quiet friendliness. He had even thought it might be a good idea, mom's marrying him—she wouldn't be alone, then, when David went out nights. It had never occurred to him that Jeb was going to take over their lives, changing their good, carefree, casual ways, making rules, dumb rules, like the one about the front-door key; like the one where he wouldn't let David drive the car any more until he'd taken the course they gave at high school, though David had been driving for years, since he was thirteen.

"Driving a car's a responsibility," he said. "You've got an obligation to the community to learn the best possible way of doing it."

The key thing had come up the night he got home so late after bowling with the fellows. Generally he was home by eleven on bowling nights, but they had stopped in for Cokes and got talking, and the first thing he knew it was almost two.

Jeb was up waiting for him. "I made your mother go to bed," he said. "I hope she was able to get to sleep."

David had never minded when mom waited for him and gave it to him for being late. After all, she was his mother. But this guy, this Jeb—he was a stranger. What right did he have?

"I don't have to come in at any certain time," he said. "I'm no kid."

"I'm no kid either, but if I'm going to be three hours later than your mother expects me, I telephone and say so. What do you suppose she thought?"

"Mom? Heck, mom never worries."

Jeb had just said, "I see," in his quiet, friendly voice, and then he had asked David for his door key. "There's a certain freedom that goes with a latchkey," he'd said. "It enables you to come and go as you please, without answering to anyone. I don't believe a boy knows how to handle that kind of freedom—I think it takes a man."

David had looked at him scornfully. "Teaching the little boy a lesson? So he'll your basic handbag

Lucky you—holding this bag! Exquisite top grain cowhide, roomy enough to cherish all your treasures. Smart urbanity... to parade this spring and ever after.
RBS
Rambler
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

KADIN, 20 WEST 33rd STREET, N.Y.C.1

Designed to flatter feminine ankles. Write for name of nearest dealer.

MIRACLE-TREAD DIVISION
Craddock-Terry Shoe Corp., Lynchburg, Virginia

YOUR CHANCE FOR FAME . . . Pictured is lovely Joan Smith, winner of the last Stardust Beauty Contest, now a Walter Thornton Pin-Up Girl. Enter our 1947 Contest now, YOU may be the lucky winner of $500 first prize or 27 other awards! Just send recent non-returnable photo, with height, weight, bust, waist and hip measurements before May 31, 1947. Decisions of famous beauty judges are final. Mail entry to P. O. Box 65, Station F, N.Y.

fashion highlights

TRICORNE
One of many smart LaMode Buttons at fine stores everywhere

LaMode
BUTTONS
Blumenthal & Co., Inc., 1370 Broadway, N.Y.C. (PENN)
Button Specialists Since 1877

never stay out late again without telling his

"No, not exactly," Jeb had said, smiling too, as though this were some joke they shared. "Let's think of the key as a kind of David had been careful about watching the time after that—about being home when he'd promised, or telephoning if he couldn't make it—but the key had nothing to do with it. Jeb had nothing to do with it. It was because he thought maybe his mother had been worrying about him that night after all. She had been standing in the hall when he got upstairs, wide awake, as if she'd never been asleep.

"The picture was good," Jeb said now, his body filling the doorway, his dark, carefully brushed head almost touching the lintel. "You should have come."

"What did you do all evening, darling?" his mother asked him.

"Nothing much," David said. "Just

What had he done? he thought, in wonder. He had gone down to the river and thought of Susan, remembered being there with her. He had read her letter over and over, and dreamed about the Labor Day dance and wide curving drive, through the great doors—and how he would hold her elbow lightly, easily, as they walked inside and joined the others, the best people in town, the people who knew how to do things right—and she would look at him with her sweet, grave eyes full of admiration.

The holy passion of friendship is so sweet and strong and loyal and enduring a nature that it will last through a whole lifetime, if not asked to lend money. —MARK TWAIN

Be sparing of speech, and things will come right of themselves.
—LAO-TSE

He had done nothing, really, nothing at all—and yet the evening had gone.

turning it palm up in helpless incredulity.

"But I've got to have it. I've already asked the girl." His voice squeaked a little on the last word. "Heck," he said, "it's only

Jeb crossed his legs and leaned back in his chair, and there was no exact reading of the expression in his narrowed blue eyes. "Only ten bucks," he said slowly. Then, in a different tone, "If you wanted it so bad, why didn't you save it?"

"Out of my salary? I'm lucky if I can get through on it."

He didn't always get through. How could he? It was only an afternoon job, helping out behind the soda fountain at Cullen's, and it paid practically nothing. He went to summer school mornings to make up some Latin and so couldn't take a full-time job, but that was all right. He was just doing it for experience, wasn't he? All the fellows took summer jobs, even Lowell, the mayor's son. It was kind of a good feeling to have your own money and not have to depend on an allowance—not have to ask for anything unless once in a while you ran short. But heck, he couldn't save anything out of it.

The last traces of his smile faded, and his lower lip thrust itself out a fraction beyond the upper one and then tightened back. "Let's skip it," he said. "I only asked you because mom told me to. I guess she figured it would look better if ——"

"There's no question of looks," Jeb broke in. "Your mother has decided to leave all such matters to me." He sighed a little and his voice softened. "I don't want to make you hate me, David, but this is a sort of trust I have now—you and your mother. I've got to do the best I know how for both of you." His eyes held David's. "The fact is,

as on Stomach
eved in 5 minutes or double your money back

BRIGHTEN YOUR UPHOLSTERY AND RUGS
HIS QUICK WAY!
STIC FOAM
minutes
HIS EFFICIENT WAY!
STIC FOAM
HIS THRIFTY WAY!
STIC FOAM is economical—a gal-will do it! Professional results at a saving. Remember, clean furnish-last longer
HIS EASY, SAFE WAY!
STIC FOAM
losive, non-est furnish-
MYSTIC FOAM
UPHOLSTERY AND RUGS
prepaid
MYSTIC FOAM
Cleans So Well So Easily...and for So Little

SO LUSCIOUS, COULDN'T BE FINER
YET YOU SAVE! SAVE! SAVE!

Dromedary Gingerbread!

Costs you less than buying the ingredients.
And saves your sugar, shortening . . . and work!

JIFFY "COMPANY" DESSERT

Peaches 'n' Cream Gingerbread

Make a luscious layer cake of Dromedary Mix. You can toss it off in jig-time . . . and m-m-m, is it good! Just add water to the Mix and bake in 8" pan. Then split into layers. Spread with whipped cream (or frosting or custard). Top with fruit.

Your guests will oob and ah. And well they may, for Dromedary Gingerbread—and only Dromedary—is made from the treasured old recipe of Washington's mother!

Dromedary Gingerbread Mix
Just add Water!

MORE QUICK TRICKS WITH DROMEDARY MIX

COOKIES: Package makes 50 to 60! Make them plain or with chocolate bits, nuts or raisins. Delicious!

FRUIT STRIPS: Add 2/3 c. water and 1 c. chopped cooked prunes. Spread batter ¼" thick. Bake. Cut into strips.

GINGER RING: Stunning! And easy. Bake in greased ring mold. Serve warm, with fruit salad . . . or ice cream.

Give them "Candy from Trees" . . . delicious

Dromedary Dates

Children love Dromedary Dates . . . So flavorsome and tender. And they're so wholesome! Rich in minerals, vitamins. A wonderful energy pick-up . . . for you too!

The only dates pasteurized!

even if I thought it was right to advance you this money, I couldn't. There isn't ten dollars to spare."

David stared. "What do you mean? What's happened? Mom always ——"

"That's just it. Mom always. And so the little she had is gone, and the little I have has to be stretched very carefully. Ten dollars for you to take a girl to a dance is just impossible, David. We're poor people."

"But I've already asked her. What will I tell her? What ——" The words were out before he knew it. They were foolish words to say to Jeb. What did Jeb know or care about his humiliation—about Susan?

He turned without waiting for any answer and walked out. He went up to his own room and clos-d the door and stood looking out the window with his long legs apart and his big hands deep in his pockets. His brain was whirling like a kaleidoscope, all the familiar patterns breaking apart and forming into new, strange ones.

Poor, he thought. No. The Fullers were poor, the Fullers with their nine kids, all wearing cut-down clothes that didn't fit them, living in a house with a leaky roof and no paint.

"David," said his mother's voice outside the door. "David, may I come in?"

She was almost as tall as he was, but she looked much smaller. She was not like other mothers, with her tumbled hair and the dimple that flickered at the corner of her mouth and the look of mischief in her eyes. It was hard to remember, sometimes, that she was more than twice his age. Even when she scolded him for something, she usually looked ready to burst out laughing.

"About the ten dollars," she said. "Maybe I can find some way. We have a couple of weeks. I think maybe I can get it together by then."

She would get it together—she would give him the ten dollars. But now all at once he saw how it was. She would go without something herself so that he could have it. This was what she had been doing right along, and he had never known it, never guessed.

"No, mom," he said. "It's okay—it doesn't matter."

She smiled. "Of course it matters. You think I don't remember? Your father and I went to the Labor Day dance for our first anniversary. We ate mostly potatoes all the rest of the week, but we didn't care." She turned her face away from him a little, and he could no longer see her eyes. "Jeb doesn't understand about such things. He's a good man, but he doesn't understand."

David felt a small, comforting warmth. She didn't really think so much of Jeb after all. She didn't agree that David shouldn't have ten dollars to take his girl to the dance. Still, he couldn't take the money from her, now that he knew how things were. He didn't know what he was going to do, but he couldn't take it.

"I don't want you to give it to me, mom," he said. All at once he was angry. "Heck, I'm no little kid!"

She looked at him in astonishment. "What do you mean? What has that to do with it?"

But he didn't know. He didn't know what he meant. Everything was confused and strange and he couldn't tell what to do. How was he going to back out of his invitation to Susan? How could he do that—what could he say to her? He would make a fool of himself, and she would go to the dance with somebody else, up the wide curving drive, through the great doors, with somebody else—and she would never bother with him any more; she would never again sit with him on the grass and look at the river.

He had to get that money.

There weren't many night jobs around town that a fellow his age could get, and all of those had been filled at the beginning of the summer. He walked his feet off for a week, and then there was only a week left before the final day for buying tickets—Susan would be home soon—and he didn't know what to do.

At the beginning of the last week, his mother tried to give him the money. She slip on instantly... no tugging

Ebonettes

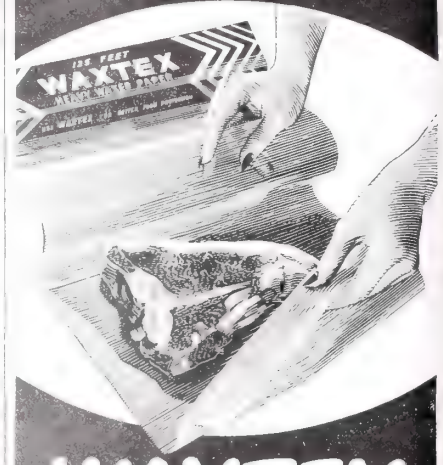
Easy on and off as a cotton glove...satinized inside. Short fingers, snug fit at tips. Amazing positive-grip finish. Unusual comfort, bare-hand efficiency. Of Du Pont neoprene, long lasting. Now it's fun to keep your hands lovely with easy-to-wear Ebonettes.

The Pioneer Rubber Company
Willard, Ohio • Los Angeles, Calif.

Buy easy-to-wear Ebonettes at drug, hardware, paint and department stores.

Over 25 years of Quality Gloves

STRONG, TRANSPARENT



WAXTEX
HEAVY WAXED PAPER

FOR TRUE BARBECUE FLAVOR

This wonderful sauce brings to sandwiches and indoor cooking the rare spirit of "open-pit" barbecue. Racy—but it won't burn you up. No artificial preservatives added.

A. C. L. HAASE'S
True BARBECUE SAUCE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

FREE! Send for "Barbecuing Indoors and Out." A.C.L. Haase Co., 4300 Geraldine, St. Louis 15, Mo.

gain that Jeb didn't understand—that as something between the two of them, r and son—that it was fine to be prac- and foresighted, but that life had to some gaiety in it, too, some foolishness. stened. He wanted to be convinced. e couldn't take the money.

tried to talk to him, but he avoided He told himself it was because Jeb still ot given him back his key, but that was d resentment and this was fresh. He ly knew himself what it was: that if it ot been for Jeb he need not have known hings were; he could have accepted the y from his mother and thought nothing he could have gone on in the old way, aken Susan to the dance, and been v.

found work the last week, when he got to ringing doorbells. He found two e who wanted their cellars cleaned and mind his doing he evening, and t a few lawns to before dark, and d lady gave him dollar to bring k down from the Every evening shed home from ugstore, gobbled pper, and was off e what he could o do. At first he l all over when ent to bed, and ldn't sleep. But wore off in a few en Susan came . He had not n exactly when vas coming, or he was going to er. He had no ime at all. But lay he was mix- soda, his back to counter, and a voice said, lo, David." And she was, sitting stool with her s on the counter ner chin on her , looking at him ly—just the way membered her, s though she had been away. Hello," he said. lo, Susan." he only knew words to say. id know them. were there, waiting inside of him, wait- be released. Only he couldn't release . He couldn't find the spring, the lever. e he would never find them, and the would stay there, crowding against his , and Susan would never know.

you have a nice summer?" he asked ery nice. Did you?" eah. Swell." was lovely of you to ask me to the ," she said. "I'm terribly excited." Ie too. I mean, I'm excited too." ce they had sat and watched the river, ng hands, speaking softly. Once he had arm and easy with her, and talked of s that were strange and new, and kissed David." She gestured with her chin ner lips twitched. He looked where she ooking, but he saw nothing except the rising slowly from the coffeepot. id," she said, her smile full now, her so low that no one else would hear. k—the fog comes on little cat feet." grinned, and slid the soda expertly the counter to the customer. "Don't jokes about that," he said. "That's neme song—at least it would be if it was g." He laughed without knowing why as laughing. He felt wonderful. "Got a dress for the dance?" he asked her.

"No," she said slowly, a little anxiously. "But my old one's nice."

"I bet you'll look swell," he said, and then he said it again, differently, easily, his voice deeper somehow, and stronger. "I bet you'll look beautiful, Susan."

The night he came home with the tickets in his pocket, his mother and Jeb were sitting at the dining-room table with a pile of papers spread out in front of them.

"Come on in," his mother called to him. "We're just about finished."

"I want to get something to eat," he said, and went on past, into the kitchen.

He was sitting on the table, eating an apple, when his mother came in. She took an apple, too, and sat down next to him, munching, swinging her leg. There was ink on her fingers and a smudge of it on one cheek.

"Look, David," she said, "why do you avoid Jeb? Don't you like him? You used to, before we were married."

"He's all right. I can't get used to having him run things, that's all; not letting me have a key—stuff like that."

"He's a good man, David. He's somebody to depend on in a crisis—a rock to lean on. I've never really had a rock." Her smile was small, wistful. "Your father was . . . quicksilver. We were very happy, but you see we never thought about tomorrow—we never built anything." She gave a little sigh. "Jeb has just been showing me how he has planned everything. All our bills are paid now, and we're going to be able to save from now on, and still have enough for everything else." She took a bite of apple and went on speaking with her mouth full. "When I was first married we had a budget too. Of course, we never stuck to it, but we had it. And you know what one item was? Nonsense." She laughed. "You can bet Jeb has nothing down for Nonsense."

She had always talked to him like this, even when he was a little boy—as though he were her own age and understood all about everything. And he had always listened politely, not interrupting, letting the words glide through his ears while he busied himself with thoughts of his own. But now all at once he heard, and he knew what the words meant; he knew.

"But I love Jeb," she said, almost with defiance. "It's a quiet thing, without surprises, and still it's good. A woman my age doesn't need surprises, surely. So you try to be friends with him, David, because he's a wonderful friend to have—you can be certain of that."

"All right," he said. "I'll try."

When she had left him, and he heard her go upstairs, he went into the dining room, where Jeb was putting the papers in order. The man looked up and gave his friendly smile and asked him to sit down.

But David stood. "I got that money together all right," he said. "That ten dollars. I bought the tickets."

Jeb nodded. "That's a fine thing," he said, "to go after what you want and get it. As long as you want something worth while and ——" He stopped, and made an impatient gesture with his large, work-worn hand.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

When You Have Gone

By Eugene T. Maleska

When you have gone, and in these quiet rooms
Your voice still lingers like an echoed song,
Sometimes across my opened book
there looms
Gray-shadowed fear. I tell myself how wrong
And infantile this notion that some harm
May strike in streets or places
where you go,
But when sane reason quails
before alarm
I close the book and try the radio
In hope that blatant trumpets will erase
The vestiges of childhood from
my brain;
And still they cling—grim pictures
that I face,
Smash into nothing, think, and
face again.
Then you return to find me on the stair,
And wonder at the kiss I give you there.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

1-2-3 a Breakfast Spree!
Quick and easy . . . with this one basic cereal you can serve so many ways! The flavor "at home" with everything . . . from strawberry jam to a poached egg . . . because it's so natural, so honest! For Nabisco Shredded Wheat is just whole-wheat steamed, shredded, baked. A good for your family as "cooked" cereal without the bother for you! Get Nabisco Shredded Wheat — the original Niagara Falls product.
Here's how — with hearty Nabisco Shredded Wheat:
1 Crumble, add banana, brown sugar and cream
2. Sprinkle with nut meats. Butter, top and toast the
3. With strawberry jam and top milk
The cereal you can serve a dozen ways!
NABISCO SHREDDED WHEAT IS DELICIOUS HOT, TOO
TO GET THE ORIGINAL PRODUCT AS MADE SINCE 1893 ask for NABISCO SHREDDED WHEAT
NABISCO
SHREDDED WHEAT
The Original NIAGARA FALLS PRODUCT
12 LARGE BISCUITS
NATIONAL BISCUIT CO.
MADE IN U.S.A.
One of the many fine foods baked by Nabisco National Biscuit Company

Miss Swank* slips
must fit better!
Only Miss Swank slips have this exclusive STRAIGHT-PLUS-BIAS design. Straight-cut sides prevent twisting, riding up, bunching. Bias-cut front and back gives you a smooth-fitting, smooth-acting, oh, so comfortable slip! Exquisitely tailored of the finest fabrics —in the Miss Swank manner. At better stores, from $3.
Miss Swank*
straight + bias slips
*Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. © 1947, MISS SWANK, INC. 112 MADISON AVE., N. Y. 16

what? only these?
How to end "button-bother" forever!
FOR HOME ATTACHMENT
Gripper FASTENERS
NO SPECIAL TOOLS NEEDED
only 25¢ a card at notion counters!

Grand news for sew-at-homes!
The makers of famous Gripper fasteners now bring you Gripper fasteners especially designed to attach at home!
All you need is a pencil, a spool, and something to tap with to put them on . . . and they never come off!
No holes to punch, no tools to buy. Instructions on every package.
Their uses are countless, and you'll sing their praises when you discover how wonderful they are!

GRIPPER* FASTENERS
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
*the laundry-proof [illegible] that ends "button-bother"

Oakville Company, Division Scovill Manufacturing Company, Waterbury 86, Conn. America's leading manufacturer of snap fasteners

"I'm not going to lecture. I do too much of that, eh?" He took out his pipe and filled it slowly, watching his big fingers tamping down the tobacco. "My father and his father and I myself—we always had to earn everything we ever had, you see; every penny, every pleasure and privilege. I can't see any kind of squandering—I can't ——" He broke off and shrugged, looking up at David with a little smile, watching to see if he understood. "I want to make your mother happy," he said then, "and you, too, David." His voice was anxious, puzzled. "That's what I want more than anything in the world."

David sat down now. It seemed to him that Jeb was asking him a question—a question to which the answer stood clear in his mind. "Women," he said. "They want a man to understand about—about nonsense."

Jeb repeated the word as though he had never heard of it. "Nonsense?"

David nodded. He put his hand in his pocket and brought out the tickets. "Here," he said, "you take these; you take m the dance."

For several moments Jeb did not m speak. He sat staring at the ticke though trying to read on them the that were not there.

"What will you tell your girl?" he David finally.

"I'll tell her the truth. I'll tell her thing happened in the family—a k crisis—and so I had to give up the t It will be all right," he said. "Women man to be practical, too—you kno pendable in a crisis."

Jeb stood up. He said nothing, jus David's hand in his powerful grasp and and strode swiftly out of the room. In ment his voice boomed through the calling to David's mother—sounding and gay, a little reckless, almost.

David looked down at his hand, t gers still tingling from Jeb's clasp. T took the key that Jeb had left in hi and attached it carefully to his key r

THE RED CROSS: MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE

(Continued from Page 67)

During the war, in every quarter where American G. I.'s walked, or fought, or sagged with fatigue, the Red Cross found its way. In the form of a bandage. . . . In the form of blood plasma. . . . As a club director. . . . In an ambulance, a doughnut-and-coffee canteen, in a letter saying not to worry about the wife, she and the baby are doing okay, in a bar of chocolate looking like pearls beside the cabbage soup of the prison.

And in the hospitals where wounded lay: friendliness, courage, gentleness—and more. Training. Nothing fancy. Nothing dramatic. Lectures on how hospitals are run; where responsibilities lie; what sick men need; lectures from Red Cross leaders, drawing on the organization's seasoned experiences; lectures from the doctors and the nurses. Training in cooking for the Canteen Corps. Training in driving trucks, busses, jeeps, station wagons—driving generals, privates, colonels, admirals, for the Motor Corps. Training in nursing for the Nurse's Aides.

And training in being a Gray Lady. A Gray Lady is a mysterious creature. Her service is intangible. You cannot say of her (as you cannot of a mother) that she did this, and this, and this happened. Sometimes she seems just to be puttering around. She sits there idly talking to the glum boy with the cast on his foot; just passing the time of day. You can't tell by looking at her that a slip with her name on it will be dropped on the hospital's social-service desk that evening, a slip reading, "Jones worried about harvesting his wheat crop; says wife sick." That slip will become a telegram, which will start an inquiry, which may provide a nurse for the wife, a farm hand for the farm, or money to tide the family over. . . . But what did the Gray Lady do, really? They were just gossipin', after all, and the farm came up.

Officially, the Gray Lady is a member of the Red Cross Hospital and Recreation Corps. Her nickname came in World War I in the first hospital in which she worked—Walter Reed, in Washington—from the gray uniform she wore. She is an ill man's mother, his sister, his aunt, his link with home. She does his shopping for him, writes his letters if he can't, brings him cigarettes or a pipe, holds his hand when he's down and out, encourages him to dance when he isn't. And today, as new methods of treatment open the doors of the once barred and sinister mental wards, she walks freely among the disturbed and the normal alike. And for good reason.

Take what happened in Kennedy Veterans' Hospital in Memphis. The boy lay in a catatonic trance. He had not spoken s arrived. His bed was just off the ward the psychotics were, and where the Lady had just finished playing Alwa she slid her small wheeled piano o stopped beside the open door of the room. She began to play Trees, sin softly as she played. The boy stirr opened his eyes. She played it again. gan to sing. He remained alert lon the last lingering note had died in the was happenstance that the boy was a but it was no happenstance that a ye the woman sat in a church pew liste the soaring voice of that same lad as in the church choir, and tears of down her face.

"Even if we could replace the vol with paid personnel, we could rarel cate their service," said Dr. Hugh L chief of Kennedy Veterans' Hospital. one coming to hos pital because sh to help, becau likes the patien individuals, is a factor which ca tabulated. And our present e ceiling, we coul place volunteer wanted to."

> One night the great and flaming missionary-bishop, Francis Xavier, returned weary from a strenuous day's labor. He made haste to retire for the night, saying to an assistant: "I must have sleep or I shall die. No matter who comes, do not disturb me."
>
> In a little while the assistant saw at the door of the bishop's room a benign but anxious face and heard the previous order modified. "I made a mistake. If a little child comes, awake me." —Pulpit Digest.

He spoke of t teen Corps wor baked a birthd for one of the b how his medic began to show cided impro from that night on; he spoke of the game that the Motor Corps had group of paralyzed veterans 100 mile and how some of these men had co death only by the will to live. He the Red Cross members of the Arts a Corps who were on call, the painters sculptors who come out when a b boy—needs them and their abilities

Doctor Prather is representative of chiefs of veterans' hospitals. Never our history, or world history, have received care and interest of the cali are receiving now. Just consider, stance, the different social attitud World War I, veterans' hospitals w in localities far from cities in plac they would bother no one. Today built in and near the cities, and p encouraged—even demanded—to themselves. As representatives of th the Red Cross moved with the Administration and inaugurated t services to veterans. Any veterans' which so desires may now have a pr Red Cross field director (it's Janice and two assistants at Kennedy) hospital grounds to provide liaison the VA staff and the Red Cross v

3 WAYS BETTER . . . 6

1. Leaves skin feeling smoother . . . softer!
2. Protects against "Alcohol Dry Skin"!
3. Makes massaging easier... Feel the difference!

more worry about that old bugaboo lcohol Dry Skin"! Just splash on w Mifflin with DERMIUM . . . and know it your skin is guarded against the rness so often caused by excessive e of ordinary rubbing alcohols. . . You feel the difference!

DERMIUM does it! This new miracle redient in New Mifflin Rub not only ves your skin feeling soft and smooth a baby's . . . it makes massaging ier by reducing friction. Your hands m to glide over your skin!

Try New Mifflin with DERMIUM, for easiest-rubbing, smoothest, most ilarating rubdown you ever experi-ced. Use New Mifflin, too, to help pro-t against colds—as a massage for iscular aches and pains—and for ansing sickroom instruments. Un-nted, and scented with Lilac, Pine, vender or Wintergreen.

Don't just ask for "Alcohol"... insist on genuine New with Dermium!

MIFFLIN

ISOPROPYL ALCOHOL

The National Rubdown!

"And so long as there's a boy left in a veterans' hospital, we'll be there," Mrs. Dave Gaut, head of Memphis' Red Cross Volunteer Special Services, said. "We'll never allow a let-down like the one after the last war."

These are not casual words. Memphis is a town full of volunteers. During the war the Red Cross trained 10,000; many have, of course, moved away, but of those who are left, be they bandage rollers or office workers, "It's just a question of their being needed," Mrs. Gaut said. As proof of their support: the Red Cross goal was $270,000 in 1946; the chapter raised $345,000. As proof of their willingness to work: the hurry call for bandage rollers answered one year and four months after the war was over. "Memphis hasn't let us down yet. And it won't. We got those surgical dressings made—and we'll get anything else done our boys need."

In January, 1947, Mrs. Gaut had 100 Gray Ladies at work in Kennedy Hospital, while she planned an orientation course to double that amount as the hospital began to climb from 1000 patients toward its capacity load of 2000. In the Motor Corps 62 war-seasoned drivers each gave one day or two evenings a week to driving men, singly or in groups, in the Red Cross bus or the two new station wagons to plays, wrestling matches, parties—wherever they wanted to, and could, go. In that month 49 members of the Canteen Corps spent at least eight hours a week cooking and serving full dinners to the patients ("We do them up proud—on our best silver platters," said director Mrs. Frank Glankler) in the locked wards of the NP patients, in the private homes of Memphis' hospitable, or push-wagon parties through the hospital. And during that month, three members of the Arts and Skills unit worked in the hospital's Occupational and Art Shop teaching design to men who worked the leather, sculpting to men who worked the clay; nine more were on call for jewelry design, art appreciation, oil painting.

NOR did the volunteers neglect two other Memphis hospitals; Lamar Veterans', with 500 to 600 patients, some of them World War I veterans, is staffed by 39 Gray Ladies. Motor Corps girls drove them to the concerts, to the shopping area—and as for the wrestling matches, "Pop" said the first time he had got out of his wheel chair in twenty years was the night the girls said he could go, too, if he'd leave his wheel chair behind; he got out—and under his own power. At the U. S. Naval Hospital 26 more Gray Ladies serve in the wards where most of the sailors suffer from bone injuries—and where one of the heroes of Corregidor still, after three years of bad eating, if any, in Jap prison camps, has a long way to go before he becomes whole.

Let it not be thought that only in Memphis does the Red Cross still care for veterans. All over the country, wherever there is a need and a request, the Red Cross is pushing to fill that need, meet that request. But, in Memphis, there is given speedily that little bit more. For instance, while 50 hours is the minimum required yearly of a Gray Lady by the national Red Cross, the Memphis chapter, headed by an erstwhile volunteer of World War I, Miss Mary Poston, demands 200; where the national asks a 50-hour yearly minimum of a Motor Corps driver, Memphis says 300. Now 200 hours yearly means four hours weekly, but Memphis doesn't think that's much. As Mrs. Tim Treadwell, head of Kennedy's Gray Ladies, says, "You know that once you get out there among the patients, you're not going to leave that soon. Four hours is just what you have to do to be a member in good standing. We put in at least a full day each week, and more when we can. The fact of the matter is, we like to be Gray Ladies."

And the Motor Corps? Mrs. James Fleming ("There's the little lady who drives that bus—that little blonde there," said the boy with the crutches) says the Motor Corps is pushing toward 60,000 miles of service now; and as for a yearly minimum of 300 hours—"Some of the girls give that much a month."

Friendliness, courage, gentleness—and training. Work with the ill and injured is not caresses your instep

BESTFORM

collects his compliments

If ordinary pumps cut, try the blissful ease of TANGO, famous Paradise classic. Its flexible instep gives with every tiny movement of your foot. Watch his admiring glances, too!

Paradise Shoes

BRAUER BROS. SHOE CO., ST. LOUIS 8, MISSOURI

HEAVEN FROM AN OVEN

Get full-flavored perfection in all your baking—by using the new, improved Pillsbury's Best Flour. It's easy to work with—ingredients blend smoothly and readily, doughs have a new springiness. Moreover, this new Pillsbury's Best is especially adapted to modern, minute-pinching, quick-mix baking. It's a faster Pillsbury's Best when used with modern, streamlined recipes. Look for Ann Pillsbury's time-saving recipes in every bag.

Ann Pillsbury's MELODY PIE

A melody of tantalizing fruit flavors, with a Pillsbury's Best crust that melts in your mouth

Bake at 450° F. for 10 minutes, then 375° F. for 50 minutes.

Makes one 9-inch pie.

Sift together . . . . 1 cup sifted PILLSBURY'S BEST ENRICHED FLOUR
½ teaspoon salt

Cut in . . . . . ⅓ cup shortening with pastry blender or two knives until particles are the size of small peas.

Add . . . . 2 to 3 tablespoons cold water until dough is moist enough to hold together.

Roll . . . . . dough to ⅛-inch thickness.

Fit . . . . . loosely in pan and gently pat out air pockets. Trim pastry 1 inch beyond rim of pan. Fold to form standing rim; flute edge.

Chop . . . . . 1 cup cooked, pitted prunes and 4 cups peeled apples.

Add . . . . . grated rind and juice from one small orange.

Blend together . . . ½ teaspoon salt
½ cup sugar
2 tablespoons flour
¼ cup prune juice
¼ cup light molasses

Combine . . . . . with fruit mixture; turn into pastry-lined pie pan.

Dot with . . . . 1 tablespoon butter.

Bake . . . . . in hot oven (450° F.) for 10 minutes; reduce to 375° F. and bake for 50 minutes. Before serving top with whipped cream.

You Bake your Best with Pillsbury's Best much good without training. A woman driver on a bus with 40 crippled patients—she has to know how to drive. Memphis' record is no injuries, no tickets. And a woman walking through a ward or sitting in a recreation room among men whose spirits have broken and whose minds are out of touch with reality—be she ever so willing, she must also be capable.

Before any member of the Gray Lady Corps can even begin training, she must undergo a screening by two Red Cross officers. Basic characteristics necessary are dependability, a cheerful personality and good sense. Young girls are encouraged to become Gray Ladies who work in the recreation halls only; young matrons are encouraged to work the medical and surgical wards; and, as Dr. Samuel Paster, chief of Kennedy's neuropsychiatric service, puts it, "We prefer the young middle-aged among the disturbed patients." All Gray Ladies working any wards go through a probationary period of 24 hours' work before they are permitted to wear the gray veil, the symbol of their unit. When a girl puts on the Red Cross insignia, she is more than herself: she is the representative of a nationally supported, nationally believed-in organization whose standards she must uphold. "And Gray Ladies must," Mrs. Treadwell said, "have not only the approval of the Red Cross, but also the approval of the VA staff. Any volunteer in a VA hospital is responsible first to the VA staff; second to the Red Cross."

And what types do the work? There's a beautiful blond sweet-talker, whose looks belie her efficiency and who makes the weakest patient feel like a strong man; there's the schoolteacher who gives her evenings and to whom patients will talk when they won't talk to anyone else; there's the mother whose son left his leg in France; there's the intuitive woman who knows just the right thing to say to a disturbed patient. There are working women who give their leisure hours, their evenings, their Saturdays and Sundays. There are married women whose husbands take an interest in the patients, too; the veterans like men visitors.

Hospital authorities respect the Gray Ladies. Doctor Paster, formerly senior psychiatrist at Bellevue Hospital, New York, has asked for 70 more—"Treat the sick patient like a human being and he's much less likely to hurt others or destroy himself." He cites his 80 per cent social-recovery record, his record of 16,000 patients and no suicides, his record of no mishaps among volunteer workers. He personally works with his Gray Ladies; he is always available for consultation, for conference.

"To the disturbed men, the Gray Lady is first the Red Cross, the symbol of mercy; second, a woman; and third, his link with his home life. It is she who reminds him of his constructive, social self; who first writes his letters home for him, then encourages him to write them himself. She is a woman of peace and inner security; mental patients rarely know what the Gray Lady has meant to them when they most sorely needed her."

"Yes," said Mrs. L. E. Dickey, "I was fearful when I first decided to work here. But I found there was work for me to do—and I found it meant a lot to me. It's broadened my understanding of others; helped me to know why people act as they do—and when I have been troubled myself, n troubles were lost in the troubles here. It through kindness and persuasion that yo work with these men. They need personal a tention as children do. I taught Sunda school for eighteen years and these patien are like the children I had then."

There will be an increasing need for Gra Ladies with the neuropsychiatric veterans Memphis: a 1000-bed hospital for NP's alo is planned for Memphis in the near futur There will also be an increasing need f volunteers who will work with tubercul veterans; Lamar is expected to change soo to TB patients only. Recreation and ente tainment is particularly difficult for tube culars who need rest and quiet for recover and it is in this field that volunteers of organizations are of the greatest help. T Red Cross serves these groups—like t veterans' organizations, the church a school organizations—by transporting eith them or the veterans to the recreati planned.

"I don't think we could operate witho volunteers," Jack Silicott, VA chief special services, said. "It's not only the work, but their interest in the men."

More and more work is needed. More ar more interest. There are 122 VA hospita now; 74 new ones are planned. In Decer ber, 1946, 82,808 veterans were being car for; tens of thousands more were expecte The shift from Army hospitals to Vetera Administration hospitals occurred in t summer of 1946. The Sunday visitors f away that summer: the drama and t glamour of the war began to wear off. The boys, with their misshapen bodies, the headaches, their troubles, didn't have t draw the cocky lad, his cap perched jaunti on the side of his head, had as he strode off victory. But they were the same boys, wi the same needs. For them each operation another D Day; each struggle with pain another landing. It is their belief in the place in the world that keeps them fightin It is up to all of us to fulfill that belief; to fu fill the promises with which they went in battle the first time.

"There's a moment in each of our da when our life hangs by a thread," said t man who, because of a sniper's bullet, w never walk again. "But if we give in to t idea the struggle is a futile one, we are lo I remember the day we persuaded Jack he to go to the fish fry the Red Cross was givin He was on boards—like the ham in a san wich. He didn't want to go, but he was t weary even to protest. The girls just gather him up like they really wanted him along and knowing them as I do after the time I' spent here, I know they did want him wi them. He couldn't use his hands, he couldn use his feet, he couldn't use his shoulde They could have treated him like he was goner. But they knew he could eat—and fe the sun on his face—and he could smi Look at him now. Two years isn't so lo really. Look at him, sitting in his whe chair. He can swing those shoulders no He's getting well. What if he'd been ju left that day to brood—to feel that he was wanted? You have to feel wanted to want get well—and you have to want to get w if you're going to. There is a good life wa ing for all of us, but it's a long hard ro back to it. And we have to have help."

LETTERS TO JOAN

(Continued from Page 31)

mind, it would seem to me that even if a woman is in such command of her emotions—or has such lack of them—that she can indulge in petting without danger, it is unpleasant to think of being handled in intimate ways by any casual escort. And unwholesome as well. Continual sex excitation without gratification is not good from either a physiological or psychological standpoint.

Now all this, of course, is just my own view, and goodness knows I have been out of the amorous lists for many years. Perhaps, I said to myself, people manage these things better nowadays.

So I pinned down the one of our m relatives who, in my opinion, is most lik to know about such things. (Maybe you be able to guess which one, Joan, but le keep it to ourselves.) I'll call him Cou Tom. As a charming bachelor who g around, and who is decidedly not a virg he is in a position to keep completely up-date on courting customs. I didn't menti petting as such, but I did tell him I had be called upon to talk to some young peop and didn't want to seem too old-fashion and so on. What advice would he give seventeen-year-old daughter, if he had o

STOP THAT RIP! Mend tears in window shades at once with strong, invisible "SCOTCH" TAPE. Keeps rips from growing.

SCOTCH BRAND Cellulose TAPE

SEALS WITHOUT MOISTENING TRANSPARENT AS GLASS

25c at your favorite store

Scads of "Scotch" Tape ideas in the new free "Slick Tricks" booklet. Send for yours today . . . and if you have some clever hunches on how you use "Scotch" Tape, let us hear from you! Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 922 Fauquier Ave., St. Paul 6, Minn.

©1947 3M CO.

Sell GREETING CARDS

Fastsales, big profits . . . Birthday, Easter, Boxed Stationery, Gift Wraps, Correspondence Notes, Personal Checks, Party Goods, $1 Items, Box Assortments. Hedenkamp & Co., 343 Broadway, Dept. A-3, New York 13, N.Y.

100 MONEY MAKERS

KNITTED AND WOVEN FROM COTTON

Ask for them by Name

MORGAN

REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

DISH CLOTHS

Bright, fast kitchen colors in attractive designs.

SOLD AT ALL LEADING STORES

MORGAN COTTON MILLS, Inc., LAUREL MILL, N. C.

"FROM RAW COTTON THROUGH FINISHED PRODUCT"

$1,000.00 IN CASH PRIZES

BE A WINNER . . and DRAPE Your Home in New Beauty

YOU can be a winner in Itasca's big "Homemaker's Inspiration" Contest . . . YOU can get your share of the $1,000! It's easy . . . it's fun—just let beautiful Itasca fabrics be your inspiration! Drapes, bedspreads, slipcovers, table cloths, and many other items, made with Itasca fabrics can be entered . . . YOUR ENTRY may win one of the big money prizes! Write for full details.

Save up to 50% Buy Direct From the Mill

GET STARTED NOW!

SEND FOR YOUR 16 FREE SAMPLES OF ITASCA FABRICS

Select your favorite Itasca material right in your own home . . . buy direct from the mill and save up to 50%. Smart new designs and weaves in Ratines, Woven Stripes, Homespuns, Basket Weaves and others are available now in famous Itasca fabrics. Get your free samples today—get started early on your entry in Itasca's "Homemaker's Inspiration" Contest.

ITASCA WEAVERS GUILD • Dept. ITASCA-5-2 TEXAS

"I would advise her," he said among other things not relevant to this discussion, "not to indulge in any very heavy petting, at least before she is thirty."

He seemed so embarrassed, poor dear, that I didn't have quite the nerve to ask him what he meant by heavy petting, but I can sort of guess, can't you? Then he caught on that it was you I was thinking about, and fairly roared, "You tell Joan to make those squirts keep their hands off of her!" If Cousin Tom hasn't found petting a great aid to seduction, I'll eat my most expensive hat. Which is why he wants none of it for a woman of his family. Your own father, if he were alive, couldn't have been more emphatic.

For my part, I'll take a decorous courtship based upon mutual respect as well as upon attraction, from which passion flowers as a sweet and logical outgrowth. To start with the passion, it seems to me, is just not smart, at least from the woman's standpoint.

How can it help but reduce to an animal level what can and should be one of the most beautiful experiences of life? How can men respect women, and how can women respect themselves, if practically a woman's whole person is made available to any man who deigns to spend an evening with her? That's the way it strikes me. And not just individual women, but the whole sex suffers when such a custom is allowed to grow up.

You remember my friend Mary Smith, and how closely she sequestered herself after the death of her husband, to whom she was devoted. Well, her friends had been urging and urging her to get out and have a little fun, and lately she has been accepting some invitations. She tells me she is aghast and heartsick at the things escorts seem to expect. It is amazingly different from what she and I were used to, and indicates to her that men hold women in pretty low esteem, at least as compared with the way it used to be. If things like that can happen to a woman like Mary, almost middle-aged, dignified, eminently respectable and with an assured position, one wonders what it must be like for young, attractive females. Perhaps you girls can enlighten me on that score.

> I painfully reflect that in almost every political controversy of the last fifty years, the leisured classes, the titled classes have been in the wrong. The common people—the toilers, the men of uncommon sense—these have been responsible for nearly all the social reform measures which the world accepts today. —GLADSTONE.

I grant you that the girls of my generation probably were too prim and inhibited, and that a more frank acceptance of the facts of sex makes for greater happiness in marriage. But most of us did manage to get husbands, and during the courtship phase we certainly held the whip hand. And as long as woman continues to be the sex that has the babies—and I see no immediate prospect of any change in this respect—I think that is a pretty good thing.

Well, darling, any more—gulp!—questions? I really enjoy thinking these things through. And if I sometimes seem to arrive at the same old conclusions, do remember that the moral laws, after all, were set up to protect women. Or perhaps, I had better say, to protect the babies who otherwise might come into the world without a father's presence and help. That being the case, it behooves us women to think more than once before we decide to throw them all away, wouldn't you say?

Look, do you suppose you could inveigle that Tim into coming home with you for a week end sometime? I'd like to meet him. (But don't tell him I said so. That would be very bad strategy indeed, at least at this point!)

Your incurably old-fashioned (when it comes to petting)

MOTHER

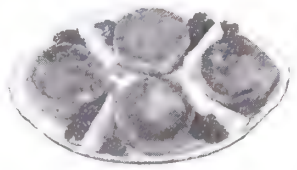
THE END

For Easter Sunday Dinner
So CRISP
So FRESH
THE GIFT SUPREME
THE FAMILY TREAT
½ lb. serves 8
for Gin Rummy—Bridge Luncheon or Cocktail Parties
Look for the sparkling white—electrically heated Double Kay Nut Shop in good stores in your community—ready to serve you with the finest nuts from all over the world—packed fresh for you at moderate prices.
Double Kay NUTS
FRESHNESS TOASTED IN
Try ¼ pound of DOUBLE KAY MIXED NUTS for DINNER NEXT SUNDAY
©1947 THE KELLING NUT CO., CHICAGO

DEEP-SEA DAVE SAYS—

Keep a sharp lookout at your grocer's for famous CODDIES

The fish cakes with oceans of flavor



RECIPE—Shape into fat little cakes and fry until golden brown. Coddies are a delicious combination of choice fish caught off the Atlantic Coast and carefully selected potatoes.

OTHER FAMOUS DAVIS BROS. SEAFOODS . . .

★ Flaked Fish prepared from cod . . .
★ Flaked Fish prepared from pollock.

Crabmeat style flakes for appetizing cocktails, salads, creamed fish. At good food stores.

The Tupman Thurlow Co., Inc. • Sole Selling Agents for U. S. A. • 155 East 44th St., New York 17, N. Y.

I'M SPEEDING UP WASH-DAY LIKE MAGIC!

Since I found this Amazing new-type STARCH!

Reading That Made History

By Donald A. Laird, Ph.D., Sc.D.

F

...d it save so they might not go to the ...olish use in their old age. No boy who true? the lad asked himself in a voice that barely rustled. And that is how a Welsh stripling was launched on his life's goal—building boats that would travel safely under water. Simon Lake was inspired for more than sixty-five years to build and ... improve submarine and ... salvage equipment.

•

In Abilene, Kansas, a tallish high-school boy wondered what to do when he graduated. He visited the weekly newspaper office, and famed editor E. W. Howe lent him a book that had just come in. The book told the story of that amazing military leader, Hannibal. Young Dwight Eisenhower was fascinated by the book. It was the turning point in his life. Reading ... Eisenhower on the way to West Point, to become the Allied Supreme Commander in Europe in ... greatest war.

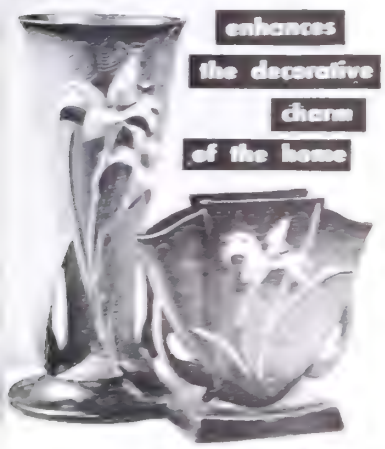
•

... is a shelf in a small upstate ... with ... things, a broken-backed encyclopedia that came ... caught his fancy: he read it until it was ... One ... boy, not yet twelve, pushed back his brown ... to ... this ... for making lenses, in a barn. He made the ... the laurels away from European optical ma...

•

... E. Dahl ... property ... Dahl ... ...

Sydney Lily



enhances the decorative charm of the home

ROSEVILLE DECORATIVE ART POTTERY

ON YOUR VACATION

Visit your Western Wonderlands

CALIFORNIA

YELLOWSTONE and GRAND TETON Nat'l Parks

ZION • BRYCE • GRAND CANYON Nat'l Parks

SUN VALLEY, IDAHO

COLORADO

DUDE RANCHES

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD

Glasses clean dry...

sparkling and streakfree!

RAIN DROPS

RAIN DROPS

dissolve grease and soap film...

greasy dishwater . . . no rough hands . . . even in hard water.

FLOATS AWAY HIDDEN DIRT SAVES SEPARATE RINSING

Saves SOAP

Dogs I've Known... by Tony Barlow

Fussy Fido Picks at his food like a dowager on a diet. His boss should tempt him with Gro-Pup Ribbon. These tasty, toasted ribbons are different from any other dog food. Dogs really go for it, according to a recent survey of owners who've fed it.

Tired Towser No bounce. No pep. No spirit. Could be Towser's just not being fed right! Nourishing Gro-Pup Ribbon would give him every vitamin and mineral dogs are known to need for vigor, vitality, and growth. As many as 23 essential nutrients are combined in Kellogg's own tested, scientific formula!

Frolicky Fritz Eats well, acts well, is well—on a basic diet of Gro-Pup, of course! His owner saves money, too. A single box of Gro-Pup Ribbon supplies as much food by dry weight as five 1-lb. cans of dog food! Order Gro-Pup from your grocer today. It's made by Kellogg's—that means it's good!

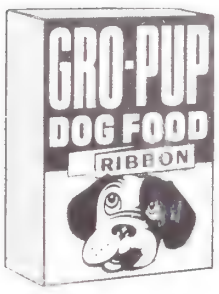
Dogs Go For GRO-PUP



P.S. You can give your dog the same tested, scientific formula as Gro-Pup Ribbon in popular Gro-Pup Meal, or in crunchy, bite-size Gro-Pup Pel-Etts. For variety, feed all three.

MADE BY Kellogg's
OF BATTLE CREEK AND OMAHA

Even the new puppy, after a long day investigating the brisk winds and wonderful smells of spring, is ready to collapse comfortably in the house when evening comes.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

NOTHING about country life moves me more than spring plowing. So much significance has it that I always stop whatever I am doing and just stand in the cool bright sun and watch and think, and my thoughts turn over and turn over, and fall back in my mind as the shining plow turns over the dark, rich earth.

For plowing means the rebirth of the growing season; it means that Nature again will justify our faith in her rhythm, that we can count on this much in a world of incessant fluctuation. What would mankind do if spring ceased to come, if seeds ceased to grow, if fruit and flower ceased to ripen? No power of nations to destroy life would seem anything but trivial beside such a devastation. Nobody, in fact, would bother about the possession of atom bombs if those small dry seeds tucked in paper packets should all at once remain small dry seeds forever.

Well, there is security in nature, and it restores the heart to realize that all over again, as George turns the plow deftly to miss the asparagus bed, and the blade bites down again. There is thinking to do about the plow itself. I always seem to see, walking over our garden, the figure of the first man who plowed there. With a homemade wooden plow, homespun clothes, and his musket at the near end of the furrow, in case of trouble. Smoke from the log cabin drifted blue against the blue sky, and how tall the woods must have been then! How deep the thicket, up the hill! I think of the labor of wresting the trees from the plot itself, by hand, with no dynamite to tear out the deep roots. I think of hand-turning the thick sod.

Now the plow that George uses would have been miracle enough for the first householder on Stillmeadow land. And we ourselves have seen the change from horses to mechanized power, for George used to hitch up the two white horses for the plowing until a few years ago. And much as I admire the motor-driven plow, I miss the sight of the horses moving rhythmically along the furrows.

The garden has been in the same spot here for as long as anyone can remember. In New England, once you get a few tons of rock extricated from a piece of earth, you want to go on using it. You can get exercise enough taking out the rocks that have grown, apparently, during the winter.

Another thing that this plowing makes me think of is the plowing that goes on in one way or another all over the world. Being a simple person, I see the world as a nice round ball; and having no sense for maps, I can imagine the Burmese and the Chinese and the Africans all tilling their soil on rounded sides of the ball. But I feel a nice sense of brotherhood with all peoples who go out in the clear early morning and say, in whatever language they speak, "This is the day to plow!" There are small clearings in jungles where dark men go out to dig furrows in the black soil and plant strange fruits I never tasted, while the small dark women tend the fire and argue with the children, and purple and ivory birds cry in the branches.

I know nothing of these people and yet I know so much. I know how they feel at the day's end when the clean receptive earth is ready for the seed. I feel a kinship with them, though I am cooking corned beef and cabbage in the Dutch oven over the electric range while they are sitting down in the thick jungle night eating unknown food rolled in a green leaf.

I know how the women feel when the garden is ready for planting and the sleepy children are quiet and the man of the family has been fed. And if it be a place where the women do the tilling, I still know how the family feels with the tribal gods making this wonderful thing possible, that food should grow out of the earth.

FINALLY, as George makes a last turn, I think how much we need to share the food grown in this rich country. Nobody should be hungry in all this world. It is the business of nations to distribute, divide, feed the hungry. There should be no child in the world going to bed at night whimpering because the simple benison of food has been denied him. There are many things we cannot do—we cannot make all people rich, or intelligent, or noble—but all people should be fed.

Dusk falls sweetly and softly in April. George goes home, after a mere fourteen hours of nonunion labor. Up at dawn, milk the cows, take the milk to the station, clean the barn, feed the pigs, plow the upper fields, plow our garden. Cut wood for the stoves. Repair the tractor. Get the cows in. Milk. Work in the April night fixing the car. Roll into bed in time to cool off the light bulbs before starting all over again.

City people who move to the country to farm are often a sorry lot, for they discover almost immediately that farming is not merely sitting under the apple trees of a summer afternoon, but means endless work, rain or sun. On the other hand, country folk have things that money cannot buy in the city; the fresh smell of new-turned earth is one.

Sister Jill is already planning the garden, sorting seeds. Early seeds can go in any day now: lettuce, radishes, those nice crisp first things. Peas too. In our valley you either have early peas or no peas at all. They must mature in the cool fresh days before the aphids rear their ugly heads and dry warm weather sets in.

Every year the seedsmen develop new varieties which are better and stronger than last year's, and it is fun to watch the vegetables improve. Some old varieties we like best, but new blight-resistant kinds are always added to our list. Last year 90 per cent of the tomatoes in our region developed a new and fatal blight, growing green fur before they ripened. This year we are experimenting with a tree tomato, and one tomato fills a salad plate—if it works!

Spring is the time for new puppies. Then they can go out in the sun by the time they are old enough, and get the grass under their paws. We wean puppies on baby food and add scraped beef later. The canned baby foods are excellent, for they have much concentrated nourishment, enough variety and are easy to digest. We use them, too, for the mother when she has her first meals after the babies are born.

Melody had her puppies while the snow was still on the ground, and we reinforced her diet with vitamins and calcium and a cod-liver-oil composite. From our experience we learned much, for no litters are ever alike and no mothers are alike either.

Melody contracted an atypic case of distemper two weeks before the puppies were born. She had been inoculated when she was a puppy, so she did not die from it, but she had a bad cold, wheezing and the other symptoms. By giving her a supportive dose of serum, she came through and had the puppies, although she had a hard time.

Due to her being nursed so ardently the previous period, she felt overdependent on us, and so she had no idea of helping the puppies after they were born. It was, she indicated, our party. She had two on the sofa, two in an armchair, two on the kitchen floor, one under the table, but setting foot in the nice nursery box was out of the question.

In a case like this, the puppies should be removed, and put in a basket on a hot-water bottle, with a soft warm towel over them. A couple of drops of warm olive oil should be given with a medicine dropper to keep them going. They should be gently rubbed from time to time to keep the circulation normal.

At the end of a hard day, we had seven beautiful puppies settled down with the mother in the box. In the morning they began to die, one by one. The doctor diagnosed the difficulty as acid milk due to the distemper. We did all we could. We took the ailing ones and kept them on hot-water bottles and fed them with a dropper every hour day and night.

Now this is what we learned: Toward the end we had one puppy still alive on the formula and one with the mother. The one remaining with the mother lived, and the fourth day the other died.

The rest slipped away one by one, but the strongest managed to survive until the acid milk had been drawn out and normal milk resulted, at which point he decided to live. In other words, saving puppies that do not nurse at all is a nearly impossible project.

Now the treatment of the mother, in such a terrible time, is of the utmost importance. Naturally she was hysterical at losing her family. She had recurrent fits of shaking, spells of digging the box up by the roots, times of whacking the lone ranger left all over the place. She panted. She tore the couch cover to pieces.

Heavy doses of calcium by mouth were given four times a day. Taking a bitch in this state to the doctor would be extra nervous strain, the doctor said. Otherwise, calcium can be administered by hypo, which is quicker and more powerful.

Meanwhile we reinforced the feeding. Melody had tray meals, served under her nose every four hours. This meant in the night too. In fact, during this period we hardly went to bed at all. We gave egg and milk, a prepared breakfast food for babies—one that has minerals and vitamins in it—with milk, chicken broth with rice (correcting symptoms of severe diarrhea), chopped broiled slices of roast beef.

A bitch that is too nervous to eat will invariably eat if the food is put in the whelping box under her nose. For she feels it must be cleaned up. We also removed Melody from the box at intervals and massaged her well.

It is imperative to keep things quiet even for a normal litter and undisturbed mother. But if any difficulty develops, no care is too much. I made an almost fatal mistake by changing the bedding in the box. Melody nearly lost her mind. Hastily I put back the old before she had banged Lone Ranger's brains out.

On no account should strangers be admitted to see new puppies. Not more than two people should do the necessary chores in the nursery. They should move quietly and speak low.

When the day came that we felt, battered and worn, we were out of the woods with what we had left, I said to Jill, "Maybe we can sit down and relax a minute." Jill went to the kitchen to boil up feeding pans and I started for my room. Then I screamed suddenly, "Here comes Melody, and a squeak is coming with her!"

We rushed out, and Melody was loping across the living room with her son and heir in her mouth. One small paw protruded from her jaws. She leaped lightly to the sofa and deposited him. She had decided she didn't dare leave him for fear he would vanish like the rest, and yet she wanted to join the family. We tried to persuade her that at six days of age, a child could not go ram-jamming over the house. In the end, we all had to go back and sit by the box.

We named the puppy Stillmeadow Solace.

Quick meals are in order in April, when the out-of-doors is so much of a treat. A simple supper is scrambled eggs and pineapple. I dip pineapple slices in flour and brown in butter. Meanwhile I fry 2 slices of bacon per person slowly, remove the bacon, and scramble 2 eggs for each person in the bacon drippings. Pineapple slices, eggs and bacon go on a hot platter. A ring of canned mushroom caps heated and seasoned may be added. Corn bread made with a prepared mix, currant jelly, water-cress-and-endive salad and pudding made with a prepared mix complete the quick meal.

Simple puddings are so easy to glamorize. A meringue made with 2 egg whites, well beaten, and ½ cup of sugar beaten in may be spread on top, and the pudding run in a hot oven until the meringue browns. Or, for all but chocolate puddings, ½ cup of tart jelly may be substituted for the sugar in the meringue, or added to whipped cream.

The cats and the cockers are wild with spring. New smells, new scurryings in the thicket, new warmth in the sun, and the last snow gone! Esmé divorces the radiator again and takes to chasing shadows in the moonlight. Honey ambles around the terrace like a golden ship in a fair wind. The younger dogs skim over the yard.

And high over our green peaceful valley rides the triumphant sun, the sun of April, the sun of spring. THE END

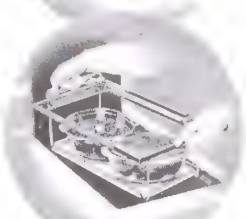
Intuition is reason in a hurry. —HOLBROOK JACKSON.

My new kitchen plans are built around the...

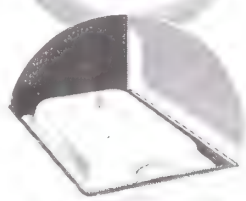
Monarch roaster range

Perfect for complete meals, vegetable dinners, baked beans, sauerkraut and spareribs, etc.

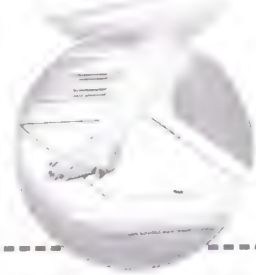
Convenient lifter rack for casserole and other baked dishes.



High-domed cover increases depth. When inverted, serves as a carving and steam server tray



When closed, the porcelain enamel lid is flush with cooking top.



How often you've wished for TWO ovens! Here you have them! In addition to the regular full-size oven — this beautiful Monarch Electric Range has a roaster-size oven built into the cooking top . . . a new, exclusive convenience which saves electricity, saves time, saves stooping. Lift the cover and there's your food! Makes a perfect Steam-Table-Server for keeping second servings juicy and hot. This range is also equipped with Monarch's exclusive "Deep Heet" Sauce Pan. See this exciting new range at your nearest Monarch dealer.

MALLEABLE IRON RANGE CO.
5647 Lake Street Beaver Dam, Wis.

Monarch ELECTRIC

Send for this free Plan Book showing convenient, Monarch-designed kitchens in full color.

MALLEABLE IRON RANGE CO., 5647 Lake St., Beaver Dam, Wisconsin

Please mail me a free copy of the new Monarch Kitchen Plan Book.

My Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

"All I did was serve 'em KELLOGG'S Raisin Bran— the kind with the tender, honeycomb coated raisins!"

DOUBLE-TREAT BREAKFAST

Watch 'em cheer when you serve this glorious fruit and cereal combination!

Extra-crisp, golden bran flakes and extra-plump luscious raisins — right from the same package of Kellogg's Raisin Bran! It's good—it's grand—it's downright delicious! Every raisin really soft and juicy (just taste 'em!) with the tenderness sealed in by a delicate coating of honeycomb—Kellogg's own special process.

This is a Kellogg exclusive, so be sure to ask for Kellogg's Raisin Bran in the white, red, and green package.

P. S. You save sugar too—because the raisins are naturally sweet!

NOTE: If you prefer crisp bran flakes without raisins, get KELLOGG'S 40% BRAN FLAKES

QUICK AND EASYS for two

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

IF spring hasn't quite gotten to you yet and your appetite isn't percolating, going home and cooking dinner may seem more ache than art to you. Better take a look around. There's lots of encouragement in what you'll see. This spring we really have a break we haven't had since early 1942. You can pick and choose from a wide variety of foods. No counting up stamps, no limiting of menus because this or that just isn't to be had. There are more frozen and canned foods around in the shops than you can use up in Quick and Easy meals for a good long time.

Take a look in the housewares store, too, on your way home. All the gadgets that make getting a meal easier are back. I was really thrilled the day I found a good can opener and a bean Frencher. My old ones had long since given up as kitchen assistants and I was lost without them.

Applying some skill and imagination to your task as chef will help you go into the spring with more zeal too. If you allow your job of getting dinner to become routine, it becomes a chore. Don't just drift into that state of mind.

Easter Evening

Water-Cress-and-Pineapple Cocktail

Frozen Rolled Sandwiches

Broiled Ham Slice With Mustard

Creamed New Potatoes With Asparagus

Crusty Rolls Green Salad

Apple Cream—Sponge Sticks

Coffee

Easter is a special day. You'd like to go to church, you're counting on a stroll. You want a special meal touching on the traditional Easter dinner, but you decide not to have it at noon. It would be too much of a rush after church. Evening is better.

And here's a note that has nothing to do with the food you're going to eat, but it will make the setting gayer. If you wore a corsage to church, it may look limp by now, but take it apart and float the blossoms in a low bowl for your dinner table. You couldn't wear it again, but you can still enjoy its beauty.

WATER-CRESS-AND-PINEAPPLE COCKTAIL

Put ½ bunch water cress, ½ cup pineapple juice and ½ cup ice cubes or chopped ice in electric blending machine with 1 tablespoon lemon juice. Turn on blender. It takes only ½ minute with this gadget to pulverize water cress and ice and make a wonderful beverage blend. However, if you do not have a blending machine, a food grinder does fine for the cress. Combine with pineapple juice by pouring it right through grinder. That way you get it all. Ice and serve in tomato-juice glasses.

You could whip up a favorite snack to serve with this springtime beverage, but if you know where to buy the frozen hors d'oeuvres—really more like tiny rolled sandwiches—you have all those thawed and ready in the refrigerator. There are 1 dozen to a package, but each is just a tiny bite. There are 3 different fillings to the dozen. Packaged in transparent paper, they'll keep fresh hours and hours after thawing. Remember these, too, when you're swinging a party and have no time for sandwich fussing.

The broiled ham is child's play, so prepare the vegetable first. It can wait. One half package frozen asparagus and 4 small new potatoes, separately cooked and combined with 1 cup seasoned thin cream sauce, will make enough for two. It's still easier if you pour ½ cup rich milk or cream over the 2 drained vegetables and add seasoning and a lump of butter or margarine. All there is to do to the ham slice is to slather it with prepared mustard before you broil it. Or for easier broiler washing, give it its mustard top after you've turned it once. The apple cream is delectable stuff. Tastes best with plain unfrosted pound or sponge cake. Buy it at the bakery.

APPLE CREAM

Here's a quick way to make this. Fold ½ cup cream, whipped, into 1 small jar or can (baby food) chopped applesauce, mixed with 3 tablespoons sugar and a little grated lemon rind. Lastly, add about ⅛ teaspoon of nutmeg. Mix well. These small jars or cans of fruit are fine for desserts for two, and now that the shortage is past you need not fear you're taking food away from babies. Any canned applesauce may be used—about ½ cup.

Short Order

Shad Roe—Lemon

New Potatoes Escarole With Egg Rolls

Strawberries With Cream

Coffee

The shad's running! If you can get your fish market to save you a pair of roe, you're in for this annual treat.

There's no salad tonight—one box of early strawberries will be your fresh raw food. The weather is warmish. You won't need to heat oven or broiler.

Scrub the new little pink potatoes thoroughly with a brush. Cook them with the skins on. Escarole can be cooked like spinach or any other green vegetable. Wash one small head, removing the core. Cut or chop coarsely. Cook in just the water that clings to the leaves—about 5 minutes. Drain and dress with butter or margarine, salt and pepper and about 1 tablespoon vinegar. Garnish with a sliced hard-cooked egg if you have one in the salad pan.

SHAD ROE—LEMON

Now for the roe. This can be done in short order too. Wash the roe—be careful not to break the thin delicate membrane. Dust lightly with flour. Sauté gently in butter or margarine on both sides. I discovered once, to my sorrow, why shad roe must be cooked gently. I had the heat too high—the membrane broke and the roe began sputtering all over the range and me. Particularly will it do this when roe is very cold and the pan very hot. Just remember, if you want to get it out of the pan in one piece, that the membrane—and the thin coating of flour—is all there is to hold it together and you'll do your cooking carefully. Season with salt and pepper. Remove to hot platter. Add 2 more tablespoons butter or margarine to the drippings. Let it brown. Add the juice of half a lemon, a bit of chopped parsley, some chopped chives, and pour over the roe. Serve with additional lemon.

Rainy-Day Dinner

Broiled Scallops
Peas and White Turnip Julienne
Rolls
Cucumbers in Vinegar
Jellied Strawberry Rhubarb
Coffee

One thing you can be sure of in this capricious month is rain. On a rainy night it's good to get inside after you've slushed along from the office to the grocery store and bakery—and stay in. This is a night to pamper yourself with a good little dinner that tastes of spring and that will help you to forget squishing rubbers and lugging wet bags.

It isn't going to take long to prepare, either, because you're going to make use of a couple of short cuts. First the dessert. Ordinarily, gelatin desserts take considerable time to jell. It's just one of the things you don't do for a Quick and Easy meal—but you'll see.

JELLIED STRAWBERRY RHUBARB

Rhubarb sauce takes but a few minutes to make, as it cooks so quickly. Follow any basic recipe, if you buy fresh rhubarb, or use frozen rhubarb and follow package directions. Dissolve 1 package strawberry-flavored gelatin in 1 cup hot water. Add 1 cup cold water and 2 cups rhubarb sauce. Pour into freezing tray of your refrigerator. There's nothing you're going to need ice cubes for tonight anyway. In about 15 minutes it not only will be cooled but delicately jellied, which is the way I like it best. This is more than enough for one meal, so after you've taken out enough for tonight's dinner, put the rest into a dish and place in the lower part of your refrigerator to await tomorrow night, when, if you like variety, you'll serve it with custard sauce.

CUCUMBERS IN VINEGAR

The cucumbers are quickly done. Slice 1 cucumber as thin as you can—the thinner, the better. Sprinkle generously with salt—more than just the usual sprinkle. Add a good grinding of black pepper, ⅓ cup slightly diluted vinegar and 1 teaspoon sugar. Let stand until serving time.

Scallops are a treat. You rarely have them, because deep frying scallops is somewhat of a bother—other ways involve complicated sauces. But there is a short cut. Have you ever thought of broiling scallops? They really are delicious this way and so quickly done. Raw shrimps, peeled and cleaned, may be broiled in the same way, if shrimps are more available in your community.

BROILED SCALLOPS

One half to ¾ pound of scallops will be enough for two. Take a look when the fishman weighs them. You can tell whether there's enough for your appetite. Wash the scallops while the rhubarb sets, and marinate them in salad oil—just enough to coat them well on all sides. This will keep them from becoming dry. When ready to broil, drain off the oil. Put the scallops in a shallow pan—not on the broiler rack. Season well with salt and pepper. Be sure the broiler is well preheated, because this is a quick trick. Have ready 3 tablespoons melted butter or margarine. Mix with the juice of ½ lemon and 1 tablespoon minced chives or finely chopped scallions. One scallion is enough if you use the green top and all. As the scallops cook, baste with sauce, turning them frequently in the pan. Do this with a spoon. It's easier than with a fork. It takes only about 5 minutes to broil them, so stand by. Have the table set and everything else ready and waiting. And that means the vegetables too. Peas go best with fish. Use 1 package frozen peas and add 1 small white turnip, shredded on the coarsest side of your grater or thinly sliced and cut in thin julienne strips. The turnip will cook right in with the peas and just as quickly. Drain, butter and season.

Hearty Dinner on a Budget

Barbecued Meat Balls
Noodles or Rice
Rolls
Green Salad
Ice Cream
With Chocolate Sauce
Coffee

You like interesting meals—sometimes hearty—but you can't buy asparagus, new potatoes or strawberries every night in the week. This little dinner doesn't take much cash, but it has plenty of sparkle. It will be one of your frequent repeaters any time of the year. Here is an easy chocolate sauce which has the added advantage of being sugarless.

EASY CHOCOLATE SAUCE

Melt 2 squares chocolate over hot water. Add 1 cup light corn sirup. Beat with rotary beater until well blended. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Store in a jar. Serve hot or cold.

BARBECUED MEAT BALLS

Let your table condiments work for you. Combine ½ pound ground beef with ½ teaspoon salt and a good grind of whole black pepper. Shape into small balls. Brown in 1 tablespoon fat. For the sauce: Mix ¼ cup catchup, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 tablespoon vinegar, 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce and 1 teaspoon prepared mustard together. When meat balls are browned, pour the sauce over them. Add a little water and cook until sauce thickens and coats the meat. Serve with a border of freshly cooked noodles or fluffy rice.

OH-JOY-OH-BLISS!

WHAT A MEAL IS THIS!

A famous Chef does the work and you get the compliments . . . when you whisk this scrumptious Spaghetti Dinner from carton to table in just 12 minutes!

